But this exclamation ought not to be applied to the Republic of Holland, since it is not true that it suffers the most illustrious families to be thus barbarously abused. That Republic made the following answer, in the year 1665, to the Bishop of Munster, who complained, amongst other things, of some writings. ' Quidquid vero seu de hoc seu de aliis negotiis in nostris terris typis divulgatum est, de iis aliud nihil dicemus nisi illud solum, non tantum hic, verum passim in aliis quoque regionibus ægre admodum frenari & inhiberi posse typographicas licentias quantumvis diligens fuerit cautela; nosque ipsi contra istiusmodi abusus severa sæpe promulgaverimus edicta, eademque sævis & rigidis confirmaverimus executionibus. . . . As to what has been printed and published in our provinces with relation to this, or other affairs, we shall only say that the licentiousness of the press is so great, not only in this country, but in many others, that it is extremely difficult to restrain and bridle it, notwithstanding all the diligence and care taken for that purpose; and that we ourselves have often published severe edicts against abuses of this nature, and have confirmed these edicts by the most rigorous and exemplary punishments.' These words contained in a Letter of their High Mightinesses, dated the twenty-ninth of September

God in a moment's bliss rewards an age of woes,
All pleasures are not worth thy afflictions be bestowed.

A thought like this had been communicated to him a long time before: these are the words: Do not you think I converse with devout people as much as I can? It is indeed because I find them more happy, both in their life and at their death, and I would gladly partake of their condition. There is nothing like devotion for an unfortunate person; it not only solves troubles, but converts them into pleasures (47). This confirms what I have said in the Penites diverses sur les Cometes (48), and the remark [R], of the article E P I C U R U S.

Note, that tho' this Count's posthumous works are ingenious and polite; yet this Histoire amoureuse des Gaules will make him more known as an author, than any other book he wrote. His fate in this is like that of Boccaccio (49).

For the rest, the falsehood abovementioned, concerning the passage of the Boyne, calls to my mind Father Londel's Fable (50), where we find these words on the eleventh of July 1690. The battle of the Boyne in Ireland: Schomberg is killed at the head of the English. This is a downright trick, which cannot be excused by the reason I have alleged to lessen Count Buffy's fault; for this work of Father du Londel, was composed with attention, and was doubtless carefully polished and revised: writings of that kind are only commendable for a great exactness. And therefore it will be no rash judgment to affirm that the author purposely used equivocal words, to conceal from the reader the disadvantage of his party, and the true success of that battle. He not only suppressed the most essential circumstance, which is to shew whether the victory was doubtful, or whether it declared entirely for this or that nation; but he has artfully slipped in a true circumstance, which is only fit to make one conclude that King James had the honour of that day. Schomberg falling at the head of the English is a principle, from which an hundred thousand readers would draw this consequence, Therefore King William was repulsed. Give it what turn you please, you will find nothing to excuse this author: infincerity, shame, or the fear of displeasing, made him speak as he did. Notwithstanding this fault and some others of the same nature (51), his book is good, curious, useful, and convenient, and of a fine invention. Such books will be composed in other countries (52), but of whatever sect or nation a man be, he should get his book read by some impartial person well versed in the art of qualifying things; for prejudices do not suffer us to define things exactly, a mere fight we call a battle; the loss of a battle a check; an engagement, an encounter. The worst is, that some call a defeat what others call a victory. The definitions of these things are no less different among Historians, than the definitions of doctrines among Controversialists (53). And as an opinion which is Orthodox in one religion, is Heretical in another; that, which is a battle won in the Histories of one nation, is a battle lost in the Histories of another. It is a very ancient abuse, for which we see no remedy.

[F] Bad examples rise higher and higher without stint. Velleius Paterculus very well expresses this maxim, after having related that Tiberius Gracchus was massacred without any trial. This was, says he (54), the beginning of the slaughter of the citizens in Rome itself; from hence proceeded the impunity of massacres. Quod baud mirum est, adds he (55), non enim ibi confidunt exempla, unde cæperunt; sed quamlibet in tenuem recepta tramitem, latissime evagandi sibi viam faciunt: Et ubi semel recto decurratum est, in præceps pervenitur: nec quisquam sibi putat turpe, quod alii fuit fructuosum. And no wonder; for bad examples stop not where they begin: but tho' the path through which they get in be ever so narrow, as soon as they are admitted they make a new way, and extend themselves on all sides without any bounds. Thus when a man once quits the right road, he commonly arrives to the brink of a precipice: and no body thinks that can be a disgrace to him which proves advantageous to another. The same maxim may be seen in a speech of Julius Cæsar, related by Sallust. He there shews that all bad examples arise from a good beginning (56), because the innovations, which at first are good and useful, quickly give occasion to disorders, that continually increase. To this may be applied the thought of Juvenal: that man never keeps within the bounds of permission (57).

[G] The

(47) Buffi Rabin's Letters, Part iii, Letter CC, (dated the 14th of April 1672) p. 361.

(48) There is no sweetness in a sinful course of life, that can be compared to the sweetness which a devout soul enjoys. Penites diverses sur les Cometes, pag. 570.

(49) See, above, remark [I], of the article EUCALICE.

(50) They are mentioned in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Febr. 1699, p. 223.

(51) For instance, when he says upon the 11th of Aug. 1691, The defeat at Conlarbeck, without saying who those were who were defeated.

(52) This has already been done in Brandenburg.

(53) Compare with this the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, 1686, pag. 277, 309, 349, 354, 645, 960.

(54) Vell. Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. iii.

(55) Ibid.

(56) Omnia mala exempla ex bonis initiis orta sunt. Sallust. in Bello Catilina, pag. m. 146.

(57) Nemo satis credit tantum delinquere, quantum Permittas: adeo indulgent fuit iustis ipsi. Juven. Sat. xiv, ver. 233.

Septembre 1665, and printed with licence, may serve for a general answer to all complaints of the same nature [G].

XI.

An avowal of Count Buffu.
The Secret History of Pope Alexander VI.

It will not be amiss to insert here the public avowal of Count Buffu Rabutin. Five years ago being in the country, and not knowing how to divert my self, I verified the proverb, that idleness is the mother of all vices: for I fell a writing an History, or rather a satirical romance, indeed without any design to make a bad use of it; but only to employ my self, and at most to shew it to some friends, in order to divert them, and to be praised by them as a tolerable writer (yy) . . . As true events are never extraordinary enough to be very entertaining, I had recourse to invention, which I thought would be more pleasing; and without any scruple of offending the persons concerned, because I did it almost only for my self, I wrote a thousand things which I had never heard of. I made some persons happy, who had not so much as heard of it, and others who had never thought of being so; and because it had been ridiculous to choose two women for the heroines of my romance, who had neither birth nor merit, I made choice of two who wanted no good qualities, and even possessed so many, that envy might contribute to render credible all the ill things I could invent of them (zz).^{(yy) Buffu Rabutin's Letter to the Duke of St. Augustin, inserted in one of the Vies of Adrien, pag. 261, of the Dutch edition. This Letter is dated the 12th of November 1665.} You have here a true picture of the conduct of satirical writers. Whether they write out of revenge or jealousy; or whether they do it to display their thoughts, and exercise their pen; the main thing they aim at is the diversion of the readers, and to be praised for their parts. Now because they are afraid

[G] These words . . . may serve as a general answer to all complaints of the same nature.] And yet there are very few French Roman Catholics, but say that certainly the States are not displeased with the liberty which the Bookellers take to publish all sorts of satires against those who are not in the interest of their country, some on long and narrow slips of paper, and some in many pages, all full, say they, of heinous lies, especially during the last war: This is a master-stroke of policy, say they, the States were very glad, to foment animosities, and to keep up the hopes of the people, that they might more patiently bear the charges of the war, and by their hatred of a foreign government, grow more in love with their own country. The Athenians used the same policy, and if we had all they said and published against the Persians and Macedonians, we should find that the magistrates gave their helping hand to it, in order to inspire more zeal for the preservation of a government, which besides the public shews, and many other such things agreeable to the multitude, afforded them the pleasure of composing and reading a vast number of libels against the enemy. Besides it was a good way of purging the satirists, by giving vent to the peccant humours which might have occasioned defluxions on the internal parts; for had they been restrained with respect to strangers, they would have vomited their gall on their own masters. This is what the French say, without forgetting that their nation had been kept pure and clean from this licentiousness, and that it is one of their noblest triumphs. But a satisfactory answer is made to them, as to all those political mysteries they mention, which are only imaginary: they are desired to consider the constitution of a free state, wherein it is essential that every member should be secured from that rigorous prosecution, practised in monarchies. However I will quote an author who makes some complaints (58): 'They have printed in Holland, and even of dangerous consequence to posterity; and indeed who knows but that two or three hundred years hence, they who shall write the History of our times, may take these satirical books for original and authentic Memoirs written by contemporary authors, who ought to be credited (60)? Since we cannot extirpate those plagues of History, we must at least warn those, who shall come after us, not to be deceived by them.'

(58) Diversitez Curieuses, Part. 2, p. 173, 174, Dutch Edit. 1699.

(59) Compare this with the remark [C], of the article NID-NARD.

We must own there are very good things in this passage, and that the author has very good reason to say that it were to be wished, that care was taken to refute what can be refuted; for what will our posterity think, when they shall read so many things made current, without any opposition? How will they be able to forbear believing that they are true? Will they not say that if they had been false, they would have been confuted for the honour of those whom they blemish? How many people are there, whom the satires of the XVIth century keep still in error? Those of our time will not be less active in future ages, and we must not imagine, that they will not last long, because they disappear in the Bookellers shops in two or three months time. They will be preserved in the most famous libraries, in which they have been carefully collected. I do not pretend that there is a necessity to confute all libels; that would be an endless work and oftentimes very needless. It were sufficient to refute those which have something of the character of an History, and to give some general rules for discerning the truth, and securing ones self against the boldness of satirical writers. For example, a man of ability, and well informed, should criticise the book, intitled, Annales de la Cour & de Paris pour les années 1697, & 1698 (61). - Annals of the French Court, and of Paris, for the years 1697 and 1698. If he should demonstrate the falsity of five or six of the most remarkable particulars, all the rest would fall of itself; especially if the readers were told that they cannot reasonably believe what is advanced by such writers, unless their relations be attended with certain characters, for want of which one ought to suppose that all their stories are only the discourses of taverns and coffee-houses. These places are the magazines and store-houses of false news, and may be rightly compared to the Mythology of Nardis Comes. Such a work as the refutation I speak of, would serve as a preservative an hundred years hence, and would be of great use to those who should endeavour to find out Historical Truths.

The author whom I have quoted has forgot a necessary reflexion: he should have complained of France as much as of Holland; for it is particularly in France, that the writings of which he complains fell well. If the French would neither read nor buy them, the Bookellers would not print them, and thus the greediness of the French contributes as much as any thing else to the production of libels: the liars and the credulous feed one another mutually; each of them lives upon the purse of the other.

[H] The

afraid that meer truth would afford but little diversion, and that their work would be accounted a very indifferent performance, they season their relations with a thousand false stories; they invent extraordinary adventures, and conversations, and apply to those they speak of whatever they have read that is most proper to give a high relish. If you examine the smartest and best written satires, you will find the spirit of the author, his stile and character, in all the letters and conversations he ascribes to lovers. Is not this a proof that he writes a romance? If the History of Donna Olympia, and an hundred other pieces of the same nature, were written with the simplicity which is to be observed in Burchardus's Journal (xx*), they would be incomparably more creditable. I do not say that the readers would be more persuaded of the truth of them, but only that they ought to be so; for I know that the readers proportion their persuasion to the probability the writers observe, and to the pleasure they afford by satirical strokes in their writings, and by the wonderful events they relate. This is so true, that, notwithstanding the public confession of Count Rabutin, most people do still believe, that his relations are truly historical. Take notice of the words, in which he tells us, that his manuscript was falsified by a lady to whom he had lent it. 'She added to, or left out of that History, what she pleased, to expose me to the hatred of most of those I spoke of: which is so true, that the first copies that were seen were not falsified; but as soon as the others appeared, as every body loves the sharpest satires, the true ones were thought insipid, and suppressed as false (a).'

The journal I have just now mentioned was written by a German, Master of the Ceremonies at the court of Pope Alexander VI. His nation and the post he was in assure us of two things, one that he relates things faithfully, the other that he was able to come to the truth of what he relates. So that there is no reason to doubt of those infamous fights, wherewith the Pope and his daughter fed their eyes, I mean that collation which the Duke of Valentinois gave to fifty courtizans, and the combat of four stone-horses let loose upon two mares. Besides, as I have already said, the plain and barbarous style of the writer does not permit to suspect that he wrote for the diversion of the reader and his own commendation. You may judge of it by this little specimen. 'Dominica ultima mensis Octobris in fero fecerunt cœnam cum Duce Valentiniensi in camera sua in palatio Apostolico quinquaginta meretrices honestæ, Cortegianæ nuncupatæ, quæ post cœnam chorearunt cum servitoribus & aliis ibidem existentibus, primo in vestibus suis, deinde nudæ. Post cœnam posita fuerunt candelabra ardentibus & projectæ ante candelabra per terram castaneæ, quas meretrices ipsæ super manibus & pedibus nudæ candelabra pertranscutes colligebant, Papa, Duce, & Lucretia sorore sua presentibus & aspicientibus: tandem exposita dona ultimo, diploides de serico, paria caligarum, bireta & alia, pro illis qui plures dictas meretrices carnaliter agnoscerent, quæ fuerunt ibidem in aula publicè carnaliter tractatæ arbitrio presentium, & dona distributa Victoribus. Feria quinta, undecima mensis Novembris intravit urbem per portam viridarii quidam rusticus ducens duas equas lignis oneratas, quæ cum essent in plateola S. Petri, accurrerunt stipendiarii Papæ, incisique pectoralibus & lignis projectis in terram cum bastis, duxerunt equas ad illam plateolam quæ est inter palatium juxta illius portam, tum emissi fuerunt quatuor equi curserii liberi suis frenis & capistris ex palatio, qui accurrerunt ad equas, & inter se propterea cum magno strepitu & clamore moribus & calcibus contententes ascenderunt equas & coierunt cum eis, & eas graviter pistarunt & læserunt, Papa in fenestra cameræ supra portam palatii & Domina Lucretia cum eo existente, cum magno risu & delectatione præmissa videntibus (b). - - - - On the evening of the last Sunday in the month of October, fifty reputable barlots, called courtizans, supped with the Duke of Valentinois, in the chamber he had in the Pope's palace; after supper they danced with the servants and others who were present, first in their cloaths, and afterwards stark naked: then candlesticks were brought upon the table, with candles burning, and before them were thrown upon the ground a great many chestnuts, which these naked barlots scrambled for, creeping upon all four, and passing backward and forward before the candlesticks, while the Pope, the Duke, and Lucretia, his sister, were present and looking on. At last several silk doublets, pairs of breeches, and stockings, caps, and other rewards, were offered to those who should lie with the greatest number of these courtizans: whereupon those who were present publicly lay with as many of them as they pleased, and afterwards the rewards were distributed to the victors. On Thursday the eleventh of November a peasant entered the city, driving two mares laden with wood; when he came to St Peter's Square, the Pope's servants immediately run to the mares, cut their girths, threw off their wood and their pack-saddles, and brought them to the little court which is nigh the palace-gate: then they let loose four stone-horses, without any halters or bridles, who run to the mares, and with great noise and clamour, biting and kicking one another, mounted and covered them, and greatly bruised and hurt them. The Pope being at the window of a chamber over the palace-gate, and the lady Lucretia with him, beheld all this with great mirth and delight.'

(xx*) Johanne Burchardus, Agentis, Capellæ Alexandri Sexti Papæ Clericus Croniconum Magister. The Excerpt, out of his Dictionary, were printed at Hunsler in 1696, by the care of Mr Leibnitz, with this title, Specimen Historiæ Arcanæ sive Anecdote de Vita Alexandri IV Papæ.

(a) Buffon, ubi supra, pag. 269.

(b) Specimen Histor. Arcanæ seu Anecdote de Vita Alexandri VI Papæ, pag. 77, 78.

XII.
Laws of Charles V.
etc. against

Was I further to enlarge upon the subject of this Dissertation, I should hope the reader would excuse my prolixity, if he considered the abundance and importance of the matter, and the care I should take, as I have done hitherto, not to transcribe the

VOL. V.

9 F

Civilians

libels. How Pope Hadrian VI was dissuaded from overthrowing Pasquin's statue.

Civilians who have written so many books upon this question [H]. It is easy to be copious upon a subject which affords so many reflexions, and wherein the public is so much concerned, that all legislators concur in severely punishing the authors of defamatory libels. We have seen that Augustus repealed them in this respect (c): we have seen the contrary above. One of the greatest Emperors that lived since Augustus, appointed the punishment of Retaliation (d); for he ordered that libellers should undergo the same punishment with those whom they defame, and who should be convicted: nay he would not have them to go unpunished, tho' they should say nothing but truth. 'Per hoc autem quod verum scripserit infamans nullam meretur excusationem, siquidem veritatem criminis per libellum famosum pandere non licet, & edens libellum famosum injuriarum tenetur, nec admitti debet edens libellum famosum & injuriarum conventus ad probationem veritatis criminis. Joannes Thilemannus de Benignis, alias Goth. Obs. Præst. 86. Quod etiam confirmatur per constitutionem Caroli V. criminal. art. 110. in f. ubi hæc verba habentur: Et licet illata injuria prætensi facti vera esset, debet tamen diffamator talis injuriæ secundum jus & arbitrium judicis puniri (e). Haec perquam est - - - But a defamer deserves no excuse, though his defamation should prove true: for it is not lawful to divulge in a defamatory libel the truth of a crime, and the publisher of such a libel is guilty of an action of trespass, nor ought he, or the publisher of many accusations, to be admitted to prove these accusations. . . . This is also confirmed by the constitution of the Emperor Charles V, where these words are to be found. And tho' the defamation were grounded upon truth, yet the defamer ought to be punished according to the power and at the discretion of the judge.' In France the famous edict of January condemned them and their abettors to be whipped, and in case of relapse, to be punished with death. Ne quis infames libellos ad quemquam traducendum faciat, divendat, aut divendendos curet. Qui secus faxit, primum fustigium, secundum, capitalis pena indulta esto (f). I mean here by abettors those who procured the publication, or the sale of a libel. This was renewed by King Henry III, in the year 1577. The law of the Emperors Valentinian and Valens is very severe; for it condemns to a capital punishment such as meeting with a libel by chance, divulged it instead of tearing or burning it. 'Si quis famosum libellum, five domi sit, five in publico, vel quocunque loco etiam ignarus repererit, nec statim corruerit, aut igne consumpserit, sed vim ejus manifestaverit, quasi auctor hujusmodi delicti sententiæ capitali subijciatur. . . . If any person shall meet with a defamatory libel, either in a private or public place, even if he meets with it only by chance, and does not immediately destroy or burn it, but divulges the same, let him be subject to a capital punishment, as the author of such a trespass.' See Naudé's Mascurat, at the 657th page. But so many temptations to prolixity will not hinder me from putting an end to this dissertation, when I have related a thing which I remember I have promised, and made three or four other considerations.

Pope Hadrian VI hearkened to reason, when it was represented to him that the remedy he was going to employ against Pasquinades, would be useless. I will use Mr Flechier's words: 'An infinite number of libels were then current in Spain, against the court of Flanders, and against Ximenes himself. The Flemings*, who were not used to this sort of smart and ingenious satires, complained of them, and the Cardinal had orders to search after the authors and Printers, and to punish them severely. He caused, out of form, some Booksellers houses to be searched, but so lightly that no body was disturbed at it. He was of opinion that inferiors should have the liberty of revenging themselves for their sufferings by words or writings, which last no longer than a man's offended at them, and which lose their charms and venom when they are despised. Alphonso Castile, governor of Madrid, having met with some of these works reflecting upon Cardinal Hadrian and La-Chaux, Ambassadors of Charles, shewed them to them, and they were very much displeased at it, especially Hadrian, who was for some time inconsolable. It is said that being afterwards raised to St Peter's chair, and not being able to bear the statues of Pasquin and Marforio, whom the facetious and satirical wits have chosen for the confidants and authors of their calumnies, ordered them to be thrown into the Tiber; which had been executed, if the Duke of Sessa, the Spanish Ambassador, had not very wisely told him: What are you going to do, holy father? It is much better still to pardon those two mutes, than to open [H] The Civilians, who have written so many books upon this question, &c. Mr Furetiere has quoted four or five in one of his Cases. It is where he would prove that his book against some Academics deserved not to be called a libel by the sentence of the Chatelet. I have in vain searched after Gabriel Naudé's book, intitled, Mayfore, ou Discours contre les Libelles. It was printed at Paris by Lewis Boulenger in 8vo. I know not in what year. Leo Allatius mentions it in a book, (62) which he published in the year 1633. Mr Baillet (63) cites a book which I would fain have read. It is the celestial shield of John Baptist Nocette a Genoese, against Defamatory Libels. The abbot Michael Justiniani (64), says, the first edition was printed at Paris, in the year 1653, in 4to; and the second, at Lyons 1664, in 12mo. It is written in Italian. Ale- gambe's Continuator (65) mentions but one edition, viz. that of Paris 1655. See the Margin (66).

(62) Intituled, Apes Urbaines.

(63) Baillet, Jugem. des Scavans, sur les Préjuzes des libelles diffamatoires, &c. part II, ch. viii.

(64) Nath. Sorvel, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jesu, pag. 415. (65) The authors quoted by Furetiere, pag. 12, of the third Case, are Franciscus Baldinus, 1562: Fredericus Banvinius: Aurelius de Vergerius, printed in the year 1564, &c. Joan. Conradus Rokembach, at Strasbourg, in 1660, in 4to; and Henricus Berrus, at Tubingen 1611, in 8vo. I believe that his Franciscus Baldinus is a ginary author, whose name has by degrees been taken from Franciscus Baldinus, some errors of the press, and the abbreviations of the names. The book of the Libellus is mentioned in such a manner by Draudius, pag. m. 783, as possibly appears with Baldinus's book.

‘open the mouths of all the town. If you throw them into the river, the frogs will croak the raileries which we read as we go by them: and what two dead stones shall no longer speak, will be divulged by all persons living.’ The Pope followed this advice, and was afterwards less nice upon this subject (g). That you may see more particularly the sensibility of this Pope, I will set down the words of Paul Jovius, who tells us that the Spanish Ambassador was forced to renew his advice. ‘Gravissime etiam tulerat se famosis carminibus apud Pasquilli statum fuisse laceratum, sed id postea civili animo tulit, cum didicisset, eam maledicendi licentiam obscurorum hominum libertati atque nequitiae dari, ut cum insignes viros impunè carperint, fortunam suam ea vindictæ voluptate consolentur. Deceverat Hadrianus uti poëtis non obscurè subiratus, Pasquilli statum, quæ erat in Parione, demoliri, atque eam in Tyberim præcipitare: sed Ludovicus Sueffanus urbano falsoque ingenio id fieri debere pernegavit, subdens, Pasquillum vel in imo vado ranarum more, non esse taciturnum, ad id verò pontifex, exuratur ergo, inquit, in calcem, ne ejus vestigii ulla omnino memoria superfit: Tum rursus Sueffanus, rectè inquit, sed tam crudeliter concremato poëtæ clientes non deerunt, qui patroni cineres invidiosis carminibus prosequantur, & supplicii locum quotannis statuto solenni die concelebrant. Quibus verborum lusibus pontifex ab iracundia ad jocos hilaritatemque sensus omnes lenissimè revocavit (b).’

Hadrian was also highly offended at some satirical verses written upon him, and fastened to Pasquin’s statue; but he afterwards bore this with great calmness, when he came to know that this licentiousness of defaming was to be tolerated in obscure and invidious men, that they might comfort themselves in their hard fortune, by the pleasure and revenge they took in being suffered to defame eminent men. Hadrian, being highly incensed against the Poets, had resolved that Pasquin’s statue should be taken down, and even cast into the Tiber. But Lewis Duke of Sessa, a man of wit and humour, represented that such a thing ought not to be done, alledging that if Pasquin was in the bottom of the river, he would not be silent, but would croak like the frogs. To this the Pope answered, let him therefore be burnt to ashes, so that there may not remain the least remembrance of him. Right, said the Duke, but if Pasquin should be so cruelly burnt, he would not be abandoned by the Poets, his clients, who would attend the ashes of their patron with many satirical verses, and would set a part a day yearly for celebrating the place of his suffering. These facetious words appeased the Pope’s anger, and put him in a merry and cheerful humour.

(g) Flechier, Histoire du Cardinal Ximenes, liv. vi, p. 814, Dutch Edit.

(b) Paul. Jovius, in Vita Hadrianæ lecti, pag. m. 277, 278. See also Camerarius’s Historical Meditations. He supposes that the second answer was made by a Cardinal, and not by the Ambassador, and that it was a wooden statue.

XIII.
Princes who have despised slanders.

Some Princes have been as insensible to slanders as Cardinal Ximenes. See in Seneca (i) how Antigonus (k) pardoned some soldiers who had lampooned him. The same author alledges (l) the patience of Philip of Macedon, and that of Augustus. This Emperor expressed an admirable good humour towards a satirical Historian (m), who had abused him, his wife and children. Nothing was more likely to exasperate a potent Prince, who besides knew that the witticisms of the Historian had been taken up and spread over all the town. This is customary. The Chevalier de Meré has wisely said, That slanders are very much to be feared; when they are expressed in witty sayings, because people delight to repeat them, and love always to commend a good thought (n). But Seneca says with more reason still, that witty sayings, which expose their authors to some danger, are more studiously observed than any others. ‘Multa & divus Augustus digna memoria fecit, dixitque, ex quibus appareat illi iram non imperasse. Timagenes historiarum scriptor, quædam in ipsum, quædam in uxorem ejus, & in totam domum dixerat, nec perdiderat dicta: magis enim circumfertur, & in ore hominum est, temeraria urbanitas (o).’

Many of the actions and sayings of Augustus deserve to be remembered, and manifest that he was far from being mastered by anger. Timagenes, an Historian, had passed some invidious jests on the Emperor, his wife, and his whole family; and these jests were not disregarded and forgot; for men love to spread and repeat witty sayings, when they are indiscreet, and expose the authors of them to danger. However it be, the detraction of this Historian brought but a small disgrace upon him. Add to this what I have cited above (p). Nothing can be more rational than Mæcenæ’s arguments about the contempt that this Emperor ought to express for slanders (q). He advised him not to hearken to the informers against satirists, and to punish no body for speaking ill of him. You may see in Dion Cassius the reasons of this advice. The same Historian will inform you, why Cæsar took no notice of the injurious things that Cicero, and some others divulged against him (r). He thought they aimed at the glory of equalling themselves with him they abused, and that it was better to deprive them of this advantage, by avoiding to contend with them. The reason he went upon was contained in an oration of Quintus Metellus Numidicus, if we judge of it by this discourse of Aulus Gellius; however, I would not have it to be extended so far as to Cicero. ‘Cum iniquatissimis hominibus non esse convicio decertandum, neque in maledictis adversus impudentes & improbos velitandum, quia tantisper similis & compar eorum fias, dum paria & consimilia dicas atque audias, non minus ex oratione Q. Metelli Numidici sapientis viri cognosci potest, quàm ex libris & disciplinis philosophorum. Verba hæc sunt Metelli adversus Cn. Manlium tribunum plebei, à quo apud populum in concione laessurus jactatusque fuerat dictis petulantibus. Nunc quod ad illum attinet, Quirites, quoniam se amplio rem putat esse, si se mihi inimicum dicataverit, quem ego mihi

(i) Seneca, de ira, lib. iii, cap. xxii.

(k) He was not grandfather to Alexander the Great, as Seneca says.

(l) Seneca, ubi supra, cap. xxiij.

(m) Called Timagenes.

(n) Chevalier de Meré, Discours de la Conversation, p. 81, 82, Dutch Edit.

(o) Seneca, ubi supra, cap. xxiii, pag. m. 570.

(p) At the beginning of this Dissertation, citations (e) and (f).

(q) See Dion Cassius, lib. lii, pag. m. 556.

(r) Dion, ibid. lib. xxxviii, p. m. 71, 72.

'mibi neque amicum recipio, neque inimicum respicio, in eum ego non sum plura dicturus :
 'nam eum indignissimum arbitror, cui à viris bonis benedicatur : tum ne idoneum quidem, 'cui à probis maledicatur : nam si in eo tempore hujusmodi bomunculum nomines, in quo pe-
 'nire non possis, majore honore quam contumelia afficias (s). - - That we ought not to contend 'in defamation and reproaches with base and dishonest, or with impudent and wicked men, '(for by returning the same or the like invectives and abuse we put ourselves on a level with 'such persons) we may learn not only from the writings and doctrines of the Philosophers,
 'but likewise from the oration of Quintus Metellus Numidicus, who was a very wise man.
 'These are the words of Metellus, against Cneius Manlius the tribune, who had made an 'barangue to the people, in which he had treated him in the most opprobrious and abusive 'manner. Now, Romans, as for this Manlius, because he expects to pass for a man 'of greater importance, by often calling himself an enemy to me, a man whom I nei-
 'their admit to my friendship, nor regard as my enemy, I will say no more of him,
 'for I think he is far from deserving to be commended by honest men, nor even wor'thy to be censured by good men : for the very naming of such a wretch, at a time 'when he cannot be punished, does him more honour than discredit.' But Cæsar not 'being yet Emperor, his conduct on this occasion is not of so great weight for this part 'of my work as that of Tiberius mentioned by Tacitus. A lady was charged with 'having spoken ill of Augustus, of the Empress Livia, and of Tiberius. She was pro'secuted upon the law de Majestate. Tiberius would have a distinction made ; I will 'not, said he, have her prosecuted for what concerns me ; but if she be found guilty as 'to Augustus, let her be punished. He answered nothing the first day about his mother ;
 'but the next day he declared, that she desired no body should be brought into trouble
 'for satirical words spoken against her. 'Adolescebat interea lex majestatis ; & Apu-
 'leiam Variliam sororis Augusti neptem, quia probrosis sermonibus divum Augustum,
 'ac Tiberium, & matrem ejus inlulsisset, Cæsariæ connexa adulterio teneretur, maje-'statis delator arcessebat. De adulterio satis caveri lege Julia visum : majestatis crimen di-
 'singuī Cæsar postulavit ; damnarique si qua de Augusto irreligiose dixisset : in se jacta nolle
 'ad cognitionem vocari. Interrogatus à consule quid de his censeret, quæ de matre ejus lo-
 'cuta secus argueretur, reticuit : dein proximo senatus die, illius quoque nomine oravit,
 'ne cui verba in eam quoquo modo habita crimini forent : liberavitque Apuleiam lege ma-
 'jestatis (t). - - The law of violated Majesty, in the mean time, began to be of more force ;
 'and by it an accuser impleaded Apuleia Varilia, grand-niece to Augustus by his sister, 'for having by opprobrious words reviled the deified Augustus, Tiberius, and his mother, and
 'as she was nearly allied to the Emperor, for having stained by adultery the Cæsarean blood.
 'Concerning the adultery, sufficient provision was thought already made by the Julian 'Law : and as to the crimes of state, Tiberius desired they might be separated : if 'she had uttered impious speeches of Augustus, she must be condemned, but for in-'vectives against himself, he would not have her called to any account. The Consul 'asked what would be his sentiments, if she was convicted of defaming his mother.
 'To this he made no answer, but next sitting of the Senate, he prayed too in her name, that 'no words spoken against her might, to any one, be imputed for crimes, and acquitted
 'Apuleia of treason.' Suetonius will give you a more particular account of this Em'peror's indolence (u), I would not repeat what I have said before of Nero's moderation, 'and as for Vespasian, I refer you to Suetonius (w). But upon this head can any 'thing be nobler than this edict of the Emperor Theodosius ? 'Si quis modestiæ nefcius '& pudoris ignarus improbo petulantique maledicto nomina nostra crediderit laceßenda,
 'ac temulentia turbulentus obrectator temporum nostrorum fuerit ; cum pœnæ nolu-
 'mus subjugari neque durum aliquid nec asperum volumus sustinere, quoniam si id ex
 'levitate processerit contemnendum est, si ex insaniam miseratione dignum, si ab injuria
 'remittendum : unde integris omnibus hoc ad nostram scientiam referatur, ut ex personis
 'hominum dicta pensemus, & utrum prætermitti an exquiri debeant censeamus. Da-
 'tum VI. Id. August. Constantinopoli, Theodosio anno III. & Abundantio Coss. - -
 'If any person, void of modesty and shame, shall by wicked and slanderous detraction, go about 'to blast our reputation, and wantonly traduce and defame our government, it is our pleasure 'that he be not subjected to punishment, nor suffer any harshness or severity on that account,
 'because, if this proceeded from levity, it ought to be despised, if from madness, it deserves 'pity and compassion, if from a design to do an injury, it ought to be forgiven. We therefore 'will that no man be punished, or prosecuted, for such slanderous speeches, and that they be 'referred to our cognizance, that we may weigh and consider the sayings of men by their 'characters, and may judge whether they ought to be passed by or inquired into.' This con'stitution is in the Code, in the title, Si quis Imperatori male dixerit.

Modern History likewise affords several instances of this forbearance. You will find some in a Latin letter of Balzac (x), but not that of Lewis XII, which I have related in its proper place (y), nor that of Catherine de Medicis. We learn from Brantome (z), that she read even the invectives that were made against her, at which she jested and laughed, without any emotion, calling them babblers, and authors of idle-stories : Being told that the Huguenots in the second troubles had with them a very fine culverin, which they called the Queen-mother, she desired to know the reason of it. Some body being pressed by her to tell it,

it, answered, it is, Madam, because it has a greater and wider bore than any other. She was the first that laughed at it (aa). What she told some soldiers who spoke most horrible infamies of her, is to be seen in Costar's letters with some flourishes. (bb) Catherine de Medicis, tho' she was of a country where they say, God has reserved vengeance to himself, because it is the dainty bit, found nevertheless more daintiness in pardoning than in punishing, when she saw some soldiers by her coach, who said of her all the filthy things imaginable, without minding her, or so much as lowering their voice; for this Princess only looked out of the coach, and fixing her eyes upon those rogues told them: Friends, if you do not go farther off to speak ill of me, I will keep you from roasting the goose (cc), and eating it so quietly as you do. The Cardinal of Lorraine would have had them hanged for an example; but she chose rather to let posterity know that a person, who was at once a woman, a queen, and an Italian, could command her passion, and deprive herself of the pleasure she would have found in revenge. I am much mistaken, if this story is not originally in d'Aubigné's History. But to shew how Costar accommodated the circumstances of facts to his own humour, without considering the great abuses which arise from such a liberty, it will not be amiss to set down the words of that Historian (dd). I have it, says he, from the Sieur de Talsi (ee), that the King of Navarre, and the Queen-mother being (ff) at the window of a low room, overheard two black-guards, who were roasting a goose on a wooden spit, and singing infamies against the Queen: one often said that the Cardinal had lain with her, and that she had a pig in her belly, the other said it was a mule-colt; and then they cursed the bitch that did them so much mischief. The King of Navarre was taking his leave of the Queen to go and have them hanged; but she looking out of the window said, Why, what has she done to you? You may thank her that you roast the goose, and turning to the King of Navarre, and laughing, she told him, Cousin, our anger must not descend so low; that is beneath us. This I mention to shew that there was nothing mean in her.

Francis I, is one of the examples alledged by Balzac. But I find one thing in him to be blamed, which is that this King suffered his ministers and courtiers to be abused upon the stage, at the same time that he permitted his own faults to be censured. This was imitating a conduct which Antient Greece and Rome found detrimental to them. It was introducing an ill custom: and if it be an act of magnanimity in a Prince to despise the satires that concern his own person, and to forgive the authors of them; it is a visible neglect of his duty to suffer his subjects to be exposed to the insults of a satirical pen. He may abate of his own right; but the honour of his subjects ought to appear inviolable to him. Note, That Francis I. did not suffer the Players to name people. Accipimus tacite, libenterque etiam ferre solitum, se præcipuosque Regni sui proceres, quorum ipse opera consiliisque utebatur, in Fabulis & Comædiis publicis rodi & configi maledictis; recte id quidem & involute, sed tamen ut ab omnibus perspiceretur (gg). - - - We are informed that King Francis I, was wont patiently, and even willingly to suffer himself and the chief nobles of his kingdom, men whom he employed in the highest offices, to be inveigled against, and satirized in the public Comedies. It is true these invectives were concealed and disguised; yet so as that every body could perceive them.

XIV.

The Romans were more jealous of their honour than of that of their gods.

The Romans did not permit the Comic Poets to abuse the Magistrates, but they left them an entire liberty to make sport with the gods. St Austin upbraided them with it severely. At Romani, says he (bb), sicut in illa de (ii) republica disputatione gloriatur Scipio, probris & injuriis poetarum subjectam vitam famamque habere noluerunt, capite etiam punire facientes tale carmen condere si quis auderet. Quod erga se quidem satis honeste constituerunt, sed erga Deos suos superbe & irreligiose. Quos cum scirent non solum patienter, sed etiam libenter poetarum probris maledictisque lacerari, se potius quam illos hujusmodi injuriis indignos esse duxerunt, seque ab eis etiam lege munierunt, illorum autem ista etiam sacris solennitatibus miscuerunt. Itane tandem Scipio laudas, hanc poetis Romanis negatam esse licentiam ut cuiquam opprobrium infligerent Romanorum, cum videas, eos nulli Deorum pepercisse vestrorum? Itane pluris tibi habenda est existimatio vestrae curiæ, quam Capitoli, imo Romæ unius quam cœli totius: ut linguam maledicam in cives tuos exercere poetæ etiam lege prohiberentur, & in Deos tuos securi, tanta convitia nullo senatore, nullo censore, nullo principe nullo pontifice prohibente jacularentur? Indignum videlicet fuit, ut Plautus aut Nævius Publio & Cneo Scipioni, aut Cæcilius M. Catoni malediceret: & dignum fuit, ut Terentius vester flagitio Jovis optimi maximi adolescentium nequitiam concitaret. - - - But the Romans, as Scipio boasts in that disputation concerning the Republic, would not suffer their lives and reputations to be exposed to the reproach and abuse of the Poets, having decreed that if any person should be guilty of writing a Defamatory Libel, he should be put to death. The decrees they made relating to themselves were commendable enough, but those which related to their gods were naughty and irreligious. For knowing that though the gods were abused and reviled by the Poets, yet they bore it not only with patience, but also willingly, the Romans thought that they themselves deserved such abuse, less than their gods, and likewise made laws to protect themselves against it; but they suffered the invectives against the gods to be mingled even with their sacred solemnities. Is it so Scipio? do you commend this decree which made it unlawful for your Poets to inflict reproach and dishonour upon any Roman, whilst you see they have spared none of your gods? Have you then more regard for your Senate-house, than for the Capitol, for Rome alone, than for the whole Heavens; that the Poets who are by law forbidden to exercise their malicious tongues against your citizens, should be by no Senator, Censor, Prince, or Pontif, forbidden to load your gods with so many reproaches? Was it an heinous offence in Plautus or Mævius, to slander Publius and Cneius Scipio, or Cecilius to defame Marcus Cato, and was it commendable in Terence to exhort the youth to lewdness by the wicked and profligate example of 'almighty Jupiter.' This thought is older than St Austin, for Arnobius had made use of it before. 'Nec à vobis faltem istum meruerunt honorem (Dii) . . . Carmen malum conscribere, quo fama alterius coinquinetur & vita, decemviralibus scitis evadere noluitis impune: ac ne vestras aures convitio aliquis petulantiore pulset, de atrocibus formulas constituistis injuriis. Soli Dii sunt apud vos superi inhonorati, contemptibiles, viles: in quos jus est vobis datum, quæ quisque voluerit dicere: turpitudinem jacere, quas libido confinxerit atque excogitaverit formas (k k). . . . Neither ought you at least to pay this honour to the gods. By the laws of the twelve tables, you have not suffered the authors of libels, which defame the life and reputation of any person, to escape unpunished; and to the end, that no man might grate your ears with abusive reproaches, you have decreed that defamation should be punished as a capital crime. With you the gods alone are dishonoured, despised, and vilified, you are permitted to say of the gods what ever you please, and even to reproach them with those very things, which your lust prompted you to feign and devise.' A modern author does not mention it upon an occasion where it would have served his purpose. It is in a letter wherein he designed to attack the House of Austria. He enters upon the matter in hand, not citing Arnobius or St Austin, but Livy. (ll) The Spaniards, who first fought the same alliance (m m) which their partisans blame at present, took no care to preserve the veneration, due to holy things, or to maintain the immunities and privileges of the priesthood. Perhaps the reason of it was, because thinking themselves to be the lawful successors of the Romans, particularly in their design of forming an universal monarchy, they fancy they may say as well as they, *As for religion, it is more the interest of the gods than ours. They may give orders if they please for hindring sacred things from being polluted by impure hands. Ad * Deos id magis quam ad se pertinere, ipsos visuros ne sacra sua polluantur.* Is it not very likely that Charles V acted by this principle, when in the year 1552, he displaced three Lutheran ministers in Augsburg for abusing him, and suffered the rest to vilify God, his mother, and his saints; as the Duke of Nevers reproached him in a discourse he made to Pope Sixtus V (nn), upon the present state of affairs. Doubtless the Emperor Charles remembered this saying of Tiberius, and not without putting it in practice. Let us leave to the immortal gods the care of revenging injuries that are done to them. Deorum  injuriæ Diis curæ.

V O L. V.

9 G

XV.

The council of Trent ascribes the power of punishing the writers of libels to the tribunal of the Church.

I must not forget a thing which very much displeased the Civilians who were tender of the rights of the secular power. They looked upon the authority given to the Bishops by the council of Trent, as an usurpation. Let us hear William Ranchin (o o). This council, to the prejudice of the secular jurisdiction, assigns to the Bishops the punishment of the authors of Defamatory Libels, and of the Printers of them, &c. . . . Our Civil Laws commit the cognizance and punishment of them to the judges and magistrates, and not to Ecclesiastics. Some would except those that concern religion; but this exception is not pertinent; and here is an argument against it. The laws of Constantine the Great, and of Constantius, made against such libels, were enacted at such a time as this, that is, at a time when several writings were published in matters of religion against the honour of both sides. Dr Balduin has very judiciously observed it. It is a material thing, says he, to remember what were the times of Constantine and Constantius, in which the contentions of religion, not unlike ours, inflamed the passions of the parties, who thereupon sent out horrid calumnies and Defamatory Libels, as is done at present. He says this, explaining three laws of the Emperor Constantine, and two of Constantius, made upon this account, which we find at present in the Theodosian Code. These words † of the Emperors Valentinian and Valens are also remarkable: If any one is concerned for his religion and the public safety, let him declare his name, and speak with his own mouth what he would have said in Defamatory Libels. This very well agrees to libels in point of religion, and was never said in any other sense by those Emperors. Now * all the abovementioned constitutions, as also some others of the same Valentinian and Valens, of Arcadius, Honorius, and Theodosius, inflict penalties on the authors of such libels, and the publishers of them, and commit the cognizance and punishment of them to their officers and magistrates, directing such laws to them, that they may observe them in their sentences. A great many ordinances of our Kings mention in express words Defamatory and Scandalous Libels that concern religion, prescribe the punishment due to them, and the particular penalties to be inflicted on the authors, printers, and publishers, and expressly give this jurisdiction to the royal judges. As that of King Henry II, of the eleventh of December 1547, made at Fontainebleau, and another of the same Prince made at Chasteaubriant in the year 1551. That of King Charles IX, made at Mante on the tenth of September 1563. That of the States of Molins in the article LXXVII, and a great many others. I shall only set down the ' words of them, viz. that of King Charles IX, made at Mante on the tenth of September 1563, which speaks of Defamatory Libels, bills posted up, books, and such-like things concerning religion; and as to jurisdiction, it provides thus: In-joining all public magistrates, justices of the peace, and our other officers to whom it shall belong, to take a due care of them, charging our attorneys and advocates to do their duty therein, and to lay aside all other affairs, in order to examine and punish the offences they shall find. And it is moreover enjoined, that they shall observe the same ordinance in every point, and proceed briefly against the infractors, by the punishments herein specified.

XVI.
Libels complained of as being the cause of sedition.

As there is nothing so useful, but in some respects is the cause of evil, it fell out that printing, among a thousand conveniences it has brought with it, has occasioned a notable inconvenience, which is, that it has afforded satirical and seditious men a thousand opportunities of quickly dispersing their venom every where. Du Verdier Vau-Privas has inserted in one of his books (p) a Latin Poem, entitled, Encomion Chalcographiæ, where, after several praises bestowed upon printing, many complaints are brought in against the licentiousness of libels. The author of this Poem being a Roman Catholic, it must be observed that he suits his style to his prejudices in the following verses:

(p) At the end of the Supple-mentum Epitome. B. Bibliotheca Göttingensis.

Omnia dente petunt, scedant spurcaque saliva,
Digni qui Anticyræ præmia sana ferant.
A quibus & Nemesis turpissima facta repositat,
Quo meritas poenas improba turba luat.
Principis ac Princeps lacerat caput, atque tacenda Consilia in chartis vendere quisque solet.
De rebus magnis populi suffragia vana
Captant, quæ semper mens animosa fugit.
Quid non aubebit furiosa licentia vulgi,
Talia si primi dant documenta duces?
Quæ non his oritur funesta Tragoedia nugis?
Accendit quas non hæc quoque flamma faces?
Rustica seditio belli cur cornua sumpsit?
Chartæ pellaces hoc docuere nefas.
Has quoque Gorgoneo perfudit sacra cruore
Progenies vulgi, quam nova secta tenet.
Quæque Numam simulat modo religione prophana,
Et geminos fertur ferre sub aure polos.
Omnia confundit, vertit sursumque, deorsumque,
Ac gerras præter nil sua sylva crepat.
Hæc ausa est Aquilæ Romanæ vellere pennas, Atque aras magni commaculare Dei.
Non adeo lædunt Bombardæ fulmina dira:
Nil præter clades sit licet illa tonent:
Nec tantum nocuit cuiquam vis sæva cicuta,
Quantum famosi stigmata nigra libri.
His & mille modis essent hæc sæpe notanda,
Ast iter immodicum nostra Thaleia fugit.

With these advantages from printing sprung,
Swarms of defaming libels also come;
Where stand'ers stain and poison with their breath,
And madly rage, and tear with furious teeth.
Let vengeance overtake this odious crew,
Bare their most hidden crimes to public view
And with disgrace their blasted names pursue.
Defamers spare not the most sacred things,
Haunt and infect the palaces of Kings;
They slander Majesty, and all the great,
Divulge th' important secrets of the State,
Greedily catch th' applause of th' ignorant croud,
A vain applause shunn'd by the wise and good.
What limits can the popular fury know,
While such examples instigate to vice?
What fatal tragedies and civil woe,
What broils and discords will there not arise?
Libels of tumults first the causes are,
And then inflame them to a civil-war.
But none so bloody libels are, as those Which Heretics with lavish hand diffuse:
This inauspicious offspring of the croud,
Subverting all things, nought but mischief brood.

Insult

A DISSERTATION

*Insult th' Imperial throne, provoke th' avenging sword, Dare Heaven, and profane the altars of the Lord.
Not slaught'ring guns, whose issue wrapt in smoke,
And wing'd with death, flies kissing to the stroke;
Nor deadly draught, which mixing, with the blood,
Corrodes the heart and taints the vital flood,
Such woful mischief and destruction bring,
As Printing, whence defaming Libels spring.*

Erasmus exclaimed against the abuses of the press, and confuted the ridiculous excuses of the Printers, who alledged that they should want bread if they did not publish libels. 'Dicit hic aliquis: Heus divinator, quid hæc ad Typographos? Quia nonnullam mali partem invehit horum impunita licentia. Implent mundum libellis, non jam dicam nugilibus, quales ego forsitan scribo; sed ineptis, indoctis, maledicis, famosis, rabiosis, impiis ac seditiosis: & horum turba facit, ut frugiferis etiam libellis suos pereat fructus. Provolant quidam absque titulis, aut titulis, (quod est sceleratius) fictis. Deprehensi respondent: Detur unde aliam familiam, definam tales libellos excudere. Aliquanto meliore fronte respondeat fur, impostor aut leno: Da qui vivam, & definam his artibus uti, nisi forte levius crimen est, clam minuere rem alienam, quam palam eripere famam alienam: aut sine vi ad quæstum abuti tuo alienove corpore, quam vitam alterius ac famam vita quoque chariorem impetere (g). - - - Here some body may ask, what is all this to Printers? I answer, it does concern them, because the unpunished licentiousness of these men, is partly the cause of the evil I complain of. They fill the world with writings, which I will not call trifling and insignificant, such perhaps as are mine, but writings that are impertinent, unlearned, scandalous, defamatory, furious, impious and seditious libels; and there come forth such multitudes of them, that they prevent the reading of useful books, and obstruct the good effects they might have. Some come forth without any titles, or (which is still more wicked) under fictitious ones. If you discover the Printers of these libels, they say, give me wherewithal to support my family, and I will leave off printing such books. With more modesty might a thief, a cheat, or a pander say, give me wherewithal to live, and I will leave off committing these crimes; and perhaps it is not so criminal secretly to deprive another man of his property, as openly to rob him of his good name, not so criminal to prostitute one's own body, or that of another person, for the sake of gain, without using violence, as it is to attempt upon another man's life, and what is much more dear to him, his reputation.' I think that the author of the abovementioned poem does the satirical writers more honour than they deserve, by accusing them to be the cause of wars and seditions. It is certain that very often they aim at such a thing, and are over-joyed to think that their libels have produced so great an effect. They flatter themselves with it, even when they have no reason to do it, and are very well pleased to have this laid to their charge. Can one build any certain fact upon this subject? I do not think any general rule can be grounded upon it. At certain times Defamatory Libels do not stir the people, and the Publishers are disappointed in their expectations. But at other times they are real incendiaries, and trumpeters of sedition. Besides, the difference of parties and interests is to be considered; for the effects of libels are in that respect very different, and even contrary to one another: They sometimes unite those whom they would divide, and divide those they would unite. What is certain is, that the tongue and pen of a single man are sometimes more useful to a cause, than an army of forty thousand men. Francis I, confessed that the Bishop of Sion had done him more mischief by his words than all Swisserland by their arms. Maxime vero ei gloriosum fuit Francisci Regis judicium, quum asseveraret, me audiente, aliquanto plus sibi sumptus atque periculi Sedunensis facundie indomitam vim, quam tot legionum ejus gentis cuspides attulisse (r). I will not mention the confession of a King of England (s); for it would be departing from the matter in hand, and misapplying a thought to the present subject. The question is not here about the great things a King can do without going out of his closet, and by the sole power of his pen; nay, the question is not in general about the power of the pen in a war. A little book came out upon this subject in the year 1679 (t).

XVII.

Whether it be too severe a thing to inflict the same punishment upon the dispersers of libels as upon the authors of them. Some remarks against those who approve libels.

I have called the law of Valentinian and Valens, a severe one which condemns to capital punishment those who accidentally meeting with a libel do not destroy it, but on the contrary encourage it. Does this signify that I blame this law? By no means. For I cannot conceive that a man who in this case disperses a libel, is less desirous of doing mischief than the author himself, and therefore he deserves the same punishment with the author. But what shall we say of the pleasure that is taken in the reading of a Defamatory Libel? Is it not a very sinful thing before God? Here we must make a distinction. Either this pleasure is only an agreeable sensation, which affects us when we light upon any thought that is ingenious, and well expressed; or it is a joy grounded upon the dishonour of the person defamed. I have nothing to say upon the first case; for perhaps some would think that my morality departs too much from that of the Rigoirists, if I should affirm that a man is not master of those agreeable sensations, any more than of those occasioned by sugar or honey when they touch his tongue: but in the second cond case, every body will own that pleasure to be a great sin. The pleasure in the first case is of no continuance; it precedes the use of our reason and our reflexion, and is immediately succeeded by the grief of seeing our neighbour's honour blasted. If it does not cease immediately, it is a sign that the insolence of the satirist does not displease us, and that we are glad to see him defame his enemy by all sorts of stories; and then we justly deserve the punishment to which the writer of the libel is liable. I have just light upon a modern author, here are his words: St Gregory excommunicating the aubors who had dishonoured the Deacon Castorius, does not except those who read that book; because, said he, if calumnies have always been the delight of the ears, and the happiness of the people, who have no other advantage over honest men, is not he who takes pleasure in reading them, as guilty as if he gloried in composing them (v)? It is a certain maxim, that they who approve an action would willingly do it if they could; that is, if some reason of self-love did not hinder them. There is no difference, said Cicero (w), betwixt advising a crime and approving it when it is committed. To desire that an action should be done, and to be glad that it is done, are the same thing. The Roman law confirmed this maxim, having submitted the approvers and authors of evil to the same punishment. 'Et si erat servus omni modo fugiturus, vel furtum facturus, hic vero laudator hujus propositi fuerit, tenetur. Non enim oportet laudando augeri malum' (x). - - - If a slave designed to run away from his master, or to rob him, and if another person approved his design, the latter shall be liable to the same punishment with the slave: for evil must not be encouraged and increased by commendation. We may therefore say, that those who are pleased with reading Defamatory Libels, so far as to approve the authors and dispersers of them, are as guilty as if they had composed them; for if they do not write such libels, it is either because they have not the talent of writing, or that they will run no hazard. See in one of the Provincial Letters (y), the mortal contagion of calumny: St Bernard is cited there, who maintained that calumny kills not only those who publish it, but also those who do not reject it. The Heathens were not ignorant of this maxim of morality: they said that slandering was criminal, both in the slanderer, and in him who believed slanders. Διαβολὴ γὰρ ἐστὶ δεινότατος ἐν τῇ δούμῃ εἰσι οἱ ἀδικούντες, ἐς δὲ ὁ ἀδικεῖ μὲν ὁ μὲν γὰρ διαβάλλων, ἀδικεῖ, ἡ τῶν παρεόντων κατηγορίαν ὁ δὲ ἀδικεῖ, ἀναπειθόμενος πρὶν ἢ ἀπρεκέως ἐκμάθοι ὁ δὲ δὴ ἀπειθὼν τῷ λόγῳ τὰς ἐν αὐτοῖσι ἀδικεῖται. Διαβληθεὶς τε ὑπὸ τῶ ἐτέρου, καὶ νομισθεὶς πρὸς τῷ ἐτέρῳ κακὸς εἶναι. Detractio namque importunissima res est: in qua duo sunt qui injuriam faciunt, unus cui injuria fit. Qui enim detrahit, injurius est, quod non præsentem accusat; item qui huic credit injurius est, quod prius credit quam rem compertam habeat; & illi cui absenti detrahitur, ob id fit injuria quod ab altero insinulatur ut malus, ab altero talis putatur (z). - - - Defamation is a most dreadful thing: in it there are two persons who do an injustice, and one who suffers it: for he who defames does an injustice, because he accuses another man in his absence, and he who believes the defamation does also an injustice, because he believes it before he knows the truth of the matter. On the other hand the person defamed suffers an injustice from both, being accused as a bad man by the one, and deemed to be such by the other. See the book intituled, Question si Mr Arnaud est Heretique (a a)? On the other hand, we ought to believe that the same baseness which induces some people to fire a musquet upon their enemy, would induce them to defame him by a satire, if they had no other arms but their pen. It is just as amongst beasts: some do not gore with their horns, but bite (b b), it is because they have no horns, and know how to use their teeth. Let us also say, that a satirist who attempts upon the honour of his enemy with libels, would attempt upon their life with sword or poison, if he had the same opportunity. 'Maledicum à Malefico nisi occasione non differre, non minus verè quàm eleganter scripsit Fabius: vix enim est ut qui verbis ultro lædit, re etiam lædere non nolit' (c c). - - - It was a very true and ingenious observation of Fabius, that a calumniator and a villain differ in nothing but opportunity: for the man who, without provocation, wounds with his tongue, would very probably wound with his hand, if he had a fit opportunity. As for the rest, it is not always a good excuse to say, such a libel has not been answered, therefore we ought to believe it: Seneca laughed at this way of reasoning. 'Res falsa & inanis nisi corrigatur habet nonnunquam fidem, multique sunt homines judicii parum firmi qui nihil audiant legantque quod non credant nisi refutatum sciant' (d d). - - - A false and foolish assertion, unless it is refuted, is sometimes believed; and there are many men of weak understanding, who believe all they read, and all they hear, unless they know that it is refuted.

(v) Clavigny de sainte Honorine, Usage des Livres suspects, pag. 41, 42.

(w) Tu omnium stultissime, non intelligis, si id quod me arguis voluisse interfici Cæsarem, crimen sit, etiam, lætatum esse morte Cæsaris, crimen esse: quid enim interest inter forem facti, & probatorem? aut quid refert, utrum voluerim fieri, an gaudere factum? Cicero, Philipp. II, pag. m. 722.

(x) Ulpianus, in Lige 1. D. de servo corrupto. See apud Th. Raynaud. Hypoth. pag. m. 359, 360, how great a sin it is, according to the Fathers, to praise evil actions.

(y) It is the XVth lib. towards the end, pag. m. 282.

(z) Herodotus, lib. vii, cap. 11, pag. m. 388.

(a a) Page 210, 211.

(b b) See the Penitens sur les Cometes, pag. 517.

(c c) Menagius, Epist. dedicat. Vitis Mamuræ.

(d d) Seneca.

I. .
Two sorts of Hippomanes.
Servius and Pliny quoted wrong.

Hinc demum, Hippomanes vero quod nomine dicunt Pastores, lentum distillat ab inguine virus.
Hippomanes, quod sæpe malæ legere novercæ,
Miscuerintque herbas & non innoxia verba (a).

DRYDEN.

I do not add to Virgil's authority that of his Commentator Servius, cited on this subject by Ferrugerus in his Philological Lexicon, by Calepinus, Decimator, &c. for I do not find that Servius does any thing more than explain the sense of the Poet: but I will not forget the authority of Aristotle. He says, that what they call Hippomanes is a certain thing proceeding ex pudendis equæ similis genituræ, sed multo magis tenuis quam semen maris (b). Now let us hear Pliny, who has this passage: 'Equarum virus à conitu in lychnis accensum Anaxilaus prodidit equinorum capitum visus representare monstrum sic: similitur ex asinis. Nam Hippomanes tantas in veneficio vires habet, ut affusum æris mixturæ in effigiem equæ Olympiæ admotos mares equos ad rabiem coitus agat (c). - - - Anaxilaus relates, that the liquor which flows from mares when ready to take horse, being kindled in lamps, shews a frightful apparition of horses heads. It is the same with asses. For the Hippomanes has so much power and efficacy in fascination, that being mixed with the brags which made the statue of an Olympic mare, it fires all the horses who are brought near to it, with a most furious desire after copulation.' Thus much concerning the first signification: now for the second. Et sanè equis amoris inasit veneficium, Hippomanes appellatum, in fronte, caricæ magnitudine, colore nigro: quod statim edito partu devorat fœta, aut partum ad ubera non admittit. Si quis præreptum habeat affætu in rudiem id genus agitur (d). Aristotle had said the same thing (e); Virgil hinted at it, speaking of the enchantments the unfortunate Dido had recourse to in her despair:

Quæritur & nascentis equi de fronte revulsus
Et matri præreptus amor (f).

And

And cuts the forehead of a new born foal Robbing the mother's love . . .

DRYDEN.

It is easy to see that Calepinus has quoted those two passages of Pliny wrong, to prove the Hippomanes to be a little excrescence of flesh upon the forehead of a new-born colt; for Pliny speaks of it in this sense, only in the forty-second chapter of the eighth book. Besides, Calepinus (g) has quoted the eighteenth book instead of the twenty-eighth, and put carie instead of carica; and he ascribes five or six words to Servius, which are not to be found in the commentary of that Grammarian, and which signify, that the Hippomanes, being eaten by a man, makes him mad; quod in humana viscera descendens hominem in furorem agit. Decimator's Dictionary ascribes the same thought to Servius. Martinus, in his Dictionary, mangles the passage of the eighth book of Pliny; he puts equi for equis; fetus for feta, (which is nonsense); and a comma instead of a full-stop betwixt admittit and si quis. See Father Hardouin upon Pliny (h). It may be said in general, that the writers of Dictionaries take more pains to compile new things, than to mend the faults of their predecessors.

(g) The editor.
I make use of it that of Lyons 1681.

(h) In the second volume, p. 272.

II.
A plant called Hippomanes
by Theocritus.

I had reason to say that the Hippomanes does chiefly signify two things; for there is a third kind not near so remarkable as the others, since it is found only in a passage of Theocritus: besides, one must engage in a controversy with one of the most learned men of the XVIIth century to find it there [A]. This passage says, that the Hippomanes is a plant in Arcadia, which makes mares and colts run mad (i). Salmassius will by no means admit of this plant; he maintains that Theocritus did not say φουδόν, but χουδόν, and that he meant by χουδόν the brazen mare that was near the temple of Jupiter Olympius, which excited lust in horses in like manner as if she had been alive; a quality she had derived from the Hippomanes that had been mixed with the brags in her casting. We have already related a passage out of Pliny where mention is made of such a thing; but it will be better to consult Pausanias, who will give us a larger account of it. And as what he says is the key of almost all the criticisms contained in this article, it is necessary to insert his words at large.

(i) Ἱππομανέϊς φουδόν ἐστι παρ' Ἀρκάδων, τῷ δ' ἐπὶ τῷ αὐτῷ καὶ τῷ αὐτῷ μαίνονται ἀν' ὄρεα καὶ θανά
τῳ. Hippo-manes planta est apud Arcades qua concitati omnes & equulei infantunt in montibus & celeres eque.
Theocrit. in Pharmaceutria,
pag. m. 15.

III.
A brazen horse which excited lust.

Hear then how Pausanias speaks (k): Phormis going out of Menalos, his native country, went into Sicily, where he signalized himself in several expeditions under Gelon son of Dinomenes, and Hiero brother of Gelon. Having acquired a great fortune, he offered up gifts not only to Jupiter Olympius, but likewise to Apollo Delphicus. Those he offered to Jupiter are two horses with two grooms, for each horse has a groom: Dionysius of Argos made one, and Simon of Ægina the other. Upon the side of the first horse was engraven an inscription, the beginning of which is in prose, and much to this purpose, viz. Phormis, the Arcadian of Menalos, but now of Syracuse, offered it. The people of Elea say, that through the artifice of a Magician some Hippomanes had been mixed in the casting of this horse, to the end it might afford a surprising show. He is both smaller and less beautiful than several other horses in Altis (l), and has a cut tail, which renders him yet more ugly; nevertheless he stirs up lustful desires in horses, not only in the spring, but all the year round; for they break their halters, or escape out of the hands of those who hold them, to rush with greater fury (m) on this statue than if they were to leap the finest mare that ever was. It is true, their feet slip, but they do not give over neighing and renewing their furious encounters till they have been forced from the brags by mighty whipping and downright strength.

(k) Pausan. lib.
v, sub fin.

(l) It was the name of one of the dependencies of the temple of Jupiter. See
Pausan. pag. m.
156, and below,
num. VIII.

IV.
Servius justly censured by Salmassius.

Salmassius (n) has written a long discourse to shew that Theocritus spoke of this statue, and not of a plant called Hippomanes. Let us examine his reasons a little; we cannot fail to benefit ourselves by following the footsteps of so great a man. It is true, he seems not to love the plainest and most natural paths, but rather chooses to break a passage through the midst of bushes; yet one may sometimes learn more by running after him through wilds, than by taking a direct way to truth under other guides. He very justly censures Servius for saying that Virgil pretended that the plant Hippomanes

(m) Πάλλω δὲ τὴν ἱμάντιν πρὸς Ἀμαθύναν translates it nihil hercle minus fu-renter, quibus weakens the sense.

(n) Salmass. Exercit. Plinian.
pag. 939. & seq.

(1) It is thus perhaps that the Greek words of Theophrastus ought to be rendered, lib. ix, Hist. Plant. cap.
xv, καὶ τὸ τιθυμᾶλλον ἐξ τοῦ τοῦ Ἱππο-μανέϊς, ἀρῖστον δὲ τὸ ἐπὶ Τε-γῆαν, καὶ ἐνὶ μάλιστα ἐνδύεται. Salmassius, Exercit.
Plin. pag. 941,
refert ἀρῖστον,
&c. τοῦ Ἱππομα-νέϊς.

(2) lb. p. 940.

[A] The third kind of Hippomanes is only found in a passage of Theocritus: besides, one must engage in a controversy with one of the most learned men of the XVIIth century, &c.] I am not ignorant that in Dioscorides we find an herb called ἀπόκυνος, and κυνοκράμνη, and Ἱππομανέϊς; and in Theophrastus an Hippomanes made of the herb called Tithymallum, which was excellent and much cultivated at Tegea, a town of Arcadia (1). But because Salmassius (2) pretends that none but cavillers, like him who concealed himself under the borrowed name of Cercocœtus (it was Father Petau), would make use of the authority of Dioscorides, since that would be to give us the spurious additions made to that author for his genuine writings, I think we ought to pass by his testimony. As for Theophrastus, it is not certain whether we ought to read Ἱππομανέϊς in the passage I have quoted; Salma-sius (3) corrects the reading of it, and substitutes in its place δὲ ἀπὸς μένος, pretending that the author (4) meant, that juice only was drawn from the Tithymallum. Thus we see these testimonies are only matter of dispute. We must not say the same of that of Theocritus, since besides the reasons by which I have overthrown the χουδόν of Salmassius, it cannot be denied but that from the time of the Grammarian Servius the word φουδόν was in the text of that Poet. Nothing can be said positively as to the herb of which he has spoken. Aloisius Anguillara, Cratevas, Doneus, and Wecker, who take it for the Stramonium (4), called by the Arabians Nux Metel, and by the French Pomme du Perou, do not give us better conjectures concerning it than Rodericus à Castro (5), who has taken it for Petu, or Gaspar à Reies, who took it for the herb Flavia (6).

(3) lb. p. 941.
its place δὲ ἀπὸς μένος, pretending that the author (4) meant, that juice only was drawn from the Tithymallum. Thus we see these testimonies are only matter of dispute. We must not say the same of that of Theocritus, since besides the reasons by which I have overthrown the χουδόν of Salmassius, it cannot be denied but that from the time of the Grammarian Servius the word φουδόν was in the text of that Poet. Nothing can be said positively as to the herb of which he has spoken. Aloisius Anguillara, Cratevas, Doneus, and Wecker, who take it for the Stramonium (4), called by the Arabians Nux Metel, and by the French Pomme du Perou, do not give us better conjectures concerning it than Rodericus à Castro (5), who has taken it for Petu, or Gaspar à Reies, who took it for the herb Flavia (6).

(4) Medic. Polit.
lib. iv, cap. ii.

(5) In Campo
Elyfio jucundus.
Quest. XXIX.

[B] Concerning

was improperly so called (e). Servius's reason is, that Virgil, speaking of another Hippomanes, observes it was properly so called, vero quod nomine dicunt. This reason is of no force, for the Poet did not express himself after this manner, but because he saw in the very name the property of the thing: now if this property agreed with several other things, with the plant of Theocritus, with the matter that proceeded from a mare, and the like, the same name might be given them in the proper sense. Salmasius imagines with a great deal of probability, that Servius mistook Hesiod for Theocritus, when he said upon the third book of the Georgics, that Hesiod makes mention of an Herb called Hippomanes, which made horses mad; for having had occasion to speak of the same thing in his comment on the fourth book of the Æneid, he quotes only Theocritus. Had he known two Poets who had spoke of this plant, he would doubtless have named them both either in the first place or the second; but he has not done it, therefore we must believe he had only the authority of Theocritus. He has nevertheless been the cause that even at this day the Dictionary of Decimator, and the Thesaurus Fabri, have quoted Hesiod and Theocritus for the herb Hippomanes.

V Servius and Phylargyrus, unjustly censured by Salmasius.

Servius and Phylargyrus seem to have had more reason when they say, the former, that this herb made those horses mad who eat of it; and the latter, that it excited an excessive lust in mares. Salmasius pretends that they do not understand the matter, and that Theocritus meant only that the horses were enflamed with a violent desire of possessing the Hippomanes; so that if this Poet spoke of an herb, it must be understood that the horses were transported with a furious inclination to eat of it. It is thus he explains the Greek phrase μαίνεσθαι ἐπὶ τῇ (p). Be it so; but it seems to me that the explication of those two ancient Grammarians is not amiss. The preposition ἐπὶ has so many significations, that it would be strange if it had not sometimes that which we give to the preposition upon in these phrases: He was enraged, he was transported, he became furious upon it. These are all phrases where the preposition upon does not denote the object of the passion, but the cause of it.

I do not deny but Phylargyrus has made Theocritus say, what he does not precisely say, viz. That the herb Hippomanes excites in mares who eat of it an ardent lust; but it is nevertheless very likely Theocritus understood it so. For proof of this, we need only consider his wish, that the object of his love seized with a desire like to that of those mares, might come to him; as also what the Naturalists observe as to the excessive lust of these animals. Aristotle says (q) no female creatures equal these in lust; and that to express the lust of other females excessively amorous, they made use of the name which denotes that of mares. Ælian observes the same thing in the eleventh chapter of the fourth book of his History of Animals. Others have remarked, that they will go in quest of the males, even over mountains and through rivers (r).

Scilicet ante omnes furor est insignis equarum.

Illas ducit amor trans Gargara transque sonantem Afcanium; superant montes & flumina tranant (s).

But far above the rest, the furious mare,
Barr'd from the male, is frantic with despair.

For love they force through thickets of the wood,
They climb the steepy hills, and stem the flood.

DRYDEN.

Lastly, Horace foretelling to a mistress who had slighted her lovers, while she was in her prime, that the time would come mankind would be even with her, tells her she would then feel the rage that transports mares.

Cum tibi flagrans amor & libido,
Quæ solet matres furiare equorum,
Sæviet circa jecur ulcerosum (t).

Let us infer from hence by the by, that gallant poetry, was not in the reign of Augustus, as now-a-days, an enemy to all gross ideas; but let us chiefly remember to conclude from the authorities which have been quoted, that Servius and Phylargyrus have well enough understood the passage of Theocritus, not to deserve the censure Salmasius passed upon them. It was much more natural to understand it of an amorous passion excited by the herb Hippomanes, than of a desire of eating that herb: and it signifies little, that only Theocritus has spoken of this plant (v), since he might have grounded his assertion on some old tradition which might be contradicted by the following ages. In truth, it would not be very surprizing that there should be such an herb, as could produce this effect. That which the Italians call Sferra-Cavallo, because it is pretended that horses no sooner tread on it, but they are unshod (w), seems to me much more miraculous.

(e) Phylargyrus, another old Commentator on Virgil, is also involved in this censure, since he has insinuated the same thing with Servius.

(p) Μαίνεσθαι ἐπὶ τῇ non significat qui alioquin rei pulsus vel transfusus ad insaniam adigitur, sed qui rei causa reus cupiens est quocunque modo potius amore infans. Salmasius, ubi supra.

(q) Τὴν δὲ βῆρ καὶνὴν ἰμμερὴν αὐτὴν ἴσχει τῆς τοῦ ἀνδρὸς ἐπιθυμίας πλεονεξία. Plin. lib. ix. c. 47. de Arte Anim.

(r) In fœcis agitantur equi, insuperant montes Per loca diruta, æque sequuntur equos. Ovid. lib. ii. ec. 487. de Arte Anim.

(s) Virgil. Georg. lib. iii. ver. 266.

(t) Horat. Od. XXV, l. 1.

(v) See the remark [A].

(w) See Martialis, lib. ii. c. 135.

VI.
Confutation of the opinion of Salmalius.

Pliny mentions an herb by means of which the woodpecker makes a wedge thrust into a tree jump out (x). Yet of this he seems to doubt in another book of his (y).

Let us examine more closely the opinion of Salmalius, and we shall better see that the changing the word φύτον into χυτόν was not happily conjectured. To justify that change, we must suppose, 1. That Theocritus believed that the temple of Jupiter Olympius was not in Elis, but in Arcadia; or that knowing it was not in Arcadia, he has nevertheless affirmed it, either by reason of the nearness of those two provinces, or because Phormis who consecrated this brazen mare was of that country. This first supposition is very absurd; for who can suppose that the ceremony of the Olympic games could permit a fine wit to doubt in what province of Greece they were celebrated? In this respect the Greeks were all good and exact Geographers, inasmuch that it can never enter into the thoughts of any attentive man that Theocritus could err upon this head, or dare to deprive the people of Elis, in favour of those of Arcadia, of the temple of Jupiter Olympius, one of the seven wonders of the world; and to deprive them of it for two bad reasons. But here are other suppositions not less strained than the foregoing. We must suppose in the second place, that speaking only of the lust of horses, Theocritus made use of the feminine gender πῶσαι καὶ πῶλοι, and all the mare-colts; καὶ θοαὶ ἵπποι, and all the mares (x). What reason for this? A brazen mare is the object desired; her Hippomanes excites the lust only of the horses, as Pausanias observes; and yet Theocritus meant only the lust of the mare-colts and mares. The reason is this: the Doric dialect made use of the feminine article to denote a horse, in like manner as the common dialect employed the masculine to denote a mare. Be it so; but as Pausanias, even in the passage which Salmalius quotes for proof of the remark concerning the common dialect, makes use of the masculine article for horses, and the feminine for mares, we must believe that those who made use of the Doric dialect applied to each sex its proper article upon certain occasions: and it would be easy to prove that no Greek author has made a horse feminine, as the French do the word perdrix; or masculine, as they do the word lièvre. Now if a like usage cannot be shewn in the Doric dialect, Salmalius's answer will appear to be no better than a chimera. 3. We must suppose that the Hippomanes of the brazen mare extended its virtue a great way, since the horses of which Salmalius will have Theocritus to speak, ran raging over mountains, and flew to enjoy their beloved object superatis montibus. No such thing is hinted in the relation of Pausanias, and the quite contrary is to be found in these words of Pliny, mares ADMOTOS ad rabiem coitus agii.

Salmalius finding himself perplexed with these mountains of Theocritus, changed them into something else that might better agree with his notions: he pretends therefore we ought to read ἄρτα, in the spring; and not ἀν' ἄρτα, thro' the mountains; but by misfortune nothing agrees worse than this criticism of his with the text of Pausanias, where it does plainly appear, that without any distinction of seasons, the horses were inflamed with lust after the statue, whatever time of the year it was (a a). Lastly, Salmalius had no reason to suppose that this statue, impregnated with the virtue of the Hippomanes, was a mare. I know very well Pliny has said it before him; but Pausanias, who made it his principal study to examine the monuments of Greece, and who is an author incomparably more exact than Pliny, leaves us no reason to doubt that this statue was a horse, since he every where makes use of the masculine article when he speaks of it, and employs the feminine in the same place to denote a mare (b b).

VII.
A Reflexion upon what Pausanias relates.

I shall not examine what credit is to be given to what Pausanias relates concerning the virtue of this statue, which was a kind of Talismanic virtue; but shall however say, that the extreme fury of lust incident to horses, might well enough be raised by a statue without the help of any philtre. Let us suppose them to have a soul; could they not fancy that a statue is the animal it represents, or at least that it is a very fine statue? In the first case, why might not the same thing happen to them, mutatis mutandis, as to those birds who pecked upon the picture of a vine? An horse painted by Apelles made the living horses neigh (c c). In the second case, why should they not be subject to the infirmity many men have been guilty of, that is, to the lascivious loving of a statue (d d). I confess it may be objected amongst other things, that in love the eyes are not the sole guides of animals (e e), as they are very frequently of men; and that the smell is the principal vehicle of this passion in the machines of animals; whence it follows, that a statue is destitute with respect to them of the main springs of love. But the question is, whether the skill of the statuary might not supply this defect by imitating the attitudes of a mare excessively lustful; and whether the story so celebrated by the Greek Poets, and by Ausonius after them, concerning Myron's brazen heifer, can be doubted of [B]? Livy, more credible alone than an hundred Poets, relates that at Syracuse

[B] Concerning Myron's brazen heifer. Myron a native of Eleuthera in Boeotia, made an heifer of brass which furnished a fine topic for the Poets. There are in the Anthology (7), near forty epigrams upon this subject. Ausonius has made eleven on the same
VOL. V. No. CXL.

theme, which are ingenious enough; this is one of them:

Becula sum cælo genitoris facta Myronis
Ærea: nec factam me puto, sed genitam.
91

Sic

(x) Plin. lib. x,
cap. xxviii.

(y) Idem, lib.
xxv, cap. iii.

(x) t do not translate θοαί, which signifies swift-footed.

(a a) Ἀρτὰ πῶσαι ἐπ' αὐτὸν ὄργισ-σιν ἡμέραν.

(b b) Ἐπιπνέουσιν αὐτῷ πολλὰ δὴ τι ἐμμε-νέρον ἢ ἐπὶ τὴν καλλίσ-την ἵππον ζώσαν τε καὶ ἡδύδα ἀνακαί-νισθαι.
Id. qd. iuxta
Personem Romuli
Amasii, illum invasit nihil hercle minus fa-cilem quam si viventem pul-cherrimam equam gregalem inituri adorrentur.

(c c) Plin. lib.
xxxv, cap. x.
Valer. Max.
lib. viii, cap. xi,
says it was a mare, quo excusabilior est error equi, qui visā picturā equæ hin-nitum edere co-actus est.

(d d) Several Moderns have made a collection of them, amongst others Balthaz.
Bonifac. Histor. Ludic.
lib. xiv, cap.
xiii.

(e e) See the passage of Lucian, of Perugia, in remark [B].

CONCERNING THE HIPPOMANES.

778

author does not say that Arcas the Olympian mingled some Hippomanes, &c. but that Phormis the Arcadian discovered the virtue of the Hippomanes at Olympia, tantam in eo vim novit Olympiæ Phormis Arcas. I believe Cardan occasioned the error of one Peter Boasitua, surnamed Launai, a native of Bretagne, (for these are the titles he loved to distinguish himself by) highly praised by la Croix du Maine. Who would not be surprized, of an horse, formed by a certain artist in Heraclea, a province of Peloponnesus, having a cut and deformed tail, but perfect in all the other parts of the body, which however the other horses en- devouring to leap with so much heat and transport, as to break their hoofs by their frequent rear- ings upon it, whilst the slipperiness of the brass it was composed of still cast them off; and not- withstanding all the blows that could be given them, they could not be driven away, but neighed after the statue as if they had met with a mare ready to take horse? Du Bartas hinted at the same wonder in these verses (rr).

Cette jument d'airain sur qui les estalons
Lançoient estant en rut leurs fragiles talons.

(rr) Sixth day of the first week,
ver. 826.

That brazen mare, by famous Myron cast
Which horses leap'd, and as a mare embrac'd.

But Simon Goulart, his Commentator, has wrongfully imagined that this related to Myron's masterpiece, who made, says he, a mare or heifer of brass so very natural, that the horses ran to leap her. If he had remembered the passage of Pausanias, or rather that of Pliny, and considered that the epigrams he speaks of in the same place do not permit us to doubt whether Myron made an heifer or a mare, he would not have fallen into this little error. See, above, the remark [B].

X.
Whether there is a fourth sort of Hippomanes.

Besides the three sorts of Hippomanes I have spoken of, there are some authors who mention a fourth. They ground themselves upon Aristotle's authority, pretending that he acknowledged two sorts of Hippomanes in mares, one that flows before the horses approach, the other after they have allayed their appetite by the first congress. Salmasius, who finds this distinction in Aristotle (ss), put me upon reading attentively the words of this Philosopher (tt): but I have not found it there, tho' I saw the remark concern- ing the Hippomanes, repeated twice over in a very few lines. That repetition ought not to carry our thoughts to two different things: for tho' Aristotle be concise, it is ne- vertheless true that he considers the symptoms of lascivious mares at two different times; and the reason of his doing it is, that he particularly explains the accidents of those mares that took wind, if I may so speak, quæ ἐξαιμῶσθαι, eventari dicebantur. He intimates that this happened not to mares who had an horse at hand; I say, he intimates it in the place where he observes that by reason of this accident the Cretans left the mares and stallions together: and having spoken of the courses which those mares took towards the north or south, to whom this accident happened, he speaks in general of the signs by which the mares are known to want the horse; and as he had spoken of the Hippomanes with respect to those who do nothing but run, he speaks of it also with respect to all mares in general [C]. I see no ground from hence for multiplying the kinds of Hip- pomanes: but yet suppose they were multiplied (vv), Salmasius would still be mistaken, in

(ss) Differentiam itaque constituit Aristoteles inter hoc ἵππο-μανὲς quod eque tum ejiciunt ubi semel salutem fuerint, et quæ simile naturæ, & illud ἵππομανὲς quod illis defuit ab inguine eo tempore quo ma-ris cupiditate andecant nec dum admirant. Sal-
mas. Exercit.
Plin. pag. 941.

(tt) Arist. Hist.
Animal. lib. vi,
cap. xviii.

(vv) Father Hardouin in Plin. Tom. ii,
pag. 211, acknowledges two kinds of it.

Mares that took wind.

[C] He speaks of it also with respect to all mares in general. It is thus I explain that passage of Ari- stotle, because otherwise there would seem to be a con- tradiction in it as may be seen by this abstract. We see there that the lust of the mares, is called a furious appetite of enjoying the male, ἵππομανίς; that it is said also that at that time they take wind, ἐξαιμῶσθαι; that in that condition they depart from other mares and horses; that they run not towards the east or west, but towards the north or south; that they suffer nothing to come near them, except they are tired down, or come near the sea-side; that then they cast out something called Hippomanes; that the mares at the season of copulation gather together; that they love company more than before; that they move more frequently their tails; that their neighing changes; that they cast the Hippomanes. They stale also, says Ari- stotle, more frequently, and sport with one another when they are ready to take horse. I am sorry, I am not clear-sighted enough to perceive much perspicuity and exactness in these words: but however it be, if ἐξαιμῶσθαι does not differ from ἵππομανίς, as the species differs from the genus, it will follow that Ari- stotle would teach us that mares ready to take horse, avoid all company, and yet that they associate with greater pleasure than before. Now, as this would be a ridiculous contradiction, it must be concluded that Aristotle by ἐξαιμῶσθαι meant only a kind of heat; or if it be pretended that this contains something common to all mares, we must conclude, that it was a state that preceded the maturity of the passion, and what Aristotle a little after calls ἔξαρ τῆς ἐχέας, tempus coitus. But this utterly overthrows Salmasius's system, I mean that explication he is so fond of, and repeats more than once in another page, after having justly censured the great man who thought that Ari- stotle's ἐξαιμῶσθαι ought to be understood of the wind. It is certain that Aristotle does not speak of this, and there would be no objection against Salma- sius, if he had contented himself with affirming that this Greek word signifies the refreshing one's self with the wind sucked in with open mouth: but he is unfortu- nate in what he adds to this interpretation. ἔξαιμῶσθαι, sibi be (13), est eventilari & vento excepto (13) Salmas. Ex- hiante ore refrigerari, quod equæ faciunt ubi ad sa- ercit. Plin.

tietatem initæ non fuerint. Ex eo quidem interdum pag. 943.
& concipere autores tradidere, idque in Hispania tantum. Non tamen ἐξαιμῶσθαι significat ex vento concipere. Loquitur Aristoteles de iis equa- bus quæ admiserint sed non satis, nec meminit eo loco conceptionis ullius quæ ex vento fiat. -- ἔξαρῶσθαι, signifies to be eventilated or fanned, and to be cooled by taking in air with open mouth, as the mares do, when their lust is not fully satisfied. Authors indeed have said, that by this they are sometimes impregnated, and that this happens only in Spain. But ἐξαιμῶσθαι does not signify to be impregnated by the wind.

A DISSERTATION

in pretending that Aristotle's distinction respects the non-enjoyment of some mares, and the enjoyment of some others far short of satiety, and that those mares who took wind, were of the latter sort. This is by no means Aristotle's doctrine; on the contrary, we should infer from his discourse, that they totally abstained, since, besides the reflexion he makes upon the conduct of the Cretans, he says in express words, that they wandered from the herd, and never suffered themselves to be approached till they were tired, or came near the sea ((ωω), and that then they cast the Hippomanes. Ὅταν δὲ τὰτε πάθοςι, θένοντι ἐκ τῶν ἀλλων ἱππων . . . ὅταν δὲ ἐμπισθὴ τὸ πάλος ὑδναῖς ὡσπι παλσιδιζόν, τότε αὐτοί τοις θαλάσσας εἰλωθοῦσι τότε δὲ ἐκβάλλονσι τι. &c. Cum vero ipsæ ab aliis equis secessant . . . quandoque ad mare deveniant ; tum aliquid emittunt, &c. (<x x).
Mr Hofman

Mr Hofman

(14) See St. Augustine, De Civitate Dei, bk. xiii, cap. vi.

THE pretended fecundity of those mares.

(15) Several authors, as Fr. Modus Nov. Antiq. Lect. Epist. Lasrio, Quæst. J. words:

(15) Several authors, as Fr. Modius Nov. Antiq. Lect. Epist. lxxiv, Dausqueius in Silium Italicum, lib. iii, pag. m. 134, falsely father upon Aristotle those conceptions.

Continuorque avidis ubi subdita flamma medullis,
Vere magis (quia vere calor redit ossibus) illæ
Ore omnes versæ in Zephyrum, stant rupibus altis, Exceptantque leves auras: & sæpe sine ulla
Conjugiis, vento gravidæ (mirabile dictu)
Saxa per & scopulos & depressas convallas
Diffugiunt, non, Eure, tuos, neque folis ad ortus,
In Borean, Caurumque, aut unde nigerrimus Austër Nascitur, & pluvio contristat frigore cælum (16).

(16) Virgil.
Georg. lib. iii.
ver. 271b

Burns fiercer (for in spring the flame returns),
 On lofty rocks they stand, and in their month's,
 Op'd to the western breeze, the gentle air Receive; and oft (prodigious to relate!)
 Without commotion, pregnant by the wind,
 O'er cliffs, and bills, and lowly vallies fly;
 Not tow'rd the east, or to the rising sun,
 Nor tow'rd the north, or north-west, or that point,
 Whence the black south blows, frowning on the world
 With fog, and rain, and saddens all the sky.

TRAPP.

From this description it may be inferred, that it was the west wind that impregnated the mares, and that they rested upon some rising ground to receive it, turning their heads or tails to it, (for that is a point that has not yet been cleared by the critics, there being reasons on both sides) after which they ran as if they had been mad, either from north to south, or from south to north. These fictions are pardonable in the Poets; but we cannot tell how to pardon (17) Varro, Pliny, Solinus, Columella, and some others, for having affirmed, as a certain fact, that in Portugal the mares bring forth colts without any other fire than the wind. The Historian Trogus Pompeius has much ridiculed this (18). Andrew Renedius, a learned Portuguese, says (19), that there is no instance of it in his country. Francis Fernand of Corduba (20), has confuted the same story with arguments, authorities, and experience.

(17) See Jo. à Wower. de Polymath. cap.
51.

(18) Justin. lib.
xliv. cap. iii.

(19) Antiq. L. stanicar. lib.

(20) Didascal multipl. cap.
xlviii.

(21) De Civ
Dei, lib. xxi
cap. v. See last paragraph this remark.

nated by the wind. It was not a point that all the Heathens generally agreed in. We find it exploded in Justin, with the approbation of Leonard Coquezus (22). Euthathius, Bishop of Thessalonica (23), looks upon it as a fable, and every body at present laughs at it (24). But after all, a better reason might be given for it in the new Hypothesis, that all animals proceed from an egg, than from the courtes the mares made from one pole to the other. If Aristotle, who appears not to doubt of this fact, would have exercised his principles of Phycic upon it, he would have found himself more work than Des Cartes did in the direction of the loadstone. Mr Des Cartes might here have been put to a stand, for want of a channelling, or rebates of the insensible parts, such as would be necessary to explain the virtue of the southern and northern winds upon mares that had sucked in the western. However it be, I do not think that the present managers of the studs could supply Aristotle with memoirs to confirm those he has published. Who would believe, for example, that there was at Opus (25) a stallion which could do his office at forty years old, tho' he wanted assistance to raise his fore-legs (26)? Pliny has well copied this passage of Aristotle, when he says, Opuntis & ad quadraginta durasse ante agistum modo in attollenda priore parte corporis (27). But Solinus has performed the part of a very bad transcriber in these words: "Notatum etiam advertimus Opuntis nomine equum ad gregariam venerem durasse in annos quadraginta (28). . . . We find it also recorded that a stallion named Opus, was able to leap the mares when he was forty years old." This horse belonged to an inhabitant of Opus, and Solinus has taken the name of the place for that of the horse. Blamius (29) has not forgot to censure him for this slander. The omission of his wanting to be helped up by the fore-feet, which was the principle rarity of the fact, did not less deserve to be censured.

did not less deferre to be censured.

What I have said of St Augustin is applicable also to Origin (30) and to Lactantius, who have endeavoured to persuade us of the immaculate virginity of the mother of Jesus Christ, by the examples of conceptions without the use of a male, storied by the Heathens. * Quod si animalia quædam vento aut aura concipere tolerare omnibus notum est, cur quisquam mirum putet cum Spiritu Dei cui facile est quidquid velit, gravatam esse Virginem dicimus (31). -- If (31) Lactant Div.
it is universally known, that some animals are impregnated by the wind, or air, why should any man think it wonderful that the Virgin Mary conceived by the Spirit of God, who can easily do whatever he pleases.' The Fathers made any theft, & ex omni ligno Mercurium. Infruct. lib. ix, cap. xii. pag. m. 249. 247.

If they had only allegeded this as an argument ad hominem, they could not be blamed; but they affirm it as a certain fact. I do not know whether they cite what Pomponius Mela relates of some savage Æthiopian women, who became mothers without the concurrence of any man : * Super eos grandis litoris flexus grandem insulam includit, in qua tantarum fœminas esse narrat, totorum corpore hirsutas, et cum coitu marium sua sponte secundas : adeo aspersione coitu marium sua sponte secundas : ne raris esserifque moribus, ut quædam contineri ne rarior lætetur vix vinculis possint. Hoc Hanno rebus, & quia detracta occidis coria peruleratis, sudes habitus est (32). -- Above these turnings of the great coast, (32) Pomponius Mela, lib. vi. c. 12. there is a very large island, whith, they say, is inhabited by women, whose bodies are all over hairy, and who conceive of themselves, without the help of men. Their manners are so rough and wild, that some of them can hardly be subdued and mastered, even when they are in chains. This is related by Hanno, and as be bewrote upon some of the skins of these women who had been (w w) The Geneva edition, 1605, and the Paris, 1629, have marem instead of mare.

(x x) Arist. ubi supra.

(25) A town of the Epicnemidii Locri.

(26) Arist. Hist.
Anim. lib. vi,
cap. xxi.

(27) Plin. lib.
viii, cap. xlii,

en (28) Solin. esp.
xlv.

er. (19) Exhibit.
the Phil. pag. 936.
a,

also (30) In Ebris adversus Gallia

con[caaura

- If (31) Lactant
- Institut.

man pag. 246
ed by 247.
be ligno ar-but while-some with-and tan-us, & aspeetulic, habita

inba- la, lb. 1
y, and ix.
f men.

of them en they d as be

• been

CONCERNING THE HIPPOMANES.

773

XI.
Remarks upon Hofman
and Furetiere.

Mr Hofman (yy) speaks of the Hippomanes according to Salmasius's ideas, as well upon the passage of Theocritus as that of Aristotle; and therefore we need only refer him to what has been said above. Only let me be allowed to tell him, that if he well consults Pausanias, he will not cite him de Arcad. (zz), nor find there that Phormis dedicated a mare in Olympia; for that author expressly says at the end of the fifth book, that Phormis consecrated two horses and two grooms. As to Mr Furetiere, I have no considerable faults to tax him with; I only observe, that he has been a little unexact in citing Pliny only for the Hippomanes on the forehead of colts. That naturally leads us to this fallacious thought, that Pliny speaks of no other Hippomanes. I could wish also he had cited Aristotle, whose authority is justly greater than Pliny's. As to the other sort of Hippomanes, he should not have cited Servius, but Virgil; Servius being only his interpreter, without saying whether the fact be true or false. Neither Cæsar de Rochefort's Dictionary, nor Castellus's Lexicon Medicum copiously enlarged by Bruno, say any thing of the Hippomanes.

(yy) Vol. iii.
pag. 162; and
Vol. iv., pag.
495.

(zz) The book concerning Arca- dia is the eighth, that wherein he speaks of Phormis is the fifth, and the first of the two wherein the author treats of Elys.

XII.
What is to be believed of the Hippomanes.

I will not conclude this article without observing what Aristotle has so judiciously determined concerning the Caruncula on the forehead of the foal. He says, that it is said to grow there, but that the dam takes it off by licking, and that the stories concerning its virtue are to be reckoned fables invented by women and enchanters. τὸ δὲ ἵππομανὲς καλλίμανον ἐπιφύεται μὲν, ὥσπερ λέγεται, τοῖς πωλοῖς. αἱ δὲ ἵπποι περιλείχουσαι καὶ καθαίρουσαι περιτρέφουσιν αὐτὸ. τὰ δὲ ἐπιμυθεύματα πείλασαι μᾶλλον ὑπὸ τῶν γυναικῶν καὶ τῶν περὶ τὰς ἐκβολὰς. Quod Hippomanes vocant, heret quidem fronti nascentis pulli, ut narratur, sed equæ perlambentes abstergentesque id abrodunt: quæ autem de hoc fabulantur, figmenta mulierularum & professorum carminis incantamentorum esse credendum potius est (a). Nevertheless this virtue has been talked of in all ages, and one may easily see that the persuasion which first obtained of its being serviceable as a philtre, was grounded upon the story, that if the mare did not swallow it, she did not suckle her young. An ancient Poet, cited by Apuleius, enumerating philtres, calls this binnientium dulcedines; which agrees extremely well with the Matri præreptus amor, which I have cited from Virgil. But as philtres rather produced fury than love, thence the Hippomanes came to be considered as a baneful drug. Juvenal says that Cælonia, by employing it upon her husband Caligula, caused that mad rage which made him commit so many crimes.

(a) Arist. Hist.
Anim. lib. viii.
cap. xxiiv., pag.
699, 700.

Et furere incipias, ut avunculus ille Neronis
Cui totam tremuli frontem Cælonia pulli Infudit.
Ardebant cuncta & fracta compage ruebant,
Non aliter quàm si fecisset Juno maritum Infanum.

Hæc poscit ferrum atque ignes, hæc potio torquet,
Hæc lacerat mixtos equitum cum sanguine patres,
Tanti partus equæ, tanti una venefica constar (b).

(b) Juven. Sat.
VI., ver. 614.

Some nimbler juice would make him foam and rave,
Like that Cælonia to her Caius gave,
Who plucking from the forehead of the foal
His mother's love, infus'd it in the bowl;
The boiling blood ran hissing in his veins,
Till the mad vapour mounted to his brains.
The thund'rer was not half so much on fire,
When Juno's girdle kindled his desire.

But this fierce potion calls for fire and sword,
Nor spares the commons, when it strikes the lord:
So many mischiefs were in one combin'd,
So much one single pois'n'der cost mankind,

DRYDEN.

The world is not yet cured of this superstition; for we find in a pretty late romance (c), which is a faithful and agreeable copy of the conduct of many persons; we find there, I say, some Parisian ladies passing a whole night in watching a mare, to catch I know not what they were made to believe a foal brings into the world on his forehead, and to dress it with certain ceremonies, which in their opinion, would become a wonderful and irresistible

(c) Avantures de Henriette Sylvie
de Molière.
Part. iii., pag.
50, Dutch Edit.
1674.

VOL. V.

9 K

philtre.

'been slain, what he said was believed.' You see that Laëtantius quotes Hanno; but he misrepresents him, for Hanno has not said that the women of that island were without men: 'Non recte Hannoni adtingit, insulam hanc habitari à feminis solis, & quidem sua sponte fecundis, cum Hanno contrarium dicat: utriusque enim sexus homines in ea insula fuisse scribit,

'quamvis multo plures feminas (33). . . . He wrong-fully ascribes to Hanno, the having related that this island was inhabited by women only, and that these women conceive of themselves: whereas Hanno says the contrary; for he writes that there are both men and women in that island, though a great many more women than men.'

(33) Isaacus Vof-sius, in Pompon.
Mela, ibid.
Gasp. à Reles quem vide in Elysi. jucunda
Quest. Campo, Quest. XLII.
num. 13, & seq. knew not Hæle's error.

philtre. This philtre was to be given cunningly to the soldiers, and to the captain himself, if there was occasion for it, and immediately both the captain and soldiers were to run through the streets, and offer to do all that should be desired of them. The towers and gates seemed, if I may so speak, to be ready to fall of themselves, to give liberty to whomsoever the ladies pleased. If we consult the journal of the German Naturalists (d), we shall be fully convinced that the colts are foaled with the Hippomanes on the forehead; for they give us the anatomical figure and description of one of them, which had been brought quite hot to a Physician, called Mr Raygerus. He had often desired to see some of them fresh, having before seen some that were dry: he experienced that the mare gave milk to the colt as usual, tho' that part was taken from it; so that if on one hand he lends assistance to the Antients, he discredits them much on the other. His Hippomanes is much larger than Aristotle or Pliny represent it.

(d) Annus Oclavus, impressus 1678, pag. 94, & seq.

A DISSER-

A DISSERTATION UPON THE DAY.

I.
Reflexions upon the definition of the Natural and Artificial Day.

EVERY body knows that the word Day has several acceptations, and that there is the Natural Day, the Artificial Day, the Civil Day, the Astronomical Day, &c. I could make many observations to shew that in the definition of these several sorts of Days there is hardly ever any perfect exactness; but as the particularizing these punctilio's might carry me too far, I shall omit more of them than I shall mention.

It is somewhat strange that authors are not agreed in the definition of the Natural and of the Artificial Day. Some define the Natural Day, the time betwixt sun-rising and sun-setting; and the Artificial Day, the space included in twenty-four hours (a). Others define the Natural Day, the space of time the sun takes to make a complete revolution about the earth; and the Artificial Day, the time from sun-rising to sun-setting (b). I own this difference lies more in the words than in the thing it self, and that we are not obliged to give words the same sense that others give them; but it would be very convenient for readers if the signification of certain terms was fixed, and was not converted from white to black in passing from one book to another. Besides, they who define the Day, the time from sun-rising to sun-setting, chuse the least common signification; since, for one Cosmographer who measures each Day's extent by it, in treating of the difference of climates, (in which it is certain that the sun's rising and setting are only regarded) there are millions of people who understand by the word Day all the time that the Horizon is enlightened. This appears by these common phrases, At break of Day; It was already Day; It was Day still; whereby the morning twilight and evening twilight are manifestly denoted. It is therefore exposing the books of the Dogmatists to the complaints and censures of most people, to say that the revolution of the sun comprehends the Day and the Night; but by the Day is meant the time from the rising to the setting of the sun, and by the Night the time from its setting to its rising. It would be better to say that the Day is all the time we enjoy the light of the sun (c), and that the Night is only the time we are deprived of it. Besides, it is not very reasonable to call that the Artificial Day, which nature makes by the real or apparent revolution of the firmament about the earth: this title much better agrees to that part of the revolution in which artificers are employed in their labour; and even this shews that the Artificial Day ought not to be terminated by the rising and setting of the sun; it is not by that the workmen can measure their labour in the frigid Zones, nor always measure it in the temperate ones.

We see every where else that those things which borrow their names from nature, are much more general than those that take them from art: It is therefore more reasonable that the Natural Day should be that which is uniform throughout the world, and the Artificial Day that which varies according to places, than to establish the contrary. Let us say therefore that the word Day in its most proper signification ought to be taken for the time betwixt the sun's leaving the Meridian, to its returning to it again; that this is the Natural Day, which comprehends twenty-four hours [A]; that in this sense the the duration equality of rural Days.

[A] The Natural-Day, which comprehends twenty-four hours. What I say here of the duration of twenty-four hours, ought not to be rigorously understood: for, if the Astronomers and Cosmographers do not deceive us, when they unanimously affirm that the space of an hour corresponds to the ascension of fifteen degrees of the Equator upon the horizon, the sun's return to the meridian will require somewhat more than twenty-

(a) Father Labbe, Abbrégé Chronol. Tom. i. and before him Conformis, as to the Natural Day, to which he opposes the Civil Day.

(b) Coustel, pag. 13, of the Calcul. Ecclesi. Futuriere, and before them Gassendus, Instit. Astronom. lib. i. cap. xiii.

(c) Take in also the light that precedes the sun-rising, and succeeds the sun-setting.

the Days are not longer nor less numerous under the Poles than under the Æquator; that they are equal in all parts of the earth; but that as the most excellent parts of a whole have often the privilege of bearing the name of the whole without addition, and by way of pre-eminence, it happens that where the Natural Day is composed of two parts, one dark and the other light, this, as the more noble, has been only named the Day; whereupon they thought they might say, that in the temperate Zones each Day is longer or shorter than the preceding. This was doubtless the origin of this second signification of the word Day. Order requires, that they who treat these subjects dogmatically, should characterise it by the addition of some epithet, of Artificial for instance. But in common speech there is no need of any addition, in order to conceive that the Day excludes the Night (d). However, this is not universal; there are popular phrases in which the Day is taken for twenty-four hours; as when we say, that a child lived but four days, that a journey or a marriage continued but fifteen days; and thus of several other ways of speaking, in which it is plain that the Day excludes not the Night.

II.
The Gauls and other nations reckoned by nights.

The antient Gauls gave the Night the preference over the Day, calling the time of twenty-four hours, which makes up the Night and Day, a Night. Cæsar informs us of this, and attributes the origin of this custom to an ancient tradition of the Druids, that the Gauls descended from Pluto (e). The Germans also practised the same thing of reckoning by Nights (f). Vigenere in his notes upon Julius Cæsar (g), pretends there are still some remains of this practice. As for the Germans, says he, they still observe this way of speaking, and commonly say, vor drey nachten, before it be three Nights, instead of before it be three Days; and Sant Johans nacht, Sant Martins nacht, Saint John's Night, Saint Martin's Night, for Saint John's Day, Saint Martin's Day. The French also in many places of this kingdom use the same way of speaking, anüict (to Night) meaning to-day (h). Nicolas Bergier, Advocate in the Presidial of Rheims, adds to these remarks of Vigenere, That the French who came from Germany, and seized on that part of Gaul which is situate betwixt the Rhine and the Maese, and were called Riparian French, used the word Night to signify the Natural Day of twenty-four hours, as appears from these words in one of their laws: Si infra Ducatum est super 14 noctes auctorem suum representet. He speaks thus in his posthumous treatise du Point du Jour [B]. The Printers have committed some errors in it, as Xiparian instead of Riparian, in the foregoing passage. Mr du Cange in his Latin Glossary has cited many Laws, Capitularies, and Formularies, which shew that not only the French, but also the Northern people, the Saxons, English, &c. reckoned by nights. Nay he shews, that it is a very ancient custom among the Arabians. See Cluverius chap. xxxiii. of the first book of Germania Antiqua.

III.
Of the Civil and Astronomical Days.

Censorinus (i), as I have already observed, divides the Day into Natural and Civil, and calls the Natural Day the time betwixt the two suns, if I may be allowed that vulgar expression. The Civil Day he takes for the space of twenty-four hours, or for an entire revolution of the heavens. Bergier affirms (k) that Pliny and Macrobius hold the same division of the Day, calling the Civil Day that of twenty-four hours, and the natural only the time of light, commonly of twelve hours, or a little more or less: But I have not found this division in either of these two authors, or in Aulus Gellius (l), followed upon this head by Macrobius; but only that they give twenty-four hours to the Civil Day, and relate the different beginnings it had in different countries. At present most

(1) See Gassen-dus. Instit. A-stronom. lib. i,
cap. xxi. In the abridgement of Mr Bernier,
Tom. vii, pag.
80, there is 56 minutes instead of 59.

(2) The title is,
La Connoissance
des Temps, &c.
The knowledge of the times, or a Calendar and Ephemerides, of the rising and setting of the sun, &c. They began to be published in the year 1679.

twenty-four hours. In fact, if the time taken up in the ascent of fifteen degrees of the Æquator upon the horizon be one hour, this circle will require twenty-four hours for its revolution: but when that is finished, the sun is not yet returned to the meridian, because it has a peculiar motion, by which it advances near a degree eastward, whilst the Æquator makes one revolution; and therefore the sun must be carried near the space of a degree westward, to make it answer to the same point of the firmament or the same meridian it answered to the day before. Here is therefore an Astronomical Day a little longer than twenty-four hours. But moreover, one Astronomical Day is not perfectly equal to another, because, by reason of the obliquity and eccentricity of the ecliptic, the sun does not make the same progress each day towards the east (1). It advances 59 minutes $\frac{1}{2}$ each day, by the mean motion; when it goes swifter, it advances near two minutes more; when it goes slower, it proceeds near two minutes less. Nature loves variety even in the heavens. The Ephemerides which Mr Dalencé printed at Paris some years ago (2), shew a great deal of variety in the proportions of the increase of Days. For example: the fifth of January is longer by two minutes than the fourth; the sixth is longer by two minutes than the fifth; the seventh is longer by two minutes than the sixth; but the eighth is no longer than the seventh. All the other months are full of the like inequalities, both in the increase and decrease; and even the increases of January do not always answer the decreases of July. It is certain, says the author of those Ephemerides (3), that November and December, than September and October, tho' there are on both sides an equal number of days, viz. 61.

[B] In his posthumous treatise du Point du Jour. I Or Berger, we call this book posthumous, because the edition of those of the Tru-Rheims, 1629, which I use, shews, that John Bergier, Attorney in the Presidial of Rheims, printed this work of his father deceased. The Epistle Dedicatory to Mr du Lys, Advocate-General in the court of Aides of Paris, is written by the same John Bergier, and shews that this magistrate was the author's patron. The Abbot de Marolles speaks of another patron in his alphabetical catalogue of authors who had presented him with their books. Claude du Buif, son, says he, expressed to me the particular esteem he had as well as I for Nicolas Berger (4) of Rheims, who has written the book of the high-ways of the Roman Empire, le Voyage, &c.
and who had gone farther had he not been prevented by death.
for he died at Grignon, in the house of the President Bellieuvre, who honoured him with his friendship. I wonder that in the edition of 1629, there is no mention of any preceding edition; for in the catalogue of Thuanus's library (5), we find Archemeron, or a treatise (5) Pag. 61. concerning the beginning of Days, by Nic. Berger, Paris

(d) Valgus omne à luce ad tenecuras diem observat. Plin. lib.
ii, cap. lxviii.

(e) Galli se om-nes à Dite, pa-tre prognatos predicant, idque à Druidibus pro-dicum dicitur.
Ob eam causam spatia omnia temporis non numero dicunt, sed noctium definiunt, & dies na-tales & mensum & annorum initia
sic observant ut noctem diem se-quatur. Cæsar, de Bell. Gall.
lib. vi.

(f) Nos dicunt numquam ut nos, sed noctium com-putant. Sic con-sistunt, sic conducunt; nec decere diem vide-tur. Tacit. de Germ. cap. xi.

(g) Pag. 2.
319.

(h) There are four places where anüict, signifies the night past, others where it signifies the night to come.

(i) Censor. de Die natali, cap.
xxiii.

(k) Preface to the Point du Jour, citing Plin.
lib. ii, cap.
lxxviii, and Macrob. lib. i, Saturn. cap. iii.

(l) Aulus Gellius, lib. vi, cap.
ii.

writers

writers consider the Natural and Civil Day as different, not in duration, but only as the Natural Day in a general manner signifies an entire revolution of the sun about the earth, and the Civil Day contains in particular the choice that certain nations have made of two points, to denote the beginning and end of this revolution. Some have chosen the rising or setting of the sun; others rather mid-day or mid-night. Hence the Civil Day of some countries has been included betwixt two risings or settings of the sun, or betwixt two noons, or two mid-nights. The ancient Romans followed this last way, which is at present almost universal in Europe. These different sorts of the Civil Day cannot be perfectly equal, neither to one another, nor to the true Natural Day, because of the continual mobility of the moment of the sun's rising or setting: but as this inequality is not sensible from one day to another, it is not regarded. And therefore the nations whose Civil Day reaches from one rising or setting of the sun to another, no less take the Day for the space of twenty-four hours, tho' the sun every Day advances or retards his rising and setting, and that unequally, according as it is near the Equinoctial or Solstitial points, than if they comprehended it betwixt two noons. Whence it appears, that I had reason to say that the true Natural Day in its most proper signification, is the time betwixt the sun's quitting the Meridian to his returning to it. It is by this the Astronomical Day is measured; for the Astronomers begin the Day at the instant the centre of the sun touches the Meridian Line, and end it at the instant the same centre comes to touch it again. This is the least unequal Day which it is possible to find, and that according to which all Astronomical tables are calculated. An author whom I have cited (m) tells us, that the Astronomers begin their Natural Day at the noon of the preceding Day; that for instance the second Astronomical Day of the month of May begins at noon the first day of May, and ends at noon the following Day, which is the second of May, the noon whereof commences the third Astronomical Day. For a greater illustration he should have added, that tho' all the Astronomers begin their Day at noon, yet they are divided; some (n), as Ptolomy, and Tycho-Brahe, begin their day where Alphonso King of Castile ends his. They, for example, begin the first day of January at the noon of the first day of our Civil Year: Alphonso begins the first day of January at the noon of the thirty-first of December; so that the first day of the year to him is the last day of the preceding year for the others.

(m) Bergier, preface to the Point du Jour.

(n) See Father Labbé, Abrégé Chronolog.

IV.
Bergier's book upon the Point of Day.

Since I have cited this little work of Bergier, it will not be amiss to explain here the subject of it; it will serve for a connexion or introduction to the rest of this article. I say then, that this author's design was to assign a point upon the earth, in which the Civil Day should begin in such a manner, that the same day (Monday or Tuesday for instance) should be carried successively throughout the world, and begin again at the end of twenty-four hours in a place that should immediately touch the point given. By this means there would be two places upon the earth perfectly contiguous, one whereof should have the beginning of Monday, whilst the other had but the beginning of Sunday; whence it would happen, that each Day would last forty-eight hours, not with respect to a certain place, but to all the earth; each holy-day, for example, would be kept forty-eight hours together. The point Bergier chose for the beginning of the Day, was that wherein the 180 and 181 degrees of Longitude touch one another in Mercator's maps: and thus one of the three Subadibe islands under the Æquator, cut into two by the 180th degree of Longitude, would first receive the Day; Sunday would begin there in the western part, whilst Saturday's noon would be under the first Meridian, and the same Sunday would not begin in the eastern part till Monday began in the other. It was the Pope's business, according to this author, to make this new Establishment, and to appoint that for the future each holy-day, and each Day of the week should begin when it is midnight upon the confines of the 180 and 181 degrees of Longitude; prohibiting all the Catholics in the world to begin their Day before the midnight which followed that which was under that place. It is plain, that after such an order they who live under the 181st degree of Longitude would not be at the end of Lent till twenty-four hours after those under the 180th degree had kept Easter-day. This would be very advantageous to them, if their desire of eating flesh was very pressing; for they would have but a little way to go, to be in a country where they might eat it by the laws of the church. I need not tell the reader that this advantage was not put into the account by Bergier; it would rather be an objection against him [C]: but this is

(6) Pag. 288, of the first part.
(7) I do not believe this version has been printed, but I know that the Italian translation made by Father Bacchini has been published. It is without notes.
(8) Géograph. du Prince, cb. viii, tom. vi, of the Edit. in 1780.

Paris 1617. We also find there the History of the high-ways of the Roman Empire, by the same Nic. Berger, 4to. Paris 1622 (6). It is a very learned work, Father Bacchini, a Benedictine of the congregation of mount Cassin, one of the authors of the journal of Parma, has translated it into Latin (7), and illustrated it with notes. The author deserved to be cited in a more honourable way than la Mothe le Vayer has cited him, who says (8), one Bergier, who after his treatise of the high-ways, has written another little discourse concerning the break of day, has betought himself, &c. It appears by Thuanus's catalogue, that this other little book did precede, and not follow the History of the high-ways. Mr Henninius (9), has translated this History of the high-ways, and published it with learned notes in the tenth volume of the Theaurus Antiquitatum Romanarum. Mr Oudinet (10), and the Abbot du Bos sent him some notes, most of which were taken from the copy in which the author had written many things. There is a fine encomium on our Bergier in Father Commire's Latin poems.

[C] It would rather be an objection against him. They who censure a project, and by their adversaries answer, find themselves obliged to reply, so diligently collect whatever is not favourable to the adverse cause, that we may reasonably wonder the Sieur Michalor

(9) Professor of Duisibourg.

(10) Keeper of the King of France's cabinet of medals.

INCONVENIENCES of the line of the point of Day.

is the principal advantage he finds in this new establishment of the point of Day, viz. that there would be no more disputes about the celebration of holy-days, when in going round the world, either thro' the east or west, people should not reckon the same Day of the week with the inhabitants of the countries they would land in.

V.
They who go round the world, get or lose a Day.

It is needless to explain this, for no body is ignorant that they who went round the world east-ward, found themselves older by a day at their return than those who staid at home; and that the contrary happened to those who travelled round the world west-ward. They who returned to Seville on board the Victory, which had carried Magellan as far as the Molucca islands, after the discovery of the Straits to which this great man gave his name, found by their journal that the day of their arrival was the sixth of September, but at Seville they reckoned the seventh (o). If they had gone from Seville to the Molucca islands, and then to the Straits of Magellan, they would have found the eighth of September reckoned at Seville, when they counted the ninth. Whence it is easy to understand, that there may be three calculations at the same time in the same place. For if two vessels arrived at Seville which had made the circuit of the globe, one eastward, and the other westward, it is certain that Saturday the third of September at Seville would be Sunday the fourth according to the computation of the first vessel, and Friday the second according to the journal of the other. Let each continue his own reckoning, and you will quickly find three Christmas-days or three Easter-days, &c. in one and the same week, and it would be no longer a jeft to bid people stay (as the French saying is) till the week when three Thursdays come together, I add, that a Day is gained or lost, not only with respect to those we find in our return home, but also to those we meet in the way. Thus, the Dutch who discovered the Strait le Maire in the year 1616, being arrived at the Molucca's on the thirty-first of October, found there the first of November, and were obliged to skip from Monday to Wednesday, in order to agree with the reckoning of their country-men settled in those islands (p). It is thus also, that according to the relation of Jof. Acofta, the Portugese and Spaniards who penetrated into the East-Indies, the latter by the west, and the former by the east, established there a different reckoning of Days; so that when it is Sunday at the Isle of Macao, discovered by the Portugese, it is but Saturday at Manille in the Philippine islands discovered by the Spaniards; and yet it is but about 100 miles from the island of Luffonia, in which is the town of Manille, to the Isle Macao. This was the reason why Alphonso Sanctius, being arrived from the Philippines at this Isle on the second of May in his reckoning, and going to read in his Breviary the office of St Athanasius, found that this was not the Gospel for the Day in that place, and that the calendar there noted the third of May, which is the Invention of the Holy Crofs (q). His surprize was probably greater than his perplexity, for it is no great matter to pass from one Day of the Breviary to another; and if Cardinal Pellevé, carried unawares from the Day of St Paul's Conversion to that of St Polycarpus, could have remedied this disappointment by the help of the Breviary, he would have harangued better than he did at the opening of the States of the League. 'Id multum Cardinali Pellævæo incommodavit qui Orationem meditatus fuerat occasione ex conversione B. Pauli sumpta, quam translato in sequentem diem conventu vix ac ridiculè ad B. Polycarpi festum accommodare conatus est (r). - - - This was very inconvenient to Cardinal Pellevé, who had composed an Harangue on occasion of St Paul's Conversion: For the opening of the States being put off till the next Day, he with difficulty and ridiculously endeavoured to accommodate his Harangue to the feast of St Polycarpus.' Nicolas Bergier had no reason to say (s), that they who travel round the world enter upon a different calculation of the Day but two ways; one is, when they compare their computation with that of the city in which they finish their circuit; the other is, when they compare it with the calculation of those whom they meet upon the Oriental Ocean, and who make the tour of the world another way. It is certain, that this Eoick Sea, as he calls it, has nothing particular in this, absolutely speaking, since in whatever other part of the world two vessels meet, making the circuit of the earth, one eastward and the other westward, they would find the difference

(o) Sir Francis Drake; and Thomas Cavendish, Englishmen, and Oliver Vander Noort of Utrecht, who made the tour of the world thro' the same Straits, never experienced such a misreckoning of a Day.

(p) See William Schouten's journal.

(q) Idem. F. Alphonso Sanctius corripit, qui cum Philippina salvet, venit expectatione sua, in insulam Macaum potridie Kalendas Maji. Rectatur autem preces horarum in honorem S. Athanasii, deprehendit loci inconvencionem S. Crucis celebrationis, quicquid enim Non. Maji facti inibi exhibebant. Idem illi, alio etiam tempore, sed contrario circulo huc redeuntis erant. J. J. J. Acofta, J. J. J. lib. iii. cap. xxiii.

(r) Thomas, lib. vii. ad ann. 1593.

(s) Ubi supra, of pag. 118, 119.

has not objected to Ericius Puteanus, that the circle he proposed, made way for a thousand abuses. In effect, through the whole extent of the hemisphere, it would be the easiest thing in the world to elude the laws of the Church concerning the days of abstinence. A man might come off with abstaining from flesh for one day a week, if he would recur to the sophistry of the Spaniards Medianoche. Going from home on Friday at midnight, he might find himself a moment after in a country where it is Sunday, and where without violating the canons of the holy Mother-Church, he might feast upon capons for his supper. He might leap over all the vigils by making but a journey of two or three steps under another meridian, where it is holy-day; and if he would not celebrate any holy-day, no not Sunday itself, (I speak of Holy-days that come not two together) it were only passing from one meridian to another, which would cost but little time: for tho' one degree in the heavens answers to the space of several leagues upon earth, yet it is certain that each degree is contiguous to another; so that the degree where the day begins must necessarily touch another degree where the same day begins not till twenty-four hours after. To prevent therefore the passing in a small time from the place where it is unlawful to eat flesh, to another where it is lawful, it should be ordered that the eastern part of one of these two degrees, and the western part of the other, should remain uncultivated and uninhabited. Who knows not, that any one who would continue the carnival with impunity to the first Sunday in Lent, needs but go to Milan, where there is no obligation to fast till four days after Ashwednesday?

of a Day betwixt their dates. There is no reason therefore on this account to place the point of Day on the Eoick Ocean rather than in another place.

After having represented the inconvenience which Bergier would prevent by his line of the point of Day, I think I ought to say in a few words, that it might be so conveniently remedied without this, that it is no wonder his counsels had no effect. There are three calculations at once in the same place; some reckon Saturday, others Sunday, and others Monday. Well! Let the whole matter be regulated by the date of the inhabitants, and every feast be kept by their calendar, and you remove all this disorder. This remedy would fail but very rarely; namely, in case that those who had taken the eastern road, and others who had taken the western, should meet in a country wherein there were no Christians; then they could not conform to the date of the inhabitants, and each would stand perhaps upon his own calculation. This disorder would be a very little one.

VI.
Erycius Puteanus has written concerning the point of Day.

I pretend not however to lessen this author's merit: such propositions are seldom imagined but by men of a strong and extensive genius; besides, there is in the treatise I speak of, a stock of learning which alone might recommend it. If the author had lived long enough, he would have complained, perhaps, of a professor of Louvain who is celebrated for his numerous writings, and who a long time enjoyed the place of Justus Lipsius. To speak freely, Erycius Puteanus does not seem to have dealt fairly with Nicolas Bergier. That professor published a little piece in the year 1632, with the title of Circulus Urbanianus, sive Linea archimedis compendio descripta, qua dierum civilium principium hieraticum in orbe terrarum baltenus desideratum constituitur. The year following he published a larger book, to defend the first against the attacks of one Michalor, a Canon of Urbino. These two pieces in their most material points are wholly grounded upon Bergier's thoughts; for it is no considerable difference to place the line of the point of Day not in the Meridian opposite to that which is the first in Mercator's Atlas, as Bergier does, but in the Meridian opposite to that of Rome, as Erycius Puteanus does. This, I say, would not secure a man from the imputation of a transcriber and a Plagiary; and yet Puteanus says not a syllable of the treatise of the Point of Day, printed in the years 1617, and 1629, but sets up for the man who first spoke of this subject. Here we may admire the good fortune which presides over some books. That of Bergier, which was incomparably more an original than the other, and which we may say had been at all the charges, lay grovelling in the dust, whilst Puteanus's was enriched with the encomiums of many learned men, with the compliments of a Nuncio, of a Cardinal Patron, of another Cardinal, and of the Pope himself, and came out with those glittering ornaments. Bergier might have well said, Hos ego versiculos feci, tulit alter honores.

VII.
How two contiguous places may differ 24 hours as to the beginning of the Day.

It may here be asked me, whether there is any part of the world where the Day takes its rise; and whether it was possible for two contiguous countries to differ twenty-four hours with respect to the Point of Day? I answer, first, that a circle has, absolutely speaking, neither beginning nor end; and therefore the Day depending upon a circular motion, can neither begin nor end, but with respect to certain places; so that it is always beginning and ending in different respects, and is always in all the parts of its duration, at Mid-night, at Mid-day, at five, at six of the clock, &c. with relation to different countries. Secondly, it was hardly possible, otherwise than by a divine or human institution, for two contiguous countries to differ more than a moment upon the Point of Day; for in whatever point of the ecliptic we suppose the sun to have been created, it must necessarily have illuminated at once ninety degrees round, which is half the globe; and the Day must have begun all at once upon that half, naturally speaking. If the question was about the Civil Day, that is, if all men should agree not to begin the Day till a certain hour, or if God had commanded them to begin it precisely in that manner, I confess there might be two countries entirely contiguous, one of which would not enter upon Sunday till the other left it. But in this case a Day must be sunk, and this sentence of Excommunication, or rather of annihilation, should be pronounced against it:

Que ce jour soit raié des choses avenues,
Jupiter le commande aux trois filles chenties,
Qui tiennent registre des tems (t).

Jupiter commands this Day to be rased out of the records of time.

But stay a little. Chance, without the assistance of any divine or human order, or the nulling of a Day, may make two contiguous countries differ twenty-four hours as to the beginning of the Civil Day. For which we need only suppose two ships, which in making the circuit of the globe, one eastward, and the other westward, meet, for instance, in the mid-way: suppose their crews should settle, one on the one side, and the other on the other side of an island, and each should preserve their own computation: Sunday will begin on one side, whilst beyond the line of partition they will only be be beginning Saturday. This is what the Portuguese and Spaniards experienced on-wards Japan.

(t) I have corrected these verses above, in remark [B], of the article FONTARABIA.

VIII.
Puteanus has ill expressed himself in saying that those who go round the world eastward, lose a Day.

Now since they who sail round the globe eastward think they are at Saturday, whilst it is only Friday at the place they return to; and since those who make the circuit westward only reckon Friday, whilst their countrymen are already at Saturday, it is plain that the former gain a day, and that the latter lose one. And yet there have been writers who have so confounded their ideas upon this subject, that they have ascribed the loss to the former, and the gain to the latter; this Erycius Puteanus did (u). Michalor, his Critic, did not let this fault pass uncensured; the consequence of which censure was, that Puteanus, who might easily have come off by confessing ingenuously that he had used improper terms, obstinately defended his expression. Had it not been better to have frankly owned his fault, since the dispute turned only upon words? But why must a man after so many years professorship in Justus Lipsius's chair, after being the author of so many books, confess that he has expressed himself inaccurately? No, God forbid he should do so much injury to his rank. He therefore chose rather to have recourse to all the cavils his wit and reading could suggest to him, than to own his fault. He found himself the worse for it; his adversary returning to the charge, unmercifully scanned him even to the least punctilios, and both as to this part of the dispute, and the pretended necessity and uses of the line of the Point of Day, he perfectly routed him, and remained sole master of the field of battle. His first critical book is in Latin, but the reply is in Italian.

I believe Erycius Puteanus forgot but one cavil, which would have been, to maintain that on one hand it is a loss to bring an additional Day from a long voyage, and on the other hand it is a gain to return to one's country with a Day decreased. In point of gallantry, this thesis would pass for a principle; and there is no loss more considerable than the getting of many years, nor a gain more important than the having lived less than another. The generality of people in this point follow the lovers style, looking upon the superiority they have over their neighbour in number of Days, to be a disadvantage. But how much soever such sort of cavils might avail in a dispute, where the business should be only to jest, they would be entirely useless in a dispute like that of Michalor and Puteanus: for the question betwixt them was not to know whether those who make the tour of the world eastward or westward, grow older or younger by twenty-four hours than those who stay at home. It is manifest that the age of both is precisely what it would be if they had not stirred from their houses; and that the only reason why one counts less Days than the other, is, that the Days of those who travel westward contain above twenty-four hours each, and the others contain less. I own if two men born the same day began at fifteen years of age to travel round the earth, one eastward and the other westward, and made thirty turns each year; the first would believe himself fifty-four years old, when the latter would think he was only forty-eight. But this difference, which in case of marriage, if it was real, might render the latter of these travellers the more eligible match, would be a meer chimera in this case: they would be mightily deceived who should rely upon that advantage. Western voyages are not that fountain of youth, which removes old age; and, properly speaking, a man neither gets nor loses a moment whatever way he sails round the world. However it is true that Erycius Puteanus used a most improper expression; for in short, it would be a very wrong way of speaking, to say that we get years by reckoning as the Christians, and lose them by counting as the Mahometans. It is just the contrary, since a thousand of our years answer to a thousand thirty two Mahometan years, as is manifest, since the year 1622, was the 1032, of the Hegira (w). This example removes all the difficulty, because the same reason that lessens our years with respect to those of the Mahometans, lessens also the number of the Days of those who go round the world westward. That reason is, that the years of the Hegira being lunar, are shorter by eleven Days than ours.

IX.
Authors who have committed the same fault as Puteanus.

Puteanus is not the only person who has been mistaken in this. I say nothing against Wendelinus (x), whom he calls the Hipparchus of our age, and who uses a (y) phrase which seems to import that he believes the eastward circuit gives a Day less, and the western gives a Day more; for he pretends that if the Pope followed Puteanus's counsel, the Rubrics of the Breviary would shew the western travellers the Day they should sink, and the eastern travellers that which they ought to intercalate (z). Does it not seem that the intercalary Day ought to belong to those who have fewer Days than the others? How then comes this learned man to give it to those who travel eastward, who are already at Tuesday, when the others are but at Sunday? I decide nothing upon this point; there will ever be a subterfuge by the equivocation of exemptilis and intercalaris. I shall therefore only say that in one sense Wendelin's expression is not exact. The reader will own it, if he compares the Pope to a father, who would reduce the profit his three sons had made to an equality, the first by staying at home, the second by making the circuit of the world westward, and the third eastward. Let us suppose that the capital of the first is advanced from 10 to 15, that of the second from 10 to 14, and that of the third from 10 to 16. To make all their gains equal, is it not necessary to take from the third and add to the second? And yet, according to Wendelin, the (u) Ab ortu in occidentem mari-bus dies unus circuito in luero est, ab oc-cidentem in ortum non ita. And a little after,

Ducet transla-tionem quoniam unus in occidentem ambit addit;
addit quoniam unus in ortum eripit.

(w) It is thus they call the Mahometan Era, or Epoch, which begins on our Assess of 799 622.

(x) Godefridus Wendelinus, much affected by Gelicorides, who had been his disciple.
See Val. Aul.
Bibl. Belg. 14.
294.

(y) In Appendix circuli Vi-bani.

(z) Ut inter Bre-varii Rubricas illa quoque cum primis necessaria lex eminet, que diem in-cremque sovigantibus in Oc-cidentem exceptillum, condentibus in Orientem intercalarium formula prescribit.

Pope

Pope must do the quite contrary. The inhabitants of Seville who remained at home passed from the 10th to the 15th day; the western travellers from the 10th to the 14th; and the eastern from the 10th to the 16th. We must, says Wendelin, take one day from those that have but 14, and give one to those that have 16. Let him rather say one is to be taken from the latter, and given to the former; but the way of giving it is to reckon it to their account as if they had furnished it: for it is not giving, to quit arrears? Once more let us say nothing against Wendelin, for his expression is good in a certain sense. Take a Day from the western travellers, and they will leap from Sunday to Tuesday; oblige the eastern to intercalate their Tuesday, that is, to count it twice together, and you will take from them a Day, and so the western and they will arrive the same time at Wednesday.

X.
Bembus criticized.

A man might more easily take to task Peter Bembus, who speaking of the return of Magellan's companions, says, that they found the years of their voyage to be grown longer by a day; but that if they had failed eastward, they would have doubtless found them grown shorter by a Day: for, continues he, the farther they had advanced, the farther they would have gone towards the rising sun; and therefore, after they had finished their tour about the world, they would have seen that luminary rise a day sooner than when they set out. Semper enim tanto citius Orienti soli occurrens quanto plus itineris post se circumvolutus reliquisset, emenso demum totius terræ globo die uno prius solem sibi Orientem, quam cum viæ se dederat, profecto habuisset (a a). Is not this a very fine reason? This Historian proves that the year of those who circuit the globe eastward is shorter by a day, because it contains a sun-rising more. But is not this rather a proof that it contains 366 Days, and consequently that it is longer by a Day? Note, That the year being equal, that is, 365 times 24 hours, &c. both for those who stay at home, and those who go round the globe eastward or westward, is nevertheless divided into more or less sun-risings; into 365 for those who stay at home, into 366 for those who return by the west, and into 364 for those who return by the east. This is all the mystery. Michalor has not censured Bembus for this bad way of reasoning, but only for his reverting the change which a circuit round the world gives to the year. Bembus did not persist all his life-time in his error, but expressed himself as he should do in the Italian translation he published of his Latin History, and instead of these words, Uno sibi annos illos die longiores factos . . . uno breviores die redeunt sane fuissent, he put, Quelli anni tutti e tre essere d'un giorno fatti minori . . . d'uno piu lungbi stati sarebbono (b b). Bergier (c c) did not perceive this inverted sense of Bembus; for, far from reproving him, he cites him in Latin to confirm the same inversion he had been making, saying, that the time of Magellan's companions was lengthened by a Day, and that if they had returned by the west, it would have been shortened by a Day (d d).

(a a) Bemb. Hist. Venet. lib. vi. pag. 131. Edit. Paris, 1551, in 4to. Bergier, cites lib. ii. pag. 218, Basil.

(b b) I have cited this Italian as I find it in Michalor.

(c c) Ubi supra, pag. 198, 199.

(d d) These delusive expressions might be rectified, by saying that they who return home westward find, not their year, but that of their country, a day shorter; and those who return by the east, find it in like manner a day longer.

(e e) Cardan examines it, lib. iv. de Subtil. but does not examine either there or in the ninth book, cap. lxii, quoted by Erycius Puteanus (who did not know that the books de Subtilitate, are not divided into chapters) the subject which Puteanus ascribes to him.

(f f) Longiores ita dies sunt Hispaniensibus. Tum quia solis comites sunt, lux eis productior est: tum quia retrocedit sol atque in eorum occursum abit. Lusitanos autem de reliquit à meridie non solum averlus sed etiam aversos, atque ab eis mane refugit cum ejus extortum expectant, serius enim orientur. Jul. Cap. Scalig. Exercit. Ixxvii, de Subtil.

(g g) Antapocrisi, Part. i. pag. 44.

(h h) Non eadem celeritate aquitamen ventis Lusitani atque Barchini parem marium tractum metiuntur. Scal. ubi supra.

XI.
Julius Cæsar Scaliger criticized.

These confusions will the less surprize us, when we find the Great Julius Cæsar Scaliger could not avoid them. When he criticises Cardan upon this question, Why the stars seem to sailors to follow them, and the shoars to remove from them (e e)? He represents to him, that so common a subject as that ought to have been seasoned with something new, as for instance, that even when we sail towards the east, the stars seem to go before us. Whereupon he relates what the Portuguese and Spaniards experienced in going round the world, and gives this reason for it: The Spaniards, says he, go to China, and from thence to the Cape of Good Hope, following the course of the sun; the Portuguese, on the contrary, sail against its course; and therefore the days grow longer to the Spaniards, both because they accompany the sun, and enjoy the light longer, and also because the sun retrogrades, and comes to meet them: but it leaves the Portuguese behind it at noon, who on their part turn their backs to it, and in the morning it goes from them when they expect its rising, for it rises later (f f). What can be more false than to say that the sun goes before those who sail towards the Cape of Good Hope, in the course taken by the Spaniards? What falser still than to pretend that the days grow longer to those whom the sun comes to meet. It is the very reverse, for the sun brings them a new Day so much the sooner. What can be more false in the third place, than to say that the sun goes from the Portuguese in the morning, and that they see it rise later? How is this possible, since the readiest way to meet by a circular motion, is to go to China by the east as the Portuguese did, and to go thither westward as the sun did, after having left them behind it? In fine, what can be falser than to pretend that if the sun rises later, the Civil Day must be shorter? Michalor (g g) has only censured Scaliger's third fault, except that he has farther observed, that there was no need of considering whether the Portuguese had as good a wind as the Spaniards. In effect, since Scaliger did not consider the swiftness of motion, celeritatem motus nunc non intelligo, what signified the winds to him (b b)? Let the Portuguese finish their round in three weeks, and the Spaniards take a thousand for it, this will neither make the difference of Days, greater nor less.

XII.
Several faults of Pliny in a few words.

The Ancients were not absolutely ignorant, that the Artificial Day must be longer to a man travelling westward, and that the sun sets sooner with respect to the eastern parts of the earth than to the western: But if we were to judge of their knowledge by that of Pliny, we should conclude they had no manner of notion of this.

In the first place, this Naturalist says, that it has been often experienced that the beams kindled on high towers at the sixth hour of the day, to give notice of the approach

V O L. V.

9 M

of

of pirates, have been seen even in those places where it was then three hours night (ii). A man needs not above three lectures on the globe, to see that this is a story perfectly absurd. This sixth hour of the Day with most interpreters signifies noon. Alciatus will have it to mean sun-setting, and by this means he bates Pliny two thirds of his distance; but to little purpose, since he leaves him still too much: for to make it three hours of night in one place, whilst the sun sets in another, you must allow 45 degrees difference of Longitude betwixt these two places. Now each degree of Longitude under the Æquator, comprehends twenty-five French leagues, of 2500 Geometrical paces each; the beacons must therefore have been perceived at the distance, not indeed of 1125 leagues, but at a distance differing from it only in proportion to the space which separates the parallel spoken of by Pliny from the Æquator; notwithstanding which abatement, this distance would contain some hundreds of leagues. Judge what this would be, if Pliny's sixth hour was mid-day; the distance would then be triple, and a beacon would have been seen at a greater distance than one third of the circumference of a good large parallel. This had been a more wonderful thing than what the same author speaks of in the twenty-second chapter of the fifth book, where he says that mount Casius is so high as to be enlightened by the sun three hours before day (kk). And yet Father Hardouin will not allow of Alciatus's modification, but will have it that these beacons were kindled at noon, and pretends to have cleared all the difficulties of this passage (ll). He finds no matter for criticism in all this chapter. Note, That this passage of Pliny, concerning mount Casius is liable to several difficulties. Aristotle has said as much of Caucasus; but some learned men (mm) maintain that there is no mountain in the world from whence the sun may be seen, if he be more than four degrees below the horizon. According to this assertion, the sun itself placed upon the top of a mountain, could not be perceived above an hundred leagues distance. How then was it possible to see Pliny's fires? Father Hardouin, upon the passage where mount Casius is mentioned, affirms that Cabeus has very well shewn that Aristotle was right in what he relates of Caucasus. We shall shew the contrary under the word CAUCASUS, by examining what three learned and subtle Italians, Mazzoni, Blancanus, and Cabeus, have said upon this passage of Aristotle.

In the second place, Pliny says, that Philonides, a courier of Alexander, went in nine hours from Sicyon to Elis (nn); but in returning was forced to travel three hours by night. The distance of these two cities was 1200 Stadia (oo), and the way of the former to the latter, was an ascent: and thus this courier employed one while nine hours, and another fifteen, in performing the same journey: nine hours going to Elis ascending, fifteen hours in returning to Sicyon descending. If you ask the reason of this prodigious difference betwixt going and coming, Pliny will tell you that this messenger, as he went to Elis followed the sun, but in returning to Sicyon, he travelled contrary to it. But this reason is so far from compensating the difference betwixt nine and fifteen hours, that it cannot even compensate the advantage of the declivity of the road; for to gain an hour in following the sun, one must make a stage of fifteen degrees, and consequently the courier gained but somewhat under ten minutes when he travelled sixty leagues from east to west.

Lastly, Pliny says, that the reason before given is the cause that the Navigators towards the west proceed farther in the Day than in the Night, even when the Days are very short (pp). Here are several falsties. For not to say that our Pilots, whose observations are more certain than those of the Ancients, do not observe that ships go slower by Night than by Day, other things being equal, who sees not that this pretended slowness caused by the Night, cannot amount to the proportion Pliny assigns, nor proceed from the cause he alledges? Let us suppose that a ship in full sail westward, makes eighty leagues in nine or ten hours of a winter's day, she gains not a quarter of an hour (qq); and what is a quarter of an hour in comparison of five or six hours, more or less, by which the winter-night exceeds the Day in the countries Pliny might have had in view? Add to this, that in sailing westward, we follow the sun no less by Night than by Day; whence it follows, that a ship ought to sail as far in the dark as during the Artificial Day, since the time of darkness, when we sail westward, lengthens in the same proportion with the time of light. The navigations of these later times have taught us, that there reigns a constant wind from east to west in the Torrid Zone: so that those who sail there from east to west, have always the wind behind them, and those who sail from west to east, have always the wind against them (rr). This is the reason why a voyage from Spain to the West-Indies, requires less time than a voyage back again. But we must not believe, as the Abbot de la Roque did (ss), a story that (tt) was laughed at, viz. That the Spaniards sometimes sail to the West-Indies in twenty-four hours, but cannot return in less than four months, let them have ever so favourable weather. Pliny might easily be deceived by such as did not well understand what they had heard of the effect of this eastern wind. There is no sea in which the east winds are more favourable than the Pacific; and yet the Spanish vessels which cross it in their way from America to the Philippine islands, spend two months and an half, though they sail 130 leagues a day (uu). I wonder that the Commentary Variorum on Pliny, printed at Leyden, does not examine and determine this matter. There can be nothing more dry

(ii) In quibus pronuntiatio ignis sexta hora dici accensio, sepe compertum est tertiam noctem à tergo ultimam videri. Plin. lib. ii, cap. lxxi.

(kk) Cuius exaltatio alitudo quatuor vigiliis orientem per tenebras sollem aspiciat. Id. lib. v, cap. xxi.

(ll) Nihil opus istis ambagibus, ubi sunt omnia per se perspicua, necque plenissima, ut vel ex interpretatione nostra liquet. Hardouin, in Plin. Tom. ii, pag. 227.

(mm) See Isaac Vossius, in Meibom, pag. 90.

(nn) Ex Sicyone Elis mille & decem stadia novem diei cunctis horis, indeque quatuordecim itinere tota nocte hunc remens. Plin. lib. ii, cap. lxxi.

(oo) That it is say to be leagues, 98500 geometrical paces each.

(pp) Que de cause ad occasionem navigationis quatuor brevissimo die vincunt spacia nocturna navigationis, ut solem ipsum comitant. Plin. ubi supra.

(qq) To lengthen the day an hour by a progress westward, one must travel fifteen degrees, which under the Æquator make 375 leagues.

(rr) See Varin's Geography, lib. i, cap. xxi, and Robaut's Physics, Part. iii, cap. xi, where he offers the reason of this Phenomenon, by the action of the Earth according to Copernicus's system: but in the Philosophical Transactions, the Historical Relation of the Madagascari, or Trade-winds, made by Dr. Halley.

(ss) Journal des Savans, 1685, pag. 30, Dutilleul Edit.

(tt) Ibid. p. 17.

(uu) Halley, ubi supra, citat. 1701.

dry and wretched than what we find there upon this subject. We find nothing in it that insinuates any distrust, except two or three words, which inform us that Melichius (ww) thought the story incredible concerning the beacons of the towers, and that concerning the courier Philonides. But I much more wonder at the goodness of Salmasius, who has reported (xx) the story of this messenger with marks of approbation, and so little doubted of his diligence, that he makes his journey longer than Pliny did. Observe that Allatius (yy) relates the opinion of Julius Cæsar Scaliger without censuring it, and defends Pliny against Melichius.

XIII.
Some faults of du Pinet and la Mothe le Vayer.

I would fain know how this chapter of Pliny has been interpreted by Erycius Puteanus, who boasts of being the first that understood it (zz). Du Pinet has put in the margin of his translation, That the waves of the sea incline more to the west than to the east, and that this is the reason of what Pliny relates concerning vessels sailing westward. But would not this reason be as good for the Night as for the Day? I omit the fault he has committed in translating these words, Eundem (Solem) remans obviu contrario pratervertibat occursum, thus, He met the sun, and passed it, he went so swift. I believe that pratervertibat there, signifies more than Father Hardouin thinks, more than offendebat; and that Pliny's meaning is, that the courier going towards the sun, went beyond it, and left it behind him. This does not signify that he went swifter than the sun. La Mothe le Vayer (a) alledges this example of swiftness without finding any thing false in Pliny's passage: nay, he observes that Philonides almost equalled the course of the sun; and yet he had been just computing Philonides's swiftness at the rate of about eight leagues an hour (b).

(ww) It should be Melichius, a Professor of the Mathematics at Wittenberg, who published a Commentary on the second book of Pliny, in the year 1534. See above, remark [E], of the article ZIEGLER.

(xx) Salm. Exercit. Plin. pag. 45, vubere he computes Pliny's 1200 stadia to 160 miles; they are but 150.

(yy) In Libro de Mensura Temporum, pag. 14.

(zz) Quoniam locum per Massochum suppletum, hæcenus tamen non intelleximus in Theoribus nostris expressum. Putean. Vindic. Circuli Urban. Note, That Michæler tells him, that Manzani, author of a learned apology for Dante, has only cited this place of Pliny, without adding any thing to the common reading. (a) Letter xxviii, Vol. x, of the Edit. in 12mo. 1681. Pliny is there wrong cited in chap. vii, (it should be lxi) of book ii. (b) Reckoning 75 leagues, of 2000 paces each, in nine hours.

A DISSER.

A DISSERTATION

Which was printed before some essays or Fragments of this work in the year M DCXCII,

Under the title of,

A Project of a Critical Dictionary, in a letter to Mr du Rondel, Professor of the Belles Lettres at Maastricht.

It has been revised and corrected (in this second edition) but not enlarged, except with some citations, and a few notes put at the bottom of the pages. We have also placed there some of the citations which in the first edition were in the margin. They will be here by way of a comment.

SIR,

YOU will doubtless be surprized at the resolution I have taken. I have resolved to make the largest compilation I can of the faults which are met with in Dictionaries, and not to confine my self within these bounds, however large and extensive, but to make fallies upon all sorts of authors, whenever occasion offers. What! will you say, a man from whom we expected quite another thing, and much rather a work of reasoning than a compilation, is he going to engage in an enterprize which requires a much greater expence of body than of mind? It is certainly a very wrong step. He undertakes to correct Dictionaries; His most malicious enemies could not have prescribed to him a harder task, had they over his destiny the same power that Eurystheus had over that of Hercules. It is worse than going to fight monsters; it is attempting to lop off the Hydra's heads; it is at least attempting to cleanse Augeas's stables (a); in fine, it is, the penance which ought to be enjoined those turbulent men who have abused their leisure and the credulity of the people, to vent under the name and authority of the Revelation all sorts of Chimera's, justit quod splendida bilis (b), I pity him. Why did he not leave this employment to those robust constitutions who can study sixteen hours a day without prejudice to their health; who are indefatigable in citations, and all the other functions of a transcriber, and much better qualified to acquaint the public with matters of fact than with reasonings?

I. . .
The reasons and design of this undertaking.

If these are your thoughts, Sir, you ought to fear lest your friendship for me should mislead you, and correct your error by this sincere confession of mine, that I find my capacity very inconsiderable which ever way I turn my self. I confess, that in this undertaking I apply my small forces by their weak side, instead of chusing a subject that might display them to less disadvantage. But, in truth, there is no difficulty in the choice, when a man is convinced, as I am, that the difference between his strong and his weak side is almost imperceptible. And besides, I will tell you freely, that if I had turned my pen on what you believe the most advantageous side, I should have been involved in the alternative, either of displeasing some persons whom prudence forbids to provoke (c), or of displeasing my self. Now you well know that in writing our genius ought not to be forced (d), and you are sensible that the judicious answer of an ancient Greek might in several senses be applied to one's self [A]. And after all what is [A] The judicious answer of an antient Greek. We find it in Stobæus. Θεόκριτος ἐρωτηθεὶς διὰ τί ἔσυγγράζει, ὅτι εἶπεν ὡς μὲν βύλομαι, ἔ-δύναμαι, οὐ δὲ δύναμαι ἢ βύλομαι: Theocritus querenti quare non scriberet, dixit, quoniam ut libet non possum, ut verò possum non libet (1). . . . Theocritus being asked why he did not write, answered, it is because I am not allowed to write as I would, and cannot write as I am allowed.

(a) It is said that Mr. . . .
ferry me of his friends, so far dressed upon from little pieces of poetry the fault is should observe in his Dictionary, was answered, that it required quies and some of paper, and not little pieces.

(b) Horat. Sat.
III, lib. II, vers.
141.

(c) See in English's Adagio, the saying, Not irritate crabbees.

(d) Tu nihil invita dices facere Miserere. Horat.
de Art. Poet.
vers. 385.

is the disadvantage of not shewing our selves on the best side? It is depriving our selves, perhaps, of the praises one might have received. I say perhaps; for the caprices of men and chance have a strange influence in this. But omit the perhaps; what then would this be, but a privation of praise, which is a meer nothing to a man who never acted, and at present acts less than ever by this principle? I could wish that the ancient Poet, who had so well begun to shew the emptiness of human affairs, had carried his thought so far as to say, cornea mihi fibra est: you would here see the application that might be made of the three verses he would have left us in this case.

Non ego cum scribo, si forte quid aptius exit.
Quando hæc rara avis est, si quid tamen aptius exit,
Laudari metuum, neque enim mihi cornea fibra est (c).

(c) Persius,
Sat. I, ver. 451.

..... If I, by chance succeed
In what I write, (and that's a chance indeed;)
Know I am not so stupid, or so hard
Not to feel praise, or fame's deserv'd reward.

DRYDEN.

If on one hand I am not ignorant that my enterprize requires great strength of body, I consider on the other, that natural patience, joined with the habit of meddling only with books, of going little out of one's study, and avoiding as the plague the ways of those turbulent men whom I have spoken of, who busily thrust themselves into all affairs, even those of state, may supply a great many things.

As for those learned men, whose erudition in matters of fact is proportioned to the indefatigable application their robust constitution allows them, I declare to you, Sir, that I do not pretend to intrude upon their province; on the contrary, I only propose to furnish them with an essay, or rough-draught, which may determine some of them to perfect this plan, and to enlarge this Critical Dictionary with several volumes. I heartily agree they should say of me in this respect, what was said to Varro upon matters of Philosophy, that he had said enough to create a desire for it, but not to give the knowledge of it (f). I even submit to those who shall say it would be a greater favour

(f) Philosophi-
am multis locis inchoari ad impellendum factis, ad edocendum parum. Cicero, Academ. Quest.
lib. 1.

than justice in the public to treat me according to the rule that Aristotle approves in one of his writings. Οὐ μόνον δὲ χάριν ἔχειν δίκαιον τέτοις ὅν ἂν τις κοινωνήσαι ταῖς δόξαις, ἀλλὰ καὶ τοῖς ἔτι ἐπιπολαϊότερον ἀπορρημαίνουσιν· καὶ γὰρ ἔτοι συμβάλλονταί τι. τὴν γὰρ ἔξιν προήκονσαν ἡμῶν· εἰ μὴ γὰρ Τιμόθεος μὴ ἔγινετο πολλὴν ἂν μελοποιίαν ἐκ εἰχόμεν· εἰ δὲ μὴ Φρύνις, Τιμόθεος ἔκ ἂν ἔγινετο. Verum non solum illis agendæ sunt gratiæ quorum opinionibus quis acquiescet, sed illis qui superficie tenus dixerunt: conferunt enim aliquid etiam isti, habitum namque nostrum exercuerunt. Si enim Timotheus non fuisset, multum melodiæ nequaquam habuissimus: si tamen Phrynus non extitisset, ne Timotheus quidem (g). - - We ought to return thanks not only to those whose opinions we approve and agree with, but even to those who are meer superficial writers. For the latter contribute something to our good, as they have put us upon thinking. If there had never been a Timotheus, we should have had no excellent Music; but had there not been a Phrynus, we should never have had a Timotheus. And I very sincerely make the same declaration as the ingenious author of the History of the Royal Society: In answer for my self, says he (h), I shall alledge, that what I have to offer, so far from preventing the labours of others who could adorn so noble a subject, is no otherwise designed than as those stately edifices used at first to be represented by some few shadows and little models, which are not intended to equal the principal structure, but only to shew by way of abridgment, with what materials, how much expence, and how many hands it might be afterwards raised. I write with the same intention; proposing only to give the sketch of a design to such as shall have the capacity of executing it; and that they may fall to work as soon as may be, I will make all the haste imaginable to publish my Essay, which will contain but one volume in folio.

(g) Arist. Metaphysic. lib. ii,
cap. i, pag. m.
645.

(h) Dr Thomas Sprat (afterwards Bishop of Rochester) History of the Royal Society, pag. 2.

II.
That there are many faults in books.

They will not want matter for larger editions: For if this subject can furnish me with materials for a large volume, notwithstanding the other indispensable occupations which take up all my time, and the scarcity of books I am reduced to, what will not men of great learning and great leisure do, who have great libraries at hand, if they would undertake to make collections of this kind? These will be excursions from which they will always return laden with booty; and no Prince, whatever care he takes for laying the toils, and disposing all things for a great hunting match, can be more certain of catching a great many wild beasts, than a learned critic, who goes in chase of errors, can be certain of discovering a great many of them. It would be something curious, if this work should have the same fate, with that of a learned Swiss (i), intitled, Theatrum

(i) Theod.
Zwinger, a Physician, Native of Basel, who died in the year 1588.

allowed. An ancient Rhetorician gave this answer for the reason of his silence: What I know, it is not seasonable to speak; and what would be seasonable, I do not know.

You will find the words of this ancient Rhetorician, with those of Stobæus, in the remark [F], of the article ARISTARCHUS. And since that remark will suffice for all the comment I might have occasion for here, I need only refer to it, repetitions being to be avoided as much as possible.
VOL. V.

9 N

A DISSERTATION

Theatrum vite humane, which has been enlarged so often, that it now contains eight great volumes in folio. Doubt not but the faults of authors would arise to as many a bulk as this: Now, Sir, would a theatre of these faults in as many large volumes, be, in your opinion, less diverting or instructive than that of human life? You may acquaint me, when you please, whether the book intituled, The Hunters, which contained the catalogue of Theopompus's thefts, had not its title founded on the comparison of metaphor of hunting I have used? You may acquaint me with it, I say, when you please, no body having discovered the most hidden particulars of antiquity, so well as you have done.

It will easily be granted that there are an infinite number of faults in books, if we consider that the writings of the greatest men are not exempt from them, and that the meanest critic can discover a great many. How often do we find in the contents and indexes of the meanest performances, Scaliger notatus, ballucinatio Scaligeri, - - - Scaliger censured, a blunder of Scaliger, and the like? Mr Morus imagined that this was a sorry affectation of a proud author, who desires to be talked of (j). This may be true; but no man of learning can deny that Scaliger may be censured justly in a great many things; we need no other proof of this than the works of Salmasius, where at every turn we find Scaliger reprehended (k). It is true, he is not named, but pointed at by the lofty title of vir magnus, vir summus: but all these great civilities do not lessen the reality of the fault, when the censure is well grounded. Salmasius, who had not the same reasons for respecting other learned men, exasperated some of them, who revenged themselves with unmerciful criticisms upon his writings. He made his defence, and attacked them in his turn. The battle was principally fought betwixt him and the Jesuit Petavius, and was so obstinate, that it hardly ceased till their deaths. We may affirm, that they were two champions worthy of each other, and that never gladiators were better matched than they: for it would be unjust to determine the matter, by what those have said who were both judges and parties in the quarrel (l). They were the two most learned men in France, and they might not only have enlightened their age, but also have done it much honour by their long controversies, if, to the shame of learning, they had not tainted them with the excessive venom of their spleen, which dictated almost as many abuses as words. All the other antagonists of Salmasius were not capable of returning blow for blow, I mean of discovering as many faults in his writings as he discovered in theirs; but nevertheless they made him sensible he was often mistaken. Who can doubt, after this, that there is a vast crop of faults of this kind? Where will the harvest be wanting, when it is so plentiful in the productions of the Scaliger's and Salmasius's; and who would be disheartened with his errors, upon this consideration?

A person of your judgment needs not be put in mind that I have proposed the example of these two great men, not so much to reason from the greater to the less, as to give some sort of consolation to authors of a second class, and to those who, like myself, are of the lowest. The consolation might be more effectual than the reasoning could be just; for it is certain that authors of the first rank are those who sometimes let slip the greatest number of faults: whether because they are too bold in their decisions, and too much addicted to new ways, or whether they yield sooner or later to the vanity of distinguishing themselves by the multitude of their writings, or for several other reasons, which I could easily enumerate, if I meant to characterize any one by them; but it is no less certain, that these examples afford some consolation. In matter of comfort, men are rather touched by popular and plausible thoughts, than by reasonings the most conformable to the rules of Logic. We may say then, that the Scaliger's and Salmasius's ought to have the same effect as to other authors, that Carthage had as to other nations: Post Carthaginem vinci neminem puduit (m); No body was ashamed to be conquered after Carthage was conquered.

I might join Baronius to these two famous authors. He was undoubtedly a great man: they who have examined his work in order to write against him, are perhaps his greatest admirers; and yet how many faults are there in his annals? They are not reckoned by hundreds, but by thousands. 'Baronii Annales is quem dixi Blondellus mille castigavit notis, aliquando prodituris, quibus oram exemplaris sui prætexuit: quod exemplar ære suo redemptum bene proceres Amstelodamenses Bibliothecæ publicæ inferri curaverunt. Super hæc vero & ea quæ ab aliis animadversa sunt, quæ subnotavius etiam nos justum fere volumen impleverunt' (n). - - - - Blondel, whom I have mentioned, made a thousand corrections on the annals of Baronius; these corrections may some time be published: he wrote them on the margin of his copy, which the magistrates of Amsterdam have bought and placed in the public library. But besides these corrections, and some made by other authors, those which I have also made, would almost fill one volume. He was mistaken, not only through a party-interest, and a prejudice in favour of the court of Rome, but even in a thousand things which are of no service to the pretensions of that court. This has been proved as often as he has been attacked, and very lately the public had an opportunity of being thoroughly convinced of it (o). Baronius seems to have taken delight in deceiving himself, and purposely to have interperfed his work with lies, so thick do they grow every where.

I am

III.
Yet a good compilation of them cannot be made without much labour.

I am not apprehensive you should conclude from hence that there is nothing easier than to compile faults, and that these sorts of collections require but little time, it being but transcribing the censures authors have made upon one another; I am not afraid, I say, that so judicious a man as you, should argue after that manner. You know too well, Sir, that there is no dispute in which it is more necessary to hear both parties, than in those which arise among the learned. It would be madness to depend upon the observations of the aggressors; prudence requires we should hear both the answers of the defendants and the replies of the aggressors. I ask no more than this; I know that the reader's patience commonly does not go so far. But in a design like this, it is not too much, with respect to many things, to compare together four pieces published successively; two by the assailant, and two by the assaulted; and I dare even say, that in some particulars this is not sufficient. It will be granted me that there are many censors who commit more faults than they correct (p); at least it will be owned, that the most learned men give occasion to be censured in their turn. This is what Casaubon has been taxed with in respect to his critical work on Baronius. Some have reproached him with this very moderately (q); others in an outrageous manner; tho' we must own, that by I know not what fatality this work, which is very good and very learned in other respects, did more harm than good to the reputation of the author. But, in short, I desire only this example to shew that after the reading of a critical book, we must suspend our judgment till we have seen what the criticized author or his friends have to say. They who think all that is censured by the aggressor to be faulty, and whatever he does not oppose to be good, commonly find themselves in the end the dupes of that writer; for it may be proved to them, that he has condemned good things, and passed by what really deserved condemnation, and that he himself has been guilty of many blunders. An author who in other respects cannot endure to be censured, will turn Critic upon himself, when thereby he can hope to mortify his censurers, by shewing them they were ignorant that such and such things deserved to be censured. I would give you instances of this, was I not satisfied they are well known to you, with the reflexion naturally resulting from it: which is, that a man chuses rather to hurt himself, provided he hurts his enemy at the same time, than do himself any good that might turn to his enemy's advantage. Now, as the fate of the censor is sometimes the same with that of the Apologist, that is, neither of them sees but part of his adversary's defects, and both commit faults each in his turn, we see the necessity of following them through the whole progress of their dispute, when one attempts such a collection as that I undertake; For it ought to consist only of faults averred and certain, such, for instance, as are those which the authors animadverted upon, do themselves acknowledge either expressly, or by their silence, and those which they are disabled from defending otherwise than by notorious absurdities. Not, Sir, that I deny there are faults which are made evident by the first censure: so that if I resumed the metaphor of hunting I used before, I ought to say, that indeed those who pursue the faults of authors, frequently find the beast already slain, or that he bays; but sometimes also they find one that puts them on a wrong scent, or avoids the blow, or still vigorously defends himself, tho' wounded in an hundred places. The cavils suggested by vanity and a false shame, to writers who are censured, make the application of the metaphor but too just. This however proves that transcribing is not sufficient to succeed in this hunting, and that the edifice must be very costly, notwithstanding the plenty of materials. Let us go farther, and say, that of all Dictionaries there is none more difficult than this. When we write other Dictionaries, we meet with a great many things ready prepared in the preceding ones, which cost only the taking them; and as many others that want but a little alteration. Whatever we find good in them, is lawful prize. But all this is of no use to me: what I find wrong and defective is the only thing that can serve me, provided I know how to rectify it.

(p) Saepè in judicando majus est peccatum iudicii quam peccati illius de quo fuerat iudicatum. Ambrosius, in Psal. L.

(q) M. Godeau for instance, in the preface of his History of the Church of Casaubon, says he, who was a man of learning, should have treated Baronius with more civility, he who never names Scaliger without the title of Divine, and contents himself with censuring the things he believed him mistaken in, without attempting to make him pass at every turn for a man who had no good learning. If he had engaged in a career as long as his, we should have seen whether he would not have made false steps. His Exercitationes have produced other works of the same kind. Just matter of censure has been found in his censures, by which it appears that in such judgments there is nothing but may be defended and opposed with almost an equal probability, especially as to the dates.

IV.
The usefulness of such a compilation.

You have seen a reflexion, suggested to me by the reading of some of those disputes, which contain answers, replies, rejoinders, &c. See here another arising from the same source. After having read a criticism on a book, we think ourselves undeceived in many false things, which were taken for true when we read the book. Hence we pass from the affirmative to the negative. But if we happen to read a good answer to this criticism, we seldom fail, with respect to some things, to return to our first affirmation: whilst, on the other side, we proceed to the negation of some things which we had believed upon the credit of the animadverter. We experience a like revolution of thoughts, when we come to read a good reply to the answer. Now, is not this capable of making the greatest part of readers continually diffident? What can escape the suspicion of falshood with respect to those who have not the key of the sources in their hands? If an author advances things without citing the places he takes them from, he leaves room to believe that he only speaks by hearsay; if he cites, it is feared that he unfairly relates the passage, or understands it ill, since we seldom fail in reading a critical work to find a great many such faults in the book which is criticized. What must be done then, Sir, to remove all these reasons of distrust, whilst there are such a great number of books that were never answered, and such a great number of readers who have not the books containing the sequel of these literary disputes? Were it not to be wished there there was extant a Critical Dictionary, to which recourse might be had, in order to be ascertained whether what we find in other Dictionaries and in all sorts of other books be true? This would be the touch-stone of other books; and you know a man somewhat precise in his language, who would not fail to call a work of this nature, The Insurance-office of the Republic of Letters.

Thus you have a general idea of my project. My design is to compose a Dictionary, which, besides the considerable omissions of others, shall contain a collection of falsehoods concerning each article. And you may easily see, Sir, that if, for instance, I had been able to collect under the word SENECA, all that is falsely attributed to that famous Philosopher, it would only be necessary to consult this article in order to know whether we ought, or ought not, to believe what we read concerning Seneca in any book whatever. For if it was a falsehood, it would be noted in the collection; and whatever would not be inserted there as false, might be looked upon as true. This suffices to shew, that if this design was well executed, the work would be most useful and most convenient to all sorts of readers. I am very sensible, methinks, what ought to be done for the perfect execution of this enterprise; but I am much more sensible of my incapacity to execute it: And therefore I give here only a specimen, and leave the continuation of it to persons of the requisite abilities, in case it be thought that this project, rectified wherever it is deficient, deserves to employ the pens of the learned.

V.
Why these fragments are published beforehand, and the nature of them.

But as I soon foresaw that my specimen would be extensive enough to engage me in a most laborious task; and besides, as I am very diffident of my ability to execute this project: do you know, Sir, the resolution I have taken hastily? I design to hazzard some fragments of my specimen, and to send them abroad as the forlorn-hope to scour the country, sound the fords, and get intelligence of the enemy. If they make an unsuccessful sally, and return not with good news, I will take a Stoical resolution of lying quiet; if the success prove otherwise, I shall prosecute my design. Thus you see what obliges me to set out with this little forerunner. Whatever fate it meets with, it will afford me the opportunity of giving a public testimony of my particular esteem and friendship for you; and if any thing be capable of disturbing me for its ill success, it will perhaps be the consideration that it was unworthy of being inscribed to you.

In the mean time let me tell you a little secret; which is, that in composing this prelude, I have been so far from chusing the least exceptionable fragments of the Critical Dictionary, that I have chosen those I most suspected. It is not hard to conjecture the reason of my conduct, since common sense teaches us, that the surest way of prognosticating the fate of a book, by feeling the pulse of the public, is to take the pattern we shew, from the worst part of the piece, rather than from the best. Besides, when we desire to profit by the reader's advice, and to know which is the best way of executing a project, we ought chiefly to lay before him those parts which are of the most doubtful value. I have therefore chosen those fragments which I most suspected, or such as contained each in its kind the most obvious irregularities, as you may say a long train of remarks, a digression resembling a dissertation in form, &c. I praise the simplicity of a plan; I admire the uniform and neat execution of it; and in this I place the idea of perfection. But when I come from the theory to the practice, I own, I find it difficult to follow this idea of perfection. A mixture of several forms, a party-coloured variety, and not so much uniformity, are much my talent.

I fancy this false taste is an effect of my laziness. I would have the same book satisfy my curiosity on all the things it suggests to my thoughts, and I do not love to be obliged to pass from book to book for this satisfaction. As it is natural to judge of other people by one's self, methinks an author does a great pleasure to his reader when he spares him the trouble of going out of his place, and searching in another book for some little explanations he may desire. You now begin to fear that my book will be stuffed with parentheses all over: but fear it not; for in favour of those who love not interruptions, I will take care to keep the text clear from accessory observations, and shall place them in the margin, and at the end of each article, in favour of those who desire to know immediately the dependances or relations which connect things together. To refresh the readers, I will take care to give them now and then some gayer touches, without making too much use of the privilege allowed to works of this kind, namely of using free expressions; nothing is more necessary than such passages in a Dictionary, which is of itself a dry and fatiguing book. Would to God these were all the bad sides of it; but there are others more discouraging, since there is no work that is judged of by so bad principles as this. You find a great many readers complaining that they meet with common things in it. What then would they have? Nothing but exquisite learning, and what they knew not before? But in that case, it would not be such a book as it ought to be, that is, a book suited to the use and capacity of every reader.

I appeal to you, Sir, who are an excellent judge of every thing relating to literature: would it be reasonable to exclude from this Dictionary the censure of a fault, under pretence that this fault cannot mislead learned men, though it be spread in the works of a great many writers? Doubtless you will not be of this opinion: every falsehood which is dispersed in several books may deceive many people, and that is a sufficient reason for pointing pointing it out in a Critical Dictionary: for this reason the faults of the first editions may be taken notice of, tho' they have been corrected in the second; for how many people use the first edition all their lives, without ever consulting any other.

Have I not reason to fear that by thus giving you the character of my work, you should ask me whether this be the way of discharging my obligations to you; and whether I am not ashamed to dedicate to you a book stuffed with the errors and blunders of authors, and a heap of the trash and filth of the Republic of Letters [B]. I am as fully persuaded as any man living, that nothing should be dedicated to you but a collection of fine thoughts, and curious erudition, and that the present might be worthy of you, it ought perfectly to resemble the writings you have published. Am not I then very blameable to deviate so much from this model; and without any reason, and even in quite different circumstances to recur to the expedient of Catullus, and put his menace in practice?

Ad librariorum

Curram scriinia, Cæcios, Aquinos, Suffenum, omnia colligam venena,
Ac te his suppliciis remunerabor (r).

(r) Catull. Epig.
xiv.

I will run to the Booksellers shops, and collect the Cæcii, Aquini, Suffenus, and other books of that stamp, and, to punish you, I will present you with them.

But, whatever may be said of it, I am certain, upon mature consideration, that if my collection is not worthy of your patronage, it is not for the reason I have assigned. I should think it a much more tolerable present, if it was composed of a far greater number of lies; and I should not despair of procuring one day, your intire approbation of it, if I had as good a nose for the falsities of authors, as a Poet of your acquaintance boasts he had in other respects (s).

I should now conclude this long letter; but I have some difficulties to clear up, which will stay me some time longer.

VI.
Answer to some objections;
1. That this book may create enemies.

First, Sir, the liberty I take to gather into heaps the falsities scattered in divers books, may be taken for a notorious rashness: Is not this wantonly creating to one's self a vast number of enemies? When we censure the Antients, we provoke their numerous partisans among the Moderns; and when we censure the latter, we incur either their own repentment if they are living, or that of their family if they are dead. Now the repentment of authors is no small matter. They pass for a very touchy, choleric, and vindictive race of men; and it looks as if their relations thought themselves obliged to perpetuate, after their death, the blind love they had for their productions. As for the interest which several Moderns take in the reputation of the Antients, I cannot better represent it than by the passage I cite, where la Mothe le Vayer is angry with Balzac, who had criticized an answer of Pompey. In truth, I confess to you, that so unjust a treatment of all antiquity raises such an indignation in my soul, that I had rather it should be you, or any body except myself, who should give this sort of temerity the name it deserves. 'Exclamet Melicerta periiisse Frontem de rebus. - - Well may we say, that 'modesty is fled from the earth.' A man must have lost all modesty and judgment to proceed to such a want of respect, and to so presumptuous an extravagance, 'ut infolenter parentis artium antiquitatis reverentiam verberemus (t). - - As insolently to censure

(s) Namque so-gacius unus odo-ror, Polyppus an gravis hirsutis cubet hircus in alia
Quam canis acer, ubi lateat sus.
Horat. Epod.
Od. xii.

(t) Macrob.
1. Saturn. Hexam. Rustic pag.
142, 143.

[B] A book stuffed with the errors and blunders of authors, and a heap of the trash and filth of the Republic of Letters. As every thing has two faces, perhaps some people will pretend that I incur the censure we read in a fine treatise of Plutarch. But this would not be considering the matter by its fair side; this would be viewing it by its wrong side. It ought to be considered according to the idea of those collections of Physical Observations, which only contain the Distempers incident to human bodies, but which treat of them only to teach us how we may avoid, or be cured of them. However it be, these are Plutarch's thoughts (2): 'If any one rummaging the writings of the Antients, should pick and cull all the worst things he could find, and make a book of them, as the defective verses of Homer, beginning with a short syllable, or the incongruities met with in Tragedies, or the obscene and base objections Archilochus makes against the female sex, disgracing himself by it; would he not deserve this tragical malediction,

(2) Plut. de
Curiositate, pag.
520.

*Pox on your taste! must you, like lice and fleas,
Be always fed with scabs and nastiness?*

But setting aside that curse, such a collection would neither bring him honour nor profit, as it rips up all the faults of other men; thus we read that Philip

V O L. V.

'gathered together the most wicked and incorrigible men of his time, whom he lodged together in a city he built for them, and called it Poneropolis, that is, the city of villains: so curious people collecting and amassing from all hands the faults and imperfections, not of verses or poems, but of the lives of men, make very disagreeable archives and registers of their memory, which they carry always about them. And just as at Rome there are persons who care not to buy handsome pictures, or fine statues, or even handsome boys and girls of those who expose them to sale, but rather affect to buy monsters in nature, such as have no legs, or their arms wrong placed, or three eyes, or the head of an ostrich, and delight in viewing them, and enquiring

Where kinds of unlike form oft blended are Into one hideous deformity.

But he who should commonly carry us to such shows, would trouble and torment us with the sight of them. So those who pry into other mens imperfections, the infamies of extractions, and the faults and errors happening in families, ought to call to mind as the former, that such observations have neither conducted to their pleasure nor profit.

9 O

A DISSERTATION

'censure and stigmatize men for that veneration, which they justly pay to antiquity, the parent of arts.'

In answer to this difficulty, I say, Sir, that I do not think my design to be dangerous in that respect; and therefore this sentence might reasonably be applied to me,

Periculosa plenum opus aleæ Tractas, & incedis per ignes
Suppositos cineri doloso (u);

(u) Horat. Od. I.
lib. ii.

*A dangerous work you write, and tread
O'er flames by treacherous ashes bid.*

CREECH.

and yet, properly speaking, I could not be called rash. I do not represent authors under the disadvantageous idea by which slanderers characterise them; I think they are too reasonable to take it amiss, that for the good of the public I should shew they have been sometimes in the wrong. I declare that in doing this I have no design to lessen the glory they have acquired, and that I shall carefully abstain, wherever civility requires it, from all disobliging terms, with respect either to their persons, or to the main of their work. The fate of a book depends not on some little faults, scattered up and down in it; nor will they deprive it of its just value, or rob the author of the praises due to him. The injustice and malice of mankind, great as they are, are not grown to such a pitch that the generality of readers will not commend a good book, because there may be a few faults here and there in it. This fine maxim of a Poet of Augustus's time will always be true:

Ubi plura nitent in carmine, non ego paucis
Offendar maculis, quos aut incuria fudit,
Aut humana parum cavit natura (w).

(w) Horat. de
Art. Poet. vers.
354.

*If num'rous graces shine in what he writes,
I'll not condemn tho' some few faults appear,
Which common frailty leaves, or want of care.*

CREECH.

Especially we forgive the faults, though numerous, of those who are the authors of large Dictionaries; and this maxim is particularly to be urged on their behalf,

Opere in longo fas est obrepere somnum (x);

(x) Id. lib. vii.
360.

*Yet if the work be long, sleep may surprise,
And a short nod creep o'er the watchful'st eyes.*

CREECH.

and in confidence of this I shall be the less scrupulous to criticise them, for I should be very sorry to lessen the regard which they deserve. The public is very much indebted to them for the instructions they have given with the sweat of their brows, and with the most oppressive toil that can be undergone in the productions of the pen. I refer my reader to Mr Morus's preface already cited, where he shews that the faults of Scaliger, Salmasius, and Baronius, ought not to deprive them of the glory they have obtained. You see, Sir, the nature of my excuses: I do not design to injure the merit of authors, nor to depart from the rules of civility towards them; and I have so good an opinion of their modesty, and their zeal for the instruction of the public, that I do not believe they will resent the liberty I shall take to shew wherein they have been mistaken. Most commonly I shall not be the discoverer of their faults, but only the relater of what others have said. I scrupulously take care never to appropriate to my self what I borrow from other hands; so that the reader may be assured, that when I note a fault without citing any author who observed it, I knew not of its being ever made public. After all, I do not think I ought to shew a greater indulgence to other authors than to my self, and it will appear that I do not spare my own faults. In fine, it ought to be considered that the interest of the public must be regarded before that of private persons; and that an author deserves no complaisance, who is so unjust as to chuse rather that his faults should be concealed, than the public undeceived. 'Nimis
' perversè se ipsum amat qui & alios vult errare ut error suus lateat: quanto enim me-' lius & utilius, ut ubi ipse erravit, alii non errent quorum admontui errore careat:
' quod si noluerit, saltem comites erroris non habeat (y). - - - A man must have an ' excessive degree of self love, who, in order to conceal his error, desires that other people ' should err as well as himself: Is it not much better, and more useful to warn other men not ' to fall into the error which he has committed, and by thus warning them, to remove his ' error? But if he does not incline to take such a course, let him at least be contented with ' erring by himself.'

I know

I know not whether it proceeds from my judging of other men by my self; but methinks those authors whose mistakes I shall relate civilly, will not be offended at it. For this reason I mention some faults which concern persons for whom I have a very great esteem, and who honour me with their friendship. Those whom I shall spare will have some reason to complain, because it will be a sign that I think them incapable of hearkening to reason, or unable to bear the smallest loss. This last motive is not always absolutely to be rejected: for if there are any authors whose faults ought to be concealed, they are chiefly those poor ones whom we could quickly strip to their shirts, should we fall upon them; and if there be others whose faults ought to be discovered, they are principally the great and famous ones, since, besides that their errors are infinitely more contagious than those of indifferent authors, they have such ample funds of reputation and treasures of fame, that an hundred shipwrecks could not hurt them. These words of Juvenal may be applied to them for their comfort:

(a) Juv. Sat.
XIII, ver. 6.

Non
Tam tenuis census tibi contigit ut mediocris
Jacturæ te mergat onus (z).

But more Corvinus, thy estate can bear
A greater loss, and not implore thy care:
Thy stock's sufficient, and thy wealth too great
To feel the damage of a petty cheat.

DRYDEN.

For this reason there are few who retract with less reluctance (a a), or bear censure with a better grace, than those who have most justly obtained the title of great authors (b b). Prepare, Sir, to see your self in this Dictionary, if any mistake has escaped you; but I have no hopes of being able to give you this proof of my good opinion of you. You are too exact and penetrating, not to exclude all sorts of falsehood from your writings; and besides, you are so deeply skilled in the Greek and Roman antiquities, that you have taken nothing from them but what is rare and curious; so that a man ought to be I know not how much more learned than I am, in order to discover whether you have erred or not. If these answers are not satisfactory, I add on one hand, that the instruction of the public well deserves I should sacrifice my self to the ill humour of some private men; and on the other, that I shall give but too much occasion to the authors I censure to revenge themselves. I heartily consent to a retaliation either from themselves or their posterity. I will take it as a kindness done me to correct my writings, and to furnish me with better light; and I beseech this favour of all my readers. I will endeavour not to commit faults, but am very certain I shall commit but too many. The complaint therefore will not lie against me, which is urged against those critics who print nothing for fear of reprisals [C].

(a a) A futuris
se deceptum esse Hippocrates memorie tradidit, more scilicet magnum viro-rum & fiduciam magorum rerum habentium. Nam levia ingenia quia nihil ha-bent, nihil libi detrahunt.

Magna ingenio multaque subilominus habituro convenit etiam simplex veri erro-ris confessio. . . .
Hippocrates habet revelat that he was deceived by the futures (in the scull). This was acting like a great man, whose reputation could not be hurt by a few mistakes.
For men of superficial parts have nothing to lose, as they possess but little.

But it becomes a great genius, who, without standing his faults, will still have a great stock of fame, to make a plain and ingenious confession of his error.
Celsus de Medic. lib. viii,
cap. iv. See also Quintil. lib.
iii, cap. vi.

(b b) Nulli pa-tius reprehendi-duntur, quam qui maxime laudari merentur.
Plin. Epist. xx,
lib. vii.

In

[C] The complaint against those Critics who print nothing for fear of reprisals.] Regnier in his ninth satire, calls upon his censors to publish something.

Marcial had thoughts of this nature before in his xciiid epigram of the first book.

Cum tua non edas, carpis mea carmina, Læli:
Carpere vel noli nostra, vel ede tua.

Qu'ils fassent un ouvrage,
Riche d'inventions, de sens, & de langage,
Que nous puissions draper comme ils font nos écrits,
Et voir, comme l'on dit, s'ils sont si bien appris, Qu'ils montrent de leur eau, qu'ils entrent en carrière.

Lælius either cease to criticise my poems, or publish your own.

And he saith in the lxvth epigram of the xliith book,

Corruptit fine talione celebs:
Cæcus perdere non potest quod aufert.

Let our censurers publish a work of theirs, rich in invention, sense, and language; which we may criticise, as they do our writings, and may see if they can write so well as they criticise; let them give a specimen of their performances, and enter the lists with us.

The bachelor, who debauches a married woman, is no more liable to retaliation, than a blind man is liable to lose his sight.

To which he applies the Italian story.

See Mr Saldennus, pag. 44 & 419, of the treatise de libris variorum eorum usque & abusu.

Qu'une fois un paissant,
Homme fort entendu, & suffisant de teste,
Comme on peut aisément juger par sa requeste,
S'en vint trouver le Pape & le voulut prier,
Que les Prestres du temps se pussent marier,
Afin, ce disoit-il, que nous puissions nous autres
Leurs femmes caresser ainsi qu'ils font les nôtres.

You will find a supplement to this in the article A-RISTARCHUS (3). I have observed in another place, that those readers who never write, are very often more rigid and unjust in their censures, than those who know by experience the pains of composition. I think I may say there are two things which hinder the universal and unmerciful Critics from shew-ing themselves in print. One is, the fear that every body should fall upon their works, and make them suffer the punishment of retaliation without mercy: the other that they themselves perceive that they come not up to the idea of perfection which was the rule of their censures. It is easier to imagine an high perfection than to find it; and it is the fate of most Critics to be able to find faults, and not be able to do better (4): they do not seem to have the faculty

(3) ARISTAR-
CHUS the Grammarian, remark [C].

Once on a time a Peasant, who, as you may easily judge by his request, was a very knowing man, came to the Pope, and begged his holiness would suffer the priests to marry, that we laymen, said he, may caress their wives, as well as they caress ours.

(4) Compare what is above, in the remark
[C], of the article ZEUXIS.

VII.
2. That it will censure little faults.

In the second place it will be thought very strange that I amuse my self with censuring little matters, where the want of exactness is almost imperceptible. I have my reasons for this, Sir: I well foresaw what would be said of it, and that the minutissimum rerum minutissimus sciscitator ----- a minute examiner of minute affairs, would be applied to me; nevertheless I have considered that these galleries were to be despised, and that even the least faults were to be observed; for the more we criticise things with reason, the more we shew how difficult it is to be perfectly exact. Now, by carrying the idea of perfect exactness so high, we oblige authors to be the more upon their guard, and to examine every thing with the utmost circumspection. Man is but too much accustomed to fall short of the rules set before him (cc); we must therefore strain them to as high a pitch as possible, if we would have him come near the point of perfection. And moreover, since this book may be serviceable to those who will compose a correct Historical Dictionary, a work which is very much wanted, I ought to descend into particulars with some kind of nicety, nay, if they will, with some captiousness. It is not out of inclination, but choice, that I insist upon trifles, and I ought to be thanked for it, since it is in some manner a sacrificing one's self to the good of others (dd). It is taking a road which does not lead to praise, to bring others to a just accuracy; and is not this a considerable sacrifice? There are not many people who would make the like, I appeal to Quintilian. 'Sive contemnentes tanquam parva quæ prius discimus studia seu, quod proximum vero, nullam ingenii sperantes gratiam circa res etiam si necessarias, procul tamen ab ostentatione positas' (ee). ----- Whether this happens because we look down upon our early studies, as little and puerile; or, which is more likely, because we do not hope to be praised for our parts, when we employ them in studies, which, though necessary, yet are far from having a splendid and showy appearance.

(cc) Compare with this what has been said above, in remark [F], of the Dissertation concerning Defamatory Libels.

(dd) See, above in remark [B], of the article ANTESIGNATUS, what Erasmus has said of the laborious task of compiling Dictionaries.

(ee) Quint. lib. i, in Proæm.

I shall say something hereafter, that may serve as a supplement to the discussion of this second difficulty. (ff) Lib. x, 43.

VIII.
3. That it will contain useless discussions.

In the third place, I may be charged with giving my self an useless trouble: for what is it to us, will they say, to know whether one Cassius Longinus has been mistaken for another; whether he was capitally punished, or only banished? Truly the public is very much concerned for this! What matters it whether Scaliger was angry or not angry with Erasmus for calling him a soldier? and so of the rest. To this, I have a thousand things to answer; and from the multitude of thoughts which now offer themselves to my mind, I could make a long dissertation upon this subject, which would perhaps be tolerable: but as it is time to conclude, I reduce my self to a few notes; the rest may appear at another and more seasonable time, or perhaps is unnecessary, since every one may easily find it, either by his own meditation or in books.

(gg) By this word I do not mean that every body is pleased with the same confutations, but that some are pleased with one just, and others with another.

(hh) If it is not necessary to know them, whether it is necessary to be ignorant of them. Scaliger, at the beginning of his notes on Catullus, has this saying, Et cæcidit lectus, hoc epigrammate poetaster carere potest, habet tamen quod se scire melius fuit quam ignorare.

----- Though, candid reader, thou mightest well be wroth that this epigram, yet it contains certain things, which is better than shouldst know them to be ignorant of. See the News from the Republic of Letters, in the advertisement of August 1684. Lipsius was curious of truth, even in the least things: Ab mirabilis Lipsii alicubi sit lectore etiam in minimis vix scire. Epistolæ Hoffm. ad Beningham, p. 120.

I say then, Sir, that this objection, which might perhaps be a solid one, absolutely speaking, and without respect to time and place, is of no force when referred to the age and the part of the world we live in. If men were perfectly reasonable, they would employ themselves wholly in the care of their eternal salvation; one thing alone would be necessary, as our Saviour told Martha, Porro unum est necessarium (ff), who knows not also the good and wife maxim, nature is content with a little? Who can doubt but that if we contained our selves within the bounds of natural necessity, we must abolish almost all the arts as things superfluous? But man can be no longer treated upon that foot; it has been time out of mind his practice to seek the conveniences of life, and all sorts of pleasures and delights. Among other unnecessary things, about which the Europeans have been pleased to employ themselves, they desired to understand the Greek and Latin tongues, or at least to know the matters contained in the books which are extant in those two languages. Nor were they content to know in general what is contained in those books, but they would examine whether every thing in them was certain, and whether they could not clear up those passages where one ancient author contradicts another: and when they have been able to clear these difficulties, and those of all sorts of Histories, they have found it a very agreeable satisfaction, have very much diverted their readers, and procured great encomiums to themselves, though these illustrations were of no use to bring down the price of provisions, or to keep off cold or heat, rain or hail. It ought not therefore to be deemed an impertinent rashness in me to expose, as wares of great value, things which have been rejected by all mankind as useless; for in this I only fall in with the taste which I find has long prevailed, and is fully established. Whether men be in the right or the wrong to be pleased that they are not in an error upon any point of Geography, Chronology, or History, is nothing to me: I am in no wise answerable for that; it is sufficient for my purpose, that the public (gg) desireth exactly to know all the falsehoods that are current, and values these discoveries (bb).

Let

(f) Vigneul-Marville, Mélanges d'Hist. & de Littérature, Tom. iii, pag. 181, Rouen, Edit. 1701.

faculty of speaking or writing, they are so dry and barren to all the folds and corners of a work, had the prudence to publish nothing of his own, and that the few things of his which came out are not very considerable.

(g) The author of this judgment observes, That Mr. Cornart, who had an excellent judgment and delicate taste, and whose criticisms were just, and penetrating in

Let it not be said that our age, being cured of that critical taste which reigned in the preceding, looks upon the writings of those who correct falsities, concerning either the particular History of great men, or the names of cities, or the like, as mere pedantry; for it is certain, when all things are considered, that men were never more devoted than they are at this day to such sorts of illustrations. For one experimental Philosopher, for one Mathematician, you find an hundred men who thoroughly study History with all its dependencies; and antiquarian science, I mean the study of medals, inscriptions, basso relievo's, &c. was never cultivated as it is at present. To what does it tend? To the better fixing the time when certain particular facts happened; to prevent one town or person from being mistaken for another; to corroborate the conjectures which have been made upon certain rites of the ancients; and to an hundred other curiosities which the public has nothing to do with, according to the supercilious maxims upon which this third difficulty is grounded; maxims that have not discouraged a great man (ii), as consummate in the affairs of state as in the study of the Belles Lettres, from publishing a large book upon the excellence and usefulness of medals.

(ii) The Baron de Spaur.

You, Sir, of all men living are most convinced of the impertinence of these maxims; they tend to nothing less than the ruin of all the liberal arts, and almost of all the sciences which chiefly polish and exalt the mind of man (jj). According to these fine reasonings, we should have nothing left but the use of Mechanical arts, and as much Geometry as is necessary to perfect Navigation, Carriages, Agriculture, and the Fortification of Towns. For Professors, we should have scarce any, but Engineers to invent only new ways of destroying mankind. It must be owned the public has a very great interest in all these things, since by these means we may commodiously store our towns with plenty, and maintain an offensive or defensive war. But it must be owned on the other hand, with Cicero's leave (kk), that all the beauties of painting, sculpture, and architecture, serve only to please the eyes, and to give an agreeable admiration to good judges. The coarse productions of all those arts serve to satisfy the necessities of men; a man may be safely and commodiously lodged without the help of the Corinthian or the Composite order, without friezes, cornices, and architraves. Much less is it necessary for the conveniences of life, to know all that is said either of the incommensurability of the Asymptotes, or of Magical Squares, or the Duplication of the Cube, &c. The Turks in the midst of their gross ignorance, are no less robust, and spend no less merrily ten thousand livres a year, when they have them, than the Christians; and that Governour of Neuhaufel, who after the raising of the siege of Vienna complained of the perfidy of the French, who had given the King of Poland passage through their country (ll), enjoyed the authority of his post as agreeably as if he had been better skilled in History and Geography. So that if a man was allowed to despise a work which treats not de pane lucrando - - - of earning one's bread, or is of no use πρὸς τὰ ἀλφίτα, for getting victuals, as your good friends the ancient Greeks said, or in short when the public may do without it, there are few books but would be contemptible, and deserve the blunt saying you have doubtless read in the life of Malherbe. Mr de Meziriac, attended with two or three of his friends, brought him his commentary on Diophantus; those friends greatly praised this book, as very useful to the public: Malherbe asked them whether it would bring down the price of bread? Another time he approved the giving recompences to those only who served the King in his armies and public affairs; and he said that a good Poet was no more useful to the state than a good player at nine-pins.

(jj) See the News from the Republic of Letters, September 1684, Art. iv.

(kk) He endeavours in book iii, de Oratore, to prove this position, In plerisque rebus incredibiliter hoc natura est ipsa fabricata, ut ea quæ maximam utilitatem in se continerent eadem haberent plurimum vel dignitatis vel sæpè etiam venustatis.

- - - Nature itself has wonderfully contrived that most of those things, which are of the greatest usefulness, should likewise have in them very much dignity, and also frequently, very much comeliness and beauty.

(ll) Du Vignau, l'Etat présent de la Puissance Ottomane, pag. 177, Hague edition 1688.

It must therefore be granted me, that there are a great many productions of the mind of man, which are esteemed, not because they are necessary, but because they divert us: and since it is so, is it not proper to observe the falsities of authors, when there are so many men who delight to know the truth, even in things wherein their fortune is not in the least concerned?

Is it not certain that a Shoemaker, a Miller, a Gardener, are infinitely more necessary to the society, than the ablest Painters or Statuaries; than a Michael Angelo, or a Cavalier Bernini? Is it not true that the meanest Bricklayer is more necessary in a town, than the most excellent Chronologer or Astronomer; than a Joseph Scaliger, or a Copernicus? And yet the works of these great men which the world might well enough dispense with, are infinitely more valued than the absolutely necessary productions of these trades. Plus interfuit Reipub. Castellum capi Ligurum quàm bene defendi causam M. Curii. Credo, sed Atheniensium quoque plus interfuit firma tecta in domiciis habere, quàm Minervæ signum ex ebore pulcherrimum: tamen ego me Phidiam esse mallem quam vel optimum fabrum lignarium; quare non quantum quicque profit, sed quanti quisque sit ponderandum est: præsertim cum pauci pingere egregie possint aut fingere, operarii autem aut bajuli deesse non possint (mm). - - - It was more beneficial to the commonwealth that the sort of the Ligurians should be taken, than the cause of M. Curius should be well defended. I believe it, but it was likewise more beneficial to the Athenians to have well built houses, than to have the beautiful ivory statue of Minerva. But I would rather be Phidias, than the best Carpenter in the world: so that we are to consider, not how beneficial every man is, but what real merit he has: especially (mm) Cicero, in Bruto.

V O L. V.

9 P

'since few men are excellent Painters or Statuaries, whereas there are always workmen and porters abundance.' So true it is, that there are things whose worth and value is determined only with respect to an honest diversion, or a mere ornament of the mind.

IX.
The same reasons which prove the usefulness of other sciences, prove the usefulness of critical learning.

Here, Sir, you will not fail to foresee that the enemies to the Belles Lettres will invent an hundred exceptions. As they cannot deny that their maxims tend to revive barbarism in all respects, they will expatiate on the usefulness arising from certain sciences. But they will get nothing by it; for as soon as they place in the number of things useful, such as have an utility either by result or emanation (permit me to use this old school distinction, since it so well comprehends both those kinds of accessory utilities, which may here be alleged (nn),) they will find themselves obliged to bring in the Belles Lettres and Critical learning. I can retort all their observations against them. Here is a small specimen of it.

If they tell me that the most abstract theorems of Algebra are very useful to life, because they render the mind of man more capable of perfecting certain arts: I may also say that a scrupulous enquiry into all Historical facts, is capable of producing very great advantages. I dare affirm, that the ridiculous obstinacy of the first Critics, who lavished their time upon trifles, for example, upon the question whether we ought to say Virgilius or Vergilius, has by accident been of great use; they thereby inspired men with an extreme veneration for Antiquity; they disposed them to a sedulous enquiry into the conduct of antient Greece and of antient Rome, and thus gave occasion to their improving by those great examples. And what effect, Sir, do you think, would not a grave and majestic sentence, taken from Livy or Tacitus, and uttered as having heretofore inclined the Roman Senate to one side of a question, have upon hearers thus disposed (oo)? I will not scruple to say that it is capable of saving a nation, and perhaps has saved more than one. The President of an assembly pronounces those Latin words with an emphasis; he makes an impression upon their minds by the respect they have for the Roman name; every one goes home convinced, and infuses into his neighbours the sentiments of obedience; and thus you see a civil war stifled in its birth. Malherbe had no notion of this when he said, that a Poet is no more useful to a nation than a good player at nine-pins: for, not to descend to all the good things a Poet can effect (pp), do not you think, Sir, that one of the topping men of a parish has often by a stanza of Pibrac emphatically pronounced, happily destroyed all the contrivances of a factious declaimer? And in domestic affairs, do you think that those golden sentences recommended by Moliere (qq) are always ineffectual? I believe they are often so, but not always; and I do not think that Horace, in the verses I here cite, spoke only of an imaginary profit.

(nn) Here I erect a greater Ladder to this Distinction than the schools.

(oo) Compare with this Seneca's scitibus opibus. I have cited above some part of it in remark [B], of the article ARISTO.

(pp) Horat. Epist. I, lib. II, reckons them up. See, below, citation (rr).

(qq) Moliere, Comédie de l'École des Imaginaires.

Os tenerum pueri balbumque poeta figurat:
Torquet ab obscenis jam nunc sermonibus aurem;
Mox etiam pectus præceptis format amicis:
Asperitatis, & invidiæ corrector & iræ (rr).

(rr) Horat. Epist. I, lib. II, ver. 124.

They teach our boys to hate all words obscene,
To follow generous rules, and speak like men,
And then slide gently down with virtuous rules
Into the tender breast, and form their souls;
Restrain their envy, and correct their rage,
Tell them what's good, instruct their tender age
With fit examples, and their griefs assuage.

}

CREECH.

It will be said, perhaps, that what seems the most abstracted and unfruitful in Mathematics, brings at least this advantage, that it leads us to undoubted truths; whereas Historical discussions, and enquiries after human actions, leave us always in the dark, and always some seeds of new disputes. But how imprudent it is to harp upon this string! I maintain that Historical truths may be carried to a greater degree of certainty than what Geometrical truths are brought to, provided we consider these two sorts of truths in the kind of certainty peculiar to them. I explain myself. In the disputes that arise betwixt Historians, to know whether a certain Prince has reigned before or after another; it is supposed on both sides that a fact has all the reality and existence of which it is capable out of our understanding, provided it be not of the nature of those related by Ariosto and other fabulous authors; and no regard is had to the difficulties alleged by the Sceptics, to make it doubtful whether the things which seem to exist do really exist out of our minds. Thus an Historical fact is placed in the highest degree of certainty that can belong to it, when once we have been able to prove its apparent existence: for no more is required for this sort of truths; and it were denying the common principle of disputants, and going from one kind of things to another, to bid us prove not only that it appeared to all Europe that a bloody battle was fought at Senef in the year 1674; but also that the objects are such ad extra - - out of our understanding as they appear to us to be. Thus we are delivered from the importunate cavils which the Sceptics

X.

Sceptics call reasons for suspending our assent; and though Historical Scepticism cannot be rejected in a great many facts, it is certain there are several others which we can prove with a full certainty; so that Historical enquiries are not fruitless in that respect. We certainly shew the falsity of several things, the uncertainty of several others, and the truth of several others: and thus you have some demonstrations which may be of use to many more people than Geometrical ones; for few people have a taste for these, or find occasion to apply them to the reformation of manners: but it will be confessed, Sir, that a great many people may profit, morally speaking, by the reading of a collection of Historical falsehoods, well proved to be falsehoods, though it were only by growing more circumspect in judging of other men, and more capable of avoiding the snares which satire and flattery lay on all sides for the unwary reader. Now, is it of no use to correct the bad inclination we have to make rash judgments? Is it of no use to learn not to believe lightly what we see in print? Is it not the very nerve and sinew of prudence not to believe hastily? Νῦν καὶ μέντοι ἀπιστεῖν ἄρχει τὰν φησὶν. Sobrius esto atque illud teneto nervos atque artus esse sapientiae non temere credere (ss). (ss) Epicharmus, apud Ciceronem, Polyblum, Lucianum, &c.

In vain should we seek for these moral advantages in the most refined books of Algebra. Besides, by the leave of the Mathematicians, it is not so easy for them to arrive at that certainty which is necessary in the Mathematics, as it is for Historians to arrive at that certainty which is sufficient in History. No solid objection will ever be made against this truth of fact, that Caesar vanquished Pompey; and whatever principles we dispute upon, nothing will stand more immovably than this proposition, Caesar and Pompey have existed, and were not a mere modification of the minds of those who wrote their lives. But as for the object of Mathematics, it is not only very hard to prove that it exists out of our mind, but it is very easy to prove that it can be nothing but an idea of our mind (tt). And indeed the existence of a square circle without us, seems not much more impossible, than the existence of the circle of which Geometry gives us so many fine demonstrations; I mean, of a circle from the circumference of which, to its centre, as many straight lines may be drawn as there are points in that circumference. It is manifest, that the centre, which is but one point, cannot be the common subject where there terminate as many different lines as there are points in the circumference. In a word, the object of Mathematics being points absolutely indivisible, lines without breadth or depth, and surfaces without depth; it is evident that this object cannot exist out of our imagination. Thus it is metaphysically more certain that Cicero has had a being out of the understanding of any other man, than it is certain that the object of Mathematics exists out of our understanding. I omit what the learned Huetius (uu) has represented to these gentlemen, to teach them not so much to undervalue Historical truths.

The abstracted depths of Mathematics, it may be said, give us sublime ideas of the infinity of God. Be it so: But do you think that a great moral good may not result from a Critical Dictionary? The infallible Oracle affirms, that science puffeth up; and therefore there is no case wherein it is more important to humble the pride of man than in this. He who mentions pride mentions the fault which is the most remote from true virtue, and the most diametrically opposite to the spirit of the gospel. Now what could be imagined more proper to give man a true notion of the emptiness and vanity of the sciences, and of the weakness of his understanding, than to shew him the numberless false facts with which books abound. A great many men of letters, the most penetrating and sublime wits, have made it their business for many years to illustrate Antiquity. That task of the Critics having the actions of men for its object, should be more easy than that of the Philosophers, which has the actions of God for its object, and yet the Critics have given so many proofs of human infirmity, that one may compose large volumes of their falsehoods. These volumes may therefore mortify man with respect to his greatest vanity, I mean his knowledge or science. There are so many trophies or triumphal arches erected to human ignorance and infirmity.

Hence you see, Sir, that the smallest falsities will here have their use, since by the very collection of numerous lies upon every subject, man will be the better taught to know his weakness, and see the prodigious variety his errors are capable of. This will make him more sensible that he is the sport of malice and ignorance; that one seizes him when the other leaves him; that if he be intelligent enough to know a lie, he is wicked enough to vent it against his conscience; or if he is not wicked to this pitch of propagating falsehood, he is blind enough not to discern the truth. For my own part, when I think that perhaps I shall make it my serious employment for all my life to gather materials for this kind of triumphal arches, I find myself thoroughly penetrated with the conviction of my nothingness. This will be a continual lesson to me of self-contempt. No sermon, no note of the Ecclesiastes, or Preacher, by way of excellency, could more firmly rivet in me this grand maxim (ww), I have seen all the works that are done under the sun, AND BEHOLD ALL IS VANITY AND VEXATION OF SPIRIT (xx). You see how conceited I am of my own work: I shall think worse

(ss) Epicharmus, apud Ciceronem, Polyblum, Lucianum, &c.

(tt) See, above, the article of ZENO, the Epicurean Philosopher, remark [D], towards the end.

(uu) Prefat. Demonstrat. Evangel.

(ww) Ecclesiastes 1: 14.

(xx) Compare with this what is said by Pliny in the Maximæ, Memor. Tom. iii. pag. 206, & seq. and pag. ult. edition of Rousset of 1701.

of it than any body else, and I esteem that circumstance more than all the rest.

I was going to finish with this moral reflexion, when I remembered I had not intimated that I shall use the same liberty and civility towards all authors, of whatever nation or religions they may be; I therefore declare it here. Nothing is more ridiculous than a Dictionary where the author turns Controversialist. This is one of the greatest faults of Moreri's Dictionary: we find in it an hundred places that seem to be taken from a true crusade sermon. For my part, I shall not say with Hannibal, Hofem qui feriet mibi erit Carthaginienfis, quisquis erit (yy) Civis (zz): - - - I shall look upon him, whoever he be, who slays an enemy, as a citizen of Carthage: but rather that all those who depart from truth shall be equally strangers to me. You know some people who will complain of this, but who will rejoice at it in the bottom of their soul, because it will furnish them with pretexts for slander, and for playing the zealots, two things which in these persons always go together. But though there are not many civilities that pass between us, I shall go on my usual way, let them say what they will, and shall not envy them the bones they may find to pick in it. Here is the reason of my proceeding after this manner.

As this Dictionary does not concern errors in reasoning, partiality in it would be incomparably more inexcusable than in Historical Dictionaries; for a man is obliged in these to relate a thousand things which are true in the judgment of some, and false in that of others: he ought therefore to suppose a great difference of principles in readers, and to imagine that in the hands of some he will be in an enemy's country, and in the hands of others among friends; and for that reason it is just he should proportion his style and way of deciding accordingly. But when a man only proposes to collect errors of fact, he reasonably supposes that all his readers have the same principles, and that there is no man but will admit as false what he shews to be so: for the proofs of a falsity in fact are not the prejudices of a particular nation or particular religion, but maxims common to all men. You hereby see, Sir, that Philosophical or Theological falsities enter not into the plan of my work: however it is true that books wherein they are discussed might furnish out a kind of falsities in fact, which would not perhaps be the less useful to the reader.

It most commonly happens that disputes in writing upon any point of doctrine degenerate into personal altercations, and for the most part turn only upon the question, whether an adversary's passage has been well or ill cited, well or ill interpreted. Here the public abandons the disputants, and, as was not long since said by a man of wit, the antagonists are obliged to part for want of readers or Bookfellers. If any body had patience enough to make an analysis of these personal quarrels, he would have a great many faults within the province of this Dictionary, many false citations, or false interpretations. Now these are errors in fact. You will own, Sir, there could be no Logic comparable to this, to teach the justness of reasoning; besides this great moral advantage, that we should at the same time discover a great many frauds, or at least the imperfections of our souls; for what proceeds not from insincerity, must arise from dimness or weakness of mind.

It is a misfortune that frauds of this kind should go unpunished so much as they do, by the little care that readers take to compare the answers and replies together. But if any one took the pains to describe in a few words the progress of a dispute, he would bring to light all the windings and turnings of the caviller, and make them detested.

Pardon me, Sir, so long an Epistle Dedicatory, and make haste to enrich the Republic of Letters with the learned works they expect from you. Your modesty and our friendship forbid me to praise them: but I could gladly wish the public might soon give you the praises you will receive when they shall appear. I am with the greatest attachment

S I R,

Your most humble and most obedient servant,

May 5, 1692.

Note, that in the composing of this Dictionary I have not followed all the ideas of this Plan. The deference I had to the advices I received from some intelligent readers made me follow another method in certain matters.

REMARKS

R E M A R K S

O N

A P A M P H L E T

I N T I T U L E D,

The judgment of the public, and particularly of the Abbot Renaudot, on Mr Bayle's Critical Dictionary.

MY principal design in this piece is to acquaint the public, that I am preparing a defence, which to every unprejudiced reader will demonstrate the injustice of my censurers. But that Apology not deserving the fate of loose sheets, which commonly do not outlive the week in which they first appear, I keep it to be placed at the beginning or end of a book in folio (1). For the same reason I refer to it almost every thing considerable that may be said against the pamphlet which is just published. Here I confine myself to a few observations made in haste and negligently. It would be prodigal in a writer to bestow ornament and stile on a piece, like this, of seven or eight pages.

(1) That Apology was placed at the end of the second edition of the Critical Dictionary, and contains the IV Explanations which follow these Remarks

I. That libel has a very improper title: it ought to be intitled, The judgment of the Abbot Renaudot commented upon by the publisher; for all the other judges are less than phantoms: they are invisible beings, no body knows whether they are black or white. Therefore their evidence and a cypher are of the same value. I except the agents of the States of Holland; but upon this point, I beg the reader to take notice of what I shall mention hereafter of Tertullian.

II. What manner of proceeding is this! to make the judgment of the public consist in such pieces. I could produce a great many much stronger in my favour, if modesty would permit. And besides, how many letters could I produce, wherein my adversary is represented both as a bad writer, and a bad man. But God forbid that I should imitate him in the use he makes of what people write one to another in confidence. This is a conduct detested by the Heathens themselves. What kind of people have we here? One writes what he pretends to have heard a Bishop say, and the other publishes it to the world. Neither asks his permission. They name him without it. Can any thing be more audacious? And is not this tyrannizing over conversation, more than ever Phalaris did over the people?

III. The author of this pretended Judgment of the Public has not been very wise in the choice he has made. He conceals the names of all his witnesses, except one whom he ought chiefly to have concealed, a name odious and despised in all the countries which are at war with France. I will not take advantage of the prepossession of the public: I will not consider him with regard to his Gazette, which every where discredits him, as a man who has got a habit of giving a malicious turn to lies. I will consider him on his fair side. The Abbot Renaudot has the character of a very learned man, and of having a taste so delicate, that nothing can please him. We can therefore conclude nothing from his contempt of any thing: It is an equivocal proof. I have been told likewise that he is exceedingly devout. We must not therefore be surprized that he finds some things too free, which at bottom do not go beyond the liberties an honest man may allow himself, after the examples of so many great authors. Can a severe Moralist, Tertullian for instance, find in the house of a gentleman, any thing remote enough from luxury? It is no matter though the public be charmed with the good order observed in it. Let the mistress of the house go to plays and balls but now and then: let her engage in gaming only upon certain occasions. Let the world applaud the modesty of her dress and conversation. Tertullian, notwithstanding, exclaims that she is immodest; she shows too much her breast and her arms; she wears ribbons, and dances, and rallies sometimes. And this is enough to damn her. It is not by the taste of such a censor that we are to judge whether the commentary of a layman on the History of particular persons be not sometimes in too worldly a dress; for by following such a taste, though conformable to the rigorous laws of the gospel, we must

V O L. V.

9 Q

must

must banish all romances, and a great many other books which the civil laws authorize, and must compose works of piety only. It may be said that some persons, who are not Rigorists, find in my Dictionary a few gayeties somewhat too strong. But the Apology I am preparing, will, I hope, give full satisfaction on that head. I should make another Apology for what Abbot Renaudot calls Impieties; but as I know not upon what the accusation is grounded, I shall defer it till I am better informed. I have declared on all occasions, and I do here publicly declare, that if there are any heterodox opinions in my work, I am the first who will detest them, and that I will throw them out in my second edition. I only want to have them pointed out to me. As to the article of DAVID, the Abbé is much in the wrong to say that I have there shewn no respect for the Scripture: since the explanation I have joined to it, is full of a most respectful submission to that divine book. For this I appeal to all my readers. I add that in the way I propose to revise that article, it will furnish my censurers with no further pretence of declamation. After all, will any of them be so bold as to say that my Dictionary comes near the licentiousness of Montagne's Essays, either with regard to Scepticism, or obscenities? But did not Montagne publish several editions of his book, without being called to an account for it? Has it not been printed a hundred times over? Was it not dedicated to the great Cardinal de Richelieu? Has it not a place in every library? What a hardship and injustice would it be; if I was denied that liberty in Holland, which Montagne enjoyed in France?

IV. If ever I answer Abbot Renaudot's judgment, it will only be after being assured that he owns it to be his, such as it is printed: for it is so full of blunders, falsehoods, and impertinences, that I imagine it not to be agreeable to the original: some spurious things have perhaps been foisted into it in copying. He had prejudiced a great many people: but some judicious men having read my Dictionary, quickly put an end to that prejudice. The Abbot himself is not ignorant of this: for he says in one of his letters that I ought to be satisfied with the approbation of so many people. And so I am. People were surprized to find so many idle things in his report. The only question was whether my book contained any thing which could offend the Church of Rome, or France. They did not ask him whether I had read the best authors, or whether I equal the Moderns with the Antients. If several of my readers have contradicted him with respect to my ignorance, I disown them. He has not said enough on that head; I know a great deal more of it, and if he has a mind to draw my picture in that light, I will furnish him with a good many memoirs. But I beg leave to tell him that he has not well chosen his proofs of my incapacity; for example, when he would prove it by my translating Librarii, Booksellers, he censures me most unjustly, since in a marginal note I have apprized the reader that by Librarii, must be understood the Transcribers and Bookbinders, according to the custom of fitting up books at that time (2). I did therefore understand the thing as it ought to be understood. I do not impute to him the impertinence of the marginal note which is made on this passage of his report, published in this town. That must be laid to the charge of the publisher*.

(2) See citation (38), in the article ATTICUS.

* Mr Jurieu's marginal note ran thus. This word (Librarii) signifies what weighs a pound; Libraria frustris; pieces weighing a pound. R. M. CAIT.

V. He has published the Abbot's paper with little judgment, for it fully proves the untruth of those accusations, which he has so often trumpeted out against me, of my holding a correspondence with the court of France. A chimera which no man but himself could have devised: and for this he would have made reparation to the public at the end of this piece, which he has printed, and which so fully justifies my innocence, if it was possible for him to act the part of an honest man. But on this head he is profoundly silent, and has only laboured to throw a rank poison upon what I advanced in favour of the Protestants, and against the Church of Rome. Sure he must be an enemy to the edification of his neighbours, since he deprives the Protestants of that which Abbé Renaudot's judgment affords them; and in order to do so, copies himself twenty times over, repeating calumnies frequently detected, and which he never supported but by heaping falsehoods upon falsehoods, as it appears by the long catalogues of them, which were publicly pointed out to him.

VI. I shall take a little notice of his reflexions. In these he only gives a loose to spleen and passion: they are either rambling judgments, the fallacies of which an intelligent reader will perceive of himself, or calumnies refuted a hundred times, or new lies which do not deserve to be refuted, or which shall be so on a proper occasion. Upon the whole, after having declaimed so long, it will appear that he himself is confounded by the three examples he produces. He alledges a comparison on the fall of Eve, a passage of St Paul applied to the Abolitionists, and a phrase on the design of Abelard. The first example is an objection which I proposed to the Socinians, and expressed with that caution which the subject required, or an objection which I suppose the Manichees make to the Jesuits. There is not the least profanation in the second, nor any obscenity in the third. This I submit to the judgment of any impartial and intelligent reader, and am willing that he decide it without hearing me. Such is the common fate of declaimers. While they only make general complaints, they gain people over to their side by surprise; but bid them point to a particular passage, and it then appears that they misapprehended the matter, that they mistook for my opinions the consequences sequences resulting from those Heresies which I attack, and made mountains of mole-hills. This obliges me to give them a charitable word of advice. Gentlemen, I tell you as a friend, never speak of my Dictionary but before people who have it not; for if it is produced, and you are obliged to prove your assertions, you will be caught. This happens to some of you every day. You have not been artful enough; passion has blinded you, your hyperboles made people expect to find in every page, some abominable things, like those in the Parnasse Satirique, whereas nothing was found in it, but such trifles as are said every day in good company, and such as you yourselves might very well say, either when you take a walk, or are at table with your friends. Give over exaggerating; say rather too little, than too much. Such a way of bursting will not recoil on you.

VII. We may add to the three examples he quotes what he alledges against the article wherein I recite some passages of a book of Tagereau (3). He could not chuse a worse subject for the ground of his objections; for I shall make it appear on a proper occasion that I was fully authorized to insert in my work, what I have said concerning the congress. As an Historian I might say, that Quellenee was accused of impotence, and that it was his mother-in-law, and not his wife, who commenced that law-suit. Indeed I owed this remark to the memory of an heroine of our party. It became me, as a faithful Historian, to censure those who fully the glory of that lady, by supposing that at so early an age she raised such a law-suit. This is declaring that I do not at all think it reputable in a woman to engage in such proceedings. Every author has a right to declare the reasons of his sentiments. Thus, as a Commentator on my own text, I might and ought to offer the proofs of the opinion which I advanced, and by consequence relate what Tagereau published against the practice of that time. We would appear wiser than our fathers, and we are not so wise as they were. That Advocate of the Parliament of Paris readily obtained a privilege for publishing a book wherein he described all the filthiness of the congress; and shall a clamour be raised in Holland against an author who copies a few passages of that book? Is not this a respect of persons, proceeding either from a very fantastical mind, or a bad heart?

VIII. But it may be said, that author published those particulars only with a view of obliging the judges to put a stop to a custom inconsistent with modesty and liable to iniquitous practices. And do not I declare, even with the greatest indignation, that the custom was infamous, because it weakened the principles of modesty, the most precious source of chastity? Is it possible for a man to take the honest side with greater warmth than I have done in that article.

Besides, had I not, as an Historian, the right to relate a practice which continued long in the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Paris, and which is not yet abolished in any other place. The manner of proceeding in all civil and criminal causes belongs unquestionably to Historical facts, and if there is any thing singular in it, many travellers and many writers of relations are curious to be informed of it. What pleasure would it have been to a Pietro della Valle to find a book in Persia, which would have informed him of an extravagant custom, so well as Tagereau's book might inform him of the ceremonial of the congress. I ask whether the verbal processes of Juries and Matrons, in some cases, are pieces to be rejected by those who would make complete collections of all the uses and customs of a country? Furetiere, who did not write an Historical Dictionary, with comments on it, but only a Grammatical one, made use of these verbal processes. And did any body complain of it?

IX. Let me not dismiss this subject without acquainting our bawlers, copiers, and distributors of extracts of letters, that Dr Menjot, with whom perhaps they were particularly acquainted, and who was a very honest man, has inserted many leud things in his Dissertation on the Furor Uterinus, and barrenness. It would be ridiculous to censure him for it, because, as a Physician, he had a right to do so: his subject required, or allowed it. Now I must inform them that a compiler who relates and comments, has all the rights of a Physician, and of an Advocate, &c. as occasion requires, and may use their verbal processes, and their terms of art. If he gives an account of the divorce of Lotharius and Tetberga, he may publish extracts from Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, who wrote the impurities which were averred in that trial. We ought never to censure an Historian Commentator, 'till after being instructed in the laws of History, and the privileges of a commentary. Had these gentlemen read Andrew Tiraquellus's commentary on the laws of matrimony, they would have found in it obscenities in much greater number. Yet he was a Counsellor of the Parliament of Paris, and one of the most illustrious men of the last century, both on account of his knowledge and his virtue.

X. Observe that it becomes no man less than my adversary to declaim against me: he, who in a sermon, which lasted almost two hours, criticized the conduct of the patriarch Jacob; he, whom a Synod censured for having been too free with the dignity of prophecies; he, from whose books a list of profane propositions was extracted, and sent to a Synod: he, who had inserted so many impurities in his answer to Maimbourg, that he was forced to suppress a part of them upon the remonstrances of two magistrates; he, who in a severe criticism on a book of Abbot Dangeau used several licentious expressions; sions; he, who revived and bought out of a registry-office, the most monstrous obscenities that can be read, and filled a cafe with them; he, whose mystical Theology would pollute the most obdurate imagination; he, in short, who, rejecting the way of authority, avows that the way of inquiry and examination is impracticable. He therefore accuses his own doctrine of Atheism in another person.

XI. Never was romance more fabulous than what he says of the pretended hopes which I founded on my Dictionary. It is false that my friends did before-hand extol it with the triumphant airs he imputes to them. They are too judicious to fall into such a mistake. And for myself, so far was I from expecting any advantage by it, that I said and wrote on a hundred occasions to those who spoke to me of it, that it was only a rhapsody, that there would be a good deal of trash in it; and that the public would be very much disappointed if they looked for any thing better than an irregular compilation; that I was but little able to confine myself, and having the greatest indifference for praise, the fear of being criticized did not hinder me from running full career wherever my fancy guided; that being an author of no consequence, pretending to nothing less than to dogmatize, I gave a loose to my thoughts, such as they were, sometimes one way, sometimes another, being persuaded that no body would read them but by way of amusement, that is, that they would only serve to unbend the mind, tired with the reading of many other things serious, curious, and useful, which I have collected with great patience, but without hoping that the world would mind in my favour that candid maxim, Ubi plura nitent in carmine, non ego paucis Offendar maculis, &c. The success was beyond my hopes. A great many critical readers followed that rule. I only began to think the work not so despicable as I had imagined, when I observed how eagerly and how busily some people went about to discredit it, and with what excessive pains the partisans of a cabal, as formidable by its extent as by its credit, wrote one to another letters on that subject, and copied extracts of letters handed about among the whole fraternity, and every where else.

XII. As to the employments which he affirms I expected in the Republic of Letters by means of my Dictionary, I answer that he is as much mistaken in this, as he was in saying that Mr Arnauld had done certain things, in order to recover his benefices. He then received a mortification which ought to have made him more cautious. Had he perused my preface, he would have known my disposition with regard to employments. He may make himself very easy on that head. I never would take any employment, and will have none. My inclinations have been founded many ways, and from different places, during the printing of my work, and they always found that I would not depend on any body, nor part with the full liberty which I enjoyed of disposing of all my time. It is only by his extracts that I am informed of a report which went that a Minister had made an attempt of this kind at Amsterdam. I believe it to be false: but let that be as it will, it was a thing which never entered into my thoughts, and which I would have refused.

XIII. Let us come to the main article, to the favourite, the darling, passage of our censurer, that which chiefly induced him to draw his pen: This was surely his real motive; in short, it is that passage, where, with triumphant airs, he glories in having reduced me to live on the pension of a Bookseller. There cannot be a better picture of his pride: his ambition is so refined and so conspicuous, that it incites him to wish above all things for the latter part of Sylla's epitaph. Soon after he shews a great deal of joy in imagining that I am completing my own ruin. This is very ingenuous: It would be very wrong to accuse him of counterfeiting the honest man and the good pastor, never was any man less dextrous in hiding his foible. But what is become of my pensions from the court of France? Have they been stopped? and even if it was so, could a Philosophical life like mine have sunk all that fund? How; no reserve for surety: nothing remaining but the pension of a Bookseller! Very hard indeed. I knew not that my income was so well or so ill computed. A thousand diverting things might be said of him, with regard to his Booksellers: But it would be a pity to place them in this piece, which will as well as his, be thrown aside among the rubbish of libraries in a day or two: Such is the fate of loose sheets.

XIV. He boasts of having done me more harm than any man living, by discovering me to the world. He is surely a very fit person to hurt a man by his accusations. I refer him to the Synodal assembly of the Brill, which declared the same Mr Saurin orthodox, against whom he had written two volumes full of defamation, almost as black as that which he has published against me. He was confident that he should get Mr Saurin deposed, and had long caballed about it. But he had the confusion to see him acquitted. After such a disgrace, any man but my detractor would have hid himself in an hermitage, during the rest of his life. But as for him he has publicly declared that he persisted in his sentiment, notwithstanding the decree of the Synod, and now boasts to have been the accuser. What value ought we to have for his judgment? Would not the man be very simple, who should mind his calumnies?

XV. The

XV. The pleasure of boasting that he had done me a prejudice, was the more agreeable to him, as he expected to make a great advantage of his boasts: for he fancied that what I had written against him in my Dictionary would do him no prejudice, provided the public knew that I was prompted to it by a spirit of revenge. I make two Remarks against his cunning. He is mistaken both in his supposition, and his inference.

I have always believed, and am still persuaded, that he had no share in the suppression of my employment, but as a remote cause. Indeed he was very busy, for two or three years, to bring it about, but had not some persons of his cloth, and of another language, whose enmity he had formerly discovered to me, been active in it, his labour would have been in vain. Be it as it will, that suppression gave me so little uneasiness, that I never harboured the least resentment against any body concerned in it. I bless the day and the hour when it happened, and shall all my life lament my loss of the time which was spent in such employments. He will hardly believe me, because he knows very well that he would mortally hate those who should lessen his salary, notwithstanding that the greatest part of it was continued; notwithstanding, for instance, that the salary of a preacher was left him, and that he was only stripped of the wages of a Professor, which he has enjoyed almost sixteen years, without having given above twenty lessons in Latin, and a few more in French. Examining his own temper, he cannot think it possible for a man cheerfully to support the total loss of his salary. But I beg he would not judge of me by himself. I am an old fashioned man, Vir antiqui moris, and not like him of a modish turn. I value not the loss of that salary a rush. He would therefore do me justice, if he believed that I wrote not against him from any resentment. If he refuses to give credit to my words, let him at least give credit to my actions. Have I not spared his name on a thousand occasions, and if his friends pretend that I pointed at him, when I spoke of certain disorders, and gave the picture of some inquisitors, such as my reading had furnished me with, ought he not to impute it to the misfortune he has of resembling them, and to the penetration of his friends in discovering his resemblance? Nay, have I not avoided pointing at him on a hundred occasions which naturally admitted it, as my intelligent readers may easily perceive? Have I not commended his Apology of Theodore Beza? Was it known to how many of his false quotations and sophisms I have given quarter, my moderation would be admired. Did I not vindicate him whenever I thought him wronged? This indeed happened rarely: but it is not my fault. Why, is he not such a person that it would be an injustice to speak ill of him? He has been against all the world, and all the world against him: He has undergone all manner of abuse, complaints, and reproaches: and yet I have scarce found any occasion to criticize his censurers. I have somewhere applied to him the saying of an Emperor, taurum toties non ferire difficile est. But now we must turn the tables, and say, taurum toties ferire difficile est. It is very strange that so many authors, having pointed their arrows, and exhausted their quivers against his person, scarce one aim has miscarried. I should have been glad to discover any falsties in his censurers; for I would have mentioned them, not only as they were things which came within my province, or agreed with the Plan of my Work, but likewise with a view of doing an honour to myself. The most eminent glory of an Historian is to do justice to his greatest enemies. This is true heroism. By this Thucydides has immortalized his name, more than by all the rest of his History. Therefore, though reason and the precepts of the gospel, had not determined me to take that course, it should at least be believed that self-love alone would have induced me to it. Let my adversary's friends put me to the trial. Let them furnish me with convincing proofs that his adversaries have accused him falsely, and I promise to employ their memoirs to the best advantage. But after all, will they say, you bring him too often into your Dictionary: not more frequently than Varillas, will I answer, nor near so frequently as Moreri, two authors with whom I never had any difference. If I speak of him oftener than of many other authors, it is because I am more intimate with his writings. He thinks himself happy that I have placed him in my Dictionary; and I am very glad that he is pleased with it. Can there be a greater instance of my good nature? This is enough against his supposition; I now proceed to the consequence he draws from it.

XVI. I deny it: for granting that the Remarks which relate to him, proceeded from my design to be revenged, the concession would be of no service to him, since these Remarks are always supported by proofs. It is certain that neither of us can be admitted as evidence against the other, in any affair whatever. We are not allowed either to judge or to vote. We do not deserve to be believed when we speak, either against the other, but so far as we solidly prove what we advance. But let our motive to seek and employ proofs be what it will, these proofs are still of the same intrinsic force. This is most evident. The reader ought to take particular notice of it.

XVII. This is a full confutation of his last writing: There he rails at me in the most violent manner, and yet alledges no evidence but his own, if we except the judgment of Abbé Renaudot: and the agent's letter. He produces anonymous letters: the amount of all this is his whole authority. As if he had said to the public, you ought to

V O L. V. No. CXLII.

9 R

to believe all this, because I affirm it. And does he know that his evidence is of no manner of authority in my affairs? How dares he then abuse the patience of the public? Was he to say a thousand times over that he has read my Dictionary, and found impieties and obscenities in it, his words would be to no purpose: for, once more, he can be no evidence against me. He is naturally and peremptorily exceptionable. He can only be admitted to copy passages, and to prove that they ought to be condemned. If he cannot prove it, he must be silent. By how much more reason ought we not to give a hearing to his reflexions, since he owns that he has neither read nor seen the Critical Dictionary, and does not let us know the persons who write to him concerning it. I make no question but that as he is the first who ever imposed, with so much assurance, upon the public, so he will be the last; for there is no probability that such monstrous things will ever be imitated.

XVIII. We have no reason to believe that his news-mongers are exact, since they tell him that I have abridged Rabelais. I am greatly mistaken if I have cited him more than once, and had I done it on several occasions, I should have only followed the examples of eminent authors. His book does not please me much; but I know, and my adversary knows likewise, that many persons of probity and honour have read it over and over, know all the fine passages of it, and take a pleasure in repeating them, when they converse agreeably with their friends. If such people were to make large compilations, there is no doubt but Rabelais would frequently appear in them.

XIX. The extracts of the News from the Republic of Letters, which are here objected to me, might be the subject of a curious Dissertation. I may perhaps write it one time or other. It would give me an opportunity of clearing myself to those who blame me for having bestowed too great encomiums on the writers whom I mentioned in that journal. One might make a large catalogue of authors who have said many injurious things of those persons whom they had formerly extolled. He who attacks me on this quarter, would be of the number. He very much praised, and afterwards abused Mr Simon. He has sometimes been pleased to extol me, and even a little before our quarrel, in one of his cases against Mr de la Conseillere. But I have something stronger than examples to plead: for about twelve years ago, I publicly owned myself guilty of a failing, which I have not yet wholly mended. I shall by that confession avoid the dilemma he would put me to. It is not a mere invention to serve a turn: I take it from a work which I published at a time when I did not foresee that I should ever have occasion for it.

I have said, in the 575th page of the New Letters against Maimbourg, that several books, despised by men of parts, appeared to me to be good. This want of discernment was excusable: if I was not very young in the world, I was so at least in the Republic of Letters. I had begun very late to study, almost never had any masters, never followed any method, never consulted on that subject either the living or the dead. All this, joined with other obstacles, rendered me a very young man with regard to learning, and however, I easily suffered myself to be duped by authors. I may even at this time make the same acknowledgment that Mr Arnauld made, which I have related in the 577th page of the same Letters. There is hardly any book which I do not think a good one, when I read it only for the sake of reading; to find its faults, I must read it attentively on purpose to discover them. I never did so, while I was writing the News from the Republic of Letters. I was not then acting the part of a Critic, and had put myself on the foot of civility. Thus I only observed in books what made them valuable. Their defects escaped me. If I therefore spoke civilly of them, it was not against my conscience; and surely at the worst the rules of civility cleared me from any imputation of blameable flattery. To flatter authors with the views of a parasite, or from other motives of interest, is infamous. But when a man is so fully disinterested as I was, it is only at the most, a little too much civility and complaisance. And will this be deemed a crime?

In such a disposition of mind it was impossible for me to avoid being duped by my adversary's books. His decisive manner, his lively style, his chearful, brilliant, fertile imagination unwarily dazzled me. The dangerous illusions of friendship strengthened the charm. Thus his books appeared admirable to me: I thought therefore that in order to do them justice, I ought to employ strong expressions: for common epithets of praise, when they come from an author who has put himself on the foot of courtesy and compliment, would only be an ordinary commendation, which is more offensive to proud authors than being wholly silent about them. My readers were not mistaken in this. They only took for an encomium in my journal that which was expressed in the most superlative terms. But the charm began to vanish, when, being no longer concerned in that journal, I seriously compared his books with those in which he was refuted. Then I read them critically; I observed the weak passages of them, and by degrees found many defects. Some time after I was obliged to peruse them in order to refute some of his works. This gave me a complete notion of them, and had a retrospective effect on his other productions. The same thing has happened to me with regard to him, as with regard to Moreau and Varillas, two authors of whom I have been successively cessively the Admirer and the Critic, according as I read them either by way of amusement, or with the design of enquiring into the truth of their writings.

XX. Let us make one remark more. It will not be found that what I blame in his Prophecies, and his Esprit d'Arnauld, is the same with what I formerly commended in these pieces. I praised the invention, the wit, the turn, the stile, the fluency of thoughts, and I now blame the opinions, the slanders, &c. which they contain. He has not therefore caught me between the extremes of a base flatterer, and an infamous calumniator, as he imagined, according to his inveterate habit of departing from the accuracy of Logic. There is a very wide medium, between these two terms. The opposition had been more just between a Panegyrist and a rigid Censurer. But setting Logic aside, I answer to his question, that I formerly commended him very sincerely; and that I now censure him with reason, being better informed. Let me give an instance of my sincerity. His book of Prejudices having appeared to me to be inferior to the rest, I spoke more sparingly of it (which I know he complained of); and as I thought that his Criticism on the Abbé Dangeau was defective in some passages, I censured it very frankly.

I can therefore only be blamed for having followed the dictates of an erroneous conscience: but as these are faults which the tribunals of the Republic of Letters doth not pardon, the shortest course I can take is to lament that time of darkness, and to confess that these are productions which ought to be disowned. I do accordingly disown them; and this is the best reparation I can make.

I need not observe that in order to know a man well, we must rather view him in those writings, where he is always criticised upon good proofs, than in such as praise him without assigning the proofs of his merit.

September 12, 1697

Continuation of the REMARKS ON THE PRETENDED JUDGMENT OF THE PUBLIC.

THIS is all I thought necessary to say on that pretended Judgment of the Public, but having perused it again, before the preceding Remarks were published, I have thought it proper to add a few more.

XXI. Let us dispatch in a few words what the censurer objects to me concerning Solomon. I said that a policy in some respects of the same nature with that of the Ottomans occasioned Adonija's death. This means nothing more but that Solomon put him to death, to the end that he might not be exposed to the civil-wars, which he had reason to apprehend. No body is ignorant that this is likewise the reason of the Ottomans. Where is the harm of comparing in that respect a Jewish Prince with Infidel Monarchs, the Sectaries of Mahomet; a Prince, I say, who had not yet that wisdom which God gave him afterwards? Would the author make any scruple to say that Solomon took several wives, from an ostentation like that of Pagan kings, and of Sultans. Observe his artifice. He knew that the term Ottomans would not strike the populace, but that the word Turk would alarm them. For this reason, instead of repeating my words, he has metamorphosed them into these, a Turkish policy, which he has quoted in Italics. This is his habitual sin; every artifice pleases him, let it but serve to deceive the ignorant. But what will he say against so many authors who maintain that Solomon was personally an Idolater, and doubt of his salvation. This is much worse than comparing for once his policy with that of the Turks.

XXII. He accuses me of having abused Cameron and Mr Daillé. Would he have dared to say so, had he cast his eye on my Dictionary? Would he not have seen there that that Du Moulin his grand-father, and the works of Rivetus, brother-in-law to Du Moulin, furnished me with what I said to Cameron's disadvantage? Would he not have seen there that for what concerns Mr Daillé, I quote Marefius, Pastor and Professor of Divinity at Groningen, and plainly declare, that I decide nothing on that point? Many people do not yet know the difference between an Historian and an Encomiast. Let us take a short review of the pamphlet, in order to mark some of the falsties in fact, which may be found in it; for as to the fallacies in reasoning, it would be in vain to shew them. They are general reproaches: my adversaries affirm, I deny, and we are just where we set out: we cannot pass from this equilibrium, till every proposition with which they are displeased, is particularly examined. They shall always find me ready to satisfy them. I shall even give a little specimen of their fallacious reasonings in the XXVIIIth and XXXIId Remarks.

CONTINUATION OF THE REMARKS, &c.

XXIII. There are some falsties in fact in Abbé Renaudot's judgment: I do not point them out; for I know not whether they proceed from him, or from the transcribers. Besides that every reader may easily convince himself how false it is that I bestow greater encomiums on Mr Abelli, than on Messieurs de St Cyran and Arnauld; that I commend Father Maimbourg's Controversial Treatises, more than those of Mr Nicolle, that I blacken the latter, as having published certain Doctrines which he did not believe. How could I blacken him on that account, since I expressly say that if his silence might be ascribed to such a principle, it might also consist with his persuasion? I leave to the reader's judgment some other falsties of the same nature.

XXIV. The Commentary on the judgment of that Abbot, among other falsties, contains this, that it was owing to the war that my Printer obtained by surprize his privilege. This lie has more heads than Cerberus; for he supposes that the States of Holland would have given my book to be examined, had they not been too much employed. A chimerical fancy! As if an order given in two words to some Professors at Leyden could have interrupted the application to public affairs. Besides this, our Commentator supposes that in times of peace privileges are granted only to such books as have been examined and approved. Another chimera! The States grant them only for the security of the Printer, and not in the least as a mark of their approbation of those books: for they do not pretend to authorize the contents of them. In fine, never was any privilege obtained less by surprize than this; for it was not granted till after a long examination of the opposition which was made to it by the Printers of Moreri.

XXV. In the first extract it is affirmed that I suppose there was no Historian of the Moors. But it is manifest that I only suppose we have no particular History of Abderamus. In the second extract it is said that I have composed my Dictionary by the help of memoirs, which were sent me from France. I have always given notice from what place I received any materials. If those which I have received from that country were put together, they would not fill ten pages.

XXVI. There is in the ninth extract a particular which I shall always look upon as a horrible lie, unless I see a certificate of it from the Bishop of Salisbury. Such a discourse is so little consistent with the idea I have of the sense and learning of that prelate, that I cannot believe him capable of holding it. Would a man of his parts find Atheistical opinions in a work wherein it is asserted on a hundred occasions that reason ought to be silent when the word of God speaks? Is not this the severest principle of Orthodoxy in both communions? I have another reason for believing that there are several lies in this extract. The public has nothing to do with their personal differences, said that Prelate with indignation, if we rely on the extract. Is it likely that he spoke in that manner, since it is notorious that I make no mention of these differences? I censure my adversary for the faults which I shew in his books, or by general reflexions, which may be applied to him, but I take no notice of our quarrels. In a word, all that I have done, came within the province of an author who writes a History accompanied with a Critical Commentary. This must be granted me by all those who are thoroughly acquainted with the matter. I have, for example, a full right to alledge, as facts, all the blunders and errors, with which my adversary has been taxed in Mr Saurin's four volumes. I use this example, to shew, by the way, how ridiculous his hopes are. He may be made to live in a critical book, not as the mortal enemy of Libertines, but as arraigned and convicted of a thousand shameful blunders, by a famous minister, whom a synod has declared Orthodox.

XXVII. In the second extract it is affirmed that Abbot Renaudot taxes me with many mistakes in History, Geography, Chronology, and other sciences. This is not true. He only says, 1. That there are many falsties in my work: 2. That in the articles of curious erudition, I commit more mistakes than Moreri. The falsties he means concern what I say either against the Popes, &c. or to the glory of the Reformers, &c. By virtue of his prejudices, he presupposes that in those articles there must be several lies. But however they will not be such with respect to me, since I take them from works which I quote, and declare in my preface, that I only warrant the faithfulness of the quotations. He places among those falsties the project of re-union, proposed to Amyraldus, by the Jesuit Godebert, in the name of Cardinal Mazarine. It should have been Audebert in the name of Cardinal Richelieu. In this I have only followed the memoir of Amyraldus the the son, and I have cited it. It is his business to warrant it. As to the faults in erudition, the Abbot does not say, wherein they consist, and consequently the Publisher of the extracts proves the rashness of his own witnesses. He teaches us how to convict them of their having taken upon themselves to write what they were ill informed of. One of them says that I praise too much in the opinion of several people. The Publisher, on the contrary, maintains that I have abused all the world. Behold the persons, whom he produces to assure us of the general opinion.

XXVIII. In the thirteenth extract, it is said, that in the article ΠΥΡΡΩΝ, and several others, Libertinism is taught in a very dangerous manner, and that I have taken from Meziriac all the observations, being sometimes of a tedious length, which I make on the Heathen gods, and heroes, and the Heathen Mythology. The first point cannot be discussed in a loose sheet. It is sufficient for me to observe in this place, that my pretended Libertinism is a very solid justification of our most Orthodox Divines. They continually object to the Sectaries that the Socinian principles, tend to Pyrrhonism, Deism, and Atheism. Whereupon I say, either you are defamers, or it is most true that without captivating our understanding to the obedience of faith, we are led by the principles of Philosophy to doubt of every thing. But you are not defamers, therefore it is true, &c. You complain that I make it appear by evident examples, that you do not calumniate the Socinians. Ought you not rather to thank me for this? Do not you know that in Italy, under the yoke of the Inquisition, books are printed with impunity, in which it is asserted, that, setting Revelation aside, we know not with certainty that there are bodies? And would you impose on this country a yoke more galling than that of the Pope. I can prove that at Bologna, at Padua, &c. Professors of Philosophy have maintained publicly and with impunity, that the immortality of the soul can only be proved by Scripture. I shall make it appear in the Supplement of this Dictionary, in the article ΠΟΜΠΟΝΑΤΙΟΥΣ, which is already composed, that there was never any persecution worse founded than that which Pomponatius suffered on this account.

With regard to Meziriac, if it is pretended that I have taken any observations from him, without quoting him, I am calumniated. Neither he nor any other writer has furnished me with any thing which I have not acknowledged, by quoting them, and almost always using their own words. As the author of the letter does not say whether I quoted Meziriac, or not, I cannot accuse him of giving me the title of a Plagiary: but I impute that lie most justly to the Publisher of that extract: for he makes this reflexion on it: One of our extracts says, that he has taken from Meziriac on Ovid's epistles, all that he says of the Heathen gods: and that Meziriac's book is pretty scarce. This is his great art: he understands books very well: he knows which are scarce and which are common: and boldly pillages the former, being sure that few people will perceive the theft. Here we have an example of the danger which any man runs, when he takes upon him to speak of a book which he has never read. Had the Publisher of that extract perused my Dictionary, I doubt whether he would have presumed to say, that I have pillaged Meziriac. He would have seen that I always quote him. In the same manner, I have quoted all those who have supplied me either with facts or reflexions.

XXIX. I easily believe that the Mythological observations have appeared pretty tedious: some of my acquaintance wrote me the same thing, with regard to the Chronological discussions, and in general to all that may be called erudition. I had foreseen this, and therefore on a thousand occasions I considered those things as the cards thrown out of a hand at piquet. I discarded them and took in other cards, weaker indeed, but abler to win the game: for we live in an age where they read rather for amusement than in order to grow learned. If I had written my Dictionary according to the taste of Abbot Renaudot, no body would have printed it, and had any body run the hazard of putting it to the press, he would not have sold a hundred copies. If I had struck out all the literature, the first edition would have been sold off in three months. If he imagines that I took all the things I used in it, for matters of importance, he wrongs me. I have taken them for what they are, and employed them only to suit the malady of the times. Thus we must do, when we cannot cure it. If I had written in Latin, I should have taken another method; and had the taste of the former age prevailed, I should have given a place in my book to nothing but literature. But the times are altered. Good things alone do not take, but disgust. We must mingle them with others, if we would have the reader take the patience to peruse them. Veluti pueris ab-sinthia tetra medentes, Cum dare conantur prius oras pocula circum &c.

XXX. Here I must answer the last lines of page 29. Those of the best taste among his own friends acknowledge that the half of his work at least, might be cut off, without hurting it. These persons say not so much as I do. I give up two thirds, and even three fourths and more: and if I was required to abridge my Dictionary, so that in the judgment of Henry Valefius, it might contain nothing but what was good, I should reduce it to a pocket-size. Valefius and the learned men of his rank deem that to be superfluous in a book which they know already, or do not hope to turn some day to their advantage. But they ought to sympathize with the necessities of the half-learned, and the vulgar of the Republic of Letters. They ought to know that it is divided into many more classes than the Roman Republic ever was. Each class has its wants, and it is the part of compilations to serve them all, some one way, and some another. They are therefore mistaken notwithstanding their great knowledge, when they say absolutely, this thing is useful and necessary, that is superfluous. Are not these terms relative? Say rather, this is useful or useless to me, and to those that are like me, useful or useless however to a hundred other men of letters. It is not a just way of reasoning to say, such a book would better deserve the approbation of the most learned men in Europe, if it was shorter, therefore it ought to have been shorter. Softly, gentlemen; there is nothing useless in these volumes which you mention; for what may not serve you, may serve several others: and I am very sure that if all the citizens of the Republic of Letters were brought together, that each might give his opinion upon what should be taken away, and what should be left, in a vast compilation, it would appear that the passages which some would throw out, would be precisely those which others would retain. A hundred reflexions might be made not only on the true properties of works of this kind, but likewise on the inseparable union of criticism and trifles. Many might also be made on the difference which lies between a good book and an useful one: between an author who only proposes to himself the approbation of a few scientifics, and an author who prefers the general benefit to the glory of meriting that approbation, which is not less hard to attain than a crown. But we shall find some fitter occasions of speaking on this subject.

Before we proceed any further, let us take notice of a growing lie in the thirteenth extract. The anonymous writer from London, who dates his letter the 28th of May 1697 affirms that the Bookseller Cailloué had not sold forty copies. Now it can be proved from a letter which Cailloué wrote on the 22d of March 1697, that he had sold fifty-two: and observe this circumstance; the Printer of the Dictionary had written to him that he had been informed that he (Cailloué) had sold sixty copies of it before the end of February: to this Cailloué answered, that he had only delivered fifty-two. In this he does not deny that he had sold sixty. Observe that he had only received his copies in December. From hence, I conclude, that the anonymous authors who are produced, are ill-informed, and that we cannot depend upon their intelligence.

XXXI. It is said in the fourteenth extract, that what I mentioned of Lewis XIII, particularly obliged the Chancellor to burn my Dictionary, and to prohibit it. If this means that the Chancellor burnt in his own house the copy which was sent him, I am persuaded it is a mistake. If it means that he caused my Dictionary to be publicly burnt by the hand of the hangman, I make no question but that it is a notorious falsehood. The Commentator on the extracts has taken that expression in the latter sense.

XXXII. Let us make a serious reflexion on the last extract: it is that which is fraught with the greatest fury. The anonymous writer, who is so strangely transported with passion, needs only read my additions to the Thoughts on the Comets: If he does not see that I had reason to proclaim to the whole world as Calumniators, those who have accused me of Deism or Atheism, he must be very stupid, and must be still more stupid, if he imagines that my Dictionary may excuse my slanderers. For the rest, I would have him know that of whatever profession he be, it will always be greatly to his honour, to say, that his conduct is as regular as mine has always been and is still. I make this reflexion, in order, that he and others may learn to weigh their words, when they speak of conduct. He acquaints me, that my article of ADAM, is one of those which justly raise the indignation of good men. I am glad to know it; for I should never have believed that this was the ground of such an accusation, and nothing can be more proper than this, to demonstrate to intelligent readers that offence is taken without reason. He affirms that he does not see how I can escape excommunication: this is talking like a new convert from Paganism. He must therefore be informed that we have no such custom, neither have the Churches of God. We excommunicate people only in these two cases: one, when a person by his crimes, as incest, prostitution, adultery, fornication, murder, &c. gives scandal to the public: the other, when he dogmatically maintains heretical opinions, and is obstinate in defending them, in opposition to the judgment of the Church. Thus the Remonstrant Ministers were excommunicated; for after having maintained their opinions with great warmth, during more than seven or eight years, they declared that, notwithstanding the canons of the Synod of Dort, they would live and die in their sentiments. But it was never known that a Church proceeded by ecclesiastical censures against an author who spoke Historically of the impurities of human life, or who having declared, that he firmly adheres to the faith of that Church, relates only for arguing sake, what reason may suggest on this or that point. I say, it was never known, that such an author was excommunicated, when he declares, as I do, that all these vain subtilties of Philosophy can only serve to make us take Revelation for our guide, as the sole and true remedy against the darkness with which sin covers the faculties of our mind, and that he is ready to throw out all those wild arguments, if it was thought proper. Observe that my adversary's Newsmongers have had honesty enough to tell him, That I every where provide a screen, behind which I save a retreat for myself, in case of necessity; to wit, that we must adhere to Revelation, and submit reason to faith. Could I chuse a better a better retreat? The man who has sought his felicity in worldly advantages, and who, having been able to find it no where, betakes himself to God as the only sovereign good, does he not make the best use which is possible of his reason? Must we not say the same thing of a Philosopher, who having inquired in vain after certainty by the light of reason, concludes that he must have recourse to supernatural light, and adhere to that alone? Would not this be the advice which David and all the other Prophets and the Apostles would give to the wise men of this world? And should not I be sheltered from the thunderbolts of excommunication in an azyle so sacred, and so inviolable? Would Divines themselves be the first to invade it? I cannot believe this? and thus our anonymous writer judges rashly.

I cannot believe that the informers have always been sincere; for they have made my censorer believe that I only speak of submission to Scripture, by saying, and after having said every thing imaginable in order to weaken the authority of Revelation and of the sacred writers. This is very false, and I defy them to give the least proof of it. It does not appear that they have alledged any other reasons but those which I have refuted above in Numb. VI, and Numb. XXI, and that which they have grounded on the article DAVID. I know not whether they mentioned my explanation to him, or not; if they took no notice of it, they are very much to blame: and if they give him a faithful account of it, he cannot clear himself from being guilty of an artifice, which is very unbecoming a man of Honour: for the laws of disputation do not allow a man to suppress any thing which may justify his adversary. This is his eternal custom; he only betakes himself to that which may serve his turn, and wrefts it in the most odious manner by violent hyperboles. All that I said of some of David's actions amounts to this, that they may be accounted conformable to the art of government and human prudence, but not to the rigorous laws of piety. To conclude from thence that I have represented him as a villain, is trampling under foot all the laws of reasoning, by a furious passion. I only demand impartial judges. Such will never find that a man by remarking the faults of the persons inspired, attacks the authority of inspiration, we all agree that adultery and murder, did not hinder David from being a great Prophet. St Paul was not afraid that by giving a strong idea of the infirmities of the old man, which made him groan, and required a most violent remedy, he should weaken the efficacy of his writings. But this subject cannot be handled in a few words. Let us return to the anonymous author, and his menaces of excommunication.

XXXIII. Did ever the ecclesiastical tribunals proceed against the translators of Boccace's Novels, against the tales of Oville, or la Fontaine? I alledge these examples as an argument à fortiori; for no man dares say that I come near the licentiousness of these writers. The horrible impurities of their books, which caused the Tales of la Fontaine to be condemned to the flames by a sentence of a magistrate of Paris (4), are in some manner their own inventions; whereas I have only copied what is found in Historical books, known to all the world, and with these citations have almost always joined a mark of my disapprobation: I have only spoken of them as things which discover the exceeding depravity of mankind, and gives us reason to lament our corruption. There is hardly any Commentator whose gravity would hold out against some of Abelard's Pieces, or against the simplicity imputed to honest Robert d'Arbrisselles. A great subject of clamour truly, if I have been merry upon such things, that is, if I have censured them by turning them into ridicule. But you will say I only alledge examples of the indulgence of the Romish communion; and may not I answer that this is an argument à fortiori? Have you not exclaimed a thousand times against the tyrannical government of that Church? If this cannot satisfy you, let us view the affair in another light.

XXXIV. Did our fathers censure Ambroise Paré, whose French books on Anatomy, are full of obscenities? Did they censure those writers who published in shocking praises the leud practices of the Court of Charles IX, and Henry III? Did they censure d'Aubigné, who had not only a most satirical pen, but likewise a most smutty one? Did they censure Henry Stephens for having published so many foolish, bawdy, burlesque stories in his Apology for Herodotus? In this country, did not St Aldegonde, in a book of Controversy, use all kinds of jokes, and many smutty expressions? And was this censured? Did the Commentaries of Scaliger on the Priapeia, those of Douza on Petronius, full of filthy and lascivious matters, create any trouble to the authors of them, one a Professor and the other a Curator in the university of Leyden? Can any thing be more obscene than Baudii Amores, a book published at Leyden by Professor Scriverius? Does not the collection of the poems of Daniel Heinsius, a Professor likewise at Leyden, contain several lascivious pieces? Have not all these writings and several others been tolerated? Have the consistories and synods proceeded either against the authors, or against the books? I say nothing of the Commentary of a Professor of Franeker on the pastoral of Longus, having spoken of it in my Dictionary. I only wish the reader would observe that a Commentator, who cites impurities, is a thousand times more excusable than the Poet who composes them. When I am let into the secret of collecting in a compilation all that the Antients have said concerning the courtesan Laïs, without mentioning leud actions, I shall own myself guilty. It must at least be proved against me, that a Commentator has not the privilege of collecting whatever hath been said of Helen; how can it be proved? Where is the legislator who hath said to compilers, So far may go, but you must advance no further. You must not quote Athenæus, nor such a dialist, nor such a Philosopher. Has it not been their constant practice to take their writings as full and extensive as their reading? But here is a better way of satisfying our Critics. I will correct in a second edition, the defects that are in the first. I am employing myself in this with all possible application. I shall not content myself with rectifying whatever is faulty with regard to History, or Chronology, but I shall throw out the expressions, and turns which are too free, &c. and I beseech all my readers, but chiefly those who are members of the Dutch, French, &c. universities in this country, to assist me, by their remarks, in order to improve my Dictionary for a new edition. Works of this nature, and especially when they are composed in haste and with few helps, are at first only a loose sketch. They are improved in degrees. Every body knows examples of this kind.

(4) See, below, citat. (10), of the Explanation concerning Objections.

CONTINUATION OF THE REMARKS, &c.

XXXV. The last lie which I shall point out may be found in the last page of the pamphlet. There we find, 1. That I am preparing a new Dictionary, which will contain nothing but what is serious, sober, chaste, and judicious: 2. That they have it from very good hands that I am inquiring for some great name, distinguished not only by birth, but merit and piety, to be placed at the head of my Dictionary. I have nothing to say to the first point: for since my adversary acquaints me, that my Dictionary suffered much by the great encomiums which were bestowed on it beforehand, I ought to make good use of so kind a hint. For how strange would it be, if I myself praised a book which I have not yet written? His malice to the Booksellers appears in this place: he would prepare the public to slight my Supplement. As to the second point I declare to you, that he has been very ill-served by his Newsmongers. By what I can perceive, they play with his credulity, as they did about six or seven years ago. I was never more surprized, than to see in his libel that design of a dedication to be prefixed to my Dictionary, of which I have no thoughts, nor ever had, any more than of discovering Terra incognita.

XXXVI. I observed that he lays the affair of Bellarmine much to heart: this is not surprizing: but it had been a more prudent part in him not to have made this the subject of a Postscript to his pamphlet. The best course he could take, was to be entirely silent upon that head. In certain circumstances, the less a man stirs, the less is he engaged. What I said on the subject of Bellarmine is not an example of trifles and malice. I should not have otherwise discharged the duty of an Historian, since the original design of my work was to observe the false accusations which had been imputed to the persons of whom I was to speak. Had I omitted that accusation in the article of BELLARMINE, might I not have been called partial very justly, and charged with forgetting matters of which I could not pretend to be ignorant? I have not taken it from any satirical book, as he says falsely, but from a book of Controversy, and from the Journal des Sçavans. I do not examine the art he uses to hide his fault. I only beg the reader to look into my Dictionary, and compare with his remark, the authorities I have alleged. Such a parallel will shew what agonies he is in, when he is obliged to make any humble and ingenuous confession. I am not surprized at this, for a bow which has always been bent to one side, can hardly be bent to the other at the first attempt. And it is thus with the fibres of our brain.

XXXVII. I conclude with a short remark on my adversary's long silence. I had expected that as soon as my two volumes were published, there would appear a little pamphlet of his, wherein he would proclaim to the whole world, (often repeating the burden of his songs, about the Advice to the Refugees, &c. which have been so often exploded) that my Dictionary was the most abominable, the most frightful, the most detestable book, that ever came into the world, a heap of enormous impieties, and monstrous obscenities, with such a wretched collection of literary trifles, as would disgrace a school-boy. I was assured that he would not engage in refuting my criticisms, in order to justify himself; I only expected a sudden volley of loose and general invectives. But in this I was mistaken. He was not delivered, before the time, of the pamphlet he was big with. He only brought it forth in the tenth month. Matri longa decem tulerunt fastidia menses. If I had less aversion to quibbling, I might add that his child is notwithstanding an abortive. I am surprized that Abbot Renaudot's two pieces, together with all the other extracts were not sent to the press on the same day that the post brought them. That he should content himself with making copies of them fly about for several months successively, is what I do not comprehend. For we must not say the pangs of labour, but the pleasures: the person I speak of is never more in his element than when he publishes invectives. I am likewise surprized that a greater number of extracts has not been produced; for during the short way of Abbot Renaudot's judgment, the literary Newsmongers no doubt wrote to their friends in the country and abroad, what was said to the prejudice of my work. Twenty men of Letters having heard it said in an assembly that a new book is not esteemed, communicate that piece of news to all the curious whom they meet that day, and in the evening they write it to their correspondents. Great books advance but slowly, and must long be expected; upon upon that account, when they first launch forth, they have a thousand storms to encounter. The Dictionary of the French Academy composed, revised, and polished, through the course of fifty years, by the finest genius's in France, no sooner appeared but it was battered by storms on every side: ballads, epigrams, libels, private letters, conversations; all poured upon that work. It is full, said they, of smut, Billingsgate, and quibbles. Yet it bore off, and now steers on with full sail towards immortality.

I beg leave to place here a thought of Mr la Bruyere. What say you of Hermodorus's book? That it is a bad one, answers Anthimus. That it is so bad, that it hardly deserves the name of a book, or at least that the world should take any notice of it. But have you read it? No, says Anthimus. Why does he not add that Fulvia and Melania have condemned it without reading it, and that he is Fulvia's and Melania's friend? This reflexion seems to have been made on purpose for me.

If I have been more prolix than I at first intended to be, it is because I thought it necessary to enlarge on certain matters, in order that I might not for the future be taken off from my labours, should my enemies publish any more libels. I shall let them say whatever they please, and go forward with my undertaking. Let them clamour as much as they will; I promise to read their satires, and will improve by them if possible; but I shall lose no time, as I have already done, in answering them.

September 17, 1697.

EXPLANATIONS

Concerning certain things dispersed in this Dictionary, which may be reduced to four general heads:

- I. The praises bestowed on persons who denied either the providence or the existence of GOD. II. The objections of the Manichees. III. The objections of the Sceptics. IV. Obscenities.

A general and preliminary observation.

WHILE I was composing this work, I easily perceived that certain reflexions crept in, which were somewhat free, and little agreeable to ordinary readers; but I did not foresee that they could give any offence. I imagined that the persons whose judgment serves for a rule, and compared to that of others, would take notice of many things which might furnish me with an apology.

I. I hoped in the first place, that the reader would consider the nature of this Dictionary. It is a vast compilation, necessarily loaded with several minute criticisms, which will disgust and tire to the last degree those who are not versed in these matters; and I was obliged in this immense variety to bear two characters, that of Historian, and that of Commentator. It was not possible to rescue it from the contempt of a great many readers, otherwise than by introducing some uncommon things into it. They who neither value Grammatical disputations, nor the adventures of an inconsiderable private person, are a numerous party, and deserve that we should have some regard for their taste. It is therefore allowable for an author to season his book with something that will recommend it to their palate; and if he writes as an Historian, he ought not only to relate what Heretics have done, but also to shew wherein the strength and weakness of their opinions consist. This must especially be done by him, if he be himself the Commentator of his narratives; for in his commentary he must discuss things, and compare together the arguments pro and con, with all the impartiality of a faithful relator.

II. I hoped in the second place, that it would be considered in what manner, and with what an air I mention some opinions; it being neither in the strain of a Dogmatist, nor with the fondness of one who seeks to make converts. They are thoughts thrown out at random, and I am willing the reader should take them for nothing more than flights of wit, and reject them as he thinks proper; and that with a greater liberty than I have taken to advance them. It is easy to perceive that an author who deals thus has no sinister intentions, and is not laying snares; and if any reflexions should escape him, which, being under another form, might be dangerous, no great offence is to be taken at it.

III. I hoped in the third place, that the readers would consider the circumstances which either make an error dangerous or harmless. The consequences of it are to be feared when it is taught by those who stand in such a relation to the people as furnishes them with great authority, and with opportunities of forming a party. An error ought to be followed close, to be observed, and carefully restrained, when a man of a venerable character, a Pastor, a Professor of Divinity, sows it in his sermons, in his lectures, in little systematical tracts, or by way of catechism, and by emissaries who go from house to house to recommend the reading of his books, and invite people to the conventicles where the author explains his reasons and his method more particularly (1). But if a layman, who bears no public office, as myself, should drop amongst vast collections of History and Learning, some error in Religion or Morality, I do not see any reason why any body should be concerned at it. It is not in such works as these that the reader seeks for the reformation of his faith. No man takes for his guide in this matter, an author who only speaks by the by, and occasionally; and who by his very throwing his sentiments, as pins into a meadow, sufficiently shews that he cares not to be followed. The errors of such a writer are of no consequence, nor deserve that the world should be disturbed about them. Thus the Faculties of Divinity in France dealt with Michael de Montagne's book. They left untouched all this author's maxims, who, without following any system, method, or order, heaped up and tacked together whatever his memory presented to him: but when Peter Charron, a Priest, and a Doctor of Divinity, came to vent some of Montagne's sentiments in a methodical and systematical treatise of Morality (2), the Divines were no longer silent (3).

IV. I hoped

(1) Note, That I join all these things together, without pretending that we ought only to guard against those who are guilty of them all. A part is a sufficient motive for it.

(2) Compare with this, remark (O), of the article MONTAGNE.

(3) See the remark (F), of the article MONTAGNE.

IV. I hoped in the fourth place, and this was the main foundation of my hope, that these two points would easily be distinguished: 1. That I never advance, as my own opinion, any doctrine, which is repugnant to the articles of the Confession of Faith of the Reformed Church in which I was born, and of which I make profession. 2. That when I relate as an Historian what may be objected and replied to the Orthodox, and when I own that by natural light we cannot solve all the difficulties of the unbelievers, I always make a digression, to draw from thence a consequence in favour of the principle which the Reformed continually oppose to the Socinians; viz. That our reason being so weak as it is, ought not to be the rule or measure of our faith.

These are the reasons which made me believe, that if I sometimes used, what they call the liberty of philosophising, it would not be taken amiss. I should not have used it, had I foreseen that the foregoing considerations would not be regarded.

But the event has disappointed my hopes. Complaints have been made, and clamours have been raised, against those passages in my Dictionary. I could never believe these complaints were just; yet I am sorry I said any thing that was disliked, and have always been disposed to remove any objections in a second edition. Having been informed wherein the grievances consisted, I thought it was no hard matter to redress them, by leaving out some pages, altering some expressions, or by explanations that might set things in a due light. I have engaged in this without any reluctance, as all authors ought to do who are not bigotted to their opinions, but are ready to sacrifice them to the edification of the reader. I wish the public may be satisfied with my conduct, both as to what has been suppressed, and to those things I am going to explain; and methinks I have reason to promise myself that they will. This has been my design, and I have used great application to effect it.

EXPLANATION I.

The observation which has been made on the good morals of some persons who had no religion, cannot any ways prejudice the true Christian Faith.

THEY who were offended at my saying, that some Atheists and Epicureans have, with respect to Morality, outdone most idolaters, are intreated to attend to the following considerations; which if they please to do, the offence they have taken will entirely be removed.

I. The fear and love of God are not the only spring of human actions. There are other principles that actuate a man; The love of praise, the fear of disgrace, the natural temper, punishments and rewards in the magistrates hands, have a very great influence upon men. He who doubts of it, must be ignorant of what passes in his own breast, and what the common course of the world may demonstrate to him every moment. But it is not probable that any man should be so stupid as to be ignorant of such a truth. What therefore I have asserted concerning these other springs of human actions, may be placed in the number of truths which are beyond dispute.

II. The fear and love of God are not always a more powerful principle than the others: The love of glory, the fear of infamy, death, or torments, the hopes of preferment, act with greater force upon some men, than the desire of pleasing God, and the fear of breaking his commandments. If any one doubts of it, he is ignorant of some of his own actions, and knows nothing of what is doing daily under the sun. The world abounds with people who choose rather to commit a sin, than displease a Prince who can either make or ruin their fortune. Men daily subscribe formularies of faith against their conscience, in order to save their estates, or to avoid imprisonment, exile, death, &c. An officer who has quitted all for his religion, finding himself under the alternative either of offending God if he revenges himself for having received a box on the ear, or of being accounted a coward if he does not, never rests till he has satisfaction for this affront, though at the peril of killing or being killed in a state that must be followed with eternal damnation. It is not likely that any man should be so stupid as to be ignorant of such things. Therefore let this moral aphorism be placed among indisputable truths, That the fear and love of God are not always the most active principle of human actions.

III. This being so, it ought not to be reckoned a scandalous paradox, but rather a very possible thing, that some men, without religion, should be more strongly excited to a good moral life by their constitution, in conjunction with the love of praise and fear of disgrace, than some others by the instinct of conscience.

IV. The scandal ought to be much greater, when we see so many people convinced of the truths of religion, and at the same time plunged in all manner of vice.

V. Nay, it is more strange that Heathen idolaters should do good actions, than that Atheistical Philosophers should live like virtuous men: for the former must have been

AN EXPLANATION

812 bad

rel

been excited to crimes by their very religion; they must have believed, that, in order to become imitators of God, which is the end and substance of religion, they ought to be cheats, envious, fornicators, adulterers, pederasts, &c.

VI. Whence we may conclude, that the idolaters who lived virtuously, were only guided by the ideas of reason and virtue, or by the desire of praise, or by their natural temper, or such other principles as may all be found in Atheists: Why then should we expect to find more virtue amongst the idolatrous Heathens, than amongst men who have no religion?

see below

VII. I desire it may be observed, that speaking of the good morals of some Atheists, I have not ascribed any true virtues to them. Their sobriety, chastity, probity, contempt of riches, zeal for the public good, good offices to their neighbour, neither proceeded from the love of God, nor tended to honour and glorify him. They themselves were the principle and end of all this: self-love was the only ground and cause of it. They were only shining sins, splendida peccata, as St Augustin says of all the good actions of the Heathens. I have therefore done no prejudice to the true religion, by what I have said of some Atheists. It will still remain true, that good actions cannot be effected without it: and what is it to the true religion, if the worshippers of the false gods are not better in their actions than those who have no religion? What advantage would accrue to it, if the adorers of Jupiter and Saturn were not equally plunged in the gulph of perdition with the Atheists?

VIII. If they who were offended thought that one cannot praise the good morals of Epicurus, without supposing it the same thing with respect to a good life, to have no religion, or to profess any religion whatever, they are ignorant in the art of drawing consequences, and perfect strangers to the question. I never compared Atheism but with Heathenism; and therefore the true religion is no way concerned in it; the question is only about religions introduced and kept up by the Devil; the question is whether they who have professed a worship so infamous in its origin and progress as this, have been more regular in the practice of Morality than the Atheists. I suppose this as a point undoubted and fully determined, viz. That in the true religion there is not only more virtue than elsewhere, but that out of it there is no true virtue at all, nor any fruits of righteousness. To what purpose then do they pretend to fear that I injure true religion? Is it concerned in the censure that may be passed on the false one? And is it not to be feared that their zeal will shock men of sense, who see that this is shewing a particular tenderness for a worship detested by God, and set up by the Devil, as is owned by all our Divines.

see above

IX. I could not justly find fault with these complaints, if I had written a romance in which the persons were both virtuous and Atheistical: For, as I had been master of their words and actions, I was at liberty to describe them in a manner suited to the taste of the most scrupulous readers. But my Dictionary, being an Historical work, I ought not to represent people as they should have been, but as they actually were. I can neither suppress their vices, nor their virtues. Therefore, since I advance nothing concerning the morals of some Atheists, but what the authors I cite relate of them, no body has reason to be offended with me. To make my censurers sensible of the truth of what I say, I need only ask them, whether they believe the suppression of true facts to be the duty of an Historian? I am sure they will never subscribe to such a proposition.

X. Not but I believe there are some persons who will frankly maintain, that a matter of fact ought to be suppressed by an Historian, when it is likely to lessen the abhorrence of Atheism, or the veneration of religion in general. But I most humbly intreat them, not to take it amiss that I continue to believe, that God has no need of these Rhetorical artifices; and if this may be allowed in a Poem, or a piece of Eloquence, it does not follow that I ought to admit it in an Historical Dictionary. They must give me leave to tell them, that it is enough for me to promote the interest of true religion; for all that should be done for religion in general, would serve as well for Paganism, as Christianity.

(1) See the Pen-ces diverses sur les Cometes,
pag. 437,
490, 599: and the Additions to that book, pag.
58, 110.

XI. I had been so much the more blamable for suppressing the truths complained of, because, besides the acting against the fundamental laws of History, I should have omitted things, which, at the bottom, are most advantageous to the true system of grace. I have shewn in another place (1), that nothing can be more proper to prove the corruption of men, which is naturally invincible, and can only be overcome by the Holy Ghost, than to shew, that those who have no supernatural assistances, are as bad under the practice of a religion, as those who live in Atheism. I add here, that no thing can be more acceptable to the Pelagians, than to say, that the fear of the false gods was able to induce the Heathens to renounce some vices; for if through the fear of incurring the malediction of heaven, they could abstain from evil, they might also rise up to virtue by the desire of spiritual rewards, and to procure to themselves the love of God; that is, they might not only have been able to fear, but also to love God, and act upon this good principle. The two handles by which man is moved, are the fear of punishment, and the desire of reward. If he can be moved by the former, he may also by the latter; for one cannot well be admitted without the other.

XII. If

XII. If some persons, more equitable and intelligent than ordinary, should alledge, as the only reason of their scandal, the affectation wherewith they think I have acquainted my readers with the good lives of some Atheists; I would desire them to consider, that in the present case, affectation is very excusable, and may even be looked upon as a subject of edification. To understand this, one needs only call to mind an episode of my treatise concerning comets. The true design of that book was to confute, by a Theological argument, what is commonly said concerning the presages of comets (2). The necessity of enforcing this argument, put me upon drawing a parallel between Atheism and Paganism, without which my proof had lain open to an objection which would have made it unfit to evince what was necessary for me to demonstrate. Therefore there was a necessity for me either to leave that objection unanswered, or to confute the arguments of those who say, that the Pagan idolatry was not so great an evil as Atheism. All the success of the combat depended very much upon the success of this attack, and therefore according to the rules of disputation, and by virtue of the rights belonging to an author, I was obliged to take advantage of whatever Logic and History could afford me, to answer the objection. It was not therefore designedly, or through any audaciousness, that I alledged some matters of fact tending to prove, that Atheists are not necessarily more disorderly in their lives, than idolaters. The laws of disputation, and the right every one has to answer the objections to which his assertion is exposed, laid me under a necessity of taking such a course. Great complaints have been made against this part of my book, and some endeavours have been used to make it appear dangerous. I was therefore obliged to justify it, as far as reason and truth would permit; and consequently, no body ought to be offended, if I acquaint my readers, when occasion offers, that History informs us, that such and such persons, who denied either the existence or the providence of God, or the immortality of the soul, did nevertheless live like virtuous men. This affectation, which would perhaps be a just subject of scandal in another book, is none at all in mine: on the contrary, it may serve to edify my readers, since it shews I have not advanced a paradox out of vanity, but made an observation, which, at the bottom, is most certain, and seems false to none, but such as have not examined it. No man renders himself more odious than he, who, in order to distinguish himself, rashly leaves the common road: and if there are any writers, who have been suspected on that account, not through their own fault, but because the readers were not thoroughly acquainted with the matter, nothing can be more edifying than to see such authors justify themselves.

(2) See the preface of the third edition.

XIII. In order to remove all suspicions of a vicious affectation, I have taken care to mention, as often as possible, the bad morals of Atheists (3). If I have not done it oftner, it was because I wanted materials. The public knows, that I called for information (4): no body has been pleased to give me any, and I have not as yet been able to make any farther discovery by my own inquiries. I do not pretend to deny, that there have been in all countries, and at all times, men, who, by their debaucheries, and long criminal habits, have stifled the explicit belief of the existence of a God; but History having not preserved their names, it is impossible to speak of them. It is probable, that among those banditti, and hired assassins, who commit so many crimes, there are some who have no religion; but the contrary is still more probable, since, among so many malefactors who pass through the hangman's hands, there are none found to be Atheists (5). The ordinaries, who prepare them for death, find them always sufficiently disposed to desire the joys of heaven. As for those profane Epicures, who, in the judgment of Father Garasse, and many other writers, are downright Atheists, I could not bring them into the list; the question not being concerning those we call practical Atheists, people that live without any fear of God, though they are persuaded of his existence; but concerning theoretical Atheists, such as Diagoras, Vanini, Spinoza, &c. whose Atheism is attested, either by Historians, or by their own writings. The question only turns upon the morals of this class of Atheists, examples of whose bad lives, I desired might be shewn me. If I had found any, I had made an exact mention of them. There is nothing easier to be found in History than some wretches, whose abominable actions make the readers tremble; but their very impieties, and blasphemies, are a proof that they believed a Deity. This is a natural consequence of the constant doctrine of Divines, that the Devil, the most wicked of creatures, but incapable of Atheism, is the promoter of all the sins of mankind; whence the greatest wickedness of man, must have the character of that of the Devil; that is, to be joined with the persuasion of the being of a God. A maxim of the Philosophers confirms this reasoning (6).

(3) As in the articles of BION the Borythenite, and CANTAS.

(4) See the additions to the Penitence for les Cometes, pag. 36. See also, pag. 75.

(5) I speak thus, because I do not remember I have ever read, or heard of any relations concerning the final Atheism of these people.

(6) 'Αν δὲ θ' ὑπάρχει ἡ κατὰ φύσιν ἀνάγκη, ἀνεύθει μὲλλον ὑπάρχειν. Propter quod unumquodque est tale, illud semper est magis tale. Aristot. Analyt. poster. lib. i, cap. ii, pag. m. 105. etiam Metaphys. lib. ii, cap. i, pag. 643, F.

XIV. If what I have been saying, is capable of edifying people of a tender conscience, since they will see that the assertion which frightened them, agrees with the most Orthodox principles, they will find no less a subject of edification in what I am going to propose. That the most wicked men are not Atheists, and that the greatest part of Atheists, whose names are come down to us, were virtuous men, as the world goes, is a character of the infinite wisdom of God, and ought to make us admire his providence. It has set bounds to man's corruption, that there might be societies upon earth;

V O L. V.

9 U

and

and if it has favoured but a few with a sanctifying grace, it has dispersed a general Repressing grace (7), which like a strong bank restrains the floods of sin, as much as is necessary to prevent an universal inundation, which would destroy all monarchical, aristocratic, and democratic governments. It is commonly said, that the means God has made use of to arrive at this end, have been, to preserve in the souls of all men the ideas of virtue and vice, and a sense of a providence which superintends all, punishes vice, and rewards virtue. You will find this notion in the bodies of Divinity, and in a great many other Orthodox books. What is the natural consequence of this proposition? Is it not this; that if there are some persons whom God does not forsake so far as to suffer them to fall into Epicurus's system, or that of the Atheists, they are chiefly those brutish souls, whose cruelty, audaciousness, avarice, fury, and ambition are capable of bringing a large flourishing country to speedy ruin. Is it not this. That if he forsakes some people, so far as to permit they should deny either his existence, or providence, they are chiefly persons, whose temper, education, lively ideas of virtue, love of fame, or sense of dishonour, serve as a strong curb to keep them to their duty? These are two consequences that naturally flow from the above-mentioned Theological principle. Now, as by informing my readers in some places of this Dictionary, that the most profligate wretches had some religion; and that those who had none, have lived according to the rules of virtue, I said nothing but what agrees with these two consequences; there is no longer any ground for a just offence.

XV. It will be much better to consider in this the finger of God, and the admirable conduct of his providence; he arrives at the same end by different ways: the repressing principle, so necessary for the preservation of societies, as Divines teach us, exerts its power by the curb of idolatry, in some countries, and in certain persons, and by the natural temper, or the vivacity of ideas, and a liking to moral virtue in some others. The Greeks, ingenious and voluptuous, and thereby obnoxious to a horrid train of crimes, had need of a religion that should burden them with infinite observances. They would have had too much time to run into vice, if the multitude of ceremonies, sacrifices and oracles, had not given them many avocations, and superstitious terrors had not alarmed them. The Scythians, a stupid people, who were neither luxurious in cloaths or diet, needed only to despise pleasures, or not to know them. 'Aurum & argentum perinde aspernantur, ac reliqui mortales appetunt Hæc continentia illis morum quoque justitiam edidit, nihil alienum concupiscentibus: QUIPPE ibidem divitiarum cupido est, ubi & usus. Atque utinam reliquis mortalibus similis moderatio & abstinentia alieni foret Prorsus ut admirabile videatur, hoc illis naturam dare, quod Græci longa sapientium doctrina, præceptisque philosophorum consequi nequeunt (8). - - - - Gold and Silver are as much neglected and despised among the Scythians, as sought after and coveted by all other nations This abstinence has produced another virtue among that people, namely justice in the behaviour of every private man, for they covet not what is the property of others. And indeed wherever the use of riches prevails, there a covetous desire of them is inseparably annexed. Would to GOD other nations were endowed with the like moderation and contentment with their own. . . . It seems very wonderful and admirable that nature should have bestowed on the Scythians what the Greeks have not been able to attain by the repeated doctrines of their wise men, and all the precepts of their Philosophers.' This alone maintained their republic, and hindered them from injuring one another. They were so framed, as to be all content with what they had at home. Such a nation has neither occasion for a Code, nor a Digest (9).

These fifteen considerations seem sufficient to remove the stumbling-block, which was thought to be laid in some places of my Dictionary. They might afford matter for a large book: I have only cursorily proposed them; for I have somewhat more largely treated of them in another place (10), and I shall treat of them more amply in a work that I have promised (11).

(7) I have been told by a Divine, that this is the expression they use, when they speak of the Providence of God, in as much as it has not permitted such an inundation of crimes as would destroy justice.

(8) Justin. lib. ii. cap. ii.

(9) Justitia gentis ingenia culta, non legibus. . . . Justice is maintained among the Scythians, not by the laws of the country, so much as by the genius and disposition of the nation. Id. ibid.

(10) See the Penitens diverles sur les Cometes.

(11) See the preface of the third edition of the just Penitens.

EXPLANATION

EXPLANATION II.

How what I have said concerning the objections of the Manichees, ought to be considered.

THEY who are offended at some things which I have observed in the articles wherein I treated of Manicheism, would be wholly inexcusable if they went only upon my saying, that the Question about the origin of evil is very difficult. For the Ancient Fathers ingenuously confess it (1), as does every Orthodox Divine at this day. I do not think therefore that the stumbling-block lies in this; but rather, in my supposing the objections of the Manichees unanswerable, whilst only discussed at the bar of reason.

(1) See the article PAULICIANÆ, citat. (1c8).

This must needs scandalize those, whose great zeal for the truths of the gospel persuades them, that it triumphs over error in all kinds of combat, and whatever arms it opposes. They find so much pleasure in the reading a book, wherein Transubstantiation is routed, whether it be attacked by the testimony of the senses, and the principles of Philosophy, or whether impugned by the Scripture, and the tradition of the first ages; they find, I say, so much satisfaction in so complete a victory, that they easily fancy all other disputes of orthodoxy have the same fate. Flattered with so agreeable a persuasion, they fret and fume if any one maintains, that all the articles of the Christian Faith, defended and attacked by the arms of Philosophy alone, do not come off honourably; that some of them give ground, and are forced to retire into the fortresses of Scripture, and to ask leave for the future to arm themselves in another way, or otherwise they will refuse to enter the lists.

They, who are vexed to see themselves thus disturbed in the possession of an imaginary complete triumph, fear moreover that by the confession of a sort of inferiority, religion will be exposed to a total defeat, or at least its certainty notably weakened, and the interest of the enemies of the Gospel advanced.

An offence grounded on these notions, has two favourable circumstances; one, that it proceeds from a good principle; the other that it may be easily removed. It is produced by the love of truth, and if we do but rise up to the consideration of the character of Evangelical truths, we shall be delivered from this disturbance. For we shall see, that far from being the property of those truths to be reconciled with Philosophy, it is on the contrary essential to them, not to be squared by its rules (2).

THAT the mysteries of the Gospel being above reason, it follows, that the objections of the unbelievers cannot be answered by reason.

The Roman Catholics and Protestants dispute concerning several articles of religion, but they perfectly agree in this point. That the mysteries of the Gospel are above reason. There are even some Divines who own that the mysteries denied by the Socinians, are against reason. I will not take advantage of that concession; it suffices me, that they are unanimously acknowledged to be above reason; for from thence it necessarily follows, that it is impossible to solve the difficulties of the Philosophers; and consequently, that a dispute, wherein natural light only is employed, will always terminate to the disadvantage of the Divines, who will be forced to give ground and to retire under the cannon of supernatural light.

(2) This is only to be understood of Evangelical truths, which contain mysteries; for it must be confessed, that the moral precepts of Jesus Christ, are easily reconciled with natural light.

It is evident, that reason can never reach what is above itself; but if it could afford answers to the objections which attack the Doctrine of the Trinity, and that of the Hypostatic Union, it would reach to these two mysteries, it would get the mastery of them, manage and ply them, even to the comparing them with its first principles, or with aphorisms deduced from common notions, till at last, it had concluded, that they agree with natural light. It would therefore exert it self beyond its strength, and exceed its own limits, which is a downright contradiction. We must therefore say, that it cannot furnish answers to its own objections; and consequently they remain victorious, till recourse is had to the Divine authority, and the necessity of captivating the understanding to the obedience of faith.

Let us endeavour to put this in a clearer light. If some doctrines are above reason, they are out of its reach; if they are out of its reach, it cannot attain to them; if it cannot attain to them, it cannot comprehend them; if it cannot comprehend them, it cannot find any idea or principle that can afford solutions; and consequently, its objections will remain unanswered; or, which is the same thing, will be answered by some distinction as obscure as the position itself which is attacked. Now it is certain, that an objection founded upon distinct notions remains equally victorious, whether no answer is made to it, or such an answer is made as no body can understand. Can the match be equal betwixt you and another person, if that person makes objections which each of you clearly comprehends, and you make no answers but such as neither of you comprehends?

Every

THE end of a philosophical dispute, and that it cannot be attained when the dispute turns upon mysteries.

Every Philosophical dispute supposes the contending parties to be agreed upon certain definitions, and to admit the rules of syllogisms, and the characteristics of false reasoning. After this, the whole business consists in examining, whether a position be mediately or immediately consistent with the principles agreed upon; whether the premises of an argument are true; whether the consequence is well drawn: whether the syllogism used has four terms; whether no maxim contained in the chapter de Oppositis, or de Sophisticis Elenchis, &c. be contradicted. The victory is obtained either by shewing that the subject of the dispute has no connexion with the principles agreed upon, or by reducing the respondent to an absurdity. And this may be done, either by shewing that the consequences of his position are contradictory, or by driving him to such answers as are wholly unintelligible. The end of these sorts of disputes is to clear up obscurities, and make evidence shine forth. Hence we judge, that during the course of a disputation, victory declares more or less for the opponent or respondent, according to the greater or lesser perspicuity in the propositions of the respective disputants; and at last we determine that it wholly declares against him whose answers are such as are to us unintelligible, and who acknowledges they are incomprehensible. Hereupon we condemn him by the rules of adjudging the victory to a party; and even when he cannot be pursued into the mist he has covered himself with, which forms a sort of abyss betwixt him and his antagonists, we conclude him utterly defeated, and compare him to an army, which having lost the battle, escapes the conquerours pursuit only by the favour of the night.

The conclusion we ought to draw from this is, that the mysteries of the gospel being of a supernatural order, neither can nor ought to be subjected to the rules of natural reason: they are not suited to the test of Philosophical disputes; their greatness and sublimity hinders them from stooping to them. It would be against the nature of things, for them to come off victorious from such a combat, their essential character is to be the objects of faith, and not of science: they would be no longer mysteries, if reason could solve all the difficulties of them; and therefore, instead of thinking it strange that any one should say that Philosophy may attack them, but not repulse the attack, it should be a subject of scandal to hear the contrary (3).

If they, whose scruples I would remove, yield not to these considerations, in which they will find, perhaps, something too abstracted, I intreat them to have recourse to reflexions that are more adapted to every one's capacity: I beseech them to consider a little the genius that reigns in the New Testament, and in the mission of the Apostles.

SOME considerations upon the method that Jesus Christ and the Apostles and ancient Fathers have observed in teaching.

could it be an are we see.

The humour of disputing is what seems the least approved in the œconomy of the Gospel. The first thing JESUS CHRIST requires is faith and submission. This is commonly his first precept, and also of his apostles, Follow me, (4) Believe, and thou shalt be saved (5). Now, that faith which he required was not obtained by a train of Philosophical discussions and long reasonings; but was the gift of GOD, a pure grace of the Holy Ghost, which commonly fell on ignorant persons (6). It was not even produced in the apostles by their reflecting on the holiness of the life of JESUS CHRIST, and the excellency of his doctrine and miracles. They stood in need of a Revelation from GOD himself, to know that he whose disciples they were, was his eternal Son (7). If JESUS CHRIST and his apostles sometimes happen to reason, they did not take their proofs from natural light, but from the books of the Prophets, and from miracles; and if sometimes St Paul made use of some arguments ad hominem against the Gentiles, he did not much insist upon them. His method was entirely different from that of Philosophers: these boast of such evident principles, and a system so consistent, as to fear no other obstacles to persuasion but the stupidity of the auditors, or the malicious artifice of their competitors; and they offer to give an account of their doctrine to all the world, and to defend it against all gainfayers. St Paul, on the contrary, owns his doctrine to be obscure, that he knows it but imperfectly (8), and that nothing of it can be understood, unless GOD communicates a spiritual discernment, without which it must be reckoned foolishness (9). He confesses (10) that the greatest number of those converted by the apostles were ignorant and of mean condition. He does not challenge the Philosophers to disputation, but exhorts the believers to stand well upon their guard against Philosophy (11), and to avoid the contestations of that science, which had ruined the faith of some persons (12).

The ancient Fathers governed themselves by the same spirit; they required a ready submission to the authority of GOD, and looked upon the disputes of Philosophers as one of the greatest obstacles the true faith could meet in its way (13). Celsus the Philosopher laughed at the conduct of the Christians, Who, said he (14), will neither bear your reasons, nor give you any for what they believe, contenting themselves with saying, Examine not, only believe; or Your faith will save you; and it is a maxim with them, that the wisdom of the world is an evil . . . If, as usually, they confine themselves to their examine not, only believe, they must at least tell me what things those are they would have me believe (15). But observe how he is answered (16). 'If it were possible for all men, neglecting the affairs of this life, to apply themselves to study and meditation, we need seek no other way to make them embrace the Christian religion: for, not to say

(3) Note, that we mean not to condemn those who labour to reconcile these mysteries with Philosophy; their motives may be good, and their labour, by the blessing of God, may sometimes be useful.

(4) Luke v. 27, and ix. 59.

(5) Acts vii. 31.

(6) Matt. xii. 31.

(7) John. xvi. 17.

(8) 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

(9) 1 Thim. ii. 14.

(10) 1 Thim. ii. 14.

(11) Gal. ii. 14.

(12) 1 Tim. vi. 20.

(13) See the preface of the Fathers which Mr. de Launoy has compiled, &c. of his book, de variis Antiquis fortibus.

(14) Orig. against Celsus, book i. cap. 1.

(15) Ibid. i. 14.

(16) Ibid. i. 14.

say any thing offensive to others, no less exactness will appear in it than elsewhere; whether in the discussion of its doctrines (17), or in the illustration of the enigmatical expressions of its prophets, or in the signification of its Gospel parables, and abundance of other things which happened, or were symbolically ordained. But, since neither the necessities of this life, nor the infirmities of men, will permit many persons to apply themselves to study, what more profitable method could be found for all the rest of the world, than that which Jesus Christ was pleased to use for the conversion of the people? And I would fain be told, with respect to the great number of those who believe, and thereby have escaped the deluge of corruption in which they were plunged, which is better for them, to have thus changed their morals; and mended their lives, by believing without examination, that there are punishments for sins, and rewards for good actions; or to have put off their conversion till they not only believed, but had carefully examined the foundations of those doctrines? It is certain, that in following this method few people would have arrived so far as their plain and naked faith has conducted them; but most of them would have remained in their corruption. . . . But since they make so much noise about believing without examining, we must further tell them, that as for us who observe the profit which hence redounds to the greatest number, we frankly confess, that we recommend it to those who are not in a capacity of forsaking all things to apply themselves wholly to the search of truth (18).

(17) This must be understood not with respect to the principles of Logic and Metaphysics mentioned in this explanation (for it is certain the Fathers did not discuss the doctrine of the Trinity, and Incarnation by these rules) but with respect to principles taken from the word of God, taken the question is about a mystery of the gospel.

(18) Origen, ubi supra, pag. 6.

(19) 2 Cor. x. 7.

This passage of St Paul, We walk by faith, and not by sight (19), would alone suffice to convince us, that in a dispute between two Philosophers there is nothing to be gained by him who attempts either to prove the mysteries of the Christian Religion, or to stand upon the defensive. For herein lies the difference betwixt the faith of a Christian and the science of a Philosopher; this faith produces a complete certainty, but its object still remains invident; science, on the contrary, at once produces the evidence of the object, and a complete certainty of persuasion. A Christian therefore attempting to maintain the mystery of the Trinity against a Philosopher, would oppose an invident object against evident objections. Would not this be fighting blind-fold and with hands tied, against an adversary who has the use of all the faculties of his body and mind? But if the Christian could solve all the Philosopher's objections, only by the principles of natural reason, the assertion of St Paul would not be true, that we walk by faith, and not by sight: for science, and not Divine faith, would be the portion of a Christian.

Now can any man take offence at my acknowledging a truth which naturally results from the spirit of the gospel, and the doctrine of St Paul?

MAXIMS common to Romish and Protestant Divines.

If these reflexions upon the conduct of the first ages have not sufficient force; if, I say, such objects considered at a distance, make not an impression deep enough, let me intreat you to examine the maxims of the modern Divines. Both Papists and Protestants agree in this position, that reason is to be rejected in the judging of a controversy about our mysteries; which amounts to this, that this concession shall never be made, viz. That, if the literal sense of a passage of Scripture includes inconceivable doctrines impugned by the most evident maxims of the Logicians and Metaphysicians, it shall be declared false; and Reason, Philosophy and Natural Light shall be the rule to be followed in the choice of a certain interpretation of Scripture preferably to all others. They not only say, that all those are to be rejected who make such a preliminary demand in the dispute, but also maintain that they are engaged in a way that can lead only to Scepticism, or Deism, or Atheism: so that the most necessary Barrier to preserve the Christian religion, is the obligation to submit to the authority of God, and humbly to believe the mysteries he has been pleased to reveal, however inconceivable they be and impossible they appear to our reason.

It seems that the Papists and Lutherans ought more strongly to insist upon this principle than the Calvinists; for the doctrine of the Real Presence has a more particular need of it; and yet the Calvinists are as jealous of this position as the others, and urge it with great zeal against the Socinians; and whenever they see some of their Divines go out of this common road, to make more room for reason, they write severely against them, and make them suspected of the Socinian Heresy.

It would be easy to gather up the proofs of all I have said, but this would be to very little purpose; for whoever is acquainted with books of controversy, must know that the Roman Catholics continually recommend the sacrificing our reason, and captivating the understanding, and that the Protestant Ministers impute the Socinian impieties to the refusal of this sacrifice. The disputes of the university of Franeker, silenced by authority (20), and those of the two French Ministers (21) terminated (22) by the Walloon Synod, have made too much noise, and are of so late a date, that there is no need of proving it by any citations. I only say, that one of those two ministers maintained as the universal doctrine of the Church, and particularly of Calvin and his followers, that the foundation of faith is neither the evidence of the objects, nor the evidence of revelation; and that the Holy Ghost persuades us of the mysteries of the Gospel, without evidently shewing us what we believe, or the Divinity of the Scripture, or the truth

(20) In 1687. There are in the Bibliothèque Universelle, Extraits of many books published pro and con upon this controversy.

(21) Mr. Jurieu, and Mr. Saurin.

(22) In Sept. 1696.

V O L. V.

9 X

truth

AN EXPLANATION

truth of the sense of such and such passages. He was acknowledged to be orthodox; his adversary obtained a like testimony of his orthodoxy; but this proves nothing against me, for he owned that faith is inevident as to the object, and that the evidence accompanying it as to revelation is an effect of grace. He is therefore one of those who say that mysteries are not under the jurisdiction of reason, and that reason or philosophical light is not the rule we are to consult when we dispute on that matter.

Now, if all the Divines who are orthodox, with regard to the mysteries of the Trinity, and hypostatic Union, both Roman Catholics and Protestants unanimously reject the arbitration of reason, it is a manifest sign they find it incapable of giving proofs or solutions in the controversies concerning those mysteries; for when the question is about the existence of God, they desire nothing better than to dispute by the light of reason, because it furnishes arms both to attack and repulse the enemy, and to gain an entire victory. The reason therefore why they act quite otherwise, with respect to the Trinity and Incarnation, &c. is their knowing that Philosophical principles are unable, insufficient, to do good, but capable of doing much harm. If justice and prudence allow the excepting against a judge, it is only in case of incompetence and partiality. The more zeal a man has for his cause, the less he neglects his advantages; and if he has also a true sense of his interest, he never excepts against well-affected persons.

From all this I conclude, that there is nothing easier than to satisfy those who have been offended with my concession; for I need only desire them to observe, that if they will be scandalized at it, they must complain that all the orthodox Divines are a scandal to them. There is no medium in this case: they must either approve what I have said, or disapprove what is said by those Divines who are most averse to the Socinian Heresies.

An answer to some objections: the first is, that we give too great advantage to Heretics and Infidels, by owning that their philosophical objections against the mysteries of the New Testament cannot be answered.

If it is objected, that offence was justly taken at my concession, since it is giving too great an advantage to the unbelievers, to allow that their objections against our mysteries cannot be answered philosophically: I reply two things. First, that they must then be offended not only at what I have said on this subject, but also at what the most orthodox Divines have published concerning it. I say secondly, that this is not giving to the unbelievers any advantage they can justly boast of, as they might do if our preachers imitated those Philosophers, who give public notice that they are ready to defend such and such propositions against all opposers, and that at such a day, and at such an hour and place they will make them appear as clear as noon-day. If the Apostles, St Paul for example, when among the Athenians, had petitioned the Areopagus to permit him to enter the lists with all the Philosophers; if he had offered to maintain a disputation upon the three persons which are but one God, and upon the unity of the hypostasis of the Divine and human nature in Jesus Christ; and if before he began the dispute he had acknowledged the truth of the rules established by Aristotle in his Logic, either concerning the terms of opposition, or the requisites of the premises of a demonstrative syllogism, &c. In fine, if these preliminaries being adjusted, he had answered that our reason is too weak to comprehend the mysteries against which they proposed their objections, he had been exposed to all the shame that a nonplussed respondent can ever suffer. The victory of the Athenian Philosophers had been complete; for he would have been judged and condemned by the very maxims which he had already owned to be certain. But if these Philosophers had attacked him by the same maxims, after he declared to them the foundation of his faith, he might have opposed this barrier to them, viz. That his doctrines were unknown to reason, that they were revealed by God, and that we ought to believe them, though we do not comprehend them. The dispute, to be regular, must not have turned upon the question, Whether these doctrines were contrary to the maxims of Logic and Metaphysics; but upon the question, Whether God had revealed them. St Paul could not have the worst of it, except it had been proved to him that God did not require the belief of those things.

You see by this how imaginary is the pretended triumph of the unbelievers; for our Divines do not pretend to prove the Trinity and Incarnation by Philosophical arguments; they admit only the word of God for the foundation and source of their proofs and solutions. This is their fortress, their place of arms, it is enough for them to defend it, and ward off all the blows levelled at it by an Heretic, who bottoms upon the same principle with them, viz. the Divine authority of the Scripture. It is no great matter if the enemy seize the rest, being a country which they have voluntarily abandoned. It is no great victory to seize on a place which no body designed to keep. Facile erat vincere non repugnantes (23). - - - It was an easy matter to vanquish those who made no resistance.

To the end that those who read this, and have no other book on this subject, may be fully assured that I do not advance a thing at random. I will fully convince them of what I have advanced. I will cite the testimony of two famous writers (24), one a Priest, and the other a Minister, and both very orthodox upon the Trinity, Incarnation, satisfaction of Jesus Christ, and some other mysteries. This proceeding (25) is unreasonable, (23) Cicero, Tullius, Quæst. Tit. 1, cap. 10, p. 245, G.

(24) Mr. Nisard and Mr. Clark.

(25) That it is to make a collection of reason which have formerly surprised against the Trinity, &c. unreasonable, as being contrary to the first principles, and the very foundations of the Christian religion. If this religion told men, that it proposes to them a faith free from all difficulties; that nothing can be alledged against its mysteries with any sort of probability; and that the proofs on which it establishes the truths it teaches, are so clear as to overcome the incredulity and reluctance of all sorts of persons, however prepossessed; this would be a just ground for pretending to overthrow its doctrines, by thus heaping up probable objections against what it would make us believe. But it is very far from speaking thus: it not only does not tell them that the truths it teaches cannot be attacked by any probable reasons, but tells them it is necessary they should be so, and that it is an infallible consequence of the design God had in discovering himself to mankind by the true religion (26). Mr Claude having objected nothing to this passage of Mr Nicolle, must be deemed the approver of it; for if he had found any matter for censure in it, he was indispensibly obliged to censure it in refuting, as he did, the book concerning the Perpetuity of Faith.

(26) Nicolle, Perpetuité de la Foi, pag. m. 92, 93.

The second objection is, that answers have been found to these philosophical objections.

Let us see whether any just offence could be taken, under pretence that the Philosophical objections against the doctrine of the Trinity, &c. silence not the Professors of Divinity, and that in their public disputations on these points, they solve all the difficulties that can be proposed to them. I desire such as shall urge this to consider two things: one is, that their objection cannot be good against me, without being so against all the Divines who acknowledge that the great mysteries of the gospel are inexplicable by natural reason: the other is, that the Protestants cannot make use of this objection; for it proves too much; namely, that the doctrine of Transubstantiation is not liable to invincible attacks, philosophically speaking. It is the general doctrine of the Roman Catholics, that a body may be in several places at the same time. The Thomists, contenting themselves with what is necessary, have not dared to affirm it can be so circumscriptively, but at most as Jesus Christ is under the sacramental species. The other schoolmen, especially the Jesuits, have been much bolder; they have maintained the circumscriptive replication (27), and in this have reasoned more consequentially than the Thomists; for if the reasons alledged against this replication were good, the definitive replication (28) would not be maintainable. The replication is not only taught by the Divines, but also in all the bodies of Philosophy, and it is always one of the theses ordered to be publicly maintained by the students in Natural Philosophy. All imaginable objections are discussed in the books of scholastic Divines, which treat of the sacrament of the Eucharist, and in the bodies of Philosophy, in the place where the questions de loco are explained: not one of those objections remains unanswered: Does this hinder the Protestants from persisting to maintain that this position, viz. a body is in several places at the same time, is liable to a thousand contradictions, and absolutely impossible? Nothing therefore can be inferred in favour of an opinion, from the possibility of opposing some distinction or school-term against whatever the most subtle adversaries can object (29). All does not consist in making an answer, but in giving a solution which raises some idea, and is exempt from the petitio principii, and which shews the objection to be grounded upon foundations that have no connexion with common notions. Here you see three requisites which are wanting in the schoolmen's answers to the objections against Transubstantiation: therefore their last and principal refuge is to say, that the omnipotence of God supplies what reason cannot comprehend, and that it is our duty to captivate our understanding, and sacrifice our reason to the authority of the Church.

(27) It is thus the Schoolmen call the position of the same body in several places, without a penetration of dimensions.

(28) Thus they call the position of the same body in many places at once, with penetration of dimensions.

(29) Compare with this what I have said in the article ZENO of Elia, concerning the objections relating to the divisibility of matter.

They have been no less subtle and fertile in inventing either difficulties, or answers, with respect to the Trinity, than with respect to Transubstantiation. But the Socinians are as ill satisfied with these two kinds of answers, as the Protestants are with those relating to Transubstantiation: Both, say the Socinians, want the three requisites above-mentioned: they take for granted what is in question; they are as obscure, or even obscurer than the doctrine itself, which is the subject of controversy; they are too inconceivable to be confuted; it is a dispute wherein night parts the combatants; for if the respondent wraps himself in a distinction wholly incomprehensible, the opponent must necessarily retire; or if he stays, he does not see where he can strike a blow. No man will shoot where there is not the least glimpse whereby to discover or guess at the mark; and as the highest degree of evidence has this property, that it cannot be proved, the lowest degree of inevidence has this destiny, that it cannot be attacked. So that no consequence can be drawn in favour of a doctrine from this, that its opponents, though never so well provided with Philosophical weapons, at last meet with an intrenchment of distinctions, involved in so impenetrable a cloud, that they are forced to proceed no farther.

There are both in the Protestant and Romish communion a great many persons who are dissatisfied with the explanations of the schoolmen, and think that these people have more confounded than explained the mysteries of religion. Some Protestant Divines could wish that the scripture-terms had only been made use of, that the whole doctrine of the Trinity had been expressed in five or six lines, and that, instead of following the disputants from one objection to another, they had been told, We do not propose this this to you as a thing you are to comprehend, but as a thing you are to believe: if you cannot believe it, beg the grace of God that you may; if you obtain nothing by your prayers, your distemper is incurable: our distinctions and subtilties will serve only to harden you; you will never leave off complaining that we explain to you one obscure doctrine by another more obscure, obscurum per obscurius. It is very probable that this mystery propounded in a few words, according to the simplicity of the scripture, would much less startle and fright reason, than it does by that great train of explications which accompanies it in Thomas Aquinas's Commentators. Many Roman Catholics would heartily say, if they durst, against the subtilties of the schoolmen, what the Abbot Faydit has published of them: but though they had not the same courage he had to publish a strong invective on this subject, they nevertheless think as he does. See the margin (30).

AN EXPLANATION

Mr Balzac has said excellent things in the fifth discourse of his Socrate Chrétien (31). I shall give some part of it. 'They who have translated from one language into another with the greatest reputation, have mistaken rivers for mountains, and men for cities. The mistakes of your Divines are not less than those. Human reason falls into more strange mistakes when it treats of divine things: being weak and defective it ought to be cautious, and consider its own strength; it ought to be more discreet and reserved: there may be an excess in the desire of learning and enquiring: it is a vice to know too much news; ancient morality has condemned it: Theophrastus's characters do not forget it. And if that be true which was heretofore said, THAT WE OUGHT NOT TO BE CURIOUS IN A FOREIGN REPUBLIC; what audaciousness is it, I pray, what sacrilege, for a citizen of the lower world, an inhabitant of the earth, to meddle so much with the things above, and the affairs of heaven? In what country is he more a stranger than in that? Is there any Republic more unknown to him? Is there any foreign place he is more remote from, or has less society and correspondence with? The profound respect we owe to that majesty which conceals himself, forbids our prying into it with so much diligence and forwardness. Let us stop at his outworks and ramparts, without pursuing him into his fort and intrenchments; let us adore the veils and clouds he has placed betwixt us and him. Since he inhabits a light inaccessible, let us leave off attempting the place of his abode: let us not endeavour to surprize him by the subtilty of our questions, to force him with the violence of our arguments. If the preservation of our eyes be valuable, if our life be dear to us, let us shun that formidable presence, that fatal light, that light which dazzles angels and kills men (32). . . . At the unmeasurable distance we are from him, confined to the lowest station of the world he has built, we would ascend his throne, and touch his crown. We aspire to his strictest confidence and familiarity; at least, we pretend to see him with the eyes of flesh, to comprehend him with a mind drowned in blood, and buried in matter. We undertake to discourse of his nature and his essence, to give an account of his conduct and designs, with the jargon of Aristotle's Philosophy (33).'

Balzac, in this discourse, had the Spanish schoolmen in view; but there is no subject in which they better deserve this censure, than their explications of the mystery of the Trinity: so little reason is there to conclude they have succeeded well, under the pretence of their inventing answers to objections.

But to be impartial to every body, we must say, that those who engage in disputes with the Socinians, and take new roads, seldom fail to lose their way. This has been seen in England five or six years ago (34): a famous Divine, thinking he could not confute some Socinian tracts by the hypothesis of the schools, imagined another; but it was pretended that he established Tritheism, and his hypothesis was not suffered to take footing. From whence we may infer how impossible it is to confute the Philosophical objections of the Socinians; and since they acknowledge the scripture, they ought immediately to be attacked by it. This is the weak side of their defence; the other is the strong side.

As desirous as I am to be short, I must observe the method taken by an able Divine, who has since been many years Bishop of Salisbury, to refute the objections of a famous Atheist (35) whom he converted. He has given us an account of the conferences he had with him, where we find, amongst other things, that in answering the difficulties upon the mysteries of the gospel, he had only recourse to this, that the incomprehensibility of a doctrine is not a sufficient reason to reject it, since there are a great many most certain things in nature which it is impossible to comprehend. He mentioned some of them, and particularly the union of the soul and body. It had been objected to Dr Burnet, that it is not in the power of man to believe what he does not conceive; and that it is opening a door to all the cheats and impositions of priests, to give credit to mysterious doctrines. He excepted to the belief of mysteries in the Christian Religion; which he thought no man could do, since it is not in a man's power to believe that which he cannot comprehend: and of which he can have no notion. The believing mysteries, he said, made way for all the jugglings of priests, for they getting the people under them in that point, set out to them what they pleased; and giving it a hard name, and calling it a Mystery, the people

(30) To know is what a strange complexity the Abbot Faydit has reduced the school-men, we need only consult the author who has attempted to explain him, or the most exact Mr de Bourneville has given of his answer, in the Hist.
des Ouvr. des Savants, May 1699,
pag. 214. &
seq.

(31) Initiated, Concerning the too great subtilty in matters of religion.

(32) Balzac, Socrate Chrétien,
pag. m. 57. &
seq.

(33) Id. ibid.
62, 63.

(34) I wrote this in November, 1701.

(35) John Wilson, B. of Salisbury, born April 1648, who died positive in 1680. A man whose distinguished himself by his piety, and his writings which were full of remonstrances and strictures; and of those who were true according to their precepts; for he plunged himself into the precepts of purity, except of those which were inconvenient in his conversion in Dr Gilbert's
people

people were tamed, and easily believed it (36). The Doctor answered (37), that we must not wonder that the essence of God is incomprehensible, since there is in every being something we cannot account for (38), and the possibility of several facts acknowledged to be true by all the world, may yet be attacked by specious arguments (39); and therefore the revelation of the mystery of the Trinity and Incarnation, and some others, being certain we ought to subject our reason to them; for the sole argument that can be opposed to them is, that they are above our reason; but is not the same difficulty to be found in several things which we admit to be true (40). He was so far from reckoning the schoolmen answers any thing, that on the contrary he confessed they only served to render the difficulties more obscure. There have been too many niceties brought in indeed, rather to darken than explain these: They have been defended by weak arguments, and illustrated by similes not always so very apt and pertinent. And new subtilties have been added, which have rather perplexed than cleared them. All this cannot be denied; the opposition of Heretics antiently, occasioned too much curiosity among the Fathers: which the Schoolmen have wonderfully advanced of late times. But if mysteries were received, rather in the simplicity in which they are delivered in the scriptures, than according to the descantings of fanciful men upon them, they would not appear much more incredible, than some of the common objects of sense and perception (41).

Let us not forget this observation. Luther, and several other Protestant Divines had never maintained that there are things false in Philosophy which are true in Divinity (42), if they had believed that the answers made to the objections of the Philosophers against our mysteries were satisfactory to reason; for they maintained this only on account of those mysteries (43).

I do not see therefore that hitherto the objections I had to solve in this explanation have been able to put me to any difficulty. Let us try in some others.

If it be objected, that my concession is scandalous, because it relates not to the Philosophical reasons which may impugn the Trinity, Incarnation, and some other mysteries, but to the disputes about the origin of evil; that objection will be very faulty: For, first, the objector will be ignorant that the decrees of God concerning the fall of man, and the consequences of this fall, are one of the most incomprehensible mysteries of religion; secondly, That our most orthodox Divines acknowledge it.

The writings of St Paul teach us, that this great Apostle, proposing to himself the difficulties concerning Predestination, could get out of them no otherwise than by asserting the absolute power of God over his creatures (44), with an exclamation upon the incomprehensibility of his ways. Could he more clearly signify, than by such a solution, that the doctrine of the decrees of God concerning the destiny of the Elect and Reprobate is inexplicable? Is not this telling us in plain terms, that Predestination is one of the mysteries which most overwhelm human reason, and most unavoidably require it to humble itself under the authority of God, and sacrifice itself to the scripture? The objections it suggests against the mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation, are for the most part sensible only to those who have some tincture of Logic and Metaphysics; and belonging to the speculative sciences, they have less force upon the generality of men: but those it suggests against Adam's sin, and Original Sin, and the eternal damnation of an infinite number of people, who cannot be saved without an efficacious grace, which God grants only to his Elect, are founded upon principles of Morality, which are known to every body, and which constantly serve for a rule both to the learned and ignorant to judge whether an action be unjust or not. These principles are the most evident, and work upon the mind and heart; so that all the faculties of man revolt, when we must impute to God a conduct which is not conform to this rule. Nay, the solution which is drawn from God's infinity, and is employed as a powerful motive to captivate the understanding, is not exempt from a new difficulty; for if that infinite distance which raises God above all things, ought to persuade us that he is not subject to the laws of human virtues, we cannot be certain that his justice engages him to punish evil, and we could not confute those who should maintain that he is the author of sin, and yet punishes it very justly, and in all this does nothing but what is consistent with the infinite perfections of a supreme being; because those perfections are not to be adjusted to our ideas of virtue.

It is plain therefore, that the doctrine concerning Adam's sin, with its dependences; is, of all the mysteries unconceivable to reason and inexplicable by its maxims, that which most necessarily obliges us to submit to revealed truth, notwithstanding all the oppositions of Philosophical truth.

It were to be wished that this point had been always remembered; for the unhappy disputes about grace, which have caused so many troubles, were only derived from the treating of this mystery as a thing reconcilable with our weak reason. The Roman Catholics here have acted inconsistently; they have insulted Calvin with the utmost fury, for literally following St Paul's doctrine, whilst they would explain it in a milder sense, that human reason might be satisfied with it. They had not the same regard for reason in the explication of the passages relating to the Trinity, and the Sacrament of the Eucharist. Balzac's strokes against the Protestant Divines would do well against

V O L. V.

9 Y

(36) Some passages of the life and death of John, Earl of Rochester, &c. pag. 100, of the Edit. 1680.

(37) Ibid. pag. 101, & seq.

(38) For mystery it is plain there is in every thing, somewhat, that is unaccountable. Ibid. pag. 101.

(39) Ibid. pag. 103, 104.

(40) Note, That the author who published a treatise of religion against the Atheists, Deists, and new Pyrrhonists, at Paris, in 1677, strongly praised the argument, That unbelievers cannot avoid in their principles believing things incomprehensible.

See chap. iii, iv, and v, of the second part.

(41) Some passages, &c. Ibid. pag. 106, 107.

(42) See, remark [C], of the article HORMAN (Daniel), and remark [K K], of the article LUTHER.

(43) See remark [K K], of the article LUTHER.

(44) See remark [E], of the article ARMINIUS.

THE third objection, is, that I ought not to have applied to the arguments of the Manichees, what might be acknowledged with respect to the arguments against the mysteries of the Gospel.

the Papists. The Ministers, says he (45), ought to be laughed at as fools, ' after the advances they have made, and the reserves they would keep to themselves. When they have granted us the more, can they refuse us the less? Having given us the mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation, they have reserved themselves nothing afterwards. By granting these two great strange and astonishing truths, they have given up the liberty of their mind; which liberty must either lie lost or preserved full and entire. The same authority which assures them of the certainty of the Apostles Creed, assures them of the validity of all the other parts of religion; and they have no better grounds for contesting the latter, than the former. The authority being infallible, it is universally infallible; it is equally infallible. The Christian being a captive to faith, and not a judge of doctrines, ought to obey the voice which speaks, without deliberating about the words, because the words would not persuade him, if the voice had not already done it. A man has no longer a right to his first freedom, after he has taken upon him the yoke of the commanding and victorious God. It is too late to make use of our reason, after we have submitted it to the obedience of faith. How ridiculous, I pray, would it be, one while to quit reason, and another to resume it; to make choice of some pleasing parts of Christianity, and to reject the displeasing ones; to be half Infidel, and half Believer! This would be making terms with Jesus Christ, and entering upon articles with the Church. It would be doing something worse, passing from complaisance to giving the lie, admitting part of what the popes to our belief, and maintaining the rest to be false.' Calvin might thus have defended himself against those who disliked his hypothesis of Predestination; he might have told them, You are preposterously squeamish, after having digested the difficulties of one God in three persons, and those of Transubstantiation. You will not hearken to Philosophical arguments on that head; you talk of nothing but the omnipotent power of God; you complain of our denying it, when we deny the preservation of accidents without a subject, and the presence of a body in different places: Why then do ye attack the mystery of Predestination by human arguments? Why do not ye believe that the power of God extends even to the reconciling the liberty of creatures with the necessity of his decrees, and his justice with the punishment of a sin necessarily committed?

Be it how it will, it cannot be denied that the introduction of moral evil, with the doctrines annexed to it, is one of the most impenetrable mysteries which God has revealed to men. I will cite some authors upon it.

I repeat not what may be read in another place of this work (46), viz. that a Protestant Divine publicly confesses that the hypothesis of St Austin and Calvin is to him an insupportable burden, and that he embraces it only because none of the other hypotheses are able to ease him. Calvin's words which I have cited (47) deserve a place here. Throughout his writings he constantly declares that wherever the question is about sin, the name of God ought not to be engaged in it, since nothing belongs to the nature of God but perfect justice and equity. It is therefore a base and horrible calumny to involve in this crime a man who has served the Church of God so well, as if he made God the author of sin. It is true he every where affirms, that nothing is done but by the will of God; and yet he maintains, that the wicked actions of men are so directed and governed by the secret judgment of God, that he has no communication with their vices. The sum of his doctrine is, that God directs all things, by means wonderful and unknown to us, to what end he pleases, so that his eternal will is the first cause of all things. And he confesses it to be an incomprehensible mystery, that God should will what to us appears unreasonable; and nevertheless he affirms, that we are not to enquire too curiously or audaciously into his conduct, since the judgments of God are a profound abyss, and that it is better to adore with all reverence the mysteries and secrets which exceed our capacity, than to scan them, or intrude too far into them (48). You see how he advises us not to approach this abyss, but with a spirit of submission and reverence for this great and incomprehensible mystery. Mr Morus being Minister and Professor of Divinity in the same city of Geneva as Calvin had been, vehemently declaimed against the reformed Divines who disputed about the universality of Grace. He had an eye to Amyraldus and Spanhemius. He gave them the same reprimand as is used to audacious writers, who have the boldness to dive into the most hidden secrets of the Creator. He puts them in mind of the weightiest maxims that are employed to recommend to us the sacrificing of our reason, and the captivating our understanding to the authority of God with respect to the most incomprehensible mysteries. His words have so much emphasis, that they cannot be translated without losing a great deal of their energy. I will therefore give the original. 'Quis non videat quæ de Trinitate, quam sibi soli notam vetus ait scriptor, deque decretis Dei, quorum non aliter constat ratio, quam si nemini reddatur, deque aliis ejusmodi, quæ nec licet scire, nec prodest, anxie disputantur, non tuto, sed frustra, disputari? Nemo cœleste mysterium discutiat ratione terrena, divina verba modis non pensemus humanis, inquit Chrysologus. Credere, quod iustum est, non est discutere permiffum, ait Ambrosius. Lauda, venerare, tuum est nescire, quod agitur, inquit Author de vocatione Gentium. Quæ Deus occulta esse voluit, non sunt scruta-

(45) Balzac, Socrate Chrétien, Discours viii, pag. m. 320, 47.

(46) See above, the article PAULICANS, citations (44), (45).

(47) See citat. (16), of the article SYMBOLISM.

(48) Calvin's brief answer to the calumnies of a certain pragmatic, attempting to defend the Doctrine of God's eternal predestination, pag. 107, of his Treatise, Geneva 1611.

‘tanda; quæ manifesta fecit, non sunt negligenda, ne & in illis illicite curiosi, & in his ‘damnabiliter inveniamur ingrati. Nos autem fastidimus aperta in scripturis, clausa, ‘& obfignata, in cœlis quærimus, nunquam visa perambulare, oculis quoque subducta ‘calcare pedibus, ἡμετέροις, Pauli vox agnoscitur, fatagimus ardeliones. Quare hi sic, ‘illi aliter, absit ut dicamus judicium esse luti, non figuli, quæ sunt Augustini verba, com‘pescat se humana temeritas, & quod non est, non quærat, ne id, quod est, non in‘veniat: ὅτι ἀκατάληπτον τὸ Θεῶν Damascenus aliique præscribunt. Quid æternis mi‘nore confiliis animum fatigas? Audi Tertullianum: Præstat, inquit, per Deum ‘nescire, quia ipse non revelaverit, quam per hominem scire, quia ipse præsumserit; ‘cedat curiositas fidei, cedat gloria salutis. Audi Scripturam: ARCANUM DEO, revelata ‘nobis, & filiis nostris. Moses Dei Vocem audivit; faciem non vidit; quia fide, non ‘visu, ambulamus, & cujus ferre Majestatem non possumus, à posteriori, ut loquuntur, ‘opera cum Mose lustramus. Deus absconditus habitat in caligine, inquit Rex Paci‘ficus; in luce, sed inaccessible, inquit cœlestis Apostolus. Hic subvectus in tertium ‘cœlum quæ visere potuit, non potuit enarrare: nos humi serpentes adhuc enarramus ‘velut conscii, quæ nunquam, ne per nebulam quidem, vidimus. Non constat sine ‘arcano Majestas, nubes Dei gloriam obumbrat, Arca oppanfo velo tegitur: nos in ‘horribile Dei Sacrarium emissitios oculos evibramus, & nondum bene initiati Epoptas ‘agimus. Ut ad ignem, Solemque, sic ad Deum accedamus, hætenus ut calore ‘foveamur, non voraci flamma, non radiis æstuantibus hauriamur (49). - - - - - As ‘for those disputes relating either to the Trinity, which an ancient author says that no body ‘knew except himself, or to the decrees of God, for which no man can presume to render a ‘reason, or other points of the like nature, which we are neither permitted nor concerned to ‘know, is it not obvious that these controversies are not only bold and dangerous, but also vain ‘and unprofitable. Let no man, says Chrysologus, examine a heavenly mystery by ‘earthly reason; neither let us weigh the word of God in the scale of human judgment.
 ‘What we are commanded to believe, let us believe, says Ambrosius, but we are not ‘permitted to sift and canvass matters of faith. Praise and adore the dispensations of ‘providence, it becomes you to be ignorant of the reasons of them, says the author of ‘the book on the calling of the Gentiles. We must neither pry into what God hath thought ‘fit to conceal from us, nor refuse our assent to the truths he hath been pleased to manifest and ‘reveal, lest in the former case we should be found sinfully curious, and in the latter, un‘grateful, even to our condemnation. Nevertheless, while we despise the truths revealed to ‘us in Scripture, we pry into the secrets of heaven, and would there discover what God hath ‘concealed, tread in paths unseen and unknown, intrude upon, and are busy after things the ‘most remote from our knowledge and discernment. From hence arises the great diversity of our ‘opinions, even in matters of the highest importance. Let us therefore check our rashness, ‘let us not seek after what is bidden, lest we should miss of what is revealed. Divine things ‘are to us incomprehensible, as Damascenus and others have written. Why shouldst thou ‘rack thy thoughts, and busy thyself about the eternal purposes of God, since they are beyond ‘thy reach? Hear the words of Tertullian. It is better for us not to know what God hath ‘concealed, because he has not revealed these things, than to know what man hath dis‘covered, because he is presumptuous; let our curiosity give place to our faith, and ‘our vanity to our salvation. Hear the words of the Scripture. THE MYSTERIES OF ‘GOD belong unto GOD, but the things which are revealed, to us and to our children.
 ‘Moses heard the voice of God, but did not see his face, because we walk by faith, and ‘not by sight, and of that God the glory of whose majesty we are not able to bear, we behold, ‘with Moses, the works, only as it were in their back parts. God being hidden dwelleth in ‘darkness, says Solomon; in light, but inaccessible, says St Paul. That Holy Apostle was ‘carried up to the third heavens, but what he beheld, he was not able to relate; whereas we ‘who are reptiles on this earth, pretend to relate what we never saw, no not through a cloud, ‘as if we were thoroughly acquainted with these secrets. Majesty never appears open or ‘exposed to our view, a cloud overshadows the divine glory, the ark is covered over with a ‘large vail. Yet we pierce with prying eyes into the tremendous mysteries of God, and before ‘we are well initiated, pretend to a thorough knowledge of them. Let us approach the divine ‘majesty, as we would the fire, or the sun, that we may be nourished by the heat, but not destroyed
 ‘by the devouring flames, and scorching beams of his glory.’ Very lately one of those who ‘succeeded Calvin in his chair, has in a most distinct manner acknowledged the incomprehen‘sibility of Predestination. I have not as yet had the pleasure of seeing his new system ‘of Divinity; but we find this account of it in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres:
 ‘He begins with a question extremely difficult, and which is a stumbling-block to ‘the profane and the weak; namely, why God has permitted sin, which is the cause ‘of such a number of evils, and which he might easily prevent? Mr Pictet does not ‘conceal the strength of the difficulty, but proposes it in its full force. They who ‘ventured to affirm that God knows not futurity, when it depends on the freewill of ‘intelligent creatures, easily disengage themselves from this difficulty, by saying God ‘has not prevented what he has not foreseen: But this is leaping into an abyss to avoid ‘a precipice; and it is still more difficult to conceive that God should not know ‘futurity, than it is to conceive he has not hindered sin, though he foresaw it. The ‘opinion of those who say God has permitted it to manifest his wisdom, or to exercise ‘his

(49) Alexander Morus, Oratione
 de Pace, pag.
 52, & seq. Edit.
 Amstel. 1648, in 12mo.

1697

AN EXPLANATION

his justice and mercy, seems more reasonable. And yet all this is not satisfactory; for, besides that it was not perhaps impossible for God to manifest his attributes otherwise, is it, for instance, a great sign of mercy, to permit a great evil which might be prevented, in order to have an occasion of remedying it? Mr Pictet sincerely confesses, that as the Scripture gives us no reason of God's conduct on this occasion, and sufficiently intimates that there are here depths impossible for us to sound, we ought not to attempt it (50).^{(50) Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, November 1701, pag. 493, 494, in the extract of the Christian Theology of Mr Pictet, Minister and Professor of Divinity at Geneva.}

Any man who can be reasonably offended at what I have said in the articles concerning Manicheism, may likewise be justly offended with this Professor of Geneva's doctrine, as orthodox as it is.

Let us add also the testimony of a Roman Catholic, that nothing may here be wanting. There are some shallow wits, who had rather condemn boldly what they do not understand in the holy Fathers of the Church, than humble themselves, as they did, under the weight of the difficulties that are found in the explication of the mysteries of our faith. For the justification of a sinner, and the sanctification of a Christian, is a mystery, and a great one. And because men do not look upon it as a mystery, they boldly attempt to remove all its difficulties, they frame systems which bring every thing to evidence and demonstration, if we believe the authors of them; and they imagine a Scientia media in God, invented at first by the Semi-Pelagians, and whereof Pope Clement VIII, who well understood this subject, was wont to say, as Lemos relates, that it was an human invention to accommodate all things in appearance. With those human inventions, which explain not the mysteries but by destroying them, and give not the mind satisfaction but by seducing it with the fallacious appearances of light and evidence. Let us receive with humility what the Scripture and tradition discover of them. Let us willingly be ignorant of what God will conceal from us. Let us stop where the Apostles and Doctors of the Church have stopped; and when we read St Austin, so far from insulting him as a writer who goes astray and leads his followers to the precipice of error, let us acknowledge it is not from his expressions the difficulties proceed, but from the subject itself, as he answers Julian (51).^{(51) St Augustin justifié de Calvinisme, pag. 179, 180. Il est une piece imprimée en 1686, sous le nom de l'abbé de Saint Pierre, et qui est de l'abbé de Saint Pierre de Champ.}

THE fourth objection is, that I have used a most shocking comparison.

Let us see whether they could be justly shocked at a certain comparison which I have mentioned (52). I know several people have complained of it, some because they were not used to controversial books, and others because they had not fresh ideas of what they had formerly read in such books. Whatever be the ground of the offence they have taken, it may be easily removed. We need only represent to them that the most usual method of the controversialists is what they call reductio ad absurdum, reducing their adversaries to an absurdity. They chiefly endeavour to make it appear that the necessary consequence of the opinion they refute, is that the conduct of God would be execrable, and they make no scruple of speaking very ill of the God of their adversaries, that is of God considered such as he would be in case the opinion in question was received. They boldly employ the most shocking comparisons. The Roman Catholics maintain that Calvin introduced a God who is deceitful, cruel, and inhumane, a God void of justice, reason, and goodness (53), less innocent and less a God, than the God of Epicurus (54). A God who hath two wills, one public, by which he declares that he is willing to save all mankind, and the other secret, by which he drives into impiety, all those whom he loves not, in order to find a pretext for punishing them (55); . . . an inhumane master, who commands his servants to do things impossible, and inflicts on them an eternal punishment, because they did not perform them, as the tyrant Caligula did (56). In fine, a God who like Caligula commands his laws to be written in so small a character that no body can read them (57). The Arminian Bertius, disputing with Piscator, charged him with making God hold such a conduct towards man, as was perfectly like that which Tiberius held towards Sejanus's daughters. He shewed this parallel (58) in two columns in one of which he set down what that Emperor did in order that Sejanus's daughters might not be strangled against the laws. He set down in the other what Piscator makes God do, in order that the Reprobate may not be punished against the usual forms. A reformed Divine makes use of a like battery against the Socinians. He maintains against them that their God is the greatest of all the monsters that ever entered the imagination (59); that Plato and Zeno would have disliked him (60); that he is a very ignorant and powerless God (61), full of imperfections (62), a fantome of a God defeated every moment by unforeseen events (63); a strange God little better than the God of Epicurus (64), and lives from hand to mouth (65).^{(52) See above, citat. (50), of the article PAULICIANI. (53) See Mr Duall, Réponse à Adam & à Cottin, Part. II, chap. 1, pag. 2. (54) Ibid. pag. 3. (55) Ibid. (56) Ibid. p. 4. (57) Ibid. pag. 11. (58) Mr Arminius Bertius, a Lutheran Divine has inserted this parallel, in his Memorabilia Ecclesiastica Seculi XVII, lib. II, pag. 385, 386. (59) See the Jugement sur les Méthodes d'expliquer la Grèce, pag. 20. (60) See the Tableau du Socinianisme, Livre I, p. 20. (61) Ibid. pag. 23. (62) Ibid. pag. 25. (63) Ibid. (64) Ibid. (65) Ibid.}

THE fifth objection is, that we ought not to own disadvantages.

Such being the custom of the controversialists, I had been a very bad Historian of the dispute concerning the origin of evil, and an unfaithful relater of the reasons on each side of the question; if I had not mentioned the comparison which has displeased certain persons. It is that of God with a mother who forcing that her daughter Ucé, and observe that I have shewn that this comparison may be retorted against the Socinians.

If there are any who are offended at my departing from the maxim, that we ought never to own to our adversaries that we cannot answer their objections; I shall not want a long apology, having but this short question to ask them: is it not a commendable able thing to act sincerely? If we are not obliged, are we not at least permitted to act thus? The answer must be in the affirmative. I may therefore, shall I reply, make use of this laudable liberty, especially when there is no decree of a synod or consistory to tie a man's hands in that respect. If any one can produce a doctrinal determination signed by four Professors of Divinity, and sealed with the seal of some university, which is no great demand; if any one, I say, can shew me such an act, importing that no orthodox man ought to own, not even when it is most true, that certain objections of the heterodox are unanswerable otherwise than by Scripture, I will engage to do every thing they will have me; for I am certain I shall never see such an act.

But for a more ample satisfaction of the most scrupulous readers, I am willing to declare here, that wherever it is said in my Dictionary that such and such arguments are unanswerable, I do not desire my readers should believe they are actually so; I mean no more than that they seem to me unanswerable. This has no ill consequence; every one may imagine, if he pleases, that I am of this opinion for want of due penetration. I wish they would add, that in conforming my self to the rules of sincerity rather than to the public maxims of the spirit of a party, I nevertheless consider that neither Heresy nor Heathenism can draw any advantage from the unanswerableness of their objections against mysteries (66).

The sixth objection is, that I have not confuted the Manichees.

The remaining difficulty will require a little longer examination. It is founded on my relating at large the objections of the Manichees, and not taking the trouble to produce the arguments which confute them. What follows will give satisfaction to all reasonable readers. Four reasons hindered me from insisting on the confutation of Manicheism.

(66) See what I answer to the first objection.

The first is, that considering the present disposition of men, there is no Heresy less to be feared than this. People cannot but abhor an hypothesis which admits an eternal and increased Being distinct from God, an enemy to God, and essentially wicked. And as for Free-thinkers, or in general all those who have cultivated the study of Metaphysics, and have any inclination to make a wrong use of it, they dislike nothing more than a multiplicity of principles. The depravity of their taste inclines them rather to be perfect Unitarians (67), than to declare for the Dualists (68).

In the second place, all Christians, however ignorant they be, so clearly include omnipotence and infinity in the idea of the Divine Nature, that they have no need of borrowed arms to fight the Manichees. This idea alone renders them strong enough in an offensive war; it affords them a solid confutation of that hypothesis: I therefore did not think it necessary to shew any of my readers how it was to be attacked.

(67) Thus for brevity sake we may call those who with the Spinosaists acknowledge but one substance in the universe: but note, that below I give that name to those who acknowledge but one first cause of all things.

Thirdly, the observation I made, and sufficiently enlarged upon in the remark [D] of the article MANICHEES, contains all that is necessary to make judicious persons averse to the doctrine of two principles. I said the reasonableness of a system consists in including nothing repugnant to evident ideas, and accounting for the phenomena. I added, that the system of the Manichees has at best but the advantage of explaining several phenomena, which strangely perplex the followers of the unity of a principle, but otherwise it stands on a supposition repugnant to our clearest ideas; whereas the other system is built upon those very notions. By this reflexion alone I give the superiority to the Unitarians, and I take it from the Dualists. For all rational persons will grant that a system is much more imperfect, when it wants the first of the two qualities I have mentioned, than when it wants only the second. If it be grounded upon an absurd, confused, improbable supposition, this imperfection is not made up by a lucky explication of the phenomena; but if it does not explain them all successfully, this is made up by the clearness, probability, and conformity, that is found in it with the laws and ideas of order; and they who have embraced it for this perfection, do not use to be discouraged under pretence that they cannot account for all matters of experience. They impute this defect to the narrowness of their minds, and imagine that in time, they shall be able to discover the true means of resolving the difficulties (69). A Cartesian Philosopher finding himself pressed with an objection concerning the reason given by Des Cartes of the ebbing and flowing of the sea, answered among other things, that an opinion ought not to be lightly abandoned, especially when it is well grounded in other respects. It was objected to Copernicus, when he proposed his system, that Mars and Venus should appear much greater at a certain time, because they came nearer the earth by several diameters. The consequence was necessary; and yet nothing of this appeared. Though he knew not what to answer, he did not think himself obliged to forsake it, but only said that time would discover it, and that perhaps it was by reason of the great distance. This answer was taken for an evasion, and there seemed to be some reason for it: But the telescopes having been since invented, it appeared that what was opposed to him as a great objection, is the confirmation of his system, and the overthrow of Ptolemy's (70).

(68) Thus the Persians call the followers of two principles. See ci-dessus (77); of the article ZOROASTRIER.

(69) Compare the article ZENO (of Elea) ci-dessus (61).

(70) Oudroy, Lettre à Mr de la Grange-Trianon, pour servir de Réponse à celle que Mr Castellet a écrite, pag. 13, 14. That letter was published at Paris in 1677.

Observe here by the by, a remarkable example of what I have said concerning the perfection of a system: that of Copernicus is so disentangled, so simple, and so mechanical, that it should be preferred before Ptolemy's, though it could not so well resolve some phenomena.

V O L. V.

9 Z

Lastly,

Lastly, my fourth reason is, that I pointed out so good and so certain a remedy, that it would have been needless to use any other expedient to compensate the disadvantage. The system of the Dualists accounts much better for several matters of fact than that of the Unitarians; but, on the other hand, it contains monstrous absurdities directly repugnant to the ideas of order. The Unitarian system has the perfection opposite to this defect, and therefore, all things duly considered, is preferable to the other. This might in some measure have been sufficient, but I further observed that the Unitarian system was consonant to scripture, and that of the Dualists invincibly confuted by the word of God. Can any one desire a stronger and more demonstrative proof, that the former system is true, and the latter false? Must I after this, in order to remove all scruples, philosophically confute Manicheism! Would not he have little faith, who should want such a discussion? God speaks, and does not this fully convince you? Would you have other securities? Would you have his testimony ratified by human reason (71)? Is not this unworthy of a man of common sense? Do you fear the objections of the Manichees, when you have the authority of Revelation against them?

Why do you not say with the Scripture, If God is with us, who shall be against us (72)? If your reason cannot answer the difficulties which they raise against you concerning the origin of evil, and the decrees of Reprobation, answer them as the lesser Catechism of the Reformed Churches answers this question concerning the Trinity, How is this possible? It is a mystery above our reason, and nevertheless very certain; FOR GOD HATH DECLARED IT TO US IN HIS WORD (73). Every Philosophic subtilty, that tends to deprive us of a divine truth, ought to pass with you for one of those attacks which St Paul would have us repel by taking the buckler of faith (74). Take it therefore, and you will be pretty well armed; remember likewise that by fearing lest this should prove but a weak defence you expose yourself to the railery which fell upon a Cardinal who pitied the Popes, when they had no other assistance but that of the Holy Ghost (75). Non ho potuto d'hora in hora non commostrarvi i Pontefici con venti fra loro contrarii e tutti infesti al corso di lei eccetta la paura dello Spirito Santo (76). - - - I could not help frequently pitying the sad case the Popes were in, when the course they steered was opposed by every wind except that of the Holy Ghost.

But let us have some regard to the men of little faith, and propose in this place some arguments against Manicheism.

Some arguments against Manicheism.

I will not attack it on its weak side; that is, I will not take advantage of the palpable absurdities the Manichees ran into when they came to particular explications of their doctrine. They are so wretched, that it would be a sufficient confusion of them, barely to relate them. We have seen a specimen of it above (77). Let us spare them as to the ridiculous part of their system, and only consider it in the greatest simplicity it can be reduced to.

I will not make use of this objection of Simplicius (78): the principle of good and the principle of evil would be contrary; but they could not be contrary without being under the same genus; therefore there would be something above them, and that thing would be but one, and have all the essence of a principle: that thing therefore would be properly a principle, and consequently there would not be two first principles; and thus the supposition of two contrary principles implies a contradiction. This is more subtle than solid; for genus's and species exist only in our understanding; and therefore the genus including the two contrary principles, would be at most but an idea of our mind, as the general idea of Being, which, according to some Christian Philosophers, is univocal to God and the creatures (79).

Simplicius's other arguments are much more solid (80). He shews to those who admit two principles, one good, and the other evil, that their opinion is highly injurious to the God whom they call good; that it takes from him at least half his power, and makes him timorous, unjust, imprudent, and ignorant. The fear, said they, he was under of an irruption from his enemy, obliged him to forsake part of the souls, in order to save the rest. These souls were portions and members of his substance, and had committed no sin. Simplicius concludes from thence, that such a treatment was unjust, especially since they were to be tormented, and in case they contracted any guilt, they were to remain eternally in the power of evil. So that the good principle not knowing how to manage his interest, exposed himself to an eternal and irreparable mutilation. Add to this, that his fears were ill-grounded; for since the dominions of evil were from all eternity, and by their own nature, separate from the dominions of good, there was no reason to fear that evil should make an inroad upon the territories of its enemy. Simplicius taxes his adversaries with giving less foresight and power to the good principle than to the evil. The good principle did not foresee the misfortune of the detachments he exposed to the enemy's assaults (81), but the evil principle had very well known what detachments would be made against him, and had prepared the necessary engines to defeat them. The good principle was simple enough to suffer a mutilation, rather than receive into his districts the detachments of the enemy, who by that means would have lost part of his members. The evil principle had always been superior (82); had

(71) See remark [E], of the article PRASOT (Nicolas).

(72) Roman vii. 31.

(73) Petit Catechisme, §. ii.

(74) Ephes. vi. 16.

(75) If the Popes, who have none but God with them, are pitied by Cardinal Pallevine a Jesuit, and appear in the same pitiful condition to other men, how could they convert the Mahometans?

(76) They must therefore have some other assistance, besides that of the Holy Ghost, in order to bring about such conversions, and truly a Pope, who had no other assistance, would be in a very pitiful case. Etienne nouveau du Cardinal Pallevine, ch. iv. Art. 1, pag. 143, Dictionnaire.

(77) Pallav. Hist. del Concilio di Trento, lib. vi. cap. xiii.

(78) I translate this word as I find them in the Evangelic novum, chap. iv. Art. 1, pag. 143.

(79) In the remark [B], of the article MA- NICHISM, and in the remark [F], of the article ZOROASTER. See also the remark [E], of this last article.

(80) Simplic. in Epistola Enchirid. cap. xxxviii. pag. 163. Edit. Lugd. Bat. 1640.

(81) See the article ANNALETT (Anthony) De: the Sakers, remark [B].

(82) Id. ibid. pag. 163.

(83) Id. ibid. pag. 166.

(84) Necesse est appere, ut in ista res non habuerit, ut non esset, ut non esset.

had lost nothing, and preserved the conquests which he had made; but the good principle voluntarily had given up many things out of fear, injustice, and imprudence. The author concludes, that by refusing to acknowledge that God is the author of evil, they make him evil all manner of ways. Τὸ δὲ ἀγαθὸν, ὡς ἔτοι φασιν, ἐκείνους ἐαυτὸ τῷ κακῷ συνείμιξε, καὶ δολῶς καὶ ἀδίκως καὶ ἀνόμως κατ' αὐτὸς, μέχρι νῦν διαγίνεται. ἔσε φεύγοντες αἰτίον αὐτὸν τῷ κακῷ εἰπεῖν, πάγκαλον ὑπογράφουσιν καὶ κατὰ τὴν παρὰ τὴν φύσιν τὸν κακὸν, εἰς αὐτὸ ἐμπεπτώκασι. Cum BONUM ultro sese cum MALO commiscuerit, seque et timide, et injuste, et amenter (si illis credimus) gesserit. Itaque dum mali causam dicere Deum recusant, ab omni parte malum describunt: et ut proverbio dicitur, fumum fugientes in ignem inciderunt (83).

(83) Id. ibid. pag. 168.

I omit several other observations of Simplicius, against the hypothesis of two principles, because they attack those parts of it, which were weak only through the particular defects in the arbitrary explications of those who defended it. There is something of this in his objections which I have abridged; but I will produce one that strikes home the doctrine of two principles, though it be considered with the greatest simplicity.

He says (84), it entirely destroys the liberty of our souls, and necessitates them to sin, and consequently implies a contradiction; for since the principle of evil is eternal and incorruptible, and so potent that God himself cannot conquer it, it follows that the soul of man cannot resist the impulse with which that principle moves it to sin. But if a man be invincibly driven to it, he commits no murder, no adultery, &c. by his fault, but by a superior external force, and in that case he is neither guilty nor punishable. Therefore there is no such thing as sin, and consequently this hypothesis destroys itself, since, if there be a principle of evil, there is no longer any evil in the world: but if there be no evil in the world, it is evident there is no principle of evil; whence we may infer, that they who suppose such a principle, destroy, by a necessary consequence, both evil and the principle of evil. Εἰ δὲ τῶν ὡς κακῶν οὐτὼν τὴν αἰτίαν ζητῶντες, ἀρχὴν ὑπένεικτο κακῷ ἐκείνους δὲ ὑποσείδουσιν καὶ διαζομένους ἐκ ἑσιν ὁδὸν ἐπὶ κακῶν χαλάντας αὐτοῖς ἐ λόγῳ συνετέλεσται. συνάγεται γὰρ, ὅτι εἰ ἔστιν ἀρχὴ τῷ κακῷ, ἐκ ἑσιν κακὸν ὅλος· εἰ δὲ μὴ ἔστι κακὸν, ὁδὸν ἀρχὴν ἂν εἴη τῷ κακῷ, ἔσε εἰ ἔστιν ἀρχὴ τῷ κακῷ, ὡς φασιν, ἔσε κακὸν ἔσται, ἔσε ἀρχὴ τῷ κακῷ. Quod si talium facinorum ut malorum causam inquirentes, MALI principium statuerunt; eoque statuto, et quidem vim inferente, malum nullum relinquitur: festiva suo ipsi (quod ajunt) gladio jugulantur. Nam inde colligitur: si MALI principium sit, nullum omnino esse malum. Si vero malum non est, ne principium quidem MALI esse. Itaque si est principium mali ut ajunt, nec malum erit nec mali principium (85).

(84) Id. ibid. pag. 169.

(85) Id. ibid.

This objection is no less solid than subtle. It may be strengthened by that which I have proposed in another place (86), viz. That the doctrine of the Manichees is destructive of all religions, since if they argue consequentially, they can hope for nothing from their prayers, nor fear any thing from their impiety. They must be persuaded, that whatever they do, the good principle will be always propitious to them, and the evil one always adverse: one of them can do nothing but good, and the other can do nothing but evil. They are determined to this by their nature, and they pursue this bent to the utmost extent of their power.

(86) In the remark [G], of the article PAULICIANS, at the end.

The argument I am going to make seems to me very strong. The best way we can take in Philosophical discussions, is to consult the ideas of order. If we consult them in the present dispute, we shall plainly see that unity, and infinite power, and happiness, belong to the maker of the world. The necessity of nature required that there should be causes of all effects; and therefore a power sufficient for the production of the world must have necessarily existed. Now it is much more consonant to order, that this power should be united in one subject, than divided into two or three, or an hundred thousand. Let us therefore conclude, that it has not been divided, and that it resides entire in one sole nature, and that therefore there are not two first principles, but one only. There would be as much reason to admit an infinity of them, as the Atomists did, as to admit only two.

If it be contrary to order, that the power of nature should be divided into two subjects, generally speaking; it would be much more strange, if those two subjects were enemies, and diametrically opposite: Nothing but all manner of confusion would arise from it: What one would do, the other would undo; and so either nothing would be done, or if any thing was done, it would be an odd and disorderly work, and very far from the regularity of this universe. Thus you see Manicheism refuted by a very strong argument. If the Manichees had admitted two principles acting in concert in all things, they had been exposed to lesser difficulties.

Such a system would have nevertheless been contrary to the idea of order, with respect to the maxim, that beings ought not to be multiplied without necessity (87); for if there are two first principles, either they have each all the power necessary to the production of the universe, or they have it not. If they have, one of them is superfluous: If they have not, that power was vainly divided, and it had been better to unite it in one subject; it would have been more active, virtus unita fortius agit say they in the Peripatetic schools. Besides, it is not easy to conceive how a cause that is self-existing, can have but a portion of power. Who could have confined that that to such or such a portion? It depends upon nothing, but stands upon its own bottom.

(87) Non sunt multiplicanda entia sine necessitate.

Rabbi Maimonides seems to me too nice, when he rejects the five proofs of the unity of God, made use of by the Philosophers of the sect of the Speakers, and when he praises one of these Philosophers, who finding himself perplexed by the weakness of those proofs, said that the unity of God was not known or could not be proved, but by Revelation supported by Tradition. Hæc argumentorum istorum debilitas sic defatigavit & exercuit nonnullos, ut quidam illorum dixerit, Unitatem Dei haberi ex lege per Cabbalam; sed à reliquis ludibrio tantum fuit habitus & non nisi fannis exceptus. Mihi autem videtur, Virum illum fuisse fani admodum ingenii ac judicii. Nam cum nihil solidum & demonstrativum in ipsorum rationibus vidisset, in quo animus ipsius acquiescere potuisset, dixit, per Cabbalam sive Traditionem hoc haberi ex lege (88).

The weakness of these arguments in proof of the unity of God, so much perplexed certain Philosophers, that one of them said that it could only be proved by Revelation supported by Tradition. But this Philosopher was laughed at, and his opinion despised by the others. Nevertheless he seems to me to be a man of good understanding and sound judgment. For he found nothing solid and demonstrative in their arguments, nothing wherein his mind could acquiesce, and therefore asserted that the unity of God was known no otherwise than by Revelation supported by Tradition. The fourth of those five arguments was this: either one God was sufficient for the production of the world, or was not. If one sufficed, another God would have been needless; and if he wanted the assistance of another God, each of them wanted the necessary power; but there can lie no imperfection in the Deity. Maimonides answers, that though one God alone had not been able to frame the structure of this world, there would be no just reason to call him impotent, or insufficient, since none ought to be called so because he cannot do what exceeds his nature. It is no impotency in God not to be able give himself a body, or to make a square whose side should be equal to the diagonal line. This hinders not God from being omnipotent; the natural impossibility of some things does no prejudice to the omnipotence of God. If therefore it be asserted that it is naturally impossible for one only God to create the world, the want of two Deities to create it will be no sign of imperfection or defect in either of them. Sicut non est attribuenda Deo Impotentia, quia non potest seipsum corporeum facere, vel alium sibi similem creare, aut quia nequit creare quadratum, cujus latus æquale sit diametro: sic illi, qui duos Deos statuunt, possunt dicere, non esse illis Omnipotentiam derogandam idèd, quia nullus illorum solus creat; eò quòd necessitas existentie ipsorum requirat, ut sint duo. Hoc verò non esse ex indigentia, quæ unus alterius ope indigeret, sed ex necessitate, contrariumque esse impossibile. Et sicut non idèd dici potest, Deum non esse omnipotentem, nulloque modo Indigentie, Impotentie, vel Insufficientie titulo appellandum, quòd non possit existere facere corpus aliquod, nisi creet Substantias individuas, illasque per Accidentia, quæ itidem creat, conjungat, ut illi Loquentes asserunt; quia scilicet, ut aliter fiat, est impossibile. Sic, qui duos Deos statuit, dicere potest, impossibile esse, ut unus solus faciat omnia, nec tamen Imperfectioni ipsius hoc adscribendum esse, quia illa talis sit, ut duo simul & una sint & operentur (89).

It might be shewn that these are meer cavils; but to avoid too long discussions, I am contented to say that the Manichees cannot use this subterfuge; for if any power ought to be essentially contained in the nature of God, it is that of doing what he most earnestly desires. The idea of God includes no attribute more clearly and evidently than that of happiness (90). If therefore any want of power is capable of making God unhappy, we must say that it is essential to the nature of God to be without this want; but he must necessarily be subject to it, if the opinion of the Manichees was true: therefore their system is utterly false.

Such is the nature, say they, of the good principle, that he can produce nothing but good, and with his whole might he opposes the introduction of evil. He wills therefore, and most ardently desires, that there be no evil: It is therefore a great sorrow to him that there is evil in the universe. He has done all that he could to prevent this disorder; if therefore he wanted a necessary power to prevent it, his most earnest desires have been in vain, and consequently he is destitute of the power which was the most necessary to his happiness; therefore he has not the power which is the most necessary to the nature of his being. But can any thing be more absurd than this? Is not this an hypothesis which implies a contradiction?

The two principles of the Manichees would be the most unhappy of all beings; for the good principle could not cast his eyes upon the world, but he would see a dreadful multitude of all kinds of evils: nor could the evil principle view it without seeing a great deal of good. The sight of evil would afflict the one, and the sight of good the other. This would not be a sight interrupted sometimes, but continual, and without the least intermission. The most unfortunate men have not so severe a fate; they successively pass from sorrow to joy, and at last death secures them from the miseries of this life. But the two principles of the Manichees are eternal, they can see no end or interruption of those unpleasant objects, which disturb them to the highest degree.

All

CONCERNING THE MANICHEES.

829

All that the Manichees could suppose, concerning the first introduction of evil, and its first combination with good in the heart of man, was liable to a thousand difficulties. Their own weapons turned against them: they could not bear the Hypothesis, that evil proceeded from the ill use of free-will. God, said they, who is infinitely good, would not have suffered his creatures to degenerate from their original goodness; and yet they did not own them to be incorruptible in a moral sense. We have seen that Simplicius objected to them, that the souls the ill principle had seized on, and which were portions of the good principle, became evil, and lived eternally in corruption and misery, under the empire of the conqueror. But here follows something worse. We know by experience, that the same numerical soul sins and does good actions. When a man repents and implores the mercy of God, and makes amends for his ill life by alms, &c. this is not done by two substances, but by one and the same subject; we know it by our inward consciousness (91), and reason will have it so: for why should a man afflict himself for, and repent of, a fault which he had not committed? I ask the Manichees, whether the soul which does a good action, was created by the good principle or by the evil? If it was created by the evil principle, it follows that good may arise from the fountain of all evil: If it was created by the good principle, it follows that evil may arise from the fountain of all good (92), because the same soul, on other occasions, commits crimes. Thus you see yourselves reduced to overthrow your own reasonings, or to maintain against the internal and evident sense of every man, that the soul which does a good action, is not the same which does a bad one.

(91) See the article ROMANUS, remark [K], towards the beginning.

(92) That is, by the ill use of free-will bestowed upon men by the good principle.

To extricate themselves from this difficulty it would be necessary for them to suppose three first principles; one essentially good, and the cause of all good; another essentially evil, and the cause of all evil; and a third essentially susceptible of good and evil, and merely passive. Then they should say; that the human soul is made up of this third principle, and does sometimes a good action and sometimes a bad one, according to the influence it receives from the good and evil principle.

This conclusion of this explanation.

They who will attentively consider what I have alledged in this explanation, will, I presume, be no longer offended with what I said in the article PAULICIANS, &c; they will see that this article and those wherein the same matter is treated, may be read without scandal, and even with edification, provided they well remember,

- I. That it is the property of the mysteries of the gospel, to be liable to objections which cannot be cleared by natural light.
- II. That the unbelievers cannot justly draw any advantage from this, viz. That the maxims of Philosophy do not afford solutions to the difficulties which they raise against the mysteries of the gospel.
- III. That the objections of the Manichees, concerning the origin of evil and Predestination, ought not to be considered in general as impugning Predestination, but with this particular regard, that the origin of evil, the decrees of God concerning it, and the rest, are one of the most inconceivable mysteries of Christianity.
- IV. That it ought to satisfy every good Christian, that his faith is founded on the testimony of the word of God.
- V. That the system of the Manichees considered in it self is absurd and indefensible, and contrary to the ideas of order; that it is liable to retortions, and cannot remove difficulties.
- VI. That in all events no body can be offended at my concessions, unless he looks upon the doctrine of the most orthodox Divines as scandalous, since all that I have said is a natural and unavoidable consequence of their doctrine; and I have only related more at large what they teach more compendiously.

Some perhaps will think my confutation of Manicheism imperfect, because I answer not the objections I have set forth, as coming from the Manichees. I desire those who may start this objection to remember, that as for evident answers drawn from natural light, I know none; and as for the answers which the Scripture affords, they may be found in a great many controversial books.

They who ask of what use are the discussions that have offended them, will see my answer in the third explanation.

VOL. V.

10 A

EXPLANATION.

EXPLANATION III.

That what has been said of Scepticism in this Dictionary, cannot prejudice religion.

I. FIRST I lay down, as the basis of this third explanation, this certain and undoubted maxim: That Christianity is of a supernatural order, and centres in the supreme authority of God proposing mysteries to us, not that we may comprehend them, but that we may believe them with all the humility that is due to the infinite being, who can neither deceive nor be deceived. This is the test, the polar star, of all the discussions and disputes concerning the articles of the religion, which God has revealed by Jesus Christ.

Hence necessarily results the incompetency of the tribunal of Philosophy to judge of controversies among the Christians, since they ought only to be carried to the tribunal of Revelation.

Any dispute concerning the matter of right, or the reasonableness of the thing, ought immediately to be rejected. No man ought to be admitted to examine, whether we ought to believe what God commands to be believed. It ought to be reckoned a first principle in point of religion. It is the part of the Metaphysicians to examine, whether there be a God, and whether he be infallible (1); but Christians, as Christians, ought to suppose it as a thing already determined.

The question then is only about a matter of fact; viz. Whether God requires our belief of this or that thing? Two sorts of people may doubt of it; they who do not believe the scripture to be of divine inspiration, and they who do not think the sense of the Revelation to be such as is put upon it by this or that sect.

The only dispute therefore that Christians can enter upon with Philosophers, is on this matter of fact; Whether the Scripture was written by inspired authors? If the arguments the Christians alledge on this subject, do not convince the Philosophers, they ought to break off the dispute; for it would be to no purpose to enter into the particular discussion of the Trinity, &c. with people who disown the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, the sole and only way to judge who is in the right, or wrong in such controversies. Revealed authority ought to be the common principle of disputants hereupon, and therefore there is no disputing when one denies this principle, and the other admits of it. Adversus negantem principia non est disputandum.

If they who deny it, persist to clamour and dispute, they ought to be coldly answered, you depart from the question, Non feritis istem, non probatis negatum; and if they laugh at this answer, their laughing ought to be despised and pitied.

THE character of the Sceptics.

II. But of all the Philosophers who ought not to be allowed to dispute concerning the mysteries of Christianity, before they have admitted Revelation for a rule, there are none so unworthy of being heard as the followers of Pyrrho; for they make profession of admitting no certain marks of distinction between truth and falsehood; so that if truth, by chance, appeared to them, they could never be sure that it was truth. They not only attack the testimony of the senses, the maxims of Morality, the rules of Logic, the axioms of Metaphysics, but endeavour to overthrow the demonstrations of Geometry, and the most evident principles of the Mathematicians. If they went no farther than the ten reasons for suspending our assent, and only used them against Natural Philosophy, we might still treat with them; but they will go much farther: they have a sort of arms they call the diallel (2), which they lay hold of on the first occasion; and afterwards there is no withstanding them in any subject whatever. It is a labyrinth, from which no clue of Ariadne can wind one out. They lose themselves in their own subtilties, and are wonderfully pleased with it, since this serves to shew more clearly the universality of their hypothesis, that every thing is uncertain, from which they except not even the arguments against uncertainty. They proceed so far in their method, that they who have well considered the consequences of it, are forced to say, that they know not whether any thing exists (3).

Divines ought not to be ashamed to confess, that they cannot enter the lists with such disputants, and that they will not expose the gospel-truths to such an encounter. The vessel of JESUS CHRIST is not made to float upon that tempestuous sea, but to ride secure from this tempest in the haven of faith. It has pleased the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, must Christians say, to lead us by the way of faith, and not of science, or disputation. They are our instructors and directors, we cannot err having such guides, and reason itself commands us to prefer them before its own direction.

But is it not a scandalous thing, will some say, that I have related the conversation of an Abbot, who owns that Scepticism finds several arguments in the doctrines of Christianity, which render it more formidable than it was? I answer, that this can offend none but such as have not examined the character of Christianity. It would be a false notion

(1) See remark
[L], of the second article
MALDONAT.

(2) See Sextus
Empiricus, Pyrrho.
Hypotyphlos, lib. i. cap. xvi.
& lib. ii. cap. xvi.

(3) See what Sextus Empiricus, adv. Math.
lib. vii. relates of Gorgias Leontinus, and remark
[E], of the article Zeno of Elea.

CONCERNING THE SCEPTICS.

831

notion to imagine, that JESUS CHRIST had any design to countenance, either directly or indirectly, some of the sects of Philosophers in the disputes they had against the rest. His design was rather to confound all Philosophy, and to shew the vanity of it. He was willing that his gospel should clash not only with the religion of the Heathens, but with the aphorisms of their wisdom; and that notwithstanding this opposition betwixt his principles and those of the world, his doctrine should triumph over the Gentiles, by the ministry of a few illiterate men, who had neither Eloquence nor Logic, nor any of the instruments necessary to all other revolutions. He would have his disciples, and the wise men of this world, to be so diametrically opposite, that they should mutually call one another fools: he designed, that as his gospel appeared folly to the Philosophers, their science should in its turn appear folly to the Christians. Consider well these words of St Paul: 'For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach * the gospel: not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect. For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish, foolishness: but unto us which are saved, it is the power † of God. For it is written ‡, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent §. Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For after that, in the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of † preaching to save them that believe. For the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom: but we preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks, foolishness; but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ, the power of God, and the wisdom of God. Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men. For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called. But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world, to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world, to confound the things which are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are: that no flesh should glory in his presence. But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us  wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: that, according as it is written ††, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord (4). And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of †† speech, or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God ††. For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. And I was with you †† in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling. And my speech, and my preaching was not with enticing words of mans wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit *, and of power: that your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect: yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to nought. But we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom which God ordained before the world unto our glory. Which none of the princes of this world knew: for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. But as it is written †; Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, † neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For what man knoweth the things of man, save the Spirit of man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. Now we have received, not the Spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God? that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God. Which things also we speak, not in the words which mans wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth †; comparing spiritual things with spiritual. But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned (5).'

III. Do you think, that if the Apostles had been told that their doctrine exposed the dogmatizing Philosophers to new attacks from the Sceptics, they would have been concerned at it? They would have said, Let us not trouble our selves with their disputes; Let the dead bury the dead; the more they contend and disable one another, the more they will discover the vanity of their pretended science. Neither the Dogmatists nor the Sceptics will ever be able to enter into the kingdom of God, unless they become little children, unless they change their maxims, renounce their wisdom, and make a burnt-offering of their vain systems at the foot of the cross to the pretended folly of our preaching. This is the old man they must chiefly put off, before they can be qualified to receive the heavenly gift, and to enter into the way of faith appointed by God for eternal Salvation. If the Sceptics make an ill use of our mysteries to root themselves deeper in uncertainty, and if they object against us arguments ad hominem, so much the worse for them, unless God make use of their errors to make them see the necessity of submitting to his word. This is what St Paul and his fellow Apostles would have answered to such objections. We ought to be fully persuaded, that if there had been been occasion to give their decision upon the nature of the Heathen Philosophy with respect to the difficulty or readiness of embracing the gospel; they would have positively determined, that the method, principles, practices, and disputes of the Peripatetics, Academics, &c. were so great an obstacle to faith, that the most necessary preliminaries to enter into the kingdom of God, were to forget or lay aside all this train of a false science (6). I believe they would have made such a determination both for the present and the time to come.

AN EXPLANATION

I have cited an author who seems to believe that the subtleties of the schools of Philosophy, may upon favourable occasions serve to propagate the true faith. It may be, says he (7), that these subtle doctors were necessary to the world; I mean the curious, disputing, and contradicting world. Perhaps they entered into the design of the providence of God, for the accomplishment of his Son's kingdom; for the last perfection of the economy of his Church. You know that the Son of God sent several Apostles to several nations; you know that all the missions he ordained, were not made at the same time, and by the twelve first Apostles. He never wanted, and will never want such Ambassadors. He has always messengers ready to receive his orders, to execute his commands, to set out for his service. We ought not to doubt that he has more than one St Peter, and St Paul. He has also more than one St Thomas. How do we know but that he has sent the St Thomas of the latter times to the successors of Aristotle, to treat them according to their own humour, and to convert them in their way, in order to gain them by their own syllogisms and Logic? How do we know but St Thomas of the schools has been chosen to be the Apostle of the Peripatetic nation, which was not yet well conquered and subdued? a presumptuous and mutinous nation, which has so little regard to authority, which goes always upon reason, which continually demands why things are so and so, which is so restless, such an enemy to peace, and so fond of innovations? Methinks this last mission has not been useless, and there is some probability in what I say. If there is no irony in this discourse; if it be all in a serious strain, it is

A splendid nothing dress'd in lofty words.

All men in all ages have required and will require, that the knowledge of revealed truths should be searched after by other methods than those of Philosophy. Philosophy does not cure a floating mind, which must be cured, if we desire to obtain true wisdom by our prayers. Let us here give the authority of an Apostle. If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God that gives to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith nothing wavering, for he that wavereth, is like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind and tossed; for let not that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord (8). Judge whether the Sceptics, who are always so much the more pleased, as the efforts they make to invent reasons for doubting of every thing, have furnished them with specious objections against certainty, are capable of receiving the grace of God by the way of disputation. The modern missionaries of the Gospel, ought to treat them as the first would have done; they ought to advise them to lay aside all disputes and contentions, and to believe God upon his word; and if they prove untractable, they ought particularly to remember this precept of St Paul; and apply it to those men, Avoid foolish questions and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law, for they are unprofitable and vain. A man that is an Heretic after the first and second admonition, reject (9). It would be fine work to see our Thomists and Sco-

Mary (10).

We may affirm at this day, just as in Lactantius's time, that true religion ought to be enquired after by applying to the pretended and seeming foolishness under which God has been pleased to hide the treasures of his wisdom (11). 'Quid putemus fuisse causæ, cur tot ingeniis, totque temporibus summo studio, & labore quæsitæ (sapientia) non reperiretur; nisi quod eam philosophi extra fines suos quæsierunt? Qui quoniam peragratis, & exploratis omnibus, nusquam nullam sapientiam comprehenderunt; & alicubi esse illam necesse est: apparet, illic potissimum esse quærendam, ubi STULTITIAE titulus apparet; cujus velamento Deus, ne arcanum summi sui divini operis in propatulo esset, thesaurum sapientia, ac veritatis abscondit (12). - - - What is the reason why wisdom, which has been so frequently sought after by so many men of parts, with the greatest application and labour, has never been found; unless that the Philosophers have sought after wisdom where she is not. Now since these Philosophers who have examined and explored all things, have found wisdom no where, and since she must necessarily be somewhere, it is evident that she must be sought after chiefly where there appear the characters of FOOLISHNESS, under the cover of which, God, left the mysteries of his

(6) These words in St John's Gospel, chap. iii, ver. 3. Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God, are chiefly true with respect to Philosophers: they want to be born again more than other men: they want one regeneration as men, and another as Philosophers.

(7) Balzac, Socratic Christian, Discours v, pag. m. 71, & seq.

(8) 1 Tim. i. 5.

(9) Tit. iii. 9.

(10) How shall this be, says I know not a man. And the angel answered, and said unto her, the Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee. Luke i. 34-35.

(11) This ought to be understood with respect to Infidels.

(12) Lactant. lib. vi, cap. 10, pag. m. 218.

Divine

CONCERNING THE SCEPTICS.

833

'Divine works should be divulged, hath bid the treasures of wisdom and truth.' The same Lactantius has judiciously observed in another place, that it becomes the supreme majesty of God to speak with authority, and to say in a few words, this is true, and not to argue and add proofs to his decisions. 'Quæ (divina) quidem tradita sunt breviter, ac nude; nec enim decebat aliter: ut cum Deus ad hominem loqueretur, argumentis assereret suas voces, tanquam fides ei non haberetur: sed, ut oportuit, est locutus, quasi rerum omnium maximus iudex; cujus est non argumentari, sed pronuntiare verum (13). - - - Divine truths are declared in a few words, and without being supported by reasonings. Nor was it fit that God, when he speaks to men should support his words by arguments, as if he ought not to be believed without proofs: but God hath spoken, as it became him, like the sovereign judge of all things, who is not to argue, but to pronounce the truth.' If Seneca said that there is nothing more insipid than a law with a preamble, and that a law should not dispute, but command; if he said this of human laws, much more ought it to be said of the law of God? 'Non probo, quod Platonis legibus adjecta principia sunt. Legem enim brevem esse oportet, quò facilius, ab imperitis teneatur, velut emissâ divinitus vox sit. Jubeat, non disputet. Nihil videtur mihi frigidius, nihil ineptius, quàm lex cum prologo. Mone, dic quid me velis fecisse: non disco, sed pareo (14). - - - That reasons are annexed to the laws of Plato, is what I do not approve: for a law ought to be comprized in a very few words, that men of the meanest capacity may be better comprehend it, and consider it as a voice from heaven. Let it command, and not dispute. Nothing seems to me more insipid, nor more foolish, than a law with a preamble. Warn me, tell me what you command me to do, and I do not learn of you, but obey.'

From all that has been said, it is easy to conclude, that we cannot be alarmed with the objections of the Sceptics, without discovering the weakness of our faith, and taking things in a wrong sense, which ought to be taken in a right one.

IV. A true Believer, a Christian who well understands the spirit of his religion, does not expect to see it agree with the aphorisms of the Lyceum, nor to find it able by the mere strength of reason, to confute the difficulties of reason. He well knows that natural things have no proportion to the supernatural; and that if a Philosopher was desired to level and adjust the mysteries of the Gospel with the Aristotelian axioms, it would be requiring of him what is inconsistent with the nature of things. You must necessarily make an option betwixt Philosophy and the Gospel: if you will believe nothing but what is evident and agreeable to common notions, choose Philosophy, and leave Christianity: if you will believe the incomprehensible mysteries of religion, take Christianity and leave Philosophy; for to enjoy at the same time evidence and incomprehensibility, is a thing impossible; the conjunction of these two things is no less impossible than the conjunction of the properties of a square, and of a circle. You must necessarily make an option between them: if the conveniences of a round table do not satisfy you, make a square one, and do not pretend that the same table should furnish you with the conveniences both of a round and of a square table. Once more, a true Christian well instructed in the character of supernatural truths, and well grounded in the principles peculiar to the Gospel, will laugh at the subtilties of Philosophers, and especially of the Sceptics. Faith will place him above the regions, wherein the storms of disputation rage. He will find himself in a post, from whence, being calm and undisturbed, he can hear the thunder of argumentations and distinctions roar below him. A post, that will prove the true Olympus of the Poets (15); and the true temple of the sages (16), from whence he will see in a perfect tranquillity the weakness of reason, and the errors of men who have no other guide. Every Christian who suffers himself to be startled and offended with the objections of unbelievers, is in the same lamentable condition as they are.

V. What I am going to say, may teach us how important it is to know the true use of things. Several people have asked, to what purpose I have set forth many Sceptical and Manichean objections? They might have found the answer to this question, if they had looked for it in my Dictionary, where it is to be seen in an hundred places, and particularly in the remark [C], of the article PYRRHO (17). But since they would not, or did not attend to it, let us here examine their objection more at large. I think they could not much complain, if I should only ask them, to what purpose are so many particulars we find in Historians? Is it not certain that Historians relate several things, whose only use consists in pleasing the readers, and which may be hurtful in the hands of those who abuse the best things? Does this free an Historian from the obligation he is under, of relating the truth with all possible exactness? Must not therefore an Historian of opinions exactly and fully shew the strong and weak sides of them, tho' it should accidentally occasion some disturbance, and tho' no other good should proceed from it, but the amusement of the reader, and an example of the regard that is due to the laws of History? But this is neither the sole nor the principal answer I am to give.

Nothing is more necessary than faith, and nothing more important than to know well the worth of this Theological virtue. But is any thing more proper to acquaint

VOL. V. No. CXLIII.

10 B

us

An answer to those who ask what need was there to recite the objections, which the mysteries of the Gospel may afford the Sceptics.

(13) Id. lib. ii. cap. i, pag. 140.

(14) Seneca, Epist. xciv, pag. m. 388.

(15) Ut altus Olympi Vertex, qui spatia ventos hincque relinquit, Perpetuum nulla temeratus nube serenum, Celsior exurgit pluvias audisque ruentes Sub pedibus nimbor, & rauca tonitrua calcant. Claudian, de Mall. Theod. Consul. v. 206, pag. m. 6.

(16) Nil dulcius est, bene quam munita tenere Editâ doctrina Sapientum templa ferena; Despicere unde quævis aliorum, passimque videre Errare, atque vitæ palanteis querere vitæ. Lucræ. lib. ii, ver. 7. But above all, 'tis pleasantest to sit The top of high Philosophy, and see On the calm, peaceful, flourishing head of it; Whence we may view a deep, wondrous deep below, How poor mortals flounder mortals wandring on, Seeking the path to happiness. CREECH.

(17) See also the remark [G], in the article of ZENO of Elea, at the end.

us with it, than meditating on the attribute which distinguishes it from the other acts of the understanding? Its essence consists in imprinting in us a strong persuasion of revealed truths, by the sole motive of God's authority. They who by philosophical reasons believe the immortality of the soul, are Orthodox, but while they go no farther they do not partake of the faith we speak of. They partake of it only as they believe this truth, because God has revealed it, and humbly submit to the voice of God the most plausible arguments Philosophy offers to persuade them of the soul's mortality. Thus the merit of faith is enlarged, in proportion, as revealed truth, which is the object of it, exceeds all the powers of our understanding: for the more the incomprehensibility of this object increases by the numerous maxims of natural light which oppose it, the more we must sacrifice to God's authority a stronger repugnance of reason, and consequently we shew ourselves more obedient to God, and give him a greater proof of our respect, than if the thing was moderately difficult to believe. Whence was it that the Father of the Faithful, had so eminent and illustrious a faith? Was it not because he believed in hope against hope (18)? There had been no great merit in hoping upon the promise of God for a thing, naturally very probable; the merit therefore consisted in this, that the hope grounded on this promise was contrary to all appearances. Let us say likewise, that the most precious faith is that which upon the Divine testimony embraces such truths as are the most repugnant to reason.

This thought has been expressed in a ludicrous way by a masterly hand. The Devil take me if I believed a syllable then, said the Marechal d'Hocquincourt; but ever since I could endure to be crucified for religion. Not that I see more reason in it now; but on the contrary, less than ever: but for all that I could suffer myself to be crucified, without knowing why, or wherefore. So much the better, my Lord, replied the Father, twanging it devoutly through the nose, so much the better; these are not human motions; they proceed from God. No reason! That is the true religion: No reason. What an extraordinary grace, my Lord, has God bestowed upon you! Estote sicut infantes, be ye as children: children have still their innocence, and why? Because they have no reason. Beati pauperes spiritu, Blessed are the poor in spirit; they sin not; the reason is because they have no reason. No reason: without knowing why or wherefore: Oh excellent words! They ought to be written in golden letters. Not that I see more reason in it now; but, on the contrary, less than ever. In truth this is Divine for them that have any taste of heavenly things: No reason. What an extraordinary grace, my Lord, has God bestowed upon you (19)! Give this thought a more serious and modest turn, and it will become reasonable. Here is the proof of it. I take it from a book wherein some thoughts of Mr de St Evremond are examined; and this amongst others, that our understanding is not sufficiently convinced of the truth of religion.

To answer clearly to this, we must remember a maxim commonly received among Divines: viz. That the mind is induced to believe mysteries in a quite different way from that which gives it an evident knowledge of natural things. It knows the latter by demonstration, and it believes mysteries upon motives of credibility, such as are the miracles wrought by Jesus Christ, and his Apostles, the unanimous belief of all the faithful for seventeen centuries, &c. All which motives ought to induce us to believe prudently the faith which the church proposes to us: and this very well explains these words of St Paul, That in this present life we see the mysteries as riddles, waiting to see them evidently in heaven. But Mr de St Evremond requires demonstrations. He therefore admits no faith. St Thomas * says expressly in some places of his Summa, that no body ought to go about to demonstrate the mysteries of religion; and he adds in other chapters, that when the Fathers proved the faith, they did not pretend their arguments were demonstrative, but only solid motives to induce us to believe the doctrines propounded to us. Why, says Mr de St Evremond, is not our reason enlightened? Because, as St Thomas says, reason must submit to faith. Upon which I call to mind some words of Petrus Blesensis in his 140th epistle written to Petrus Diaconus, who was with the King of England. After he had spoke of the mystery of Transubstantiation, reason, pursues he, does not go so far, but we are carried thither by faith; a faith that is so much the stronger as it is not supported by natural reason. Reason grows weak where faith grows strong: reason is overcome that faith may be more meritorious: however, do not think, adds this Father, that reason envies the superiority of faith; on the contrary, it voluntarily and humbly submits to it. It will resume its light in heaven, where faith will not be, and then reason will reap what faith sows in the present life; and it is just it should reap the fruits of faith, since at present it debases itself, that faith may reign in its full power (20).

VI. This is the doctrine of the Roman Catholics: take from it Transubstantiation, and put the Trinity, for instance, in its room, and the most Orthodox Protestant Divines will subscribe to it. I shall quote two Protestants, whose testimony will have the more weight, because they are of such professions, as are not thought to insist much upon the humbling of reason, and the exaltation of faith: one is a Physician, the other a Mathematician; the former declares, that when he meditates on mysteries, he always stops when reason is arrived to this point, O the depth (21). He protests, that if rebellious reason, or the Devil, endeavour to perplex him, he disengages himself from (19) Mr de St Evremond, in his Conversations between Marechal d'Hocquincourt, and Father Cassey, Tom. i. p. 181, of the English translation, London 1754.

* Part. i. q. 1. a. 2. ad 2.

(20) Dissertation sur les Oeuvres de Mr de St Evremond, pag. 249, 8^e ju. fe. 1754.

(21) I have a life myself as a mystery, in part my reason is as O Alacrida! Sir T. Brown, Religio Medici, Part. i. c. 12, pag. 46.

(17) The mathematician I am to quote, published at London, in 1699, a tract, of 36 pages in 4to, intitled, Theologia Christiane principia Mathematica. He pretends, that the principles of the Christian Religion are only probable, and reduces the degrees of their probability, and of the decrease of it, to Geometrical calculations. He finds that it may still last 1454 years, from whence he concludes, that Jesus Christ will return before that time. He dedicates this book to the Bishop of Salisbury, and shews, in his Epistle Dedicatory, that they who shall blame him for calling the principles of Christianity only probable, are such as have not well examined the grounds of their religion, and do not well understand the nature of faith. Whence, says he, has this virtue so many encomiums given it in the Scripture, and so many rewards promised it? Is it not because it makes men walk in the right way, notwithstanding all the stumbling-blocks they meet with, and the fetters that are put upon them? I shall set down his words: 'Quosdam fore non dubito, majori ductos zelo quam judicio qui meos prorsus concludunt. Illi utique omnia Religionis dogmata tanquam certissima amplectentes rem Christianismo indignam me præstitisse putabunt, qui ejus probabilitatem tantum evincere conatus fuerim. Illis vero ego nihil jam habeo quod dicam, nisi quod præjudiciis suis præoccupati, Religionis quam profitentur, fundamenta non accurate satis haftenus examinaverint, nec fides, quæ tan copere in sacris literis laudatur, naturam ritè intellexerint. Quid enim est fides? nisi illa mentis persuasio qua propter media ex probabilitate deducta, quasdam propositiones veras esse credimus. Si persuasio ex certitudine oriatur, tum non fides sed scientia in mente producitur. Sicut enim probabilitas fidem generat, ita enim scientiam evertit & è contra: Certitudo scientiam simul generat & fidem destruit. Unde scientia omnem dubitandi ansam aufert, dum fides aliquam semper hæsitacionem in mente relinquit: & propterea fides tantis insignitur laudibus, tantaque sibi annexa præmia habet, quod homines non obstantibus omnibus illis quibus premuntur scrupulis in recto virtutis & pietatis tramite progrediantur, quæque Creatori suo omnipotenti grata futura credunt summa ope præstare conentur: Se tam paratos esse jussis quibuscunque divinis obsequi ostendunt, ut ne ea quidem quæ probabiliter tantum ab ipso proveniant, rejicere velint (28). - - - I doubt not but certain persons, more zealous than judicious, will absolutely condemn my work, and rashly conclude that I rather subvert and overthrow religion, than support and defend it. For they, embracing all the doctrines of the Christian Religion as most certain, will think that I have

(28) Johannes Craig, Episc. Dedicat. written

AN EXPLANATION

'written a book unbecoming and unworthy of a Christian, since I there have endeavoured to shew only the probability of that religion. To these persons I have at present nothing more to say but this, that being prepossessed with prejudices, they have not yet sufficiently examined the foundation of that Religion which they profess, nor well understood the nature of that Faith, which is so much praised in the sacred writings. For what is Faith, but that persuasion of the mind, whereby we believe certain propositions to be true, for reasons drawn from probability? If the persuasion arises from Certainty, it is not Faith, but Science that is produced in the mind. For as probability begets Faith, so it destroys Science; and so vice versa Certainty begets Science and destroys Faith. Thus Science removes all manner of doubt, whereas Faith always leaves in the mind some hesitation: and it is for this reason that Faith is so highly commended, and so many rewards are annexed to it, namely, because men, notwithstanding all those scruples wherewith their minds are oppressed, walk in the strait road of virtue and piety, and with all their might endeavour to perform those duties which they believe will be acceptable to their omnipotent Creator. They shew themselves so ready to obey all divine commands, that they will not reject even those, which only appear probably to be such.'

THAT it is proper to enumerate largely the arguments which respect the difficulties of the Christian Faith.

VIII. Most men so little examine the nature of divine Faith, and reflect so seldom upon this act of their mind, that they want to be roused from their negligence, by a long enumeration of the difficulties that encompass the doctrines of the Christian Religion. It is by a lively sense of those difficulties we learn the excellency of Faith, and of this gift of God. Hereby we learn also to mistrust reason, and have recourse to grace. They who know nothing of the great contest between reason and faith, and are ignorant of the force of Philosophical objections, have but an imperfect sense of God's goodness to them, and of the manner of triumphing over all the temptations of incredulous and presumptuous reason.

The true way of humbling it is to know, that if it be capable of inventing objections, it is incapable of resolving them, and, in a word, that it is not by reason that the gospel was established. 'It is Faith alone that can teach that Divine Philosophy, which none of the princes of this world had known'. Whoever opens his eyes to so pure a light is truly enlightened. It was not by strength of syllogisms and argumentations that this Philosophy recommended itself to men; but by its simplicity and the ignorance of those who preached it to the world. . . . Faith having discovered to men the false glimpses that shone in the Heathen Philosophy, accustomed them not to reason any longer upon things which God would not submit to reasoning, and taught them, that it is better to be ignorant of what God has been pleased to conceal, and with a respectful ignorance to adore the secrets he has not revealed, than to attempt to fathom this abyss of light, by the rashness of our conjectures, and the faint views of our reason. It was to this Divine ray of Faith, that the Christian took pleasure to sacrifice that insolent curiosity, which made him too rashly examine the works of God, by examining the effects of nature, and stifle all the views of that proud reason, which fixes him to the creatures, and makes him a rebel against the Creator. It was by the rays of this celestial light, that the Christian perceived it was better to yield than to argue in point of religion; that narrowness of wit is more advantageous to a Christian, than all the force and penetration of the mind, and that the simplicity of Faith is preferable to all the pomp of science. Since, after all, the works of God, which bear the most the stamp of his omnipotence, and his character, are those we the least comprehend, therefore nothing is more just than to humble our reason, and submit it to the light of eternal reason, which is the rule of all reasons: and indeed there is no science but requires submission for the establishment of its principles (29).^{*} I conclude with two very fine thoughts of Mr de St Evremond. 'In things purely natural, it is the mind's part to conceive, and its knowledge goes before the affection for the objects: in things supernatural, the soul is taken, it is affected, it adheres and unites itself without ever comprehending them. Heaven has better prepared our hearts for the impression of God's grace, than our understandings for illumination. His immensity confounds our narrow intellects: his bounty agrees better with our love. There is I know not what within us, that secretly pleads for a God, whom we cannot comprehend. . . . To consider well the Christian Religion would make one think, that God had deprived it of the light of our minds, that it might turn more upon the motions of our heart (30).[†] Provided a man has reduced his reason so far, as not to argue upon things which God would not subject to reasoning, it is all we can desire. I not only believe with Solomon, that a wise man's silence is better in this case than the discourse of a Philosopher, but I have a greater esteem for the faith of the most stupid peasant, than for all the lessons of Socrates (31).

This, I think, is more than sufficient to remove the scruples which the pretended triumph of the Sceptics had raised in the minds of some of my readers.

* Veritas per Christum: Yves, cap. i. Le quinisme latin: christianisme qu'on ne peut pas prouver: hujus mundi veritas, Paul. i. Cor. i. 6.

(29) Rapin, Réflexions sur la Philosophie, pag. 447.

(30) St Evremond, Works, Vol. ii, pag. 24. Rep. of the English translation, London 1734.

(31) Oremus, modestia, Tom. ii, pag. 24.

EXPLANATION

CONCERNING OBSCENITIES.

837

EXPLANATION IV.

CONCERNING OBSCENITIES.

That if there are some Obscenities in this book, they are such as cannot be justly censured.

I. WHEN people say that there are Obscenities in any book, they may understand,

I. Either that the author gives the description of his debaucheries in leud terms, applauds and congratulates himself for them, exhorts his readers to plunge themselves into all manner of leudness, recommends it to them as the most effectual means of leading a sweet and happy life, and pretends, that the censures of the public are to be laughed at, and that the maxims of virtuous men ought to be slighted as old women's tales.

II. Or, that the author relates, in a free and gay stile, some love-adventures, feigned as to the substance, or at least as to their circumstances, and embellishments; and introduces into his narrative several immodest incidents, which he dresses in all the charms imaginable, in order to make them diverting, and fitter to raise the desire of love-intrigues than any thing else.

III. Or, that the author, in order to revenge himself on an unfaithful mistress, or to excuse the transports of his passion, or make invectives against an old courtesan, or celebrate his friend's marriage, or divert himself with merry thoughts, gives a free scope to his Muse, and writes Epigrams, Epithalamiums, &c. full of impure and smutty expressions.

IV. Or, that the author, inveighing against leudness, describes it in too lively, naked, and gross colours.

V. Or, that the author in a tract of Physic, Natural Philosophy, or Civil-Law, expresses himself filthily on the subject of generation, or, the causes and remedies of barrenness, or the motives of divorce, &c.

VI. Or, that the author, commenting upon Catullus, Petronius, or Martial, has inserted in his commentary several leud discourses or expressions.

VII. Or, that the author, giving the History of a sect, or person, whose actions were infamous, has related, in too open a manner, a great many things offensive to chaste ears.

VIII. Or, that the author, treating of cases of conscience, and enumerating the different species of carnal sins, has said many things which modesty cannot easily digest.

IX. Or, lastly, that the author relates Historical facts mentioned by other authors whom he carefully cites, which facts are filthy and immodest, and adds a commentary on his Historical narrations to illustrate them by testimonies, by reflexions, and by proofs, &c. in which he sometimes alledges the words of certain authors who have wrote freely, some of them, as Physicians, or Lawyers; others, as Gallants, or Poets; but he never says any thing containing either explicitly, or even implicitly, the approbation of impurity; that, on the contrary, he endeavours, upon many occasions, to expose it to our abhorrence, and to confute loose Morality.

These, I think, are the chief cases wherein a writer can be charged with venting obscenities.

In the first case, he deserves not only all the severest punishments of the Canon-Law, but ought also to be prosecuted by the Magistrate as a disturber of the public modesty, and a professed enemy to virtue.

As to those of the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth classes, let every one judge of them as he pleases: I am not concerned in them, mine being only the ninth case; and it is sufficient for me to examine what concerns that ninth kind of obscenity. However, I will make two or three general reflexions upon the rest.

These general observations upon some sorts of obscenities that are to be found in several authors.

II. I say in the first place, that there are several degrees in the seven classes of writers, whom I leave to the reader's judgment (1). A man may keep himself within certain bounds, or may exceed them: this prodigiously varies the differences and proportions; and it would be very unjust to pronounce the same sentence against all the writers of the second class. The hundred Nouvelles nouvelles (2), those of the Queen of Navarre, Boccace's Decameron, la Fontaine's Tales do not deserve the same rigour as Aretin's Ragionamenti, and the Aloisia Sigæa Toletana. The authors of these two last works deserve, as well as Ovid, to be placed in the first class of obscene authors.

Secondly I observe, that in all times a great number of men have agreed in condemning obscenities; and yet this never seemed to be a decision of equal force with the Civil Laws, a decision to which the Poets, Commentators, &c. were obliged to conform.

V O L. V.

10 C form

form on the penalty of being excluded the rank of honest men. The censurers of obscenities seem to be so much the more capable of terminating the question by a decisive and executive sentence, in the whole Republic of Letters, because they might make up a Senate out of all sorts of men. There would be in it not only persons venerable for the austerities of their lives, and sacred character, but also military men, and professed gallants, and, in a word, many who give offence by their voluptuous life. This is an authority of great weight; for the liberty of leud verses must needs be an ill thing, since it is disliked by those very persons who live in debauchery. But in vain have obscene writings been exclaimed against, it has had no effect to distinguish between honest and dishonest men. There has always been in the Republic of Letters, a right or liberty of publishing writings of this nature. This right has never been liable to prescription; several persons of a distinguished merit have prevented it by the freedom they have allowed themselves in such sort of works; and this has brought no disgrace upon them, nor any ways incapacitated them for the enjoyment of all the honours and privileges belonging to their condition, nor prevented the preferments they might hope for from their fortune (3).

(3) I do not pretend to extend this to particular cases, exceeding certain bounds,
nor to persons who are otherwise infamous for their actions.

(4) See remark
[I], of the article PANORMI-TA.

(5) See the article SANCHEZ (Thomas) citation (14).

(6) See the articles QUELIE-NEC, and RO-BERT.

(7) See, concerning Grotius, who wrote lascivious verses, Rivet. Oper. Tom. iii,
pag. 1112,
1124. Grot. in Dissert. Rivet.
Apolog. pag.
237.

(8) Petronius.

(9) See remarks
[C], [D], of the article QUEL-LIE.

He would be laughed at who should go about to prove that Boccace was not a man of probity, because he wrote the Decameron; or conclude, that the Queen of Navarre, sister to Francis I, was not a Princess of admirable virtue, whose praises refounded every where, because she wrote some Novels of Gallantry. Antony Panormita lost nothing, either of his fortune or good reputation, by his smutty poem of the Herma-phrodite (4). The same may be said of Benedicte le Court, and the famous Tiraquellus:
the former gave himself great liberty in writing a commentary on Martial d'Auvergne's Decrees of Love: Nonnunquam etiam, says he in his Epistle Dedicatory to a Counsellor of the Parliament of Paris, quod in amore jocus fin lasciviente calamo: and every body knows how many obscene collections Tiraquellus inserted in his commentaries upon matrimonial laws (5). Did Scipio du Pleix use any periphrases or reserves in his book called, La curiosité naturelle redigée en questions selon l'ordre alphabetique? Did he not explain things in the most natural terms imaginable? What did he lose by that book?
Nothing at all. I should never have done, should I undertake to give a list of all the Civilians, who, in trials of adultery, or impotency, have alledged many obscenities, without any prejudice to their reputation. I have named three or four, Antony Hot-man, Sebastian Roulliard, Vincent Tagereau, and Annæus Robert (6). This is enough: let us name some persons of another rank.

The Dutch could not endure that any body should defame Secundus as a wicked and profligate man, or so much as deny that he was an honest man, under pretence that he wrote very lascivious verses (7). Ramirez de Prado, who wrote notes upon Martial, printed at Paris with the King's licence in the year 1607, and full of leud explications, lost nothing by this of his reputation or fortune, no more than Gonzales de Salas for his commentary of the same kind upon an obscene author (8). Joubertus, Chancellor of the university of Montpellier, and Physician to the King of France, and to the King of Navarre, lost neither his pensions, nor his honourable posts, for inserting several obscenities in his book of Vulgar Errors. Nor is he on that account esteemed a less illustrious and honest man. Did Quiller's Callipædia hinder him from being recompensed with an abbey by Cardinal Mazarin (9)? Feramus, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, did not find that his merit was less extolled, or acknowledged after he had wrote verses against Montmaur, wherein he sported with very obscene fictions.
And to come nearer our own time, was Mr de la Fontaine, who published so many leud tales less caressed by every body at court and city? Lords and Princes, the ladies of the highest rank, the most illustrious persons of the long robe, have all courted and admired him. Was he not admitted into the French Academy? And is not that honour for a man of his character, equivalent to a mareschal's staff for a military man? I doubt not but Mr de la Reinie would have gladly entertained him at his table the very day that he condemned his new tales (10); for in such books wife men know how to distinguish between the person of the author, and his writings.

III. Let us see whether the Protestants have been more rigid. I do not think that the Consistories ever thought of censuring Ambrose Paré, whose Anatomical books written in the vulgar tongue, were full of filthy things. There are many obscenities in Joseph Scaliger's commentaries upon the Priapeia, and upon Catullus. There are more still in Janus Douza's commentary upon Petronius. One of those two writers was Professor at Leyden, and the other was one of the Curators of that university. They did not lose upon that account their credit, and the great esteem they were in; and though Beza mightily exclaimed against them in an Epistle Dedicatory to the States-General (11), his out-cries were not minded. Daniel Heinsius, Professor in the same university, enjoyed all the honours he could pretend to; he was one of the Secretaries of the Synod of Dort, and received, on a thousand occasions, several proofs of the esteem they had for his person; and yet he published some poems that are far from being modest.
What he and Scriverius called Baudii amores, is a very wanton collection; and it is to be observed, that Scriverius was a man of merit, and of great note among the learned in Holland. Notwithstanding Beza's exhortation, Theodore de Juges (12) put out an edition

(10) It was on the fifth of April 1675. The sentence may be seen at the end of the third case of Panormita, whereby the sale of the book is prohibited, and it is ordered that an information shall be made about the imperfection and sale of it.
What has been said in my Remarks on the Judgment of the Public, &c.
numb. xxxiii.

(11) That the Tales of la Fontaine were condemned in the Parliament by the sentence of a Majorité of Paris, was affirmed to me by a person who came from France. I am persuaded he was mistaken, and that there was no other sentence, but that of Mr la Reinie. I should have been more cautious, had I desired to report that particular in my Dictionary.

(12) The piece I then wrote being only a leaf blank,
I was not so careful as I ought to have been.

(13) That of his fronze on Chrysis's reference.

(14) Mr Mead under the second name of Johnnes Cases Tilihomous calls him Thomas de Judicibus, in the preface to the Je-dicum de Promento Triquetent Petronius.
His mistake, as the Christian name is more ex-cellable than the
of Mr de Court-ny de la Renoine, who page 25. of his travels. Concerning Salpa-Book, printed that Theod-Juges would all Gothicus. It meant the Collection and condixit de Juges were the same thor.

edition of Petronius with his Prolegomena, wherein he endeavoured to justify those who explain the obscenities of that Roman author. It does not appear that Theodore de Juges did suffer in his reputation or fortune upon that account. He was a Protestant, and some persons of his family were Counsellors in the court of Castres, whose members were one half Protestants and the other Roman Catholics; and he spent a considerable part of his life at Geneva. Goldastus had enjoyed the same impunity after his edition of Petronius, which he published with his Prolegomena, wherein he undertook to justify the reading of such an author, and made a particular answer to Beza's reflexions. Shall I say that the famous d'Aubigné was very much respected at Geneva, though the cynical liberty of his pen was a notorious thing? Shall I observe that the consistory of Charenton never had any thoughts of complaining of Dr Menjot, though his writings concerning Physic are intermixed with many obscene things? Shall I add, that Isaac Vossius being a Canon of Windsor, when he published a book full of filthy things, the Dean and the Chapter did not meet to inflict upon him even the slightest punishment, viz. that of being reprimanded?

It is therefore no wonder if the faction contrary to those who condemn obscenities, did always maintain itself in the Republic of Letters: for besides their alledging several reasons for their opinion, they shelter themselves under the authority of several examples. You may see these reasons and these examples in the Prolegomena of Goldastus upon Petronius. All those who have apologized for the authors who as Physicians, or as Casuists, advance obscene things (13), alledge reasons against reasons, and authorities against authorities. They want neither great names nor grave authorities, magno se judice quisque tuetur (14). But do not think that I suppose that their reasons and those of their adversaries, have an equal force. I have declared in several places, that I absolutely condemn Catullus's obscenities, and those of his imitators, and the excessive freedom of the Casuists; and I add now, that the arguments alledged by those who plead for the liberty of inserting obscenities in an epigram, seem to me very weak, if compared with the contrary arguments (15). I further add, that an obscenity softened, and only meant as a jest, seems to me to be more blamable than a very obscene invective designed to create an abhorrence for impurity. And as for the obscenities of the stage, I am of opinion, that they ought to be severely punished by the magistrate. They are a school of debauchery, and belong rather to the first class than to the seven classes that follow it, and are the subject of these preliminary remarks. I have still one more to offer.

IV. For I say in the third place, that if any one should alledge that it were better for the writers of these seven classes, to apply themselves only to serious matters, and to treat them with all the modesty required by the gospel, he would depart from the state of the question. This advice, though very good in it self, is not pertinent on this occasion, since they might answer, that the question is not, whether they have chosen the good part, and whether they have made the best use they could make of their leisure and pen, but only whether they have taken a liberty condemned, upon pain of ignominy, by the statutes of the Republic of Letters, the regulations of civil policy, and the laws of the state? They would readily acknowledge, that they could not avoid being condemned, if they were judged by the laws of the gospel; but they would maintain that all writers are in the same case some more, some less, there being none but may be told, that he might have employed himself in a more Christian-like manner than he has done: for to give an instance of it, a Divine who has spent all his time in writing commentaries upon the Scripture, might have made a more pious use of it. Had it not been better for him to divide the day between mental prayer and works of charity? Why did he not spend part of the day in meditating upon the greatness of God, and the four last things? Why did he not spend the other in going from one Hospital to another to relieve the poor, and from house to house, to comfort afflicted persons and instruct little children? since therefore no man, will they say, can give a good account of his time at the severe tribunal of the Divine justice, and every body stands in need of mercy on account of many useless things, and for having erroneously chosen what was not the most necessary part; we appeal to another jurisdiction, and desire it may be enquired whether we have done any thing for which in the Judgment of the Public, and before the tribunal of the magistrates, we deserve to lose the title of good men, and to be deprived of the rank and privileges of men of honour. We desire a thing, would they say, which cannot be refused to several virtuous women who go to plays and to balls, who love gaming and fine cloaths, and who have such regard for their beauty, that they carefully study what ornaments will set it off to the best advantage. They know very well that their conduct is not agreeable to the precepts of the gospel; but whilst they do nothing else, they may lawfully pretend to the quality, rank, and privileges of virtuous women. They deserve to be censured by the Preachers and the Christian Moralists, I grant it: but till the public, or the magistrates, have fixed a note of infamy upon such a course of life, they cannot be called bad women; and whoever should call them so, would be obliged to make them a public satisfaction. They may alledge the practice of all ages, since there have been at all times many virtuous women, who loved gaming, plays, balls, and jewels; and after all, they do not

An answer to those who blame a thing for this reason, that a better one might be done.

(13) See remark [D], of the article ALBERTUS Magnus; and remark [C], of the article SANCHEZ (Thomas).

(14) Lucian, Phars. lib. i. ver. 127.

(15) The reasons pro and con may be compared together, by reading Father Vauvafleur's book de Epigrammate, ch. ii. intitled de Obscenitate in Epigrammate vindanda.

not offend against the Civil Laws, nor against the rules of human honour, and are not guilty of that kind of disorder, which is the peculiar character of gallant women. The Poets, who in an Epithalamium make too naked a description of a wedding-night, may alledge the same reasons: they will own that their Muse might have pitched upon a more laudable subject, and that the composition of a Christian sonnet was preferable to that; but this very compofure would not have been the best thing they could have done. It had been better for them to spend their time in praying, and serving the poor in Hospitals, &c. There is hardly any business but what may be blamed for this reason, that a better one might have been pitched upon; and of all the occupations of this life, there is hardly any that is more blamable, if we judge of it by the rules of religion, than that which is most common; I mean the occupation of those who endeavour to get money either by trading or other fair means. Humanly speaking, the most lawful means of growing rich are contrary, not only to the Spirit of the Gospel, but also to the literal prohibitions of Jesus Christ and his Apostles. And therefore it highly concerns all men, that God should be merciful to them for not making the best use of their time. The Poets I speak of, having laid down this principle, add, that they only tread in the steps of many persons illustrious for their virtue and wisdom; that the liberty they take, always prevailed among honest men; that if it had been laid aside for some ages as the peculiar character of debauchery, they could not be excused; but that it will appear they may claim the right of possession, and that a thing which has been practised by so many honest men, cannot be accounted dishonest (16). This is a maxim of Pliny on the present question. He was one of the greatest wits, and one of the most honest men of his time; he made some verses that were thought to be somewhat impudent (17), and was blamed for it: he alledged many great examples in his vindication, and would not instance in the Emperor Nero, though, said he, I am not ignorant that things do not grow worse, because they are sometimes practised by wicked men, but that they continue to be honest, when they are often practised by honest men (18).

Thus much for the Poets. Now I must observe in a few words that the authors belonging to the other classes abovementioned, may alledge the same reasons. Nay, some of them may say something more specious: A natural Philosopher, for instance, and a Physician, may maintain, that their profession requires they should explain what concerns generation, barrenness, the green-sickness, a woman's delivery, and the furor uterinus, as well as fermentation, and what concerns the Spleen, the Gout, &c. A Casuist will say, that it is no less necessary that confessors and penitents should be informed of the several ways of offending against chastity, than of the several frauds that are committed in purchases.

At least we ought to do those authors the justice they claim, viz. not to judge of their morals by their writings (19). No necessary consequence can be drawn from either of those two things to the other. Some Poets are chaste in their verses, and in their morals; some are neither chaste in their verses nor in their morals; some are only chaste in their verses; and some are not chaste in their verses, but they are so in their morals, and all their fire lies in their heads (20). All the wanton strokes of their epigrams, are only witty conceits; their Candida's and their Lesbia's are fictitious mistresses. The Protestants cannot deny it of Beza, since he declares that he lived a regular life when he wrote the Poems, intitled, Juvenilia, of which he did so much repent (21).

V. After these general observations, I shall proceed to the examination of what concerns this Dictionary; and the first thing I shall observe upon this head is, that if those observations are not looked upon as a solid justification, I shall not be prejudiced by it; but if they are approved as such, they will be of great use to me. I am in far better circumstances than all the authors I have mentioned (22); for though Catullus, Lucretius, Juvenal, and Suetonius, be never so much condemned, a writer who cites them, cannot be blamed for it. Those authors are to be had in all the Booksellers shops; the passages quoted out of them, cannot be more dangerous than they are in those authors themselves; and there is a vast difference between the first authors of an obscenity, and those who mention it only as the proof of a fact, or of an argument which the subject in hand obliges them to alledge. Granting that Joubertus expressed himself too immodestly, does it follow from thence that I could not alledge his authority, when I was to criticize a very weak argument alledged against those who accused the Physician Herlicius of lewdness? However it be, if the excuses alledged in favour of Suetonius, Joubertus, &c. are good and solid, so much the better for me; if they are not good, it can do me no prejudice; my case is different from theirs, and much better. By the argument a fortiori what they may say in their vindication, may be alledged by me with greater reason; and what is a weak argument for them, may be a very strong one for me. You need only compare together the nine classes I have mentioned, and you will find that the last, which suits my work, is less liable to a just censure.

This will more clearly appear, if to what I have said above (23), concerning the nature of my case, I add this consideration, viz. That I have avoided three things that might have occasioned just complaints.

(16) I say nothing of the liberty Mr. de Vautour takes in his poems. It is no new thing for the Poets to take this vicious liberty. They have long ago prostituted the chastity of the Muses. They alledge their multitude in their vindication. There is no counting with them concerning a possession, which they have enjoyed for so many ages by the consent of all nations. Grec. Réponse à la Défense de Vautour, pag. 74.

(17) See the fourteenth Letter of the fourth book of Pliny, and the third of the fifth book.

(18) Netem tranco, quamvis sciam non corrumper in deterius, que aliquando etiam à malis, sed honesta manere que legum à bonis sunt. Plin. Epist. vii. lib. vi. pag. m. 289.

(19) See remark [D], of the article VAYRA.

(20) Compare with this what Count Buffon says concerning Madam.... The picture of jelling is pronounced with her, and when she is in that humour, she joyfully listens to the freest discourses, provided they are disguised. Nay the answers with improvements, believing that her wit might be called in question, if she did not improve upon what was said to her.... She is of a cold constitution; at least if we may rely on her husband: to this he partly owed her virtue, as he said, all her fire lies in her mind: indeed she makes ample amends for the coldness of her constitution. Hist. de mademoiselle des Gouttes, pag. m. 174. & 175.

(21) See the article BEZA, remarks [F], & [A].

(22) That is the cycle class of authors, abovementioned.

(23) See, above, number 15.

In PARTICULAR remarks concerning the obscenities pretended to be in this Dictionary, three precautions which I have taken.

CONCERNING OBSCENITIES.

841

In the first place, whenever I have said any thing as my own, I have avoided all words and expressions that are contrary to common civility and decency. This is sufficient in a work of this nature, intermixed with Historical narratives, and all sorts of discussions; for to pretend that a compilation which is to contain matters of Literature, Law, or Natural Philosophy, according to the various subjects treated on, ought to be written according to the most strict rules of decency observed in a sermon, or in a book of devotion, or a novel, would be confounding things, and setting up a kind of tyranny over mens minds. A word that would be thought unbecoming in the mouth of a preacher, and in a small romance designed for the entertainment of the ladies, would not appear so in a case written by a lawyer, nor in the verbal process of a Physician, nor in a book of Natural Philosophy, nor even in a piece of Literature, or in the faithful translation of a Latin book, such as for instance, the relation of Abelard's misfortune. It is therefore certain, that there are several degrees of decency, with respect to the style: the highest degrees belong to some writers, and not to all. If an ingenious man was desired by some ladies to write a romantic History of Jupiter's or Hercules's adventures, he would do well never to use the words, to geld, to deflower, to get with child, to lie with a nymph, to ravish her; he should either lay aside the particulars that might excite those ideas, or keep them at a distance by general and enigmatical expressions. But if the writers of an Historical Dictionary, wherein the reader expects to find an exact translation of what is to be found in the ancient Mythology concerning Jupiter's adventures, used long circuits, and far fetched expressions, whereby the fate of some nymphs might be guessed at, they would be accounted finical and ridiculous. They do not offend against decency, provided they keep within the bounds of common civility, that is, provided they abstain from such words as are used by the rabble, and which even a debauchee carefully avoids in a serious conversation. They may boldly use all the words that are to be found in the Dictionary of the French Academy, and in that of Furetiere, unless the authors of these Dictionaries give notice, that those words are odious and obscene. This is the first thing I have observed; viz. that I keep to the rules of common decency, when I say any thing as my own. I now proceed to give an account of the course I have taken as to passages quoted by me out of other authors.

I have avoided, in the second place, to express in our language the meaning of a quotation, which contained some immodest thing, and have only set it down in Latin. The passages I cite out of Brantome and Montagne are not the most offensive which may be found in those authors; and I may say the same with respect to D'Aubigné, and other French writers somewhat too free, whom I have sometimes quoted to prove what I said.

In the third place, I have avoided mentioning, in any language whatsoever, such things as had a character of extravagancy and enormity unknown to the vulgar; and I have quoted nothing out of certain books that are little known, and which I had rather leave in darkness than excite the desire of buying them, in those who should find them cited in this work. I never cited on this subject any authors but such as may be had every where, and are reprinted almost every year. I could name a very honest man, who never was a debauchee, who wrote from London to one of his friends, that he expected to find quite other things in my Dictionary, from the clamours of certain people. I imagined, said he, that it contained unknown obscenities, but I could find nothing in it, but what myself and my companions knew before we were eighteen years old.

After what has been said, it will be no difficult matter to know whether I have been justly or wrongfully blamed. The whole affair may be reduced to these two points, 1. Whether I am liable to censure, because I have not sufficiently wrapped up in ambiguous periphrases the obscene facts which have been found in History. 2. Whether I am to blame, because I have not wholly suppressed those facts.

THE first of the two questions to which the present dispute may be reduced, runs upon words or expressions. An answer to that charge.

VI. The first of these two questions, properly speaking, belongs only to the Grammarians: Morality is not concerned in the matter; the civil Magistrates have nothing to do with it, Nihil hec ad editum prætoris; neither are the Moralists or the Casuists concerned in it. If an action was to be brought against me, it could only relate to the politeness of my style; whereupon I would appeal to the French Academy, as the proper and competent judge of such causes. I am sure those gentlemen would not condemn me; otherwise they would condemn themselves, since all the words I make use of, are to be found in their Dictionary, without any note of dishonour. When they do not declare that a word is obscene, all writers are thereby authorized to use it; I mean such words as they have defined. But further, I should readily consent to be condemned by them; for I do not pretend to politeness of style, I have declared in my preface that my style is very incorrect, and not free from expressions either improper, or which begin to be obsolete, or even from barbarisms, and that in these respects I am not very scrupulous. Why should I pretend to it, since several famous authors, who lived at Paris (24), and were members of the French Academy, did not care for it? Why should a man hamper himself in a book designed for things, and not for words, and which containing all sorts of matters some serious, and others ludicrous, necessarily requires (24) Mr. le Et. Bourcier, for the French, (See the preface to his Additions to Ca. Relau's Mémoires) and Mr. de Mazarin, Secretary to the French Academy.

V O L. V.

10 D requires

AN EXPLANATION

requires one should use various sorts of expressions? The author of such a work needs not to be so cautious as a preacher; and though the latter ought, in the pulpit, to avoid this phrase, They who get a maid with child, ought either to marry her, or give her a portion, yet he may use it without any indecency in a book concerning cases of conscience. So true it is, that an author may express himself differently, according to the nature of his books.

But if any thing can excuse the writers, who have no regard to I know not what refined delicacy which increases every day, it is this, that there will be no end of it; for, in order to act consistently, a vast number of words which the French tongue cannot be without, must be accounted obscene; and the writers who pretend to be so nice, may easily be convicted of absurdity. It may be proved to them, that according to their principles there are no precise or foppish women, and that those whom we call so, are very reasonable, and argue consequentially. I desire them to tell me, why the verb to geld appears obscene to them. Is it not because it offers an obscene object to our imagination? But for the same reason the word adultery cannot be pronounced without a greater obscenity. Thus this word must be banished. There will be a necessity to banish likewise the words marriage, wedding-day, bride's-bed, and a vast number of such expressions, which excite very obscene ideas, and incomparably more offensive than that, at which the precise lady in one of Moliere's plays was so much offended. For my part, uncle, says she, all that I can say is, that marriage seems to me to be a very shocking thing. How can a woman endure the thought of lying by a naked man (25)?

According to the principles of our Purists nothing could be more reasonable than such a discourse, and every virtuous maid should turn out of her chamber all persons who should come and tell her of a design to marry her. She might justly complain, that they have so little regard for her modesty, as to offer to her a frightful obscenity without any veil or disguise. To ask a married woman, whether she has had any children, would be a monstrous obscenity; politeness would require that we should use figurative expressions, and imitate, for instance, the finical lady, who said, 'That her companion had given into lawful love (which was marriage), and that she knew not how she could resolve to taste brutish pleasures with a man; That she had done it to leave behind her some traces of herself, that is, some children (26).'

According to the notions of the Purists, it would be a very reasonable thing to exclude against Moliere's School of Women, with all the fury he has so handsomely ridiculed, and which is, at the bottom, a downright extravagance. Every virtuous person should say that expression, Children coming out through the ear, is abominable . . . Can any one that has any virtue, be pleased with a piece that keeps modesty in a constant alarm, and continually defiles the imagination? . . . I positively affirm, that an honest woman cannot see that play, without being put to shame, I have discovered so many leud and filthy things in it (27). . . . Those obscenities, God be thanked, appear bare-faced, they have not the least covering: The boldest eyes are frightened at their nakedness . . . That passage of the scent, wherein Agnes mentions what was got from her, is more than sufficient to prove what I say.

. . . . Ey . . . (28). I repeat it again, the filthy things of that piece fly into one's face. . . . Is not modesty visibly offended by what Agnes says in the place we speak of (29)? If some Urania ventured to answer, 'Not at all. Agnes does not say a word but what is very modest; and if you will have it, that she means something else, the obscenity proceeds from you, and not from her, for she speaks only of a ribbon that one got from her (30):' the following answer would be a wise one: '(31) Ah! you may talk of a ribbon as much as you please; but that my where she stops, was not put there for nothing: it occasions strange thoughts; that my is furiously scandalous: and say what you will you can never justify the infolence of that my . . . There is an tolerable obscenity in it (32).' That discourse, though never so impertinent, would be proper and honest, according to this principle, All words which defile the imagination, that is to say, which denote an obscene object, ought to be laid aside. According to this principle, all those who have some modesty, would be like the Marquise Araminta, whose character is as follows: 'She says every where it is a horrid piece (33), and that she could never endure the obscenities it is stuffed with . . . She follows the ill example of those women, who being in the decline of their age, have a mind to supply what they see they are losing, by something else; and would have the grimaces of a scrupulous prudery serve them instead of youth and beauty. This lady carries the thing farther than any body, and is so nicely scrupulous, that she finds obscenities where no body else had discovered any. It is said her scruples are such as will disfigure our language, and that there is hardly any words but what she would curtail, either at the beginning or end, by reason of the immodest syllables she finds out in them (34).'

I think I have read somewhere, that preciseness has been carried so far that ladies would not say J'ai mangé des confitures, but des sûres. At this rate, above one half of the words of the Dictionary of the French Academy should be struck out, and then the rest would be insignificant, for they would want a connexion; and thus we should be obliged to explain ourselves by signs only, which would occasion more scandalous and more dangerous obscenities than those that come into one's ears (35). Here follows a (25) Moliere, Précieuses ridicules, Scene 10, Act 1.

(26) Sorel, de la Cocquetterie des bons Livres, page 470, Duclé E-dit.

(27) Moliere Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes, Scene 11, Act 1.

(28) Ibid. Ibid. page 14.

(29) Ibid. page 16.

(30) Ibid.

(31) Ibid.

(32) Nice, The

in this passage of Moliere, every body expects to hear Agnes say, that some body has got her mandarin head; which costitutes a very obscene idea.

(33) That is,

the play remarks

The School of Women.

(34) Moliere, Les

lignes, Scene 10.

(35) Scrupulous examine démontre per renes,

Qu'on que l'on

occulte l'impud-icité, à qui l'on fait tout spectacle.

Hérot. de An

Pour. par. l'ho

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

l'ho. quel est

CONCERNING OBSCENITIES.

843

passage of the Chevreana, whereby my assertion will be extremely well confirmed. A lady who has a great deal of wit, but is too finical, told me one day she never used any words which might excite an obscene idea, and that when she was in company with polite people she said, Un fond d'Artichaut; un fond de Chapeau; une rue qui n'a point de sortie, for what we call un Cul de sac. I told her she did very well, and that I would not fail to do the same. However, I added, that on some occasions we were obliged to speak like others. She very civilly defied me to give her any instance of it; and I asked her how she called in common conversation a piece that is worth sixty pence? Sixty pence, replied she. But, Madam, how do you call that letter of the alphabet that comes next to P? She blushed, and at the same time replied, Truly, Sir, I did not think you would bring me back to my a, b, c (36). You see Mr Chevreau approves that we should never use any words, which may excite an obscene idea; and by virtue of that principle, he is of opinion, that we should never say, un Cul de sac. He must therefore strike out not only above two pages of Furetiere's Dictionary (37), corrected by one of the politest writers of our days (38), but also a vast number of words, whose first syllable excites more immodest ideas than the syllable Cul. He must also banish the words adultery, fornication, incontinence, and a thousand more: but as rigid as he is with respect to obscene words, he was not willing to grant upon one single point what that precise lady required; therefore he was not consistent with himself [A]. But let us forgive him that inconsistency; for the consequences of his assertion are so absurd, and so impracticable, that he is not to blame for not keeping to them

(36) Chevreau, Part. ii, pag. 101, 102, Dutch Ed.

(37) At the beginning of the syllable Cul.

(38) Mr Baufnage de Baurval.

[A] As rigid as Mr Chevreau is with respect to obscene words . . . he was not consistent with himself.] Immediately after having said with Marshal de Bassompierre, that all men carry about them the key of the treasure, FAIRE DES ENFANS, is an obscene expression (b), and that it ought never to be used before ladies, who have nice ears. Those two observations were not fit to appear close together. Here is another that is a

(a) Chevreau, Part. i, pag. 350.

(b) See what Mr Arnauld says in his Défense de la Traduction de Mons. Irv. iv. ch. ii, pag. 334.

(c) Note, That Quintilian, lib. viii, cap. iii, observes, that instead of cum nobis hominibus, it should be said cum hominibus notis.

(d) Liberis dare operam quem honeste dicitur? Cicero, Epist. viii, lib. ix ad fam. pag. 58. Edit. Grav.

(e) Chevreau, Part. ii, pag. 122.

(f) Menage, Observ. upon Malherbe, pag. 338.

(g) Id. ibid. pag. 581.

(h) Chevreau, Part. ii, pag. 122.

(i) Ibid. p. 124. Note, That Girard, in his Reply to Cyprien, lib. viii, pag. 74, pretends this expression of Cicero is too obscene, viz. the thigh of a boy so white and so well shaped.

(k) Ibid. pag. 125.

country breeding. But to proceed, 'One cannot too carefully avoid such obscenities as leave filthy ideas in the mind, and offend ears that are not over nice. C. Servilius Glaucia Quæstor in the year of Rome 641, was looked upon as the filth of the streets, by reason of the meanness of his soul; and yet the most eloquent man among the Romans, could not bear that he should be called Curia stercus *, nor that the great loss the commonwealth sustained by the death of Scipio, should have been expressed in these words, Reipublica morte P. Scipionis Africani castrata. Mr de Balzac did not observe decency, nor the precepts of the ancient Rhetoricians, whom he often called his masters, when he wrote to a friend concerning a certain person, Qu'il étoit tout composé de parties bouterfes. Our language has been so modest for these sixty years, that we seldom use the words subore and barudy-bouffe, which the preachers formerly used without any scruple in their best sermons (l). From all these passages, it appears, that Mr Chevreau was very severe in his theory; but his practice was not answerable to it: for should one strike out of his works every thing that defiles the imagination, there would be abundance of gaps in them. To speak only of the Chevreana, wherein he appears so rigid a Moralist; how many things are there in it that excite very obscene ideas? Some of those passages are quotations, and others are his own compositions. Why should a man prescribe any rules which cannot be observed either in a general History, or in a collection of observations of all kinds?

* Quintilianus Instit. Orat. lib. viii, cap. vi. De Tropis.

(l) Chevreau, ibid. pag. 275, 276.

It will not be improper to give here an instance of what he says concerning the preachers of former times; and therefore I shall set down some passages out of a sermon of John de Monluc, Bishop of Valence, and one of the most eminent preachers of the XVIth century. 'He who deflowers and corrupts a virgin, is guilty of fornication, a crime mentioned in Deuteronomy xxii, and yet in our days no account is made of acts of Fornication, which are daily committed: many poor maids are enticed, seduced, and brought to perdition; and those who have debauched them, glory in it, and think it much to their honour that they have been able to conquer those women, who had for some time resisted the temptations of the flesh. But if they are not punished in this world, the most high God, who sees every thing, will in time call them to an account: they shall give an account of the time they have lost, of the money they have spent upon pimps and bawds, they shall be answerable for the sins committed by the maid after she has been seduced, and for her being forsaken and finding no body to marry her. Then they will know whether they had any reason to boast of such an execrable action (m). . . . They likewise infringe this commandment who contrary to the order of nature, commit that enormous and detestable crime called Sodomy: such persons are condemned to death by the law of God, as we read in Leviticus xx. (n). That command is also transgressed by those, who commonly them. His only fault lies in not perceiving the falsity of a principle, whereof the most necessary consequences are absurd, and plainly tend to the destruction of the use of speech. It is to be observed, that there are some ladies as virtuous as that precise woman, who do not scruple to say, Cul d'Artichaut, and Cul de sac. This you may see in a passage of Costar; which has a great affinity with the subject in hand [B].

(m) Monluc, Bishop of Valence, Sermons sur les dix Commandemens de Dieu, pag. 504. Edit. of Papey 1558, in 8vo.

(n) Ibid. pag. 506.

I have already observed that it is impossible to satisfy the Purists, against whom I am writing. The ground they go upon will make them lay aside, whenever they please, abundance of words not yet condemned by them, which, according to their maxims, do not less deserve to be rejected than those which they have actually laid aside. There is no avoiding their censure. Though you relate things in modest words, as has been done in the second volume of the Menagiana, they will say, That there are some passages in it plainly contrary to modesty, which cannot be read without horror, by virtuous persons (39). Could Father Bouhours avoid being criticised, though in his French (39) Journal des Savans, for February 21, 1695, pag. 145, Dutch edition.

(40) See the third letter of a learned lady to another lady her friend, pag. 8.

(41) See the preface to Boileau's Works.

(42) In the tenth satire.

(43) This is in the second volume of his Chronological Abridgement, ad ann. 1313, where he speaks of some sparks who courted the daughters-in-law of Philip the Fair.

translation of the Gospels he took all possible care to lay aside every word that might appear never so little unbecoming (40)? Was not Mr Boileau, whom the illustrious President de la Moignon often commended, for having purged satirical poetry from the obscenity, which till then had been, as it were, peculiar to it (41), charged with smuttness, for having used (42) the words Embryon, voix luxurieuse, morale lubrique? If such words cannot be admitted, there will be no end of censuring.

I know several persons who blame Mezerai for saying that some sparks, who had committed adultery, were mutilated in the parts wherewith they had offended (43). Their censure is grounded upon these two reasons: one is, that there was no need to mention a circumstance which offers such an obscene object: the other is, that he should at least have omitted all the words after mutilated, that word being sufficient to express the thing. I desire those Critics not to take it ill of me, if I believe that the circumstance which they say should have been omitted, is one of those which an Historian ought never to forget; for if there is any thing extraordinary in the punishment inflicted upon a malefactor, it ought to be particularly mentioned. The second Remark does not appear to me better. A sentence of death may import that a malefactor's hands, nose, or ears shall be cut off, before he be put to death; and therefore the word mutilated would not sufficiently express the circumstance which Mezerai was to inform us of. But supposing that this word is sufficient, does it follow from thence, that the addition of the rest is a fault? Do not we commonly say, I have seen it with my own eyes, &c. There are several needless words in such phrases, and yet no body finds fault with them. Lastly, I say that those Critics contradict themselves: they only blame this addition as being unnecessary; the thing, say they, had been well enough understood without it. They are not therefore against offering an obscene image to the mind, they would only have two or three needless sounds omitted. Their zeal for purity would have been edifying, had they been altogether against the use of any thing in History that may excite an obscene idea; but they allow of it, provided it be done without any needless words. Thus they destroy in this last Remark what might have been edifying in the first. Such is the nice taste of our Purists: they blame one expression, and

(e) Ibid. pag. 507.

(f) Ibid. pag. 501.

(g) See the eleventh edition, of Girac's answer to the apology for Voltaire.

'commonly live in delights and pleasure, who spend their time in feasting and banquetting, and pamper their body to make it a vessel of luxury and whoredom. St Peter gives a lively description of them in the second chapter of his second epistle (e) . . . Sporting themselves with their own deceivings, whilst they feast with you; having their eyes full of adultery, and cannot cease from sin, beguiling unstable souls. That is, their only end and intention is to deceive poor souls, and by their banquets and feasts, to allure them to adultery and all manner of filthiness. So that their habitations are bawdy-houses, where assemblies are held, matches are made, and women are seduced: in a word, they are the plague of a country; and yet such people are most esteemed and honoured, especially those who are the ring-leaders, and as it were, the cocks of their parish (f).'

The use we may make of the passages extracted from that sermon, is to know that the liberty of expressing one's self in such a plain manner, is not sinful in itself, for then it would not have been lawful in Henry the second's time. Now if it was lawful then, should a preacher use it in our days, his only fault would consist in not conforming to the mode. But if any one ventured at this present time to wear a ruff, would he not offend against the mode? And yet it would be no sinful action.

[B] A passage of Costar, which has a great affinity with the subject in hand.] The polite Voiture (who would believe it?) was charged with using obscene expressions (g), tho' he was so well acquainted with the genteel part of the world, and kept company with persons of quality. Let us see what his apologist answered: 'There is hardly any lady who scruples to repeat and sing the verses which Mr de Voiture made upon a lady's back-side, and I do not know one who makes any difficulty to say, un cul d'artichaut, and un cul de sac (r). The apologist alleges afterwards the passage I have recited in another place (i), and adds these remarkable words: Let us bear our perverts Critic †. It was feared there was not enough of this sort of wit in Mr de Voiture's letters, and that in this respect he would not come up to Plautus and Aristophanes; and therefore it was thought necessary to add these words in the last edition, which were wanting in the 178th letter. I consent to the castrating of Ulpian, since you will have it so, and even of Papius; for they begot nothing but law-suits. This thought is very ingenious. Hitherto I have always heard people say, without any scruple, that a book was castrated, to denote a book which is not entire, but curtailed. If our adversary had any interest in the academy, he would get this licentious expression abolished, and this modest phrase substituted in its room, to injure books and make them eunuchs. The passages of Quintilian † quoted by him, are wrongly quoted, and that author maintains, that if some expressions of Sallust were accounted obscene, it was not the writer's but the reader's fault. As for Celsus, who pretended to find an obscenity in a hemistich of Virgil, Quintilian blames him for it, and says, that if Lucianus against the same Quintilian blames him for it, and says, that such a niceness was allowable, no man could be sure he speaks well, and every body should be silent (d). It is to be observed, that Costar, who affords me this passage, was none of those learned men who are unacquainted with the genteel part of the world. He was acquainted and kept company with people of fashion.

(r) Costar, suite de la Dedicace de Voltaire, pag. 189.

(i) In the anti-Michaelist (Michael de l'Etat), (113).

† Pag. 75, 76.

† Page 71.

Dictionnaire des

littéraires, le par-

littéraires, le par-

littéraires, le par-

littéraires, le par-

littéraires, le par-

littéraires, le par-

littéraires, le par-

littéraires, le par-

littéraires, le par-

littéraires, le par-

and approve another, though they equally offer the same obscenity to the mind. The Observations printed at Paris in the year 1700, against Mezerai, will be very acceptable to those Critics. See the margin (44). He is blamed in that book (45) for commonly using the words concubine, bastard, and adultery, which are inconsistent with the niceness of our age. I am sure they would not condemn the words favourite, natural son, and conjugal infidelity, which have the same signification. How inconsistently do they argue!

IX. The new whims of those, who, as I am told, begin to reckon the words glister (46) and physic among obscene terms, and use the general word remedy in their room, would be less unreasonable. The word clistere (glister) was laid aside, as including too many circumstances of the operation, and the word lavement took its place as having a more general signification. But because the idea of the word lavement is become specific, and takes in too many circumstances, it will be quickly laid aside for fear of fullying the imagination, and none but general phrases will be used, such as 'Étois dans les remèdes, un remède lui fut ordonné, &c. which do not more particularly denote a glister or a purge, than a bag of herbs hung about the neck. These are certainly very strange whims, and were they approved and followed in all their consequences, they would destroy a great many expressions, to which every body is used, and which are very necessary to those who recover from a sickness, and to their visitants; otherwise it would be no easy matter to keep up a conversation in their chambers, and there would be a necessity to use the whole jargon of the precise ladies: But after all, those whims are better grounded than those of the Purists, who are willing that an obscene image should be imprinted in the mind, provided it be with such and such words, and not with others.

To sum up what I have said upon this head, I observe,

I. That the question is not about a point of Morality, but is a mere Grammatical dispute, which ought to be decided by those who are judges of the politeness of style.

II. That I shall ingenuously confess, I did not aim at the honour that may be acquired by such politeness.

III. That I do not think all authors are obliged to submit to the new notion of politeness of style; for were it exactly followed, there would be no need at last of any Dictionary but that of the precise ladies.

IV. That the title of this new politeness is not so well established as to obtain the force of a law in the Republic of Letters. The antient title remains still (47), and may be used till a prescription begins.

V. That in such a book as this, it is enough not to act against the common practice; but any one who keeps within those bounds as carefully as I have done (48); may use several expressions which would be improper in a sermon, or a book written by a finical author. It is enough for him that they are used in Anatomical books, in cases drawn up by Lawyers, and in the conversations of learned men (49).

An examination of what some allege, viz. that certain things offend modesty.

X. But that it may the better appear that Morality is not concerned in the present question, I must obviate another objection of my censurers. Let us see whether they can allege this pretence, that every phrase which offends modesty, is an attempt upon Morality, since it is prejudicial to chastity.

Whereupon I observe in the first place, that they who say that certain things offend modesty, must needs mean either that they weaken chastity, or exasperate the persons who are chaste. In the first sense their position cannot be admitted; and if women are to decide the case, the censurers will be infallibly cast. But doubtless women are the most competent judges of such a thing, since shame and modesty are allotted to them in a much greater degree than to men. Let them therefore be pleased to tell us what passes in their soul, when they hear or read a discourse which offends modesty. They will not say, I am sure, that it not only fills their minds with obscene thoughts, but also that it excites in their hearts a lascivious desire which they cannot restrain without great difficulty; and, in a word, that they feel themselves exposed to temptations which stagger their virtue, and carry it to the brink of ruin. We may be sure, that instead of such an answer, they will say, that the idea which rises against their will in their imagination, fills their mind at once with the highest degree of shame, indignation, and anger. Now it is certain that nothing can be more effectual than this, to corroborate chastity, and remove the contagious influence of an obscene object imprinted on the imagination; so that instead of saying, according to the first sense, That what offends modesty, endangers chastity, it ought to be said on the contrary, that it is a fence, a preservative, a bulwark for that virtue; and consequently, if we understand this phrase, Such a thing offends modesty, in the second sense, we ought to believe, that instead of weakening chastity, it revives and corroborates it.

An observation concerning the vexation of readers. Gross obscenities are least dangerous.

Therefore it will still be true that the censuring of an author for not following the most refined politeness of style, is a mere Grammatical controversy, in which Morality is not in the least concerned.

XI. If it be replied, that Morality is concerned in it, since the author has expressed himself in such a manner as angers the readers: I answer, that this argument is grounded upon (46) See Garfield's Apology, pag. 107.

(47) Mr. Menage's friends were, in the year 1695, charged with publishing obscene things in a book printed with the King's licence.

(48) Nay, I have observed Quintilian's precept in relation to some words that are grown obscene by the depravation of the readers. Vel hoc vitium sit quod καὶ παρὰ τὸν νομῶν: five mala consuetudine in obscenorum intellectum sermo detortus est, ut Duflare exercitus, & Patrare bellum, apud Salustium dicta sancti & antiqui, ridetur à nobis, si diis placeat; quam cum prius non scribentium quidem iudicio ledentium, tam men vitanda quatenus verba honesta moribus perdidimus, & evincemus etiam vitis credendum est, five junctura deformiter sonat. Quintil. lib. viii cap. iii, pag. m 367.

(49) As those that were held in Mr. Menage's house.

VOL. V.

10 E upon

upon a false hypothesis; for no writer can prevent the spite, vexation, and anger of the readers, on a thousand occasions. Every Controversialist, who defends his cause with great art and subtilty, continually vexes the zealous readers of the contrary party. Whoever in an account of a journey, or in the History of a nation, relates things that are glorious to his own country and religion, and shameful to foreigners and other religions, cruelly vexes the readers, who are not prepossessed as he is. The perfection of an History consists in being unacceptable to all sects and nations; for it is a sign the writer neither flatters, nor spares any of them. Many readers fall into such a rage when they meet with certain things in a book, that they tear the leaf, or write in the margin, Thou liest, rogue, and deservest to be bastinadoed (50). None of these things (51) can be alledged as a reason why authors should be tried at the bar of Morality: the Critics are their only judges.

(50) I have in the margin written in the margin of some books,

The only thing therefore that may be further objected, is, that Morality is concerned in the representation of obscene objects, because it is apt to excite unlawful desires and leud thoughts. But this objection is not so strong against me as against those, who use the covers, reserves, and nice ways of wrapping up things, which some complain I have neglected; for they do not hinder the impression of the object upon the imagination, but imprint it without exciting any shame and indignation. They who use such covers, do not intend to make themselves unintelligible; they know every body will understand what they say, and it is certain they are perfectly understood. The delicacy of their touches has only this effect, that people look upon their pictures the more boldly, because they are not afraid of meeting with nudities. Modesty would not suffer them to cast their eyes upon them, if they were naked obscenities; but when they are dressed up in a transparent cloth, they do not scruple to take a full view of them, without any manner of shame, or indignation against the Painter: and thus the object insinuates itself more easily into the imagination, and is more at liberty to pour its malignant influence into the heart, than if the soul was struck with shame and anger; for those two passions exhaust almost the whole activity of the soul, and put it into such a trouble that it can hardly have any other sentiment. At least it is certain, that obscenity cannot act so strongly upon a soul overwhelmed with shame and anger, as upon one that is free from confusion and vexation. Pluribus intentus minor est ad singula sensus. When the soul is affected with one passion, it is less susceptible of another.

(51) I except however, the reading of which may have caused the obscene Characters.

Add to this, that when an obscenity is expressed only by halves, but in such a manner that one may easily supply what is wanting, they who see it finish themselves the picture which sullies the imagination; and therefore they have a greater share in the production of that image, than if the thing had been fully explained. In this last case they had been only passive, and consequently the admission of the obscene image would have been very innocent; but in the other case they are an active principle, and consequently, are not so innocent, and have more reason to fear the contagious effects of that object, which is partly their work. Thus this pretended regard to modesty, is really a more dangerous snare; it makes one dwell upon an obscene matter, in order to find out what was not clearly expressed. And is this a matter fit to be suggested to the reader's meditation? Were it not better to prevent his stopping at it?

XII. This is still of greater force against the writers who seek for covers and reserves. Had they used the first word they met with in a Dictionary, they had only touched upon an obscene thing, and gone presently over that place; but the covers they have fought out with great art, and the periods they have corrected and abridged, till they were satisfied with the fineness of their pencil, made them dwell several hours upon an obscenity. They have turned it all manner of ways; they have been winding about it, as if they had been unwilling to leave such a charming place [C]. Is not this ad strenum scopulos consensere, to cast anchor within reach of the tyren's voice, and the way to spoil and infect the heart? It is certain, that excepting those who are truly devout, most of our other Purists are not in the least concerned for modesty, when they avoid so carefully the expressions of our ancestors; they are professed gallants, who cajole all sorts of women, and have frequently two mistresses, one whom they keep, and another who keeps them. Truly it becomes such men very well to exclaim against a word that offends modesty, and to be so nice when something is not left to be supplied by the reader's imagination! We may apply to them what Moliere said of a pretended [C] They have been winding about it, as if they had been unwilling to leave such a charming place.] This puts me in mind of an inscription engraved in golden letters on a black marble upon the bridge Noire Dame at Paris.

Sequana cum primum Regine allabitur urbi, Tardat precipites ambitiosus aquas.
Captus amore loci, cursum obliviscitur anceps,
Quo fluat, & dulces nescit in urbe moras.

Hinc varios implens fluctu subeunte canales,
Fons fieri gaudet qui modo flumen erat.
ANNO MDC LXXVI (a).

When the Seine first enters the metropolis of France, he ambitiously plays his rapid streams, and being enamoured with the place, he forgets his course, is uncertain whither to flow, and winds in sweet meanders through the town, thence filling the pipes with his waters, he who was once a river, joys to become a fountain. ANNO 1676.

These verses were made by Mr de Santeuil.

(a) Descriptions
Nouvelle de la Ville de Paris.
Tom. II. pag.
206, Paris
Edit. 1687.

pretended prude: 'Believe me, those women who are so very formal, are not accounted more virtuous for it. On the contrary, their mysterious severity, and affected grimaces, provoke all the world to censure their actions. People delight to find out something to blame in their conduct. And to give an instance of it, there were the other day some women at this play opposite to our box, who by their affected grimaces during the whole representation, and turning aside their heads, and hiding their faces, made people tell many ridiculous stories of them, which had never been mentioned if they had not behaved so; nay, a footman cried out, that their ears were chaffer than all the rest of their body (52).' The men I speak of, think only of making themselves admired for the delicacy of their pen.

(52) Molière, Critique de l'École des Femmes, Scène III, pag. 15.

The Jansenists are accounted the best Moralists; and I do but follow their opinion, when I say, that a gross obscenity is less dangerous than one that is nicely expressed. I am not ignorant, says one of them (53), 'that people call ordures only such words as (53) Réponse à l'Apologie du Père Bouhours, pag. 73, & seq. Edit. 1700. See also the Lettres curieuses de l'Abbé de Bellegarde, pag. 253, Hugué Edit. 1702; and the article Accords, remark [C], at the end.

'are grossly obscene; and gallantries, those which are expressed in a nice, delicate, and ingenious manner; but gross obscenities, though covered with a witty ambiguity, as it were with a transparent veil, do not cease to be obscenities; they do not less offend chaste ears, defile the imagination, and corrupt the heart; a subtle and imperceptible poison, is not less mortal than a violent one. There are some encomiums upon modesty, which modesty itself cannot bear, Witness that of * Father le Moine. The gross obscenities of a Carman or Porter, are not by a great deal so pernicious, as the ingenious words of a cajoling spark.' This Jansenist having mentioned some gallant thoughts vented by Father Bouhours, under the name of an interlocutor in a dialogue, which are expressed in very nice words, goes on thus (54): All parents, not excepting those who are most engaged in the world, will acknowledge that those pernicious fooleries are more dangerous than gross obscenities (55); that they corrupt the hearts, and make the worst of impressions upon the minds of youth. I have quoted in my Dictionary (56) a passage of Mr Nicolle, wherein he positively affirms, that unlawful passions are the most dangerous, when they are covered with a veil of modesty.

* Lettre Provinciale xi, Peintures morales, by Father le Moine, livr. vii.

(54) Ibid. pag. 78.

This cannot be denied: Nay, women of an imperfect virtue would run less danger among brutish men, who should sing filthy songs, and talk rudely like soldiers, than among polite men who express themselves in respectful terms. They would think themselves indispensably obliged to be angry with those brutes, and to quit the company, and go out of the room with rage and indignation. But soft and flattering compliments, or at most such as are intermixed with ambiguous words, and some freedoms nicely expressed, would not startle them; they would listen to them, and gently receive the poison.

(55) See the Treux's Journal, for February 1703, Edit. of France, on the romance intitled La Princesse de Porcien.

A man who courts a maid would immediately destroy all his hopes, should he grossly and filthily propose his ill design: he is a perfect stranger to the Art of Love, if he has no regard to modesty in the choice of his expressions.

(56) In the article MARRIAGE (John des), citat (11).

There is no father but would rather have his daughters blush than laugh at some stories told in their presence. If they blush, they are safe (57); shame prevents the ill effect of the obscenity; but if they laugh, it makes an impression, and nothing diverts the stroke. If they laugh, it is doubtless because the obscenity was artfully wrapped up, and seasoned with an apparent modesty. Had it been grossly expressed, it would have excited shame and indignation. Farces in our days are more dangerous than those of our ancestors: in former times they were so obscene, that virtuous women durst not appear at them; but now they do not scruple to see them under pretence that obscenities are wrapped up, though not in impenetrable covers. Are there any such? They would bore them through, were they made up of seven hides like Ajax's shield.

(57) Erubuit, salva res est. Terrent.

If any thing could make la Fontaine's Tales very pernicious, it is their being generally free from obscene expressions.

Some ingenious men, much given to debauchery, will tell you, that the satires of Juvenal are incomparably more apt to put one out of conceit with lewdness, than the most modest and most chaste discourses that can be made against that vice. They will tell you that Petronius is not so dangerous, with all his gross obscenities, as he is in the nice drefs of Count de Rabutin; and that the reading of the book intitled, Les Amours des Gaules, will make gallantry much more amiable than the reading of Petronius.

It were wrong to conclude from what has been said, that the least evil would be to use the expressions of Porters. That is not the case. I know the Stoics laughed at the distinction of words, and maintained, that every thing ought to be called by its proper name, and that there being nothing dishonest in the conjugal duty, it could not be denoted by any immodest word, and that therefore the word used by clowns to denote it, is as good as any other. You may see their sophisms in a letter of Cicero (58). Perhaps, it were no easy thing to silence them by the way of disputation (59), but they do not deserve to be admitted to dispute on that subject. What has been accounted a rule of decency and modesty in all societies, time out of mind, and with the unanimous consent of the public, ought to be looked upon as a first principle, (58) The xxiij, of the ninth book, ad Famil.

(59) Compare with this what has been said in the article HYPARCHIA, remark [D].

which

AN EXPLANATION

which no man is allowed to contradict. And therefore when a whole nation are agreed in calling some words immodest, inasmuch, that the very Porters who use them most, are persuaded of their obscenity, and abstain from them before persons of honour, and would be offended to hear them pronounced in a public assembly; no private person can be admitted to oppose such a judgment. All the members of the society are obliged to respect it. The courts of justice afford us a remarkable instance of it; for Lawyers are not allowed to repeat such words, when they plead for the punishment of those who have used them in reviling their neighbours. They will have public modesty respected in the hearing of a cause; but when they judge by report, they not only permit the reporter to mention the very words of the offender though never so obscene, but also command him to do it. This I have from a Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, who told me within these few years, that having used a circumlocution the first time he reported such a cause, the President gave him to understand, that there was no occasion to have a regard to chaste ears, but to judge of the nature of the offence, and that therefore he was obliged to speak the very word it consisted in. I fancy the Inquisition uses the same method [D].

The Stoics must have followed very near the same rule, and if in their private conferences they did not think fit to prefer one word to another, there was at least a necessity for them to conform in public to the common way of speaking. The unanimous consent of nations ought in that respect to be the standard of all private persons.

Wherefore if the word putain (a whore) which our forefathers used in their gravest books (60), as freely as the Romans used the word meretrix, begins to be generally decried, it is fit all authors should begin to disuse it, and substitute the word courtezan in the room of it, since the world will have it so. But this is at the bottom a ground-^{(60) The translators of the Bible of Geneva used it.} less nicety for either the word courtezan excites as strong an idea as the other, or a weaker one. If the former, there is nothing gained by it, every body will still have a notion of an infamous object: if the latter, it is lessening the abhorrence which the public ought to have for a prostitute. But does such a creature deserve such a regard? Were it not better to aggravate the infamous notion of the trade she professes? Are you afraid of making her too odious? You are for giving her a favourable name which formerly signified a court-lady (62). One would think you are afraid of offending her, and willing to soften peoples mind by giving her a quaint name. The consequence of which would be, if people reasoned right, that the word courtezan would quickly grow^{(62) See the Chironomus, Part. II, pag. 415.} obscene, and a softer one should be used for it. One should say, a woman who behaves herself ill, and then, a woman that is talked of, and then, a suspicious woman, and then, a woman who does not live a holy life (63), and at last desire the most finical ladies to in-^{(63) Note, That Sandoval speaking of the abominable actions committed at Rome by the army of Charles V., in the year 1527, is contented to say it was not a holy action, but no finer. See La Motte le Vayer, pag. 177, of the second volume, of the edition in 1700.} vent some other circumlocution.

AN answer to the objection grounded upon incivility.

I am just now sensible of another objection. It is a piece of incivility, will some say, to insert in a book what cannot be spoken in the presence of virtuous women; and therefore since incivility is blameable, morally speaking, the fault for which you may be blamed, does not concern Grammar, but Morality.

I answer in the first place, that incivility morally speaking is an ill thing only when it proceeds from pride, or a wilful contempt of other men; but when one is wanting in point of civility, either because he knows not the way of expressing it, or does not think himself obliged to follow it, he is guilty of no sin. Do ye think that an old Professor of the Sorbonne, is bound to know all the arts that are practised by the young Abbés of the court, to express their respect to the ladies with great politeness? That Professor has other things to learn, which are much more important; and though he were informed what sort of civility is in fashion, he might lawfully dispense with it. His age and character do not require he should conform to it, but rather the contrary. I add,

[D] I fancy the Inquisition uses the same method.] I do not think the inquisitors will allow such abjurations, as contain horrid obscenities, to be publicly read; but during the trial they hear them, and when they are written down, they are read with a loud voice in some private place. Such was the method of the inquisitors of Rome in the year 1698, towards brother Peter Paul, of St John the Evangelist, a bare-footed Augustin Friar, convicted of prophanation, impiety, and of an abominable leudness. I have a copy of the abjuration, Abjura semipublica, which he made in a chappel al Sacello di Casa Granisi, and I find that among other things this was read to him: Dicesti haver tu mostrato e rimostrato alle tue sopradette devote con le quali tu prosequivi gl' abbracciamenti in parte nascoste che tu per la dolcezza di quelli eri rapito in estasi, e sentivi un godimento infinito dell' amor divino, e che tu t'inferoravi in quell' estasi . . . Hai detto haver bacciate alle tue donne le parti vergognose, e che dopo ha- verle così bacciate e toccate l'hai benedette & li hai averti li meati, e pregavi dio che li conservasse in tutto quello benedetto clauistro verginale . . . Hai detto che alcune donne ti hanno lavato le parti basse tre volte, la prima per purgarsi dalle colpe mortali, la seconda dalle veniali, e la terza dalle imperfettioni. Hai detto che alcune volte in godere delle donne tu sentivi specie di martirio . . . che un giorno parimente l'hai fatto radunare e ad una per una invocare e bacciare il tuo membro genitale (vv).

It is not to be questioned that the Inquisition would publish those things, were it necessary to undeceive a formidable cabal, and an exasperated populace, who should maintain that a Monk had been severely punished for small faults. Thus it was thought necessary to publish the informations made against the Knights Templars, tho' never so full of horrid obscenities, rather than people should think their order had been destroyed without a just cause.

CONCERNING OBSCENITIES.

849

I add, that new civilities are a slavery introduced by great men, or invented by their flatterers to the prejudice of ancient liberty. But if it be lawful for every private person to depart from the old custom, it is also lawful to keep it till every body has laid it aside, and it becomes some persons not to be too hasty in taking up new modes. It is with this as with fashions in cloaths. Worldly people immediately appear in the new fashion, but the grave and wise do it only when it is grown adult, if I may be allowed to say so. A medium ought to be kept in those things; a man must not be one of the first who takes them up, nor the last who leaves them; and none makes himself ridiculous by keeping the old fashion, but when it is quite out of doors.

I answer in the second place, that an author is not bound to suppress all the words that cannot be civilly spoken in the presence of virtuous women: witness Mr de St Olon, who is no stranger to the ways of the court: he would not have said before the ladies in a serious conversation what he has writ concerning the marriages of the Africans (64).

There are many reasons for taking a greater liberty in a book than in conversation. An obscenity spoken before virtuous women in good company, makes them very uneasy; they cannot ward off the shocking blow; it is not in our power to hear or not to hear, what we are told in the Vulgar Tongue. The accidental meeting of a naked man, or the sight of a lewd picture, is not without remedy; we may immediately turn aside, or shut our eyes; but we cannot stop the mouth of a talking man. The shame occasioned by an obscene idea, is much greater when we are surrounded with people who observe our looks. The confusion and perplexity of a virtuous woman on such an occasion, makes her very uneasy: this uneasiness is attended with indignation, because men do not use to talk so before women whom they respect, and think to be honest, but before women of whom they have an ill opinion. There are no such inconveniences with respect to a book. If there is any thing in it which in your opinion is unchaste, you may read it or let it alone. For instance, you may foresee that the article of the courtesan LAïs in my Dictionary, will contain some lewd quotations; do not read it. Let some trusty persons take a view of the book, before you undertake to read it, and let them inform you of what is to be passed over. Besides, a woman who is alone when she reads a book, is not exposed to the looks of a company, which is the thing that most perplexes and confounds her (65): and because an author speaks to no body in particular, she does not think herself slighted or offended.

(64) In his relation of the empire of Morocco, printed at Paris in the year 1695.

(65) The most virtuous persons, when alone, are not ashamed when they get out of bed, but they would be ashamed if they were seen by others.

But after all you could not but know, will some say, that there are now many women who read books of literature; and therefore you should not have been contented with what you call common civility; you should have observed the nicest and the most rigid civility, that the fair sex might not find any thing in your book that might fully their imagination. My answer is, that had it been possible by observing such a rigid civility to prevent the reader's finding any such thing in my Dictionary, I had willingly submitted to the rules of the Purists, who come nearest to the taste of precise women; but I was fully convinced that the greatest niceness cannot remove any image of an obscene object from the mind of the reader. This will not be easily believed, unless I shew the truth of it with the utmost evidence.

THAT the nicest words fully the imagination as much as the most obscene.

In order to do it, I need only prove this single proposition, the most obscene and the most modest words that can be used to denote a filthy object, do both paint it with an equal force and liveliness in the imagination of the bearer, or the reader. This seems at first a great paradox, and yet it may be made sensible to every body by a popular argument. Let us suppose one of those adventures, which are sometimes the talk of a whole town, a marriage ready to be celebrated, and suspended all of a sudden by the opposition of a third person. This third person is a young woman, who happens to be with child, and demands that the marriage her lover has contracted with another should be declared void. Let us suppose that a very virtuous woman, who has only heard of this opposition in general, is willing to know what reasons that young woman has for it. She might be answered a hundred different ways, without using the words which a porter, or a debauchee uses in such cases. She might be told, she has the misfortune to prove with child; he has enjoyed her; he has kept her company; they have been too intimate together; he has had to do with her; he has had the last favour of her; she has granted him the most precious thing she had, as it appears from the consequences; what passed betwixt them, cannot be modestly spoken, chaste ears would be offended at it; she is obliged to get her honour repaired. Several other phrases better wrapped up might be found out in answer to the question of that virtuous woman; but all of them would imprint in her mind the filthy and brutish action, which has produced that young woman's pregnancy, as strongly as Michael Angelo could have done it upon a cloth: and if that virtuous woman had heard by chance the bawdy word whispered by a debauchee in the ear of another debauchee, to let him know the matter, she could not have a clearer notion of the thing. No person though ever so modest, can sincerely deny what I have been saying, if they will examine what passes within their breast: It is therefore certain, that the most modest and the most obscene words equally defile the imagination, when the thing denoted by them is a filthy object.

VOL. V.

10 F

Though

AN EXPLANATION

Though you use the most modest expressions employed in the Scripture, to represent what we call conjugal duty: Adam knew his wife Eve (66): Abraham went in unto (66) Gen. iv. 1. Hagar (67): I went unto the prophets (68): you will never be able to blot out the image of that object; it will be imprinted in the mind as strongly as if you used the most portly language. The same may be said of the phrases, to consummate a marriage, (67) Ibid. xvi. the marriage was consummated, the marriage was not consummated, expressions which, if I may say so, are consecrated, and cannot be avoided in the most serious relations, and the most Majestic Histories (69): those words raise the same idea as the words of a ploughman. See the margin (70).

But how comes it then, will some say, that a virtuous woman is not offended with veiled expressions, and is angry with a filthy word? I answer that their indignation proceeds from the accessory ideas which attend such a word, but do not attend a phrase which is veiled. The impudence of those who express themselves like porters, and their want of respect, is the true cause of such an indignation. Their expression excites three ideas: one is a direct and main idea; the others are indirect and accessory. The direct idea represents the filthiness of the object, and does not do it more distinctly than the idea of another word. But the indirect and accessory ideas represent the disposition of the person who speaks, his brutishness, his contempt of the hearers, and his design of affronting a woman of honour (71). This is what she is angry at. She is not offended, as she is a modest woman; for under this notion nothing can offend her but the object itself which sullies the imagination: but she is not offended at that object; for if it had been represented to her imagination with other phrases expressing the obscenity as effectually as the filthy word, she would not have been angry; and therefore her vexation proceeds from some other reason, I mean from her being uncivilly used. Hence it is that a woman of gallantry will often express a greater indignation against those who talk obscenely to her, than a virtuous woman, because she takes it for an insult, and a bloody affront. Her resentment does not proceed from the love of chastity, but from pride and a desire of revenge. As for virtuous women, who are provoked at a gross obscenity, they are so out of a reasonable principle of self-love; for reason requires they should resent an injury which deprives them of the respect due to their sex; and besides, it is very reasonable they should keep up a good reputation, which they could not do, should they suffer the same things to be said to them which are said to lewd women.

Thus I prove that it was impossible to leave out of this Dictionary every thing that sullies the imagination. It must be sullied, which way soever the reader be told that Henry IV had natural children.

It is impossible to prevent objects from fully-ing the imagination.

It is therefore enough for me to keep within the bounds of common civility. If any one was so great a lover of purity, as to wish not only that no immodest desire should arise in his mind, but also that his imagination should be constantly free from every obscene idea, he could not attain his end without losing his eyes and his ears, and the remembrance of many things which he could not choose but see and hear. Such a perfection cannot be hoped for whilst we see men and beasts, and know the signification of certain words which make a necessary part of our language. It is not in our power either to have or not to have certain ideas, when certain objects strike our senses; they are imprinted in our imagination whether we will or not. Chastity is not endangered by them, provided we do not grow fond of them, and approve of them. If chastity was inconsistent with impure ideas, we should never go to church, where impurity is censured, and so many banns of matrimony are bid: we should never hear that office of the Liturgy that is read before the whole congregation on a wedding-day: we should never read the most excellent of all books, I mean the holy Scriptures; and we should avoid, as so many infectious places, all the conversations where people talk of pregnancies, childbirths, and christenings. Imagination is a rambler which runs in a moment from the effect to the cause, and finds the way so well beaten, that it goes from one end to the other, before reason has time to stop it.

There is another consideration which may teach the compilers of Literature, that it is enough for them to keep within the bounds of common decency; I mean, that they must not expect to be read by people, whose ears and imagination are so tender as to receive dangerous impressions from the least obscene object. I do not know whether it was reasonably supposed in ancient Rome, that the filthy words which little children were taught to speak in the chamber of a bride (72), were the first she had heard; but I am persuaded, that in our days, any person of either sex, who has been conversant in the world four or five years, has heard abundance of obscene things, especially in such countries where jealousy is not tyrannical: there people enjoy a great freedom; merry conversations, parties of pleasure, feasts, and country-journies are very common; they only think of passing away the time merrily. It is true, the presence of the fair sex prevents obscenities from appearing bare-faced, but they appear in a disguise; which, as I have shown above, does not hinder the impression of a filthy object, no more than if one should use the plain words of a clown. Women dare not be angry when things are wrapped up (73) for fear of being accounted finical and precise (74). This is a mere dispute about words: the thing signified is admitted, but not all the words

(68) Ibid. viii.

(69) Those for instance which treat of the divorce of Henry VIII, and Catherine of Aragon.

(70) This expression, The parts which it is not fit to name, is accounted very modest, and very chaste; yet it is as significant as any other: It is at bottom naming the thing which we say it is not fit to name; and denoting it in such a manner, that no body can be at a loss to know what it meant.

(71) Compare with this the article BERA, derivation 'bera', where I cite the Art of Thinking.

(72) See the article LITURGY, and remark [6].

(73) See, above, [52].

(74) See, above, [50].

CONCERNING OBSCENITIES.

851

words which signify it. Therefore an author may very well believe that his readers will not be surprized, being strengthened and hardened by custom.

It is certain, that women who read a book of Literature, do not begin with that: they have already read romances, plays, and love poems. They are therefore sufficiently experienced. There is nothing in my Dictionary that can daunt them, after they have encountered such enemies. If the luxurious (75) Music of Opera's, the tenderness of Tragedies, the licentiousness of Comedies, and the affecting descriptions of the effects and disorders of love, make no dangerous impressions upon them, they need not be afraid of reading the articles of ABELARD and HELOISA. If they find shocking passages in my Dictionary, their pain will soon be succeeded by the agreeable pleasure they will feel, in having given to themselves fresh proofs of the strength of their modesty. If they delight in such passages, and spoil themselves by dwelling on them, that will not be my fault, they must blame their own depravity. Do I not shew these things to be criminal?

SECOND question. It cannot be said that there are any obscenities liable to censure in this book, as they consist in the very facts related by me.

This is what I had to say upon the first of the two questions which I was to discuss. I hope the reader will be sensible of the whole force of my justification, and own, that if there is in my Dictionary any obscenity liable to censure, it does not consist in the expressions I use when I speak of myself. Let us inquire now whether it authors, or have only given the sense of them. This is the question I have undertaken to examine.

No man can answer this question in the affirmative, without laying down these two positions: 1. That an Historian is obliged to suppress all the leud actions which are to be found either in the lives of Princes, or in those of private persons. 2. That a Moralist, who condemns leudness, ought never to mention any thing that offends modesty. The Purists I have been speaking of, must necessarily admit these two positions, and it is certain, there have been at all times many people, who have condemned the histories and invectives, in which the disorders of leudness appear under dreadful images.

If our Purists are willing to argue consistently, and to keep constantly to their maxims, they must admit the two positions I have mentioned. They must say, 1. That an Historian ought barely to observe, that Charlemagne, the two Joans of Naples, and Henry IV of France were not chaste. 2. That a Preacher, and a ghostly Father, and any other man who desires the reformation of manners, ought to censure leudness only in general. I have quoted (76) an author, who continually condemns the Historian Mezerai for mentioning some particular facts which offend chaste ears. He censures him particularly for what he says of Margaret de Valois, the first wife of Henry the Great.

There have been such Purists in all ages; but there have always been also great authors who laughed at the scruples and fancies of these men; so that the Republic of Letters has always been divided into two parties upon this head: each of them alleged their reasons and authorities; each of them raised objections, and made answers, and no supreme tribunal did ever determine the matter. I am therefore dispensed with entering upon a long discussion; this affords me a short way to come off. For if they who despised the maxims of the Purists, did always make a considerable party in the Republic of Letters, if they always maintained their right, if that difference has never been decided, every private man may lawfully side with them, and believe at least, that it is probable they are in the right. No man can reasonably be denied the privileges of the doctrine of probability in this case. They who follow the Anti-Purists (77), are not reduced to two or three grave authors: they may be reckoned by hundreds, and may strengthen their cause by the decisive example of the inspired writers (78). If you peruse the book of Genesis you will find that Moses tells us, without any compacts of words, that two daughters having made their father drunk, lay with him, and had children by him (79); that Dinah, Jacob's daughter, was ravished (80); that Judah, the son of the same Patriarch, defiled himself in an open road with a woman he took for a prostitute, but she was his daughter-in-law, and knew him very well (81); that one of the sons of Judah * * * (82); and that Reuben, eldest brother to Judah, committed incest with a wife of his own father (83). There are many things in Leviticus, which are not proper to be read in Protestant churches. An abominable action is related in the book of Judges (84). The Prophets used the most energetic expressions to represent the turpitude of leudness. See also the description of the whore in the Apocalypse. They have used some comparisons which the Ministers durst not mention entire [E]. All the Protestant tradefmen in France could tell the Popish missionaries, disputing

[E] The Prophets used some comparisons, which the ministers durst not mention entire. The following passage of Dr Menjot will serve for a commentary on the text of this remark. Hic obiter observabimus mulierem menstruam dici ἀποκαθήμενν ἅ σήταγμα. . . veteris Testamenti Græci interpretibus, ως πᾶνδς ἀποκα- *ἐκείνην πᾶσα ἡ δεικασμένη ἡμῶν, † omnis nostra justitia est quasi pannus menstruatus; ed quod Israelitica semina dicitur ὅν τὰ κατ' ἑαυτὸν τῶν γυναικῶν, † ut alibi loquuntur, iidem interpretes, during their monthly courses, sedere consueverunt, ut constat ex bis- storâ Rachelis † . . . Idem Eſaias antea dixerat * xxx.*

(75) It is an epistle of Mr. Boileau in his tenth satire.

(76) See, above, citat. (44), (45).

(77) So I call for decency sake those who laugh at the pretended niceness of the Purists.

(78) See the article SPORZA (Catherine) citat. (18).

(79) Gen. xix.

(80) Ibid. xxxiv.

(81) Ib. xxxviii.

(82) Id. ibid.

(83) Ibid. xlix.

(84) Chap. xix.

disputing about the merit of good works, that all our righteousness is as filthy rags; but the remaining part of the passage was unknown to them, because it was not put into Controversial books. Has St Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans (85), such a regard to chaste ears as our Purists require? Does he not describe, both in strong and plain expressions the abominable impurities of the Heathens?

If it be objected, that the sacred writers have privileges peculiar to them, sunt superis sua jura; I answer, that not only the gravest Heathen writers, but also the antient Fathers of the Church, wrote with the same freedom. When Livy does so gravely and majestically relate the suppression of the Bacchanalia (86), he discovers several abominations, which fully the imagination, and cannot be read without horror. Seneca, the gravest and most rigid Philosopher of antient Rome, describes the most infamous lewdness in the plainest words (87). He condemns it with all the severity of a Censor, but at the same time he makes a plain and almost naked description of it. When the Fathers of the Church speak of the Gnostics or Manichees, or such sects, they relate several things which not only defile the imagination, but also make one's stomach rise, and might serve for a vomit. Arnobius, in his invectives against the Heathens, is so little cautious in his words, that Mr de la Fontaine would certainly have dressed such things more cleanly, and had been more reserved in what concerns Priapus. St Augustine, on some occasions, expressed himself in very plain and obscene words (88). St Ambrose and St Chrysostome have done the like; nay, the latter maintained, we ought to do it in order to inspire a true abhorrence for such lewd actions as we describe. Cafaubon did not approve this method [F]; but he must permit us to believe, that his opinion about moral questions, is not to be compared with that of so great a Saint.

If a catalogue was made of all the Historians from Suetonius down to Mezerai, who have grossly related leud actions, it would fill up many pages; and if it be said, that Suetonius has been blamed by famous authors, my adversaries can take no advantage of (86) Titus Livius, lib. xxxix, pag. m. 749, & seq. Note, That Antony de la Faye in his French translation of Livy, has not weakened the original.

(87) See the Héxameron Ru-stique, Journée
II, pag. m. 45,
& seq.

(88) Ibid. pag. 58, & seq.

(x) Antonius Menjotius, de Passione uterina, pag. 4, 5.

λεημύσης ὡς ὕδωρ τῆς ἀποκαθιμένης, ventilabis, hoc est disperges ea (de idolis loquitur) sicut immunditiam menstruat. ut fert textus vulgatae lectionis (x).

[M.] Cajaban did not approve this method.] It becomes him very ill to pretend to be wiser than the ancient Fathers. If the question was about the sense of a passage of Polybius, Suetonius, or Athenaeus, one might reasonably prefer his judgment. But for a man, who made the study of Philological learning his chief business, to pretend to tutor the most holy Fathers of the Church, upon matters of conscience, is what cannot be digested. However, we must acknowledge his candour : he did not dissemble that his censure upon Perusius, might be confuted by the maxims of St Chrysostome ; he very ingeniously quotes the words of that Father, " Poeta aliquin gravissimus, & verecundissime viralis, ut testatur de illo veteres, à moribus suis heic discessit. Sic enim alienam impudicitiam castigat, ut sermonis licentia, etque figuris obfcurati, castas aures offendat merito. Omnino satis eret verecundiam silentio vindicare. Sed nefcio quomodo pervasis etiam sapientissimorum hominum mentes alia opinio, obfuscantem obfuscatante at libere falfam ditione effe castigandum. Quod quam à recta ratione alienum ? & tamen summis viris ita olim placuit. Quis fine robore que de speculo Hostii scriptis Seneca legat, paulo qui fit αἰδουμένωτες? quid beatus Hieronymus, ille taustus calificatis & virginitatis buccinator? nonne & ipse aliquando in turpia turpicule invether? sane quidem: neque id uno loco. Sed caufam quem viros graves compulsi, ut ita sentirent, attaque scriberent, aperit Johannes Chrysostomus, plenum ille omni virtute & sanctimoniam pectus. At ille homilia quarta in epistolam ad Romanos, eos quorum est scopus flagitia hominum nequam attaque impudicum reprehendere, cogi necessarium fedatitate illorum denudare, & quasi ob oculos spectandum proponere: quia parum aliter profecturi sint." *Αν μὲν γὰρ, inquit, σιωπῶς εἴπωσι, ὁ δυνήσκει καθίστασθαι τὸ ἀκούον· ἐάν τε βαλόντις κατὰ ψαλμοὺς σφοδράς, ἀναγκηὴν ἔχεισι ἀπογυμνάσαι τοὺς σαφένους τὸ λεγόμενον. Solet etiam in eam rem chirurgi exemplum afferre, qui ut tabo ac fanie manans ulcus sanet, non venter sibi manus inquinare, atque in feculentiffimum pus immittere. Οἱ ἱατροί, inquit, in priorem ad Corinthios, συνεπέδοις ἐκβαλλοῖν βυχομένοις, ὡς σκοπεῖ πῶς καθερὰ διατηρήσει τις χεῖρας, ἀλλ' οὗτοι αὐτὸν ἐν ἀπειλάσιν συνεπέδοι. Quam sententiam totidem fere verbis sepe repetit, idemque in eam ad

Theſſalonienſes diſtinguendum monet, utrum dicantur ejufmodi ſermones, ἐξ οὐκείων ἀνδρῶν, καὶ ἀνεπιτορίας: ex loquentis affertus, an curandi voluntate (y). --- Perſus, a Poet, very grave, and exceedinglꝝ modest; as the Antients testify of him, did bere depart from his character. For he laſhes immoderately and leudeſis in ſuch a manner, that the licentiouſneſs of his expreſſions, though veiled and wrapped up in figures, gives juſt offence to the moſt ſober reader. It had been much better for him to have cenſured immoderately by ſilence. But I know not how it has happened, that even the wiſeſt men are come into an opinion, that obſcenity muſt be laſhed by obſcenity, or at leaſt by licentious expreſſions. How unreaſonable and abſurd is this opinion! and yet it has been received in antient times by the moſt eminent men. Can any moſt perſon read without bluſhing what Seneca has written concerning the mirror of Heliſius? And even St Jerom, who is highly extolled chaſtity and virginity, do he not ſometimes twiſt againſt filthy manners, in a filthy manner? He certainly does, and that in more than one place. The reaſon wherewith induced ſober and grave men to think and write in this manner is explained to us by John Chryſoſtome, a man of the moſt conſummate virtue and piety. In his fourth Homily on the Epistle to the Romans he ſays, that they who purpoſe to censure the vices of leud and proſtigate men, lie under a neceſſity of unveiling their leudeſis, and of expoſing it as it were naked; becauſe otherwiſe their cenſures would do no good. For, ſays he, if your expreſſions are decent and modeſt, you will not be able to gain the attention of your hearers; but if you would force their attention, and ſtrike your audience, you are under a neceſſity of giving them an open and naked account of things. He likewiſe alludes upon this ſubject the example of a ſurgeon, who when he would cure a ſore that emits a filthy corrupt matter, is not afraid of ſtaining his hands, and putting them into the moſt filthy ſore corruption. The Surgeon, ſays he, upon the firſt Epistle to the Corinthians, when he would remove the corrupt matter, is not follicitous about keeping his hands clean, but only about curing the ſore. This ſentence he frequently repeats almoſt in the ſame words; and upon the Epistle to the Theſſalonians, he obſerves that we muſt diſtinguiſh between licentious expreſſions, when they come from the heart, and have the approbation of the perſon who uſes them, and when they proceed only from a deſign of reſtraining men from immodesty. See the margin (z).

(g) Casab.
Comment. in Perf. Sat. IV,
pag. m. 344, 8
seq.

(u) Note, That St Crysostom, and Cajetan hold upon this a true point of morality: we will leave it to be discussed in a controversy in good manner, and the other is contrary to them. Wherefore I might say, that in a case of conscience and morality Cajetan's judgment ought not to be preferred; and I might say it without answering any thing contrary to what I have just said, that the thing I could be hard for social to be a Grammarian affair.

[G] Those ^{of} the of it, since those who vindicate him, are as eminent as those who find fault with him [G].

There is a vast number of Moralists who have deplored the corruption of their age, and given a plain and naked account of the several excesses committed in it (89). I do not pretend to excuse all the Casuists; but I can positively affirm, that in the Church of Rome none of them can avoid saying many things that offend modesty. It is well known, that Father Natalis Alexander declared for rigid Morality, and was engaged in many quarrels upon that account. I perused the other day in his Moral Doctrines what concerns the sins forbidden by the seventh commandment (90), and hardly found any period in it, but what contains gross obscenities: and yet I think he is one of those who treat such matters with the greatest modesty; but it is a subject that does not permit a writer to have a tender regard for modesty. The same may be said of the Canonists (91), and those who write Anatomical books: and to shew that to this very day men of a good taste and great politeness side with the Anti-Purists, I shall set down a passage of the author, who criticized Mr de St Evremond. Do not we see still, says he (92), in the Theological treatises of human actions, the explication of all the leud thoughts and actions that can be suggested by lust? Those explications are not contrary to modesty, being necessary to those whom God has appointed for the direction of others, who ought to have a perfect knowledge of sins, with all their circumstances, in order to make a sinner sensible of the condition he is in, and work his repentance. But if you insist, that those treatises are inconsistent with modesty; find out a science more contrary to it than Anatomy, wherein all the parts of human bodies are viewed? Yet there is no law against those who teach it (93).

The party of the Anti-Purists would be more numerous than it is, were it not that the vanity or malice of the Critics engage several writers to side with the contrary faction. There is hardly any book but what is criticized, and narrowly examined; and if there are any thoughts or expressions in it that want a certain niceness, with regard to obscenity, several writers will rise up against it, and express a great zeal for offended modesty (94). They fall upon that topic, and raise many clamours. Nothing can be more easy, nor more proper to prepossess the public. A Critic who strikes upon that key is cried up by devout and polite people, and accounted the protector of purity: this is the reason which induces him to declare for the Purists. He raises his reputation two ways: he sets up for a man who is concerned for good manners, and who converses with the polite world. This is only a piece of craft in an author: Morality is no farther concerned in it than is necessary to form a fair out-side. Many who criticize books only in conversation, follow the footsteps of the Critics in print.

How many people inveighed against the book de contactibus impudicis, and the Historia Flagellantium (95), because Dr Boileau was none of their cabal in the faculty of Theology? Had the author been of their party, who is a man famous for his probity and learning, they would have approved his giving a lively description of the obscenities censured by him; but because they did not love him they sided with the Purists.

But though this faction be ever so numerous, either through such motives, or more honourable ones, it is certain the contrary party is considerable enough to justify those who stand for it. The authority of the ancient Fathers of the Church who followed it, and therein imitated the Prophets and Apostles, makes their opinion so highly probable, that if any one should obstinately maintain that it cannot be held with a safe conscience, he would not deserve to be minded.

If the Purists were contented to say that their opinion is better, we might think ourselves obliged to debate the matter with them, and to compare together the reasons

[G] Those who vindicate Suetonius are as eminent as those who find fault with him. Besides what I have quoted in another place (a e), I shall set down here a fine passage of Henry Glareanus. De vitiis differtio sive disputatio duplex est. Una, qua ad vicia homines allicimus suasionibus, exhortationibus, ac leuociniis: ut qui amare docent nostra ætate, prohi-[8].

(bb) Henricus Lorius Glareanus, Prefat. in Sueton. apud Goldast. Prolegom. in Petronium, cap. ii, pag. m. 30.

lor! etiam potare, qui amatoria ludunt, ut iuuenum mentes veluti inebriant, quales impudici Poetæ. Ea differtio vitiosa est ac detestanda, maxime homini Christiano, plus etiam illis, qui iuuentuti ut magistri præsent. Altera est differtio de vitiis, ut ea detestemur ac execremur: imò quoties de eis fit mentio, ut ab iis dehortemur, ab iis abstinemus, & execremur. Hæc differtio nequitiam reprehendenda est; multi enim sancti viri ac Doctores quemadmodum de virtutibus scriperunt, ita e regione de vitiis copiose differuerunt. Itaque Cæsarem refert vicia Suetonius, in odium illorum monstrorum id facit, ut ea scilicet fugiamus ac evitemus: imò cogitemus in quanta cæcitate fuerint perditii illi nebulones: & multò magis in quanta stupiditate mundus, qui talia portentosa dignatus est ullo honore, cum nihil illis terribius ac magis abominabile fuerit (bb). - - - Discourses on vice are of two sorts, one wherein by persuasions, exhortations, and allurements the authors entice us to the practice of vice; such are they who in our days instruct people how to carry on intrigues and amours, (how shameful a thing is this?) they who bring people into a habit of drinking, they who write amorous plays, and thereby, as it were, intoxicate the minds of youth, such as the leud Poets. This sort of discourse is vicious and to be detested by all men, especially Christians, and still more by those who have the charge and inspection of youth. The other kind of discourse on vice is that which is designed to raise an abhorrence and detestation of it, and to refrain, dissuade, and frighten, us from the practice of vice, as often as it is mentioned. Discourses of this kind are far from being blameable, for many pious men and many Divines, as they have employed their pens on the subject of virtue, have on the other side written at large concerning vice. Thus Suetonius, by relating the vices of the Cæsars, designed to raise our hatred and abhorrence of those monsters, and to make us avoid their example; nay, to make us consider how blind those abandoned wretches must have been, and in what a woful stupidity the world must have been sunk, when they went so far as to pay them any honours, since nothing in nature could be more base, foul, and abominable, than those prodigies of vice.

(89) See among others Joannes Sarisburiensis, Bishop of Chartres, de nugis Curialium, lib. iii, cap. xiii, who alludes to the example of St Paul in his excuse.

(90) Or, the sixth, according to the Roman Catholics.

(91) When they explain the title de Frigidis and other matrimonial subjects.

(92) Dissertat. sur les Oeuvres de Mr de St Evremond, pag. 216, 217. Paris 1698.

(93) Mr De-vaux, Prevost of the Society of Surgeons at Paris, has published a book mentioned in the xxix Journal des Savans, for the year 1703. Tho' the Journalists censure the obscenities of that author, they nevertheless transcribe some of them.

(94) Luther, whose expressions were very free, censured Erasmus. See the answer of the latter, pag. 34, 35.

(95) That there were other books much pernicious, printed at Paris, and written by some Doctors, against which the sacred faculty should thunder out anathemas, whereas they were silent; whereupon he named a set of books, among which that of Dr Boileau de Of Contactibus impudicis was one. Afsire de Marie d'Agreda, pag. 11.

AN EXPLANATION

of both parties, though in truth it seems very strange that Christians should question whether there is a better course to be taken than that of the sacred writers. However we might yield our right, hear their objections, and propose our difficulties. I have no need of such discussions; it is enough for me that the conduct of the Historians or Censurers, who relate obscene things, is not only allowed and authorized by a constant practice, but also very good.

For if those authors could lawfully write what I have written, I might imitate them, and lawfully quote them. I desire no more. Others may examine, if they please, whether I had done better in taking quite another method.

The right I have to quote what I have quoted, is grounded upon two reasons: one is, that if every body is allowed to read Catullus and Martial, &c. an author may be allowed to quote out of those Poets such passages as he thinks fit: The other is, that if it be lawful for an Historian to relate a lewd action of Caligula, an author may relate an obscene thought or remark of Montagne or Brantome; for such a thought or remark is not near so criminal as the infamous actions of Caligula. Whoever has a right to mention the latter, has à fortiori a much greater right to mention the former: and it would be a contradiction or an absurdity, to suffer that Petronius and Suetonius, and the most lascivious Poets, should be printed and publicly sold with notes explaining their most brutish obscenities, and to forbid the author of a Critical Dictionary, attended with a Commentary, to alledge a passage of those writers for the confirmation or illustration of some particular.

An answer to
three objections.

Here I must examine three objections that are commonly raised: It is said that a Physician and a Casuist are obliged, by the nature of their subject, to rake into many filthy things, but that my work required nothing like it. 2. That they who write in Latin, may take a liberty which the French tongue will not bear. 3. That what was allowable in former ages, ought to be forbidden in ours, because of its prodigious corruption.

The first objection can only be made by such readers as are utter strangers to the nature of my book. It is not a book like those that are intituled Bouquet Historial, Fleurs d'Exemples, Parterre Historique, Lemnici Historiarum, in which an author inserts only what he pleases. It is an Historical Dictionary with a Commentary. LAIS ought to have a place in it as well as LUCRETIA; and because it is a Dictionary which comes out after several others, it ought chiefly to contain what is not to be found in others. The reader must find in it, not only a general account of such actions as are most known, but also a particular narrative of those which are least known, and a collection of what is dispersed in several places. Proofs ought to be alledged, examined, confirmed, and cleared. In a word, it is a compilation. Now every body ought to know, that a compiler, who relates things, and comments upon them, has all the privileges of a Physician, and of an Advocate, &c. as occasion requires; he may use their verbal processes, and their terms of art. If he gives an account of the divorce of Lotharius and Teiberga, he may publish extracts from Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, who wrote the impurities that were averred in that trial (96). This is what I said in my Remarks upon the pretended Judgment of the Public, in the year 1697. I repeat it with this other passage: 'When I am let into the secret of collecting in a compilation all that the Antients have said concerning the courtesan LAIS, without mentioning lewd actions, I shall own myself guilty. It must at least be proved against me, that a Commentator has not the privilege of collecting whatever has been said of Helen; but how can it be proved? Where is the Legislator who has told the compilers, Hilberto you may go, but you must advance no further: You must not quote Athenæus, nor such a Scholiast, nor such a Philosopher? Has it not been their constant practice to make their writings as full and extensive as their reading (97)? I could name many Divines, who having pitched upon a certain subject, have quoted out of all authors whatever they thought fit, though they were things that defiled the imagination; I shall only name three, Lydius (98), Saldenus, and Lomeier. They were Dutch Ministers, the first at Dort, the second at the Hague, and the third at Zutphen. They were very much esteemed for their learning and virtue. Whoever reads the dialogues of the first concerning nuptial ceremonies (99), the Dissertations of the second de Canis pretio, and de Eunuchis (100); and the Dissertation of the third concerning kisses (101); will find in them horrid obscenities, and abominable quotations.

It will be said, that those books are written in Latin. This is the second objection I am to answer, and I shall shew easily the weakness of it: for an obscene object is no less offensive to modesty, when it offers itself in Latin to those who understand Latin, than when it offers itself in French to those who understand French; and if it were a fault to imprint obscene objects in our own and the reader's imagination, these three Ministers could not be justified. They understood what they wrote, and made it intelligible to their readers, and consequently they have defiled their imagination, and do every day defile the imagination of those who read their books. But were it not a very unjust thing to charge them with such immorality? They who write in French ought not therefore to be charged with it, for they do no more than understand what they write, and make it intelligible to their readers.

I know

(96) These words are taken from my Remarks upon a piece intituled, The Judgment of the Public, &c. &c. &c.

(97) Ibid. xxxv.

(98) Yam.

(99) I have given the title of it in the article LYDIUS, remark [B].

(100) In the book intituled, Orta Theologia, printed in the year 1684.

(101) In a book, intituled, Diserta Genialium five Differentiarum Philologiarum Decas I. printed in 1694.

CONCERNING OBSCENITIES.

855

I know two differences will be alledged, one is, that they who understand Latin, are not so many as they who understand French: The other is, that they who understand Latin are better provided than others, against the malignant influence of obscene objects. I make three answers to this. I answer in the first place, that Latin is understood by so many people all over Europe, that the first difference would not be sufficient to justify those who relate or quote obscene things in that language; the mischief would still be great, and very great. I answer in the second place, that it is only by degrees Latin obscenities would still have a dangerous effect upon young scholars. We hardly find, generally speaking, that they are more chaste and less debauched than other young men. Lastly, I say that most of my readers are persons who have applied themselves to study; for they who have not studied, little mind a book intermixed with Greek and Latin passages as mine is. However, they cannot understand the chief obscenities, since they are in Latin. I conclude, that if there is any solidity in the differences objected to me, I may make an advantage of it.

I proceed to the third objection, which concerns the great corruption of our age. We have lost say they, modesty both in morals, and in expressions. The words that were formerly modest, are no longer so; we must use others which only excite modest ideas: otherwise we should lose the little virtue that remains. I shall not examine whether there is any reason to believe that men are now more corrupt than they were in former times (102). The same complaints have been made at all times (103), and that corruption of our age is equal to that of the reign of Charles IX, and Henry III. But allowing it to be so, I shall draw a quite contrary conclusion from it; for it is never so necessary to represent in a strong and lively manner the turpitude of vice, as when it prevails most [H]; and it is a wrong way of stemming the current of lewdness, to cry it down with soft words, and to scruple to give an odious name to a prostitute. Besides, if there is so great a corruption, what benefit has the world got by that chastity of words introduced into the French tongue within these sixty years, according to Mr Chevreau's calculation (104)? Is it not a proof that the proscription of pretended obscene ideas is an insignificant remedy? Who told you they ought to be proscribed, for fear of entirely destroying modesty? Have you consulted the women for whose sake you chiefly abstain from those words? Have they confessed to you, that their honour is very much endangered by them? Would they not rather say, that you slander them if you

(102) I am willing to own that certain orders of men are more corrupt than they were formerly; this is what I meant by these words in my Remarks on the Judgment of the Public: We would appear wiser than our Fathers, and we are not so wise as they were.

(103) See a fine passage relating to this in the third volume of Vigeneul Marville's Melanges.

(104) See, above, citat. (1).

[H] It is never so necessary to represent in a strong and lively manner the turpitude of vice, as when it prevails most. See, above (cc), what induced Peter Damian to write the Gomorrhæus, and consider how the Dominicans resolved to preach against Sodomy, when they came to know that it was grown very common. Preaching being allotted to them, they deliberated whether they should thunder out against that sin, or say nothing of it; and they concluded that there was a necessity to thunder out against it, since it was grown so crying. Frater Ordinis Prædicatorum, qui eum apud Christianos locum invasissent, quem olim apud Gentiles obtinebant Poeta & Satyrici, in tracta, de Turciis: Quæsitum extitit de gravi infectione populi Christiani, quoad prædicta vitia (Sodomitica) an videlicet tam gravis infectio ex negligentia officii prædicationis contingeret, dum ipsi prædicatorum gravitatem hujus vitii fidelibus non proponerent? Quæsitumque ulterius extitit, an propter simplices & innocentes expediret Prædicatoribus sub silentio pertransire de hujusmodi vitii differendo? Responsum fuit, quod quia officium prædicationis est præcipuum in Ecclesia ad extirpationem vitiorum & plantationem virtutum, si gravitas hujus vitii fidelibus ardentius proponeretur, ut quia videlicet pro vindicta clamat ad cælum, &c. Ad secundum quæsitum responsum fuit, quod omnino sub silentio pertransire non expediret, etiam propter quoscunque innocentes, multiplici ratione. Primò, quia videmus quod tales innocentes, etiam ex diabolica suggestione continuè seducuntur abque auditione verbi Dei, & declaratione illorum vitiorum. Unde utrique tam reis quam innocentibus expedit talis declaratio verbi Dei. Secundò ad hoc nos admonet Scriptura, prout est illud; Si non annuntiaveris iniquitatem ejus, sanguinem ejus de manu tua requiram. Et iterum; Clama, ne cesses: annuncia populo meo scelera eorum. Ratione etiam concludatur. Nam Apostolus Paulus expressissimè loquitur ad Roman. i. de hujusmodi vitiiis, & sicut cuncta alia scripta ipsius necessariò prædicantur, ita & præsens hæc materia, cum non sit data distinctio inter suas doctrinas, quare videlicet una magis debeat esse prædicabilis quam altera. Ad hoc est Gregorius in Moralibus; Sicut incauta locutio in errorem pertrahit, ita indiscretum silentium in errore relinquit (d.d.). - - - A question was started (dd) Goldast. concerning the exceeding corruption of manners; which prevailed among the Christians, namely, whether the Sodomitical practices to which they were addicted, ought to be imputed to the remissness of the preachers, who forbore to inculcate the heinousness of such crimes? There was also started another question, viz. Whether out of a regard for the simple people, who were ignorant of these crimes, the preachers ought to pass them over in silence? To the first of these questions it was answered, that because the chief office in the Church, was that of preaching, an office designed for the rooting out of vice, and implanting of virtue, if the heinousness of that crime was represented to Christians in its strongest colours, and as crying for vengeance from Heaven, &c. To the second question it was answered, that it ought not to be passed over in silence, for the sake of over so great number of people ignorant of these crimes; and that for many reasons. First, because we see that such people are continually seduced to vice by the suggestions of the Devil, when they hear not the word of God preached to them, and the heinousness of these vices declared. And therefore such a declaration of the word of God was necessary both for the guilty and innocent. In the second place the Scripture enjoins it; as in that passage. If thou declarest not to the wicked the iniquity of his ways, I will require his blood at thy hands: and again in this, cry aloud and spare not, and declare to my people their transgressions. This was further confirmed by reason. For the Apostle Paul in his Epistle to the Romans, mentions this kind of vice in expressive terms, and as all his other writings ought to be the subject of preaching, so ought also the present matter since there is no distinction made between the doctrines of that Apostle, nor any reason assigned why one may not be preached as well as any other. Moreover Gregory says in his Morals, as an unwary speech seduces people into error, so an injudicious silence suffers them to abide in it.

(cc) Remark [B], of the article DAMIAN.

you believe they are not proof against an idea and a word? Would they not tell you, that if they are for words, that express lewdness faintly, it is in order to give a better idea of their virtue which has a stronger attachment to modesty, than that of their predecessors? They are not therefore afraid to be seduced by obscene objects. Such objects would rather give a new strength to their modesty. They are only offended with them, because they think there is some unpoliteness and incivility in certain words. They who pretend that considering the prodigious corruption of our age, all stories which they call obscene, ought to be avoided, are like a traveller, who in order to keep his dirty cloak from soiling, should take care not to put it in a smocking room. If the depravation is so great, that the reading of an obscene Historical fact might excite young people to commit adultery, you may be sure these young people are so many persons infected with the plague, whom you are afraid of making worse, by placing them near a man who has got the Itch. A polite style, and nice expressions will not cure such people, and stop them upon the brink of a precipice.

Certainly this is the Sophism called, à non causa pro causa. - - - - - To assign for the cause of a thing, what is not the true cause of it. The fate of chastity does not depend upon that: you do not go to the source of the evil; it requires a quite different remedy. Young people have their minds full of obscene thoughts, and go through a course of filthy obscenities, at least in words, before they read Suetonius. Ill conversations, unavoidable to every lad who is not under continual inspection, are a thousand times more dangerous than Histories of debauchery. A learned man says, that the French translation of Plutarch by Amyot, is dangerous to morality, because things are described in it with too great freedom and plainness, and there are some words in it that have now an immodest signification (105). He will give me leave not to be of his opinion. The descriptions and phrases of Amyot's translation have nothing in them that comes up to those that are daily heard and used in the world. To which I add, that if this version of Plutarch was dangerous to Morality, any other version of Plutarch would be so too, unless the translator took care to leave out all the passages wherein things are described with too great freedom and plainness.

(105) Dacier, Preface to his translation of some lives of Plutarch.

There is no medium: either a book must never mention any impure action, or our censurers must own it will always be dangerous, though written ever so nicely. One translation will be more polite than the other; but if they are faithful, the obscene objects that are in the original will appear in them.

Mr Chevreau affirms, that faire des enfans is a gross expression, and that we should say avoir des enfans and this may be granted to him; but if any one should further say, that the first expression is very prejudicial to good manners, and that the second is very beneficial to them, he would be accounted a silly foolish man.

Upon a due examination of things, it will appear that the word paillard ought to be rejected only for the same reason that we reject the words contaminer, vilipender, viluperer, and a great many old French words: That is, it has no other fault but to be obsolete. They who have nice ears would be grated with the words I have just now mentioned. For the same reason they are offended with the words paillard, and paillardise; for if the thing signified by them was the cause of their disgust, they could not endure the word impudique, whose idea is no less significant than that of paillard.

THE inconsistency of the Purists.

I shall make two further observations: the first is, that our Purists approve in general what they condemn in particular. Ask a Roman Catholic who is an enemy to the Quietists, whether an Historian ought not to avoid touching upon things that fully the imagination? He will answer you, it is his duty to do so. Tell him some days after, that a relation of Quietism is come out, containing a particular account of the abominable impurity of Molinos's followers; give him to understand that you have been offended with the reading that book, and that modesty cannot bear such things; he will answer you, that it is necessary to discover the abomination of those hypocrites, in order to undeceive many people who are inclined to Quietism, and that the author of that relation is therefore to be commended for exposing to the public view the infamous practices of that sect. You will find a thousand other persons who will agree with you, that we cannot have too great a regard for modest ears, and will exclaim with great zeal against Suetonius and Lampridius: but if you ask them some days after, whether we ought to excuse the Historians who have related so many abominable things concerning the Albigenses, the Fratricelli, Adamites, Picards, Lollards, and Turlupins, they will answer that the character of Historians and zealous Catholics, engaged them to acquaint the world with the obscenities of those heretics, the forerunners of the Lutherans.

The English Papists, who fled into France or Spain, did not offend the chaste ears of their friends, when they published several satires against Queen Elizabeth, wherein they represented her as a monster of lewdness. The Leaguers did not blame the libels, which contained impudent descriptions of the lewdness of the court of Henry III.

CONCERNING OBSCENITIES.

857

The same inconsistency is observed among the Protestants. They did not complain that those libels against Henry III their persecutor, were offensive to chaste ears. Buchanan, who published a book concerning the lewdness of Mary Queen of Scotland (106), is a man of blessed memory among all the Presbyterians; and yet that book horribly defiled the imagination. Nicolas de Clemangis, Pelagius Alvarez, Baptista Mantuanus, and several others, who made a very plain and obscene description of the lewdness of the Court of Rome, are placed by the Protestants among the witnesses of truth. They quote them to this very day upon all occasions, and long passages out of those authors are to be found in most controversial books. You will find many of them in a French book of the famous du Pleffis Mornai (107): not long since three Ministers, two of whom are Swifts, and the third a French-man (108), have revived those quotations. Henry Stephens, who tells so many obscene stories in his apology for Herodotus, did not displease those of his party: that book was thought very proper to ridicule the Church of Rome, and was approved upon that account; there are several editions of it, of silly jests, quirks, and mean and obscene words, than what is to be found in some books of Sainte Aldegonde, who nevertheless was very much esteemed and praised. The book which a German advertised in the Nova Literaria Maris Baltici in the year 1699, which is to be intitled, Sacra Pontificiorum Priapeia, seu obscene Papistarum in auricularibus confessionibus questiones, quibus S. Confessionarii innocentes puellas feminasque ad lasciviam sollicitant, will doubtless meet with a very favourable reception, and yet it will be very offensive to chaste ears, since it will contain a collection of the obscene questions of confessors. This puts me in mind of the illustrious Peter du Moulin, who objected to the Roman Catholics the obscenities that are to be found in their books concerning auricular confession. He took notice (109) of some that are horrid, and no less abominable than the lewdness wherewith Procopius accuses the Empress Theodora. Several Protestants controversialists (110) have published the obscenities that are to be found in the books of confessors.

But to speak of a thing of a later date, I say that the book intitled Les Aventures de la Madona & de François d'Assise, published (111) in the year 1701, is indeed written in very modest words; but the ideas which the author (112) excites in the mind of the reader, are so infamous, horrid, and monstrous, that none but Lucian, and such like men, can bear their enormity. The Protestants are not offended at it; on the contrary, they believe that the author designing to make every body sensible of the ridiculousness of Popery without engaging in any controversy, has done a service to the good cause. Some complaints have been made of what he says in favour of Nestorius, but he has not been blamed for the other things he advanced, which, as I have said already, startle, terrify and smite both the soul and body (113). The Bishop of Meaux being obliged to mention a thing of the same nature in order to shew the extravagance of a fanatical woman (114), thought he had contracted some uncleanness, and for a remedy had recourse to this prayer: 'But let us pass to another subject: and thou, O Lord, If I durst, I would beseech thee to send one of thy seraphims with a hot burning coal to purify my lips defiled with this narrative, though necessary (115).' Take notice of this last word: it makes much against those who say that the imagination of the reader ought to be regarded even at the expence of truth. That prelate, who is otherwise so careful to avoid obscenities, that he dares not use the word paillarde (whore) without making an excuse for it (116); did not think that the obscene and horrid extravagances of Madam Guyon ought to be suppressed.

I do not mean, that generally speaking, all the Protestants who have behaved as I have mentioned, design to bring Histrorians, Compilers, and Commentators under the yoke of the Purists. I only believe that several of them pretend to do it in general; but since they approve afterwards when they come to particulars, what they had condemned; their taste and their testimony can do me no prejudice, and I may take advantage of the opinion of all the rest who are consistent with themselves, both in general and in particular.

It cannot be pretended that for the good of the Church, an author may be allowed to write things that sully the imagination, and that in this case he is to be commended for doing it: this assertion I say cannot be admitted; for if the publishing of obscenities was an ill thing in itself, it could not be used for the benefit of the good cause, without transgressing against a command of God, importing that we must not do evil, that good may come (117).

I proceed to the second observation. Have I not acted against this precept of Isocrates, believe that whatever cannot be honestly done, cannot be honestly spoken (118)? And ought not this precept to be a law to all Christians, since St Paul would not have any thing that is filthy to be named among them (119)? I answer, that this excellent axiom condemns only the ill custom [I] which prevails both among young people and married men,

[I] That excellent axiom condemns only the ill custom. Here follows the observation of a Commentator upon these words of Isocrates. Prohibetur hic omnis vis- VOL. V.

* χρονολογία καὶ βλασφημία καὶ κακηνόρεια: qui- bus nihil est indocto vulgo jucundius aut usitatus, cum nihil sit turpius & homine indignius. . . Huc accerfator D. Pauli (106) See the article BUCHANAN, citat. (9).

(107) Intituled, Le Myſtere d'Iniquité.

(108) Mr. Piddgott, in his Hiſtoria Papatus, in the year 1684; and in Magna Babyloae, in the year 1687; Mr. Zuinger, in Traſtatu de ſeſſo Corporis Chriſti, in the year 1688; and Mr. Jurieu, in his Prejuices Le-gitimes contre le Papiſme, in the year 1685.

(109) Le bis Nouveauté du Papiſme.

(110) Mr. Jurieu among others, in his Apologie de la Reforma-tion, Tom. i, pag. 150, & ſq. Edit. in 4to.

(111) At Am-ſterdam.

(112) See the article NESTO-rius, remark [H].

(113) But what dream was it, and what did that woman ſee? A mountain, in which ſhe was received by Jeſus Chriſt; a chamber where ſhe aſhed, whom ſhe ſaw were for it There is one for my mother, and another for you my ſpouſe. And a little after, I have choſen you to be here with me. Biſhop of Meaux's Relation, ſur le Quiet-tiſme, pag. 28. Bruxelles 1698.

(114) Id. ibid.

(115) This holy Apoſtle took care not to call the prostitute he ſpeaks of, an adul-teress, μοιχεύουσα, but a public wo-man, and if I may be allowed to uſe but once theſe odious names, a whore, a prostitute, πόρνος. Id. Preface to the Revelation, pag. 27, of the edition printed at the Hague.

(116) Rom. iii. 8.

(117) * Ἄ πορ-νὴν ἀνθρώπου ταῦτα νομίζετε ἵνα λέγουν, εἶναι καλόν. Quæ factu ſunt turpia, ne dictu quidem decora eſſe puta. Iſocrates ad Demoni-cum, pag. m. 6.

(118) Eph. v.

men,

(120) Nec vero audiendi sunt Cynici, aut si qui fuerunt Stoici pene Cynici, qui reprehendunt & irident, quod ea, quæ re turpia non sint, nominibus ac verbis flagitiosa dicamus: illa autem quæ turpia sint, nominibus appellamus suis. Latrocinari, fraudare, adulterare, re turpe est; sed dicitur non obicere: Liberi dare operam re honestum est, nomine obicere: pluraque in eam sententiam ab eisdem contra verendum disputantur. Nos autem naturam sequamur, & omne quod abhorret oculorum auriumque approbatione, fugiamus. . . . Nor should we listen to the Cynics, or those almost Cynical Stoics, who censure and deride us, because we esteem some things scandalous and filthy in names and words, which in reality are not so; and call some things by their proper names, which are really filthy. To rob, defraud, or commit adultery, are in themselves scandalous actions, but they are mentioned without obscenity. To get children, men, to speak on all occasions of their lewd practices, and impudently to discourse of every thing relating to that sort of sensuality. It is at least certain that the apostle never meant that men should forbear talking seriously, honestly, and historically of a lewd action. He did not deprive parents of the liberty of examining their children concerning the Historical facts contained in the Bible, and making them repeat that Jacob's daughter was ravished, that a son of David ravished his own sister, &c. nothing can be more dishonest than this action of David's son; and yet there is no dishonesty in repeating, preaching, and printing it? Could St Paul forbid the mentioning of it? Would he have prohibited the reading of the Bible? Was he not willing that his letters should be read, and that the very children should know what he wrote to the Romans concerning the abominable lives of the Heathens? A man must be mad to think that the precept of Iſocrates means that a school-boy should never give an account to his tutor, or to his father, of such passages of the Iliad as concern the adulteries of the gods.

If one had a mind to carry the dispute to the utmost, he might say that robbing, betraying, lying, and killing, are dishonest things, and that there is no dishonesty in mentioning those crimes; but as it is evident that the precept of Iſocrates concerns only sins contrary to chastity, such an objection would be a meer cavil. The Cynics and the Stoics made use of it to justify their doctrine, that there is no obscenity in any word: Cicero confutes them only by supposing that there is a natural shame (120).

It is time to conclude this long dissertation. The clearing up of this matter is more difficult than people imagine. I hope my justification will be fully approved, not by those who are too presumptuous to see that we labour to undeceive them, but by those who have been induced to believe on the credit of other persons, or upon light and superficial reasons. If they were excusable for being dazzled with specious appearances, before I published these four EXPLANATIONS, they can be no longer so if they obstinately persist in their error. They would have done well to follow the command of Jesus Christ, judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgment (121). They have yielded to the first impressions of the objects, without waiting for the reasons on both sides; which is always necessary, especially when we are to judge of a writer who does not follow the most common road. We should immediately suspect that he has some reasons for it, and that he would not make such a step, if upon a long examination of his subject, he had not considered it on every side more carefully than those who only read his work. This well grounded suspicion should have made people very cautious and slow in giving their judgment: but what is done cannot be undone; all that can be hoped is, that their second thoughts will be better than the first.

I shall here acquaint my readers, that in several places of this Dictionary, they will find some apologetical reflections (122) immediately after such things as may offend scrupulous persons.

(121) Hieronym. Wolfius Annotat. in Parmenest. Iſocratis, p. 132.

* D. Pauli præceptum: ἡ ἡμετέρα ἀναλογία ἐν ὑμῖν * grateful to, or more frequently used by the unlearned vul-
* γὰρ, καὶ οὐδὲν ἄλλο τι. Christum etiam ματαιὸς λό- * gar, and nothing more scandalous and unworthy of a
* γὰρ ὑπευδύς ἐποίησε. Sed nos parum curamus, * man. Here let us cite the precept of St Paul; All un- * proh dolor; reddendam Deo rationem de verbis. * cleanness . . . let it not be once named amongst you.
* Nec mirum, cum tam flagitiosa & conscelerata vitæ * Our Saviour likewise says, we shall be accountable to * fit & morum licentia. Væ væ nobis, nisi maturè * God for our very words. Nor is it to be wondered at, * resipuerimus (12). . . . since our lives and manners are so wicked and licentious.
* course is here forbidden, than which nothing is more * Woe, woe unto us, unless we timely repent.

(122) Especially with respect to obscenity.

F I N I S.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

Of all the

EMINENT PERSONS

Treated of in this

DICTIONARY:

Exhibiting the Synchronisms of the times wherein they flourished; and shewing, at one view, which of them were cotemporary.

N. B. We make use of three Æra's, viz. the year of the World, the year of Rome, and the year of our Lord.

A. M.		A. M.		U. C.
100	A DAM , and Eve , his wife.		Andromache , Hector's wife, and Astyanax , their son.		Brutus (Lucius Junius) who expelled the Tarquins.
	Abel , and Cain , his elder brother.		Briseis , a concubine of Achilles.		Bupalus , a Sculptor, and son to Anthermus.
800	Lamech , a descendant from Cain.		Calchas , a Soothsayer.		Calenus (Olenus) a Soothsayer.
1000	Lamech , the father of Noah.		Cassandra , daughter of Priamus.		Darius I. , King of Persia.
1700	Cham , one of Noah's sons.		Cbryseis , a concubine of Agamemnon.		Hippomach , a Greek Poet.
2000	Pharon , King of Egypt.		Egialta , wife of Diomedes.		Lucretia , wife to Collatinus.
2100	Abimelech , King of Gerar.		Helen , wife of Menelaus.		Pythagoras , the Philosopher.
	Abraham , the Patriarch.		Oenone , wife of Paris.		Xenophanes , the Philosopher.
	Agar , his concubine; and Sarah , his wife.		Tecmessa , concubine of Ajax.	250	Cassius Viscellinus (Spurius) a Roman Senator.
2350	Job , the Patriarch.		Tenes , son of Cygnus.		Horatius (Publius) firnamed Cocles.
2525	Aaron , High-Priest of the Jews.	2850	Teucer , son of Telamon.		Simonides , a famous Greek Poet.
	Mary , or Miriam , his sister.		Ulysses , King of Ithaca.	275	Archamenes , brother of Xerxes.
2650	Gazymede , son of Tros, King of Troy.		Ajax , the son of Teucer.		Ameftis , wife of Xerxes.
2700	Europa , daughter of Agenor.		Alcinous , King of the Phæaciens.		Aristides , firnamed the Just.
	Melampus , a famous Soothsayer.	2875	Harpalicus , King of the Amynians.		Ariabannus , the son of Hytaspes.
	Olen , a Greek Poet.	2900	Nauficaa , daughter to Alcinous.		Artemisia , Queen of Caria.
2725	Gorgophone , daughter of Perseus and Andromeda.	2950	Pyrrhus , son of Achilles.		Cbrysi , Priestess of Juno at Argos.
	Perimede , a famous witch.	3075	Samson , a Judge of God's people.		Cimon , the son of Miltiades.
2750	Alcmena , wife of Amphitryon.	3100	Thamyris , a Greek Poet.		Cleonece , a young lady of Byzantium.
	Amphiarauus , the son of Oicles.		David , King of the Jews.		Elcbylus , a tragic Poet.
	Amphitryon , the son of Alcæus.		Agessius I. , King of Sparta.	300	Hiero I. , King of Syracuse.
	Byblis , the daughter of Miletus.		Elijah , the Prophet.		Anaxagoras , the Philosopher.
	Cbryseppus , natural son of Pelops.	3125	Pygmalion , King of Tyre.		Diagoras , a famous wrestler.
	Pelias , the son of Neptune.		Elisba , the Prophet.		Diogenes of Apollonia.
	Talaus , King of Argos.		Lycurgus , the Lacedæmonian Legislator.		Hiero , head of the colony which rebuilt Thurium.
	Tiresias , a famous Soothsayer.	3200	Jonas , the Prophet.		Leucippus , a Greek Philosopher.
2775	Alderus , Hercules's favourite.				Simonides , grandson to the Poet of that name.
	Adonis , minion of the goddess Venus.	U. C.			Zeno of Elea, an eminent Philosopher.
	Adrastus , King of Argos.	1	P Sammatichus , King of Egypt.		Agathon , a tragic and comic Poet.
	Alcinoi , wife of Amphilocheus.	50	Crantor , a Greek Philosopher.	325	Archelaus , a Greek Philosopher.
	Alcmaeon , son of Amphiarauus.	75	Alcman , a Lyric Poet.		Archelaus I. , King of Macedon.
	Amphilocheus , a famous Soothsayer.	100	Archilochus , a Greek Poet.		Aristo , a Greek Philosopher.
	Archifus , father to Æneas.		Judith , a Jewish heroine.		Alphæa , mistress to Pericles.
	Aristus , son of Apollo and Cyrene.	125	Timefius of Clazomenæ.		Democritus , the Philosopher.
	Callirhoi , wife of Alcmaeon.	150	Periander , King of Corinth.		Diagoras , firnamed the Atheist.
	Cinyras , father of Adonis.		Archamenes , grandfather to Cyrus.		Doræus , son of Diagoras the Wrestler.
	Hercules , son of Alcmena.		Alcæus , a Lyric Poet.		Euripides , a tragic Poet.
	Hippote , daughter to Thoas, King of Lemnos.		Lycophron , son to Periander.		Pericles , the Athenian.
	Manto , daughter of Tiresias.		Pæon of Mitylene.		Prodicus , a celebrated Sophist.
	Myrrha , the mother of Adonis.		Sappho , famous for her verses and amours.	350	Zeuxis , a famous Painter.
	Peribæa , wife of Telamon.		Tanaquil , wife of Tarquinius Priscus.		Alphæa , mistress to Cyrus the younger.
	Pygmalion , King of Cyprus.		Tales , one of the seven wise men of Greece.		Berenice , daughter of Diagoras the Wrestler.
2800	Telamon , King of Salamis.	175	Abaris , the Scythian.		Camillus (Marcus-Furius) the Roman Dictator.
	Naufibous , King of the Phæaciens.		Ezop , the first or chief author of fables.		Cyrus , son of Darius Nothus.
	Tamiras of Cilicia.		Ezekiel , the Prophet.		Conon , an Athenian General.
2825	Acamas , son of Theseus.	200	Rhadope , a Courtizan.		Critias , one of the thirty tyrants of Athens.
	Achilles , son of Peleus.	225	Anthermus , a Sculptor.		Euclid of Megara, a Philosopher.
	Ajax , son of Oileus.		Aristas , the Proconnesian.		Hanno , a Carthaginian General.
	Ajax , son of Telamon.		Anacreon , the Poet.
	VOL. V.		Anaxandrides , King of Lacedæmon.
			Bathylas , Anacreon's Minion.

U. C.		U. C.		U. C.
	Lais , a famous Courtesan.	525	Alcæus , cousin-german to Antiochus the Great.	700	Antipater , an Idumean.
	Metredorus of Chios, a Philosopher.		Apollonius of Pergamus, a famous Geometrician.		Artaxerxes I, King of Armenia.
375	Agesilaus II, King of Sparta.		Archimedes , a Greek Poet.		Atticus (Titus Pomponius) one of the most honourable men in ancient Rome.
	Agisipolis I, King of Sparta.		Chrysippus , a Stoic Philosopher.		Berenice , daughter of Ptolemy Auletes.
	Alcæus , a tragic Poet.		Lacydes , a Greek Philosopher.		Catullus (Caius Valerius) a Roman Poet.
	Anaxandrides , a comic Poet.		Pergamum (Attalus, King of).		Cæsar (Caius Julius) first Emperor of Rome.
	Calisthratus , an Athenian Orator.		Pyrrhus , King of Epirus, grandson to the Pyrrhus abovementioned.		Cornelia , wife of Pompey.
	Eneas , or Eneas Tacticus , a Greek author.		Aristarchus , a Greek Philosopher.		Cratippus , a Peripatetic Philosopher.
	Eurydice , wife of Amyntas, King of Macedonia.	550	Dicæarchus , a Macedonian Admiral.		Deiotarus , King of the lesser Armenia.
	Philistus , a Greek Historian.		Artabanus I, King of Parthia.		Demetrius (Magnes) a Greek author.
	Tachus , King of Egypt.	575	Artaxias I, King of Armenia.		Dolabella (Publius Cornelius) Cicero's son-in-law.
400	Artemisia , wife of Mausolus.		Carneades , a famous Greek Philosopher.		Fulvia , wife of Clodius, and afterwards of Marc Antony.
	Asclepiades , a Greek Philosopher.		Diogenes , the Babylonian.		Glaphyra , wife to Archelaus, High Priest of Bellerophon.
	Cotys , King of Thrace.		Metredorus , a Painter and Philosopher.		Hortensius (Quintus) son to the great Orator of that name.
	Diogenes , the Cynic.		Porcius (Marcus) commonly called Cato the Censor.		Mamurra , a Roman Knight.
	Euphratus , a disciple of Plato.		Aristarchus , a Grammarian.		Metellus (Lucius) a tribune of the people.
	Hegesilochus , a licentious debauchee.		Fannius Strabo (Caius) a Roman Senator.		Nigidius Figulus (Publius) a learned Roman.
	Lycurgus , an Athenian Orator.	600	Hipparchus , a great Astronomer.		Surena , General of the Parthians.
	Mausolus , King of Caria.		Titius (Caius) a Latin Poet, and Orator.		Tarpe (Spurius Metius) a licentious plays.
	Olympias , mother to Alexander the Great.		Alburtius (Titus) an Epicurean Philosopher.		Tarruntius (Lucius) surnamed Firmianus, a Mathematical Philosopher.
	Philomelus , General of the Phœceans.	625	Apellicon , who bought Aristotle's library.		Timomachus , a famous Painter.
	Stilpo , the Philosopher.		Attilius , a Latin Poet.		Tullia , Cicero's daughter.
	Theopompus , an Orator and Historian.		Cassius Hemina (Lucius) an Historian.	725	Antony (Marc) one of the Triumvirs.
425	Ada , Queen of Caria.		Cassius Longinus (Lucius) a Judge, famous for his severity.		Antony (Caius) and
	Amastrius , wife of Dionysius, tyrant of Heraclea.		Castor , the Chronographer.		Antony (Lucius) his brothers.
	Apelles , a famous Painter.		Catius , an Epicurean Philosopher.		Archelaus , King of Cappadocia.
	Arifander , a famous Soothsayer.		Fannius (Caius) an Orator.		Artaxerxes , King of Media.
	Arifteus , the Geometrician.		Fannius (Caius) an Annalist.		Artaxerxes II, King of Armenia.
	Arifotle , the Philosopher.		Licinia , a Vestal Virgin.		Bathylas , a freedman of Mæcenas.
	Cleopatra , sister to Alexander.		Lucilius (Caius) a Latin Poet.		Bathylas , a Latin Poet.
	Cleophis , an Indian Queen.		Perfius (Caius) a learned Roman.		Berenice , niece to Herod the Great.
	Dionysius , a Greek Historian.		Sulpicia , wife of Fulvius Flaccus.		Brutus (Marcus Junius) and
	Dionysius , tyrant of Heraclea.		Sulpicia (Lucius) a tragic Poet.		Cassius Longinus (Caius) two of Cæsar's murderers.
	Ephorus , an Orator and Historian.	650	Antony (Marc) the Orator.		Dellius (Quintus) a Greek Historian.
	Harpalus , a Macedonian Lord.		Druſus (Marcus Livius) tribune of the people.		Fannius (Quadratus) a Latin Poet.
	Hipparchia , wife to the Philosopher Crates.		Lævius , a Latin Poet.		Lycoris , alias Cyberis , a famous Courtesan.
	Isfimachus , tutor to Alexander.		Soranus (Quintus Valerius) a learned Roman.		Ligarius (Quintus) one of Cæsar's murderers.
	Macedonia (Alexander the Great, King of).		Andronicus , a Peripatetic Philosopher.		Lollius (Marcus) a Roman Consul.
	Memnon , a Persian General.	675	Andronicus (Marcus Pompius) a Grammarian.		Olavia , wife of Marc Antony.
	Philias , a Grammarian, Critic, and Poet.		Antony (Caius) Cicero's colleague in the Consulship.		Parthenius , a Greek author.
	Philla , daughter to Antipater, Governor of Macedonia.		Antony (Marc) surnamed Creticus.		Pylades , a famous Pantomime.
	Pyrrho , a Greek Philosopher.		Asclepiades of Prusa, a famous Physician.		Porcia , wife of Marcus Brutus.
	Pytheas , author of some Geographical books.		Castorius (Marcus) a Magistrate of Placentia.		Quirinus (Publius Sulpicius) a Roman Consul.
	Pythias , Aristotle's daughter.		Chelidonia , a woman of an ill life.		Severus (Cornelius) a Latin Poet.
	Silanius , a famous Sculptor.		Eſop , reader to Mithridates.		Tyrannion , disciple to the Tyrannion abovementioned.
	Tbais , a Greek Courtesan.		Eſop (Clodius) a celebrated Comedian.		Trebatius (Caius) surnamed Teda, a great Civilian.
	Timoleon , General of the Corinthians.		Fannia , wife to Caius Titinius.		Virgil , the Poet.
	Xenocrates , a Greek Philosopher.		Flora , a Courtesan.
450	Arceſilas , a famous Philosopher.		Fulvia , who discovered Catiline's conspiracy.
	Asclepiades , a Greek Philosopher.		Hortensius (Quintus) a great Orator.
	Bion , the Boryſthenite.		Laberius (Decimus) a Roman Knight and Poet.
	Craterus , author of a collection of the decrees of the Athenians.		Laudice , sister and wife of Mithridates.
	Dicæarchus , a disciple of Aristotle.		Lucretius (Titus) Carus, a Roman Poet.
	Epicurus , the Philosopher.		Metellus Celer (Quintus) a Roman Senator.
	Hermesimachus , an elegiac Poet.		Monima , wife of Mithridates.
	Lamia , a celebrated Courtesan.		Mucia , wife of Pompey.
	Lycophron , a Greek Poet.		Ptolomy Auletes , King of Egypt.
	Timæus , a Greek Historian.		Ratilia , wife of Marcus Aurelius Cotta.
475	Aristo of Chios, a Philosopher.		Servilia , mother to Marcus Brutus.
	Arſinoë , wife of Magas, King of Cyrene.		Servilia , wife to Lucullus.
	Bion , a Bucolic Poet.		Tyrannion , a celebrated Grammarian.
	Cleonymus , son to a King of Sparta.		Valeria , wife to Sylla.
	Danaë , daughter of Leontium.		Zeno of Sidon, an Epicurean Philosopher.
	Duellius (Caius) a Roman Senator.
	Fabritius Lucinus (Caius) a Roman General.
	Leontium , an Athenian Courtesan.
500	Pyrrhus , King of the Epirotes.
	Agis , King of Lacedæmon.
	Amphares , one of the Lacedæmonian Ephori.
	Berenice , wife of Antiochus Theus.
	Cheloni , wife of Cleombrotus, King of Lacedæmon.
	Conon , a Mathematician.
	Hiero II, King of Syracuse.

A. D.

A Liberius Silus (Caius) a famous Orator.
Alfennius Varus (Publius) a Roman Consul.
Antony (Marcus Julius) son of the Triumvir.
Antonia, sister to the foregoing, and mother of Germanicus.
Antonia, younger sister to the foregoing, and wife of Lucius Domitius Ænobarbus.
Cassius Severus (Titus) a famous Orator.
Druſus (Nero Claudius) brother of Tiberius.
Glaphyra, wife to Alexander the son of Herod.

Ovidius

A CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE, &c.

[861]

A. D.		A. D.		A. D.
25	Ovidius Naf (Publius) the Poet. Apelles , an excellent Tragedian. Apion , a Mathematician. Artabanus II, King of Parthia. Artaxias III, King of Armenia. Caligula (Caius Cæsar) Emperor of Rome. Cassius Cherea , Captain of Caligula's guards. Drufilla (Julia) sister to Caligula. Drusus , son of Tiberius. Drusus , son of Germanicus. Lutarius Priscus (Caius) a Roman Knight. Macro (Nævius Sertorius) Captain of Tiberius's guards. Numantina , wife of Plautius Sylvanus. Paulina (Lollia) wife to Caligula. Phædrus , author of the fables. 50 Afer (Domitius) a famous Orator. Afranius Quintianus , a Roman Senator. Apollonius Tyanæus , a most extraordinary person. Burrus (Afranius) Nero's Governour. Claudius (Tiberius) Drusus, Emperor of Rome, and Othavia , his daughter. Phil , the Jew. Quintus Curtius , a Latin Historian. Suetonius Paulinus (Caius) Governour of Numidia, and afterwards of Britain. 75 Akiba , a famous Rabbīn. Andromachus Physician to Nero. Ariabanes III, King of Parthia. Berenice , daughter of Agrippa I, King of Judea. Cassius Longinus (Caius) a great Civilian. Domitia Longina , wife of Domitian. Drufilla , wife of Felix. Fannia , wife of Helvidius. John (St) the Evangelist. Quintilian (Marcus Fabius) a teacher of Rhetoric at Rome. Vespasian (Titus Flavius) Emperor of Rome. 100 Apollodorus , a famous Architect. Aristo (Titius) a Roman Lawyer. Plotina (Pompeia) the wife of Trajan. Tacitus (Caius Cornelius) a great Historian. Trajan , a Roman Emperor. 125 Aminous , Hadrian's Minion. Artemidorus , the Ephesian. Barcocebas , a famous impostor. Cassius (Titus) a teacher of Rhetoric. Fannius (Caius) a Latin author. Hadrian (Publius Aelius) Emperor of Rome. Prodicus , founder of the sect of the Adamites. Suetonius Tranquillus (Caius) an Historian. 150 Apollinaris (Caius Sulpitius) a Grammarian. Apuleius (Lucius) a Platonic Philosopher. Phlegon , surnamed Trallianus , a Latin Author. Polyænus , a Greek author. 175 Athenagoras , an Athenian Philosopher. Cerintus , an Arch-Heretic. 200 Julia , wife of Septimius Severus Emperor of Rome. 225 Artabanus IV, the last King of Parthia. Athenæus , a Greek Grammarian. Babylas , Bishop of Antioch. Origen , a Father of the Church. Amelius , a Platonic Philosopher. 250 Arnobius , Professor of Rhetoric at Sicca. 275 Aurelianus (Lucius Domitius) Emperor of Rome.		Zenobia , wife of Odenatus a Saracen Prince. 300 Sophronia , a Roman lady so called by some modern writers. 325 Acyndinus (Septimius) a Roman Consul. Ahpius , a Philosopher of Alexandria. Arius , the Heretic. Cyril , Deacon of the Church of Heliopolis. Fausla , wife of the Emperor Constantine. 350 Marcellinus (Ammianus) an Historian. 375 Ajax , an Ecclesiastic. Alypius of Antioch. Alypius (Falconius Probus) Prefect of Rome. Arsenius , a Deacon of the Roman Church. Aufonius , a Latin Poet. Heliodorus , Bishop of Trica. Hierocles , son of Alypius of Antioch. Leontius , an Athenian Philosopher. Naxianzen (Gregory) a celebrated Father of the Church. Obsequens (Julius) a Latin writer. Priscillian , a Spanish Heretic. Prudentius , a Christian Poet. Rufinus , a favourite of the Emperor Theodosius. 400 Tbeon , a Greek Sophist. Alypius , Bishop of Tagasta. Augustin (St). Honorius , a Roman Emperor. 425 Nemesius , a Christian Philosopher. Abdai , a Bishop in Persia. Hierocles , a Platonic Philosopher. Nestorius , Bishop of Constantinople. Orosius (Paul) a Spanish Priest. Sedulius (Caius Cælius) a Priest. Severus (Sulpitius) a Lawyer, and afterwards a Priest. 450 Vigilantius , a Spanish Priest. Attila , King of the Huns. Leo I, Pope, surnamed the Great. Marullus a Poet of Calabria. Quintus (Calaber) a Greek Poet. 475 Amable , a Priest of Riom in Auvergne. Bafina , mother to Clovis, King of France. Honorina , sister of Valentinian III. Emperor of Rome. 550 Jornandus , Bishop of Ravenna. 625 Mabomem , the grand impostor. 650 Fatima , daughter of Mahomet. 675 Alpaide , a concubine of Pepin. 700 Lambert , Bishop of Maestricht. 725 Abderame , a great Saracen General. Abumuslimus , a Saracen General. Damascen (John) an illustrious Father of the Lower Empire. Eudo , Duke of Aquitain. Munusa , a Moorish Captain. Virgil , Bishop of Saltzburg. 750 Abucaras (Theodore) a Prelate. 800 Abgillus (John) called in English Prester John. 825 Eginhart , Secretary to the Emperor Charlemagne. 850 Achmet , the son of Seirim. Pope Joan . Radulphus , Archbishop of Bourges. 925 Abudabab , chief of the Karmatians. 975 Aragon (Mary of) wife of Otho III, Emperor of Germany. Capri (Hugh) King of France. 1000 Bolislau , King of Poland. Emma , wife of Ethelred King of England. Otho III, Emperor of Germany. 1025 Artin (Guy) a Benedictine. Alcindus , an Arabian Physician and Astrologer. 1050 Damian (Peter) Cardinal, &c. 1075 Anselm , Archbishop of Canterbury. Bennon , Bishop of Mifnia. 1100 Alcuarius , a Greek Physician.		Arbriffel (Robert d') founder of the Abbey of Fontevraud. Hildebert , Bishop of Mans, &c. Urraca , daughter and heiress of Alphonso VI, King of Leon and Castile. 1125 Abelard (Peter) a famous Divine. Berengarius (Peter) disciple to the foregoing. Bernard (St) Abbot of Clairvaux. Foulques , Prior of Deuil. Helisa , concubine and afterwards wife of Abelard. Tandemus , a German Heretic. Alchabitius , an Arabian Astrologer. 1150 Averrois , an Arabian Philosopher. Bulgarus , a famous Civilian. Jarchi (Solomon) a famous Rabbi. Lewis VII, King of France. Noradin , Sultan of Aleppo. Radulphus , a Benedictine Monk surnamed Flaviacensis. 1175 Harravad (Isaac Ben) a noted Rabbi. Henry IV, Emperor of Germany. Innerius , a German Civilian. Sarifieri (John of) Bishop of Chartres. 1200 Ammonius , surnamed Saccas, a famous Philosopher. 1225 Accursius , Professor of Civil Law. Capile (Blanche of) Queen of France. Elmacin (George) a Saracen Historian. Francis of Assisi, a saint of the Romish Church. Gualdrada , a Florentine lady. Scotus (Michael) a learned author. Thibaut V, Earl of Champagne. 1250 Accursius (Cervot) son to the Professor abovementioned, and Accursius (Francis) his elder brother. Albertus Magnus , Bishop of Ratibon. Colonna (John) Archbishop of Meffini. 1275 Abulparage (Gregory) a Physician. Arsenius , Patriarch of Constantinople. Bacon (Roger) an English Franciscan. Balbi (John) a Dominican. Burnettus (Latinus) author of several books. Capile (Alphonso X, King of). Cavalcante (Guido) a noble Florentine. Guillelma , or Guillemina , the head of an infamous sect. Polonus (Martin) a Dominican. 1300 Apona (Peter of) a famous Philosopher. Aurelius (Peter) a Franciscan. Barberini (Francis) a Poet and Civilian. Dante , an Italian Poet. Reynier (Peter de) Knight of the Order of St John of Jerusalem. 1325 Abulfeda (Ismael) Prince of Hama. Acyndinus (Gregory) a Greek Monk. Arsenius , Bishop of Monembafia. Ciccu , an Italian author. Cinno , a famous Civilian. Laurentio (Nicolas) author of a surprising revolution at Rome. Menandrino (Marfilus de) a learned Civilian. 1350 Andreas (John) a famous Canonist. Aristia (Lippa) concubine and afterwards wife to Opizzo Marquis of Est and Ferrara. Cauliac (Guy de) a Physician. Coronel (Alphonfus) a Spanish Lord. Naples (Joan I, Queen of) Padilla (Mary de) mistress to Peter the Cruel, King of Castile. Rimini (Gregory of) a schoolman. Roquetaillade (John de la) a Franciscan. Ruybroeck (John de) founder of a Convent of Canons regular of the Order of St Augustin. Tauterus (John) a Dominican Fryer. Baldus ,

A. D.
 1375 Baldus, a famous Civilian.
Freisford (John) an Historian.
Guifelin (Bertrand du) Constable of France.
Guise (James de) a Franciscan Monk.
Wickam (William) Bishop of Winchester.
 1400 Willi (Peter de) Bishop of Cambray, &c.
Montaigne (John de) High Steward of France.
Savonarola (Michael or John-Michael) a Physician.
 1425 Alamandus (Lewis) Archbishop of Arles.
Artin (Charles) Secretary to the Republic of Florence, and Artin (Leonard) his immediate predecessor.
Barbarus (Francis) a noble Venetian.
Blondus (Flavius) Secretary to several Popes.
Burgundy (Philip Duke of) firnamed the Good.
Caraccioli (John) gallant to Joan II, Queen of Naples.
Camaldoli (Ambrose de) Abbot-General of the Order of Camaldoli.
Capistran (John) a Franciscan.
Chastellux (Clausius Sire de) Viscount d'Avallon, &c.
Chastel (Tanneguy du) Marshal of the wars of the Dauphin.
Conecte (Thomas) a Carmelite Fryer.
Eugenius IV. Pope.
Francisca, a devout lady.
Naples (Joan II, Queen of) Paris (James des) a Physician.
Patricius (Francis) Bishop of Gaeta.
Sebaste (Raymundus) Professor of Physic, &c. at Toulouse.
Sforza (Giacomuzzo) founder of the family of Sforza.
Vegius (Maphæus) an Orator and Poet.
Vergerius (Peter Paul) a Civilian.
 1450 Amyratus, a Peripatetic Philosopher.
Andreas (John) author of a book against the Mahometan religion.
Andronicus of Thessalonica, a Professor at Florence.
Artin (John) firnamed Tortellius, Chamberlain to Pope Nicolas V.
Aristotle, a famous Architect.
Auripe (John) Secretary to Nicolas V.
Buridan (John) a famous Philosopher.
Franc (Martin) Provost and Canon of Laufanne.
Guarinus, one of the first revivers of learning in Italy.
Naples (Alphonfus I, King of) and Panormita (Antony) his Secretary.
Philippus, an Italian author.
Sforza (Francis) Duke of Milan.
Villa (Laurence) a great critic.
Wejalia (John de) Doctor of Divinity.
 1475 Abraham (Isaac) a celebrated Rabbi.
Acciacoli [Donato] a learned Florentine.
Agricola [Rodolphus] a learned Priest-lander.
Altius [Gabriel] a Latin Poet.
Artin [Francis] a translator of some of Chrysostome's works.
Argyropylus [John] a learned Greek.
Barbarus [Hermolaus] a learned Venetian.
Barletta [Gabriel] a Dominican.
Bergamo [James Philip de] an Augustin Monk.
Bosfinus [Antony] an Historian.
Bosius [Matthew] a regular Canon.
Brandolinus [Aurelius] an Augustine Fryer.
Brené [Peter de] Lord de la Varenne, &c.

A. D.
Britannicus [John] a learned Commentator.
Burgundy [Charles Duke of] and Burgundy [Mary of] his only daughter.
Calderinus [Domitius] a teacher of polite learning.
Campanus [John Antony] a learned Prelate.
Catibo [Angelo] Archbp of Vienne.
Chastellan [Geo.] a Flemish gentleman.
Donatus [Jerome] a noble Venetian.
Dante [Peter Vincent] an Italian Poet.
Edward IV, King of England.
Experien [Philip Callimachus] tutor to Albert King of Poland.
Fonius [Bartholinus] a teacher of Rhetoric at Florence.
Fulgins [Sigismund] an Historian.
Gentilis de Becis, Bishop of Arezzo.
Guarinus [Baptist] Professor of the Belles Lettres.
Hibten [John] a German Franciscan.
Innocent VIII, Pope.
Lamponiano [John Andrew] a domestic of Galeazzo Sforza Duke of Milan.
Lascaris [Conft.] a learned Greek.
Lascaris [John] firnamed Rhyndacenus.
Leonicens [Nicolas] Professor of Physic in the University of Ferrara.
Lewis XI, King of France.
Mabomet II, Emperor of the Turks.
Mainus [Jason] a Civilian.
Majus [Jurianus] teacher of the Belles Lettres.
Mancinellus [Antony] a Grammarian.
Marbe [Oliver de la] High Steward to Maximilian of Austria.
Marfus [Peter] a Commentator.
Marullus [Michael Tarchaniota] a Poet.
Monfretet [Enguerrard de] Author of a Chronicle of France.
Nannius [John] a Dominican.
Nero [Bernard del] a Florentine Nobleman.
Newsers [John of Burgundy Count of] Omnibonus, a noted Grammarian.
Oricellarius [Bernard] a Florentine author.
Patricius [Aug.] Bishop of Pienza.
Politian [Angelo] a learned and polite author.
Præpositus [Nicolas] a Physician at Tours.
Savonarola [Jerome] a Dominican Fryer.
Scala [Bartholomew] a learned Florentine, and Scala [Alexandra] his daughter.
Sforza [Catherine] wife of Jerome Riario.
Sixtus IV, Pope.
Subitius [John] firnamed Verulanus.
Tibernas [Gregory] Greek Professor in the University of Paris.
Torquato [Antony] a famous Astrologer.
Trifan [Hermite] [Lewis] Great Provost of the King's household.
Valla [George] a Physician, &c.
Valla [Nicolas] Doctor of the Civil Law, &c.
Vaquerie [John de la] first President in the Parliament of Paris.
Urceus [Antony Codrus] a learned Italian.
Utinus [Len. de] a Jacobin Monk.
Wessius [John] a learned Dutchman.
 1500 Abstemius [Laurence] teacher of the Belles Lettres.
Acciacoli [Zenobius] a Dominican.
Alexander ab Alexandro, a Civilian.

A. D.
Alexis, a Piedmontois.
Almain [James] Doctor of Divinity.
Ammonius [Andrew] a Latin Poet.
Andrada [Diego de Payra d'] a Portuguese Divine.
Andrelinus [Publius Fauftus] Professor of Poetry in the University of Paris.
Antefignanus [Peter] a good Grammarian.
Aquaviva [Andrew Mathew] Duke of Atri.
Aragon [Isabella of] wife of John Galeazzo Sforza, Duke of Milan.
Auton [John d'] Abbot of Angle.
Badius [Jodocus] firnamed Accensius, a learned author.
Berfala [Anne] wife to Philip of Burgundy.
Bristot [Peter] a Physician.
Bunel [William] Professor of Physic in the University of Toulouse.
Bulleiden [Jerome] illustrious for his embassies, &c.
Cartromachus [Scipio] a learned Italian.
Decius [Philip] a famous Civilian.
Delphinus [Peter] General of the Order of Camaldoli.
Durer [Albert] an excellent Painter and Engraver.
Flaminus [Antony] Professor of Polite Literature in the college of Rome.
Gonzaga [Isabella de] wife of Guido Ubaldo de Monticeltro, Duke of Urbino.
Grapaldus [Francis Marius] a learned Italian.
Hadrian, a Cardinal, &c.
Jacettius [Francis Cataneus] an excellent Platonist.
Julius II, Pope.
Krantius [Albertus] a famous Historian.
Langius [Rodolph] Provost of the Cathedral Church of Munster.
Lewis XII, King of France.
Linacer [Thomas] an English Physician.
Machiavel [Nicolas] Secretary to the Republic of Florence.
Manard [John] a Physician.
Marianus [Raimond] a learned Frenchman.
Molla [Francis Maria] a Poet.
Majus [Marc] Greek Professor in the University of Padua.
Parrabusius [Janus] a Professor of the Belles Lettres.
Phædrus [Thomas] Professor of Eloquence at Rome.
Pomponatus [Peter] teacher of Philosophy at Padua.
Prierias [Sylvester] a Dominican.
Ritius [Michael] a Civilian.
Sylvius [Francis] Professor of Eloquence, &c. at Paris.
Simonetta [Hyacinthus] a brave and experienced soldier.
Stoferus [John] a famous Mathematician.
Thomæus [Nicolas Leonicus] a Professor in the University of Padua.
Valdes [John] a handsome young Spaniard.
Vigerius [Mark] a Cardinal, &c.
Zabarella [Francis] Archbishop of Florence, &c.
 1525 Accursius [Mariangelus] a Critic.
Adrichomia [Cornelia] a Nun.
Agricola [George] a German Physician.
Agricola [John] a Saxon Divine.
Agrippa [Henry Cornelius] a Physician.
Athalia [Martin] a Professor of Physic.
Alciatus

A CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE, &c.

[863]

A. D. Alciatus (Andrew) a great Civilian. Alconius (Peter) a learned Italian. Aleander (Jerome) a Cardinal. Alfius (Alexander) a famous Divine. Alenflaig (John) Doctor of Divinity. Amajcus (Romulus) Professor of Greek and Latin at Bologna. Ammonius (Livinus) a Carthusian. Andronicus (Tanaquillus) a teacher in the university of Leipzig. Apianus (Petrus) a German Mathematician. Aqueus (Stephen) Lord of Beauvais. Aragon (Joan of) wife to the Prince of Tagliocozi. Astin (Peter) a satirical writer. Aventine (John) an Annalist. Avogallus (Matthew) a Professor in the university of Wittenberg. Balmis (Abraham de) a Jewish Physician. Bandel (Matthew) a Dominican. Barbara, wife to the Emperor Sigismund. Barbarus (Daniel) author of some Commentaries. Barnes (Robert) Chaplain to Henry VIII, King of England. Beda (Noel) Doctor of Divinity, in the university of Paris. Bellai (William du) Lord of Languey. Bellai (John du) a Cardinal. Bembus (Peter) a Cardinal. Berauld (Nicolas) Tutor to Admiral de Coligny. Bibliander (Theodorus) Professor of Divinity at Zurich. Bigot (William) a Physician and Philosopher. Blumberg (Barbara) a Lady of a good family at Ratibon. Boley or Bullen (Anne) wife to Henry VIII, King of England. Bombafius (Paul) Secretary to Cardinal Pucci. Bombert (Daniel) a famous Printer. Bore (Catherine de) wife of Luther. Bouchet (John) a French author. Brasavolus (Antony Musa) a Physician and Professor at Ferrara. Brodeus (John) a learned Critic. Budaeus (William) a learned Frenchman. Bunel (Peter) a good Latin writer. Barana (John Francis) a Professor at Bologna. Buto (John) a famous Mathematician. Casarius (John) a Physician and Philosopher. Caldarius (John) a Professor of the Civil-Law. Capeyus (Scipio) a famous author. Capifuccbi (Paul) Canon of the Vatican. Carian (John) Professor of the Mathematics, in the university of Francfort. Carmiliannus (Peter) a Latin Poet. Castellan (Peter) great Almoner of France. Ceratinus (James) a good Grecian. Changy (Peter de) Eq; Charles V, Emperor, and King of Spain. Chateau-Briand (the Countess of) Ciolek (Erasmus) Bishop of Plocko. Cochleus (John) Doctor of Divinity. Cordier (Maturin) a Schoolmaster. Coricius (John) an encourager of learned men. Cornelius (Antony) Licentiate of the Civil-Law. Dales (Stephen) a learned Frenchman. Dryander (John) a Protestant martyr. Driedo (John) Doctor of Divinity. V O L. V.	A. D. Durant (Samuel) Minister of Cha-renton. Egnatius (John Baptist) a learned Ecclesiastic. Emeri (Sebastian) Advocate in the Parliament of Paris. Emilius (Paul) an Historian. Eppendorf (Henry) a German nobleman. Erasmus (Desiderius) a famous Latin author. Eftampes (Anne de Piffleu, Duchefs of) Ferrariensis, a Scholastic Philosopher, whose true name was Francis Sylvester. Ferretus (Æmilius) an able Civilian. Ferus (John) Warden of the Franciscans at Mentz. Fevr of Etaples, a learned Frenchman. Finaw (Orontius) Professor of Mathematics, in the royal college of Paris. Flaminius (Marc Antony) a Latin Poet. Florimont (Galeacius) Bishop of Sessia. Francis I, King of France. Francis (Sebastian) an Anabaptist. Geldenbaur (Gerard) a Monk, and afterwards a Protestant. Gelenius (Sigismund) corrector of a printing-house. Gonzaga (Eleonora) wife to Francis Maria de la Rovere, Duke of Urbino. Gonzaga (Julia) Duchefs of Trajetta, &c. Gonzaga (Lucretia) wife of John Paul Manfrone. Grammont (Gabriel de) a French Cardinal. Graftis (Paris de) Master of the Ceremonies under several Popes. Grynæus (Simon) a Professor of Greek at Heidelberg. Guvvara (Antony de) Preacher and Historiographer to Charles V. Guicciardin (Francis) the Historian. Guindano (Sigismund) a Poet. Guise (Claudius de Lorraine, Duke of) Hadrian VI (Pope). Helvicus (Christopher) Professor of Divinity in the university of Giefen. Hochstratus (James) a Dominican, &c. Hoffman (Melchior) a dogmatical Preacher. Hortensius (John) a Physician. Hungary (Mary Queen of) Hungary (Isabella Queen of) Hungerus (Wolfgang) a Civilian. Hutten (Ulric de) a Poet. Jovius (Paul) an Historian. Justiniani (Augustin) Bishop of Nebbio. Lacifus (Paul) a regular Canon of the congregation of Lateran. Lambert (Francis) a Franciscan Monk. Landa (Catherine) a learned Italian lady. Langius (Paul) a German Monk. Leland (John) Antiquary to Henry VIII. Lemnius (Lævinus) a famous Physician. Leo X (Pope) Lizet (Peter) first President in the Parliament of Paris. Leyola (Ignatius) founder of the Jesuits. Lucidus (John) author of a book of Chronology. Luther (Martin) a Reformer of the Church.	A. D. Macrin (Salmon) a Poet. Majoragius (Marc Antony) Professor of Eloquence at Milan. Marot (Clement) a French Poet. Marulus (Marcus) a Dalmatian author. Melanchthon (Philip) a famous Protestant author. Micyllus (James) a Professor at Francfort. Mutius (Huldric) Professor at Basil. Navagiers (Andrew) a noble Venetian. Navarre (Margaret de Valois, Queen of) Nevisan (John) an Italian Civilian. Niphus (Augustin) a celebrated Civilian. Nonius (Peter) a learned Portuguese. Ochinus (Bernardin) a Capuchin. Oecolampadius (John) one of the Reformers of the Church. Padilla (John de) one of the ring-leaders of a sedition in Spain. Palingenius (Marcellus) a Latin Poet. Parthenai (Anne de) wife of Antony de Pons, Count de Marennes. Periers (Bonaventure Des) Valet de Chambre to the Queen of Navarre. Pigbius (Albertus) a Sophistical writer. Pin (John du) Bishop of Rieux. Pinet (Antony du) Lord of Noroy. Poitiers (Diana de) mistress to Henry II, King of France. Polydamus (Valentinus) an Italian Physician. Prat (Antony du) Chancellor of France, &c. Quiqueran (Peter de) Bp. of Senez. Régis (Urban) a Lutheran Divine. Ricius (Paul) Professor of Rhetoric at Pavia. Rorarius (Hierome) Nuncio of Clement VII. Rucellai (John) a noble Florentine, and good Poet. Sabius (Fauftus) keeper of the Vatican library. Sambiancai (James de Beaume, Baron de) Superintendent of the Finances. Schombert (Nicolas of) Cardinal, &c. Scherus (Antony) a Grammarian. Seymour (Anne, Margaret, and Joan) three sisters illustrious for their learning in England. Selve (John de) first President in the Parliament of Paris. Sforza (Isabella) a learned woman. Sylvius (James) a famous Physician. Socinus (Marianus) a Professor of the Civil-Law. Stifelinus (Michael) a Lutheran Minister. Sturmus (James) famous for the deputations he performed. Tapperus (Ruardus) Professor of Divinity at Louvain. Tartaglia (Nicolas) a famous Mathematician. Tiraquellus (Andrew) a learned Frenchman. Turrel (Peter) Rector of the College of Dijon. Valdes (John) a Civilian. Villamarini (Isabella) wife to the Prince of Salerno. Virgil (Polydore) an Historian. Volfus (Paul) an Abbot. Urfinus (John) a French Physician. Wechel (Christian) a famous Printer. Wida (Hernan de) Archbishop of Cologne. Wimpina (Conrad) Professor of Divinity at Francfort.
---	---	---

[10 K]

Ziegler

A. D.		A. D.		A. D.
1550	Ziegler (James) a Professor of Divinity.		Grypius (Sebastian) a famous Printer at Lyons.		Radziwil (Nicolas) Palatin of Vilna, &c.
	Acronius (James) a Philosopher, Civilian, and Divine.		Guise (Francis de Lorraine, Duke of).		Ramus [Peter] Royal Professor of Philosophy and Eloquence.
	Acronius (John) teacher of Mathematics, &c. at Basil.		Hartungius (John) Professor of the Belles Lettres at Friburg.		Rafario [John Baptist] an Italian Physician.
	Adriani (John Baptist) an Historian.		Henry II , King of France.		Rattaler [George] President of the Council of Utrecht.
	Agricola (Michael) a Lutheran Minister.		Herold (Basil John) a Protestant Minister and author.		Rauber [Andrew Eberhard] a German Knight.
	Albamps (Mark) a Cardinal.		Hyperius (Andrew Gerard) a Professor of Divinity.		Richer (Peter) a Carmelite, &c.
	Albanerus (Andrew) a Lutheran Minister.		Hortensius (Lambert) a learned Dutchman.		Robert (John) Professor of the Civil-Law in the university of Orleans.
	Ambaisé (Michael de) Esq.		Huarte (John) a Spanish author.		Roban (Renata de) wife of Francis de Rohan, Lord de Gié.
	Amoy (James) Bishop of Auxerre.		Illyricus (Matthias Flacius) a learned Protestant Divine.		Ronsard (Peter de) a French Poet.
	Arumont (Gabriel) an Ambassador of France, in the reign of Henry II.		Julius III (Pope).		Rofe (Mambrin) an Italian author.
	Baduel (Claudius) a learned author.		Junius (Hadrian) a Physician.		Ruffianus (Tiberius) a subtle Philosopher.
	Baronius (Dominic) a Florentine Priest.		Knox (John) a Scotch Reformer.		Saint-Cyrt , a brave soldier.
	Baudouin (Francis) a Civilian.		Labe (Loyla) a Courtisan of Lyons.		Serbellone (Gabriel) a great Captain.
	Bellaun (Remi) a French Poet.		Leon (Peter Cieqa de) a Spanish Historian.		Serbellone (Fabricius) brother to the foregoing.
	Bertolier (Philibert) Register, &c. at Geneva.		Leovicus (Cyprian) a famous Astronomer.		Saubise (John de Parthenai, Lord of) a zealous Protestant.
	Billon (Francis de) Secretary of William du Bellai.		Lippoman (Aloisio) a learned Prelate.		Spifame (James Paul) Bishop of Nevers.
	Bonfadius (James) Historiographer to the Republic of Genoa.		Lismanin (Francis) a Doctor of Divinity, &c.		Stancarus (Francis) a zealous promoter of the Reformed Religion in Poland.
	Bononia (John de) Archdeacon of Palermo.		Longiano (Faustus da) an Italian author.		Strigelius (Victorinus) a Protestant Divine.
	Bonquin (Peter) a Carmelite Fryer.		Longvic (Jaqueline de) Duchefs of Montpensier.		Sturmus (John) Rector of the college of Strasbourg.
	Brette (James de) a great warrior.		Lotichius (Peter) Abbot of the convent of Solitar.		Sulacha (Simon) a Nestorian Monk.
	Braschius (Gaspard) a Latin Poet.		Lotichius (Peter) surnamed Secundus, and nephew to the foregoing.		Sufanneau (Hubert) Doctor of Law and Physic.
	Buchanan (George) a famous Latin Poet, &c.		Lotichius (Christian) younger brother to the foregoing, and Vicar to the Abbey of Solitar.		Taifhier (John) a teacher of Mathematics.
	Bullinger (Henry) one of the Reformers of the Church.		Maldemat (John) a Priest of Burgos.		Tauvau (Renata) wife to Francis Rochechoiart, Lord of Tonny Charente.
	Calvin (John) Minister at Geneva.		Marillac (Charles de) Archbishop of Vienna.		Tetti (Scipio) a learned Neapolitan.
	Caninius (Angelus) a Grammarian.		Marinello (John) a Physician.		Tillet (John du) Protonotary and Secretary to the King, &c.
	Casipucchi (John Antony) a Cardinal by the title of St Pancrace.		Marius , surnamed Aquicola , an Italian author.		Tillet (John du) younger brother to the foregoing, and a learned Ecclesiastic.
	Caraccioli (John Antony) Bishop of Troyes.		Martineghus (Titus Prosper) a Benedictine.		Truberus (Primus) a Slavonian author.
	Cardan (Jerome) a Physician.		Maffarius (James) a Doctor of Physic.		Tulenus , a learned Frenchman.
	Carranza (Bartholomew) a Dominican.		Maugin (John) a French translator.		Tuppis (Laurence) a Civilian.
	Cassali (Sebastian) Professor of Greek at Basil.		Madrevius (Andrew Fricius) Secretary to the King of Poland.		Valla (Nicolas) Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris.
	Cassaberto (Lewis) a subtle writer.		Menardus (Nicolas) a Spanish Physician.		Velfus (Justus) Doctor of Physic.
	Chabot (Peter Gualtherus) a good Humanist.		Martin (Joachim) Professor of Divinity at Konigsberg.		Vergerius (Peter Paul) famous for his embassies, &c.
	Chequet (Lewis) a French Poet.		Musculus (Wolfgang) a famous Divine.		Villagaignon (Nicolas Durand de) a Knight of Malta.
	Cipierre (Philibert de Marcelli, Lord of).		Musjo (Cornelio) Bishop of Bitonto.		Viret (Peter) a Protestant Minister.
	Clarus (Julius) a Civilian.		Nangeorgus (Thomas) a Latin Poet.		Weidnerus (Paul) a Jewish Physician.
	Couffe (Gilbert) a Canon at Nozeret.		Navarre (Joan d'Albret, Queen of).		Wistphalus (Joachim) a Lutheran Minister.
	Crespinus (John) a famous Printer.		Orichevius (Stanislaus) a Polish gentleman.		Wicelius (George) a Divine.
	Curio (Caelius Secundus) a learned Piedmontois.		Osarius (Jerome) a Portuguese Prelate.		Zanchius (Basil) Keeper of the Vatican library.
	Daurat (John) a learned Humanist and Poet.		Palearius (Aonius) Professor of the Belles Lettres at Siena.		Abdissi , Patriarch of Mosul in Assyria.
	Doni (Antony Francis) an Italian author.		Paré (Ambrose) Surgeon to Francis II, King of France.		Abelly (Antony) Doctor of Divinity.
	Donzellinus (Jerome) an Italian Physician.		Pariset (Lewin) a Latin author.		Accordis (Stephen Tabourot, Lord of).
	Esmendreville (John du Bosc, Lord of).		Patricius (Andrew) Bp of Wenden.		Acidalius (Valens) Rector of the school at Bressaw.
	Effé (Andrew de Montalembert, Lord).		Peraxylus (whose true name was Arnoldus Arlenius) a great Grecian.		Adrichemius (Christian) a Dutch Priest.
	Fauno (Lucio) an Italian author.		Pereira (Gomefius) a Spanish Physician.		Aguirre (Michael de) a Civilian.
	Fernelius (John) a Physician.		Piccolomini (Alexander) Archbishop of Patras, &c.		Ayraud (Peter) Lieutenant-Criminal in the Prefidial Court of Angers.
	Feron (John le) Advocate in the Parliament of Paris.		Piccolomini (Francis) a famous Philosopher.		Alakia (Martin) Doctor of Physic of the Faculty of Paris.
	Ferrara (Renata of France, Duchefs of).		Pienne (Joan de Halluin) maid of honour to Catherine de Medicis.		Alciatus (John Paul) a gentleman of Milan.
	Ferrier (Arnau du) President of the Parliament of Paris.		Place (Peter de la) President in the court of Aids at Paris.		Aldrovandus (Ulyffes) Professor of Philosophy, &c. at Bologne.
	Fancius (John) a Lutheran preacher.		Pointet (John) Bishop of Winchester.		Alibufius (John) a Civilian.
	Gallars (Nicolas des) a Minister of Geneva.		Pontius (Constantine) preacher to Charles V.
	Gambara (Laurence) a Latin Poet.		Quintin (John) Professor of the Canon-Law at Paris.
	Garnache (Francis de Rohan, Lady de la).
	Gentilis (John Valentinian) an Arian.
	Gratarolus (William) a Physician.
	Gribaldus (Matthew) a Civilian.
	Gropper (John) a Cardinal.
	Grynæus (Thomas) a Professor at Basil.

A. D.	A. D.	A. D.
Anania [John Laurence d'] an Italian author.	Ghabort [Matthew de] President of the Inquests in the Parliament of Toulouse.	Hospital [Michael de l'] Chancellor of France.
Angiolo [Maria] an Historian.	Charpentier [Peter] a teacher of the Civil-Law.	Hottman [Francis] teacher of the Civil-Law.
Antoniano [Sylvio] a Cardinal.	Charron [Peter] a French author.	Hunnius [Giles] Doctor of Divinity.
Arigoni [Pompeio] a Cardinal.	Chastel [John] a famous Assassin.	Jodelle [Stephen] a French and Latin Poet.
Arvera [John d'] Counsellor in the Parliament of Bourdeaux.	Cipierre [Renatus de Savoie, Lord of]	Joubertus [Laurence] Counsellor and Physician in ordinary to Henry III, King of France.
Audebert [Germain] a Latin Poet.	Clavius [Christopher] a Jesuit.	Junstin [Francis] a Mathematician, &c.
Auge [Daniel d'] Greek Professor in the university of Paris.	Cologne [Peter de] Minister of Metz.	Junius [Francis] Professor of Divinity at Leyden.
Austria [Don John of] natural son to the Emperor Charles V.	Corbinelli [James] Preceptor to Henry III, King of France.	Kilianus [Cornelius] a corrector of the press.
Babelot , Chaplain to the Duke of Montpensier.	Cotta [Catellian] a Latin author.	Koornbert [Theodore] Secretary of the town of Haerlem.
Bachovius [Reinier] a Civilian.	Croquet [Peter] a Celestia Friar.	Kuchlin [John] a Minister and Professor of Divinity.
Baius [Michael] Professor of Divinity, at Louvain.	Crispus [John Baptist] a Divine and Poet.	Languet [Hubert] Counsellor to the Elector of Saxony.
Barclay [William] a learned Civilian.	Criton [James] a prodigious wit.	Lafcius [John] a Polish Gentleman.
Barleus [Melchior] a Latin Poet.	Dalmatin [George] a Lutheran Minister at Laubech.	Latius [John] a Schoolmaster.
Baron [Peter] Professor of Divinity, in the university of Cambridge.	Dalmatin [George] a Lutheran Minister in Upper Carniola.	Launoy [Matthew] a violent Leaguer.
Basta [Nicolas] an Officer in the Spanish service.	Dante [Ignatius] a Jacobin Monk.	Laxxarilli [N.] a Priest, and Provost of Miranda.
Beaura Des Matras [Maurice] chief Lieutenant of the Provostship of Angers.	Dinotb [Richard] an Historian.	Lentulus [Scipio] Minister of Chievonne.
Beaucaire de Peguillon [Francis] Bishop of Metz.	Doneau [Hugh] a Civilian.	Leon [Aloisio] Professor of Divinity in the university of Salamanca.
Beaumont [Francis de] Baron Des Adrets.	Dresserus [Matthew] Professor of Polite Learning, in the university of Leipzig.	Leon [Gonalez Pontius de] a Spanish author.
Begat [John] Counsellor in the Parliament of Dijon.	Eimeric [Nicolas] a Dominican.	Leonclavius [John] a learned German.
Belliforsy [Francis de] a French author.	Eisingerius [Martin] Doctor of Divinity.	Leonin [Elbret] Professor of the Civil-Law.
Bene , murderer of Admiral de Chatillon.	Elizabeth , Queen of England.	Leri [John de] a Protestant Minister.
Bencius [Francis de] an Italian author.	Faucher [Claude] first President of the Court of the Mint at Paris.	Lydius [Martin] Professor of Divinity at Franeker.
Bernaldus [Francis] Sieur de Verville.	Fenardent [Francis] a famous Franciscan.	Liebaux [John] a Physician.
Bernaldus [Matthew] Teacher of the Hebrew.	Freigius [John Thomas] Rector of the college of Altdorf.	Lipfius [Justus] a Great Critic.
Berttram [Cornelius Bonaventura] Hebrew Professor at Geneva.	Fugger [Hildric] Chamberlain to Pope Paul III.	Limeuil [Isabella de la Tour de Turenne Demoiselle de] maid of honour to Catherine de Medici.
Beza [Theodorus] a famous Protestant Minister.	Furius [Frederic] a learned Spaniard.	Lyserus [Polycarp] a famous Protestant Divine.
Belli [James de] an Abbot.	Galls [Peter] a learned Spaniard.	Lwinus [John] a Chanter and Canon at Antwerp.
Blandrata [George] a Physician.	Gallatius [John Paul] an Italian Astronomer.	Lorme [Philibert de] a famous Architect.
Bodin [John] a learned author.	Gardie [Pontus de la] Great Marshal of the armies of Sweden.	Louet [George] a Counsellor of the Parliament of Paris.
Boi , a famous player at Chess.	Gedicus [Simon] Doctor of Divinity, and Minister at Magdeburg.	Magius [Jerome] a famous Engineer.
Boiffard [John James] Governour to the Baron of Clermont's Children.	Gentilis [Alberic] Professor of Civil-Law at Oxford.	Mabomet [Galadin] Emperor of Mogol.
Bolfe [Jerome] an abusive writer.	Gentillet [Innocent] a Civilian.	Maldonat [John] a Spanish Jesuit.
Borgarnius [Proper] an Italian Physician.	Gifanitus [Obertus] a good Humanist and Civilian.	Malherbe [Francis de] a French Poet.
Bosquet [George] an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris.	Golius [Theophilus] Professor of Ethics at Strasbourg.	Margunius [Maximus] Bishop of Cythera.
Bossu [James le] Doctor of Divinity, in the university of Paris.	Gontaus [Armand de] Baron de Birou.	Mariana [John] a Jesuit and Historian.
Bosfulus [Matthew] a great Orator.	Gorlaeus [Abraham] a man curious in collecting medals.	Martellus [Hugolin] Bishop of Glan-deves.
Botal [Leonard] Physician to Henry III, King of France.	Gostlini [Julian] Secretary to several persons of a high rank.	Mofa [Tarquinea] an eminent Italian lady.
Botero [John] tutor to the Duke of Savoy's children.	Gregory [Peter] a learned author.	Montanensis [Henry de] King's Professor of Mathematics at Paris.
Boucher [John] Doctor of the Sorbonne.	Grillon , a valiant gentleman of Provence.	Momin [John Edward du] a French Poet.
Bouchet [William] Sieur de Brocourt.	Guarini [Baptist] author of the Pastor Fido.	Montecatini [Antony] Professor of Philosophy at Ferrara.
Braun [George] Archdeacon of Dortmund, &c.	Gaignard [John] a Jesuit.	Mont-joseph [Lewis de] an excellent antiquary.
Brocardus [James] an Apocryphical writer.	Guise [Henry de Lorraine, Duke of]	Navarre [Margaret de Valois, Queen of]
Brutus [Jordanus] a Philosopher.	Hacket [William] an English Fanatic.	Nipbus [Fabius] Professor of practical Physic at Padua.
Brutus [John Michael] a learned author.	Hay [John] a Scotch Jesuit.	Offat [Arnaud d'] a Cardinal.
Bufoquius [Augerius Giffenius, Lord of]	Haillan [Bernard de Girard, Lord of] Historiographer of France.	Pacard [George] Minister at Rochefoucaut.
Canicous [James] author of a romance.	Hall [Richard] an English Divine.	Pacheco [Alvarez] a Spanish Colonel.
Capilupus [Camillus] author of a book called The Strategem .	Harchius [Jodochus] a Physician.	Pareus [David] a Reformed Divine.
Capitucchi [Blasius] Marquis of Monterio, &c.	Hardenberg [Albert] a Protestant Divine.	Parthenai [Catherine de] wife to Renatus de Rohan, the second of the name.
Carbon [Lewis] Professor of Divinity at Perugia.	Hemmingius [Nicolas] Professor of Divinity at Copenhagen.
Caurres [John des] principal of the college of Amiens.	Henry III, King of France.
Caraf [Tiberius] an Advocate.	Helbusius [Telemannus] a Divine of the Augburg confession.
Cesalpinus [Andrew] a Professor at Pisa.	Hoffman [Daniel] Superintendent and Professor at Helmstadt.
	Hofius [James] Professor of Physic in the university of Helmstadt.
	Hofius [Stanislaus] a Cardinal.

Pafibali

A. D.	A. D.	A. D.
Paschali [Giulio Cesare] an Italian Poet. Patricius [Francis] Bishop of Gaeta. Peckius [Peter] Professor of Canon-Law at Louvain. Perrot [Nicolas] an Italian author. Pezzelius [Christoph] Professor of Divinity at Bremen. Pincier [John] a Protestant Minister. Pistorius [John] Doctor of Physic. Poncet [Maurice] Doctor of Divinity. Puccius (Francis) a Protestant Divine. Quellenec [Charles de] Baron of Pont, &c. Raphelengius [Francis] Professor of Hebr. in the university of Leyden. Rapin [Nicolas] a Provost-Marshal and Poet. Remond [Florimond de] Counsellor in the Parliament of Bourdeaux. Rhodoman [Laurence] Professor of History in the university of Wirtemberg. Rochefoucauld [Alexander de la] Abbot of St Martin. Rofe [William] Bishop of Senlis. Rofier [Hugh Bureau du] a famous Minister of the Church of Orleans. Rotan [John Baptist] Minister of Rochelle. Rua [Peter] a learned Spaniard. Ruggeri [Cosmo] Abbot of St Mahé. Sabellius [Marc Antony Cocceius] an Historian. Sacratas [Paul] a Canon of Ferrara. Saint-Aldgonde [Philip de Marnix, Lord du Mont]. Santa-Croce [Prosper] Cardinal. Sanctifus [Claudius] Bp of Evreux. Sanders [Nicolas] an English Priest. Sarnanus [Constantius] a Cardinal. Schilling [Christopher] Rector of the college of Heidelberg. Schomburg [Theodorus of] a brave soldier. Schomburg [Gasper de] Count of Nantueil. Schultingius [Cornelius] a Licentiate in Divinity, &c. Schutze [John] a Lutheran Minister. Scribonius [William Adolphus] a German Physician and Philosopher. Simonides [Simon] a good Latin Poet. Simonius [Simon] a Physician and Philosopher. Socinus [Faustus] founder of a sect that goes by his name. Spina [John de] a Protestant Minister. Spinosa [John de] a Spaniard of great abilities. Spondanus [John de] Lieutenant-General to the Prefidial of Rochelle. Stevin [Simon] an excellent Mathematician. Strozzi [Philip] son to Peter Strozzi, Marshal of France. Surgier [Francis] a Friar. Taffo [Torquato] a famous Italian Poet. Taurelius [Nicolas] a Physician and Philosopher. Texera [Joseph] a Portuguese Friar. Ypotius [James] a Civilian. Tyffander [N.] a French author. Torelli [Pomponio] Count of Montechiarugola. Tori [Jeffery] King's Printer at Paris. Toucheb [Mary] mistress to Charles IX, King of France. Valerius [Augustin] Cardinal. Valle [Rolandus] an Italian Civilian.	Verforis [Peter de] Lord of Fontenai le Visconte, &c. Villavicentius [Laurence] preacher to Philip II, King of Spain. Ulfeld [James] a Danish Senator, &c. Urfinus [Zachary] a famous reformed Divine. Urfus [Nicolas Raimarus] author of some Astronomical tracts. Vukanius [Bonaventura] Greek Professor in the university of Leyden. Xylander [William] Professor of the Greek tongue at Heidelberg. Zabaralla [James] a Professor in the university of Padua. Zanchius [Jerome] a famous Protestant Divine. Zarlino [Joseph] an excellent Musician. Accarisi (Francis) a Civilian. Adam, Archdeacon of the Patriarchal Chamber, and Superior of the Monks of Chaldaea. Akasia (Martin) Doctor of Physic at Paris. Alabaster (William) an English Divine. Alcasar (Lewis de) a Spanish Jesuit. Amboise (Francis d') an Advocate, &c. Amboise (Adrian d') Bishop of Freguier. Amboise (James d') Doctor of Physic. Arminius (James) Professor of Divinity at Leyden. Arnauld (Anthony) Advocate in the Parliament of Paris. Arriaga (Robert d') a Spanish Jesuit. Baldus (Bernardin) Abbot of Guastalla. Bandole (Anthony de) Advocate in the Parliament of Provence. Barclay (John) a Latin author. Basta, a famous General. Bauderon (Brice) a French Physician. Baudius (Dominic) Professor of History in the university of Leyden. Bautrus des-Matras (John) Mayor of Angers. Bellarmin (Robert) a Cardinal. Beley (Peter de) Advocate-General in the Parliament of Toulouse. Beni (Paul) Professor of Eloquence in the university of Padua. Berauld (Michael) Minister, and afterwards Professor of Divinity at Montauban. Bergier (Nicolas) an Advocate. Boccalini (Trajan) an Italian author. Bocbius (John) a Latin Poet, &c. Bonciarius (Marc Antony) a school-master at Perugia. Bongars (James) famous for his Embassies, &c. Botereius (Rodolphus) Advocate in the grand Council at Paris. Breault (Charles de) a Norman gentleman. Broughton (Hugh) an English Divine. Broffer (Martha) a woman that pretended to be possessed with a Devil. Bustomantinus [John] a Professor in the university of Alcalá. Caget (Peter Victor Palma) Doctor of Divinity in the Faculty of Paris. Camden (William) an Historian. Caribagena (John) a Jesuit, and afterwards a Franciscan. Chamier (Daniel) a famous Protestant Divine. Chefne [Joseph du] Sieur de la Vallette. Ciconia [Flaminius] a Philosopher. Concini [Concino] known by the name of Marshal d'Ancre.	Cremontinus [Cesar] Professor of Philosophy at Padua. Criton [George] Greek Professor in the royal college at Paris. Criton [William] a Jesuit. Dailly [John] minister of the church of Paris. Dandini [Jerome] a Jesuit. Dausqueius [Claudius] Canon of Tournay. Dempster [Thomas] a Schoolmaster. Dryfus [John] Hebrew Professor in the university of Franeker. Elieb [Lewis Philip] a German author. Elmenhorst [Geverhart] a learned Hamburguefe. Emmuis [Urbo] a Professor at Groningen. Eremita [Daniel] Secretary to the Duke of Florence. Feitibus [Everard] a learned Dutchman. Fenoillet [Peter] Bishop of Montpellier. Ferrier [Jeremiah] Professor of Divinity at Nismes. Frachetta [Jerome] a Political writer. Gaigneur [William le] a man who excelled in the art of writing. Galligay [Leonora] wife of the Marshal d'Ancre. Gallenius [Anthony] a priest of the Oratory of Rome. Gamen [Christopher de] a French author. Gentilis [Scipio] Professor of the Civil-Law at Altorf. Gemarus [Francis] a Professor of Divinity. Gontaut [Charles de] Duke of Biron. Goulart [Simon] Minister of Geneva. Gournay [Mary de Jars de] a learned Frenchwoman. Grain [Baptist le] an Historian. Grauwerny [Albert] a Doctor of Divinity. Gretferus [James] a Jesuit. Gruterus [Janus] a learned Philologist. Guaguin [Alexander] Governor of the fortress of Witschk in Poland. Guise [Lewis de Lorraine, Cardinal de]. Hacker [James] Professor of Divinity at Friburg. Hamelar [John] a Canon of Antwerp. Henry IV, King of France. Herlicius [David] a Philosopher, &c. Hervart [John George] Chancellor of Bavaria. Hæschelius [Dav.] Rector of St Anne's college at Augsbuurg. Hospinian [Rodolphus] a Swiss author. Hutterus [Leonard] Professor of Divinity at Wittemberg. Jemischius [Paul] a learned Flemish man. Jonas Arngimas, a learned Islander. Jungerman [Godfrey] a corrector of the press. Kackerman [Bartholomew] Professor of Philosophy at Dantzick. Keller [James] a Jesuit. Kormannus [Henry] a German Civilian. Labourlote [Claudius] a brave Captain. Langius [Joseph] Professor of Mathematics, &c. at Friburg. Laurens [Andrew du] Professor of Physic in the university of Montpellier.

A CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE, &c.

[867]

A. D.		A. D.		A. D.
	Lingelheim [George Michael] Preceptor, and afterwards Counsellor to the Elector Palatine.	1625	Wouwer [John de] Counsellor to the Duke of Holstein.		Blondel [David] a Protestant Minister.
	Lorne [N. de] a French Physician.		Arfens [Francis] Lord of Someldyck, and Spyck, &c.		Borfel [Adolphus de] a German gentleman.
	Loyer [Peter le] Counsellor in the Presidial Court of Angers.		Abbot [George] Archbishop of Canterbury.		Bofe [N. du] a Franciscan.
	Lubert [Sibrand] Professor of Divinity at Franeker.		Abbot [Robert] Bishop of Sarum.		Bouchin [Stephen] Counsellor and King's Attorney in the Royal Courts of Beaune in Burgundy.
	Lubin [Eilhard] Professor of Poetry, and afterwards of Divinity in the university of Rostoc.		Abram [Nicolas] a Jesuit.		Braunbom [Frederic] a Protestant author.
	Maccius [Sebastian] a learned Humanist.		Accarifi [James] Doctor of Divinity.		Brezi [the Marshal de] and Brezi [Armand de Maille] his only son.
	Magnus [John Antony] Professor of Mathematics in the university of Bologna.		Acofa [Uriel] a Portuguese gentleman.		Bervius [Abraham] a Dominican.
	Martinella [Lucretia] a Venetian lady.		Acuna [Christopher] a Spanish Jesuit.		Cameron [John] a famous Protestant Divine.
	Marnix [John de] Baron des Potes.		Adam [Melchior] Rector of a college at Heidelberg.		Capriata [Peter John] a Civilian and Historian.
	Matman [Rodolphus] a Jesuit.		Agrada [Mary de] a religious visionary.		Causin [Nicolas] a Jesuit.
	Mendoza [John Gonfales de] an Augustin Friar.		Airault [Renatus] a Jesuit.		Cerjantes , a Swedish Resident at Paris.
	Montgailard [Bernard de] Abbot of Orval.		Alamos [Balthazar] a Civilian.		Charnaie [the Baron de].
	Magne [Roberta] a learned Protestant lady.		Alciatus [Terence] an Italian Jesuit.		Croius [John] a Protestant Minister.
	Narni , an Italian Capuchin.		Aldringer , a famous General.		Dicu [Lewis de] Minister of Leyden.
	Newton [Adam] Dean of Salisbury.		Alexander [Jerome] Secretary to Cardinal Octavio Bandini.		Digby [Sir Kenelm] an English gentleman.
	Pineau [Severin] a Surgeon.		Alogambus [Philip] a Jesuit.		Donaldson [Walter] Principal of the college of Sedan.
	Pineau [Gabriel du] Counsellor in the Presidial of Angers.		Allatius [Leo] Librarian of the Vatican.		Druslicki [Gaspar] a Polish Jesuit.
	Pinsfon [Francis] Professor of the Civil-Law at Bourges.		Alstedius [John Henry] a German Divine.		Elickman [John] a Physician.
	Pitiscus [Bartholomew] Preacher to the Elector Palatine.		Altingius [Henry] Professor of Divinity at Heidelberg.		Emilius [Antony] Professor of History in the university of Utrecht.
	Plantvoit-la-Paule [John] Bishop of Lodeve.		Amama [Sixtinus] Hebrew Professor in the university of Franeker.		Episcopius , a learned Arminian.
	Politian [Giovanni Angelo] teacher of Logic.		Amesius [William] Professor of Divinity at Franeker.		Espagne [John d'] Minister of the French Church in London.
	Politian [Antony Laurentin] Professor of Logic in the university of Pisa.		Amyraut [Moses] Minister and Professor of Divinity at Saumur.		Espagnet [John d'] President of the Parliament of Bourdeaux.
	Puteanus [Erycius] Historiographer to his Catholic Majesty.		Aquinas [Philip] a converted Jew.		Essars [Charlotte des] wife of the Marshal de l'Hospital.
	Refuge [du] author of a treatise on the court.		Archireta [Alexander] an Abbot.		Fakreddin , Prince of the Drufians in Syria.
	Remon [John de] Counsellor and Physician to Henry IV, King of France.		Arnauld d'Andilly [Robert] eldest son of Anthony Arnauld the Advocate.		Farel [William] a Protestant Minister.
	Rinuccini [Ottavio] gentleman of the bed-chamber to Henry IV.		Arniens [Henningus] Professor of Physic in the university of Helmstadt.		Farnaby [Thomas] a learned Philologist.
	Rocco [Girolamo] a great master in the art of writing.		Arfenius , a Greek Monk.		Faucbeur [Michael le] a Protestant Minister.
	Rubenus [Leonard] a Benedictine.		Aubertin [Edmund] Minister of the Church of Paris.		Ferrand [James] Doctor of Physic.
	Sanchex [Francis] a Physician.		Audiguier [N. d'] a French author.		Ferri [Paul] a learned Divine.
	Sanchex [Thomas] a Spanish Jesuit.		Bacon [Francis] Lord High-Chancellor of England.		Fevret [Charles] Advocate in the Parliament of Dijon.
	Scot [Reginald] an English gentleman.		Bagni [John Francis] a Cardinal.		Forbes [Patrick] Bishop of Aberdeen, and
	Scalutus [Abraham] author of several books.		Balzac [John Lewis Guez, Sieur de].		Forbes [John] his son.
	Segla [William de, Sieur de Cayras] Counsellor in the Parliament of Toulouse.		Baranxon [Redemptus] a Barnabite Friar.		Forbes [William] Bishop of Edinburgh.
	Smiglecius [Martin] a Jesuit.		Barleus [Gaspar] Professor of Physic at Amsterdam.		Gallutius [Tarquin] a Jesuit.
	Stappa [John Nicolas] Professor of Physic at Basil.		Barleus [Lambert] Greek Professor in the university of Leyden.		Gamache [Philip] Doctor of the Sorbonne.
	Sutcliffe [Matthew] an English Divine.		Barnes [John] an English Benedictine.		Garaffe [Francis] a Jesuit.
	Kal [John du] a Physician.		Barbius [Gaspar] a famous author.		Garijoles [Antony] Professor of Divinity at Montauban.
	Valdes [James] an Advocate at Valladolid.		Bastoge [Benjamin] Minister of Charenton.		Gillet [Peter] a Protestant Minister.
	Verferus [Mark] a learned Civilian.		Baudier [Michael] a French author.		Gioachino [Greco] a famous player at Chess.
	Volkilius [John] a Socinian Minister.		Bautru [William] Count de Serant, and		Goldast [Melchior Haiminsfeld] a learned Calvinist.
	Verfius [Conrad] a Professor of Divinity.		Bautru [Nicolas] Count de Nogent, his brother.		Gombauld [John Ogier de] a French Poet.
	Usher [Henry] Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland.		Bedell [William] Bishop of Kilmore.		Goelens [David] a learned Dutchman.
	Windick [John Paul] Doctor of Divinity.		Belot [N.] Advocate in the King's Privy-Council.		Gouls [John] General of the Feuillants.
	V O L. V.		Berigardus [Claudius] Professor of Philosophy at Pisa.		Gouts [Jerome] a Physician of the Faculty of Paris.
			Bernillo [Peter de] Cardinal.		Gramond [Gabriel Bartholomew de] President in the Parliament of Toulouse.

[10 L]

Gramont

A. D.	A. D.	A. D.
Gramont [Scipio de] Lord of St Germain. Grandier [Urban] Curate and Canon of London. Grævius [John] an Arminian Minister. Grutius [Hugo] a famous author. Gruterus [Peter] a Physician. Grypblander [John] Doctor of the Civil-Law. Guadagnolo [Philip] Reader of Arabic and Chaldee at Rome. Guebriant [Renata du Bec] widow of the Marshal de Guebriant. Guimené [the Princes of]. Guise [Charles de Lorraine, Duke of]. Guyet [Francis] a great Critic. Hall [Joseph] Bishop of Norwich. Heraldis [Defiderius] Advocate in the Parliament of Paris. Hoe [Matthias] a famous Lutheran Minister. Hoelzelin [Jeremiah] Greek Professor in the university of Leyden. Horsius [Gregory] first Physician of the city of Ulm. Hortensius [Martin] Professor of Mathematics at Amsterdam. Hospital [Francis de l'] Marshal of France. Jansenius [Cornelius] Bishop of Ipres. Jérôme [Peter] a Jesuit. Joussier [N.] a French author. Juchet [Melchior] a Jesuit. Jungmann [Lewis] an excellent Botanist. Junius [Francis] son to the above-mentioned Francis Junius. Kepler [John] a great Astronomer. Keller [Andrew] a Lutheran Divine. Kircher [John] a profelyte to the Church of Rome. Kirchman [John] a famous author. Knot [Edward] an English Jesuit. Kosterus [Christopher] a Fanatic. Kyriander [William] a German Civilian. Langle [John Maximilian de] a Protestant Minister. Lanbergius [Philip] a Mathematician. Lescarbot [Mark] an Advocate. Louis XIII, King of France. Lingendes [Claudius de] a Jesuit. Lingendes [John de] a celebrated Preacher. Loges [Mary Bruneau, Lady des]. Longomontanus [Christian] Professor of Mathematics at Copenhagen. Loticus [John Peter] a Physician. Lugo [Francis de] a Spanish Jesuit, and Lugo [John de] his brother; a Jesuit and Cardinal. Lydiat [Thomas] an English author. Linde [Sir Humphry] an English gentleman. Maets [Charles de] Professor of Divinity at Utrecht. Magni [Valerian] a Capuchin. Mayerus [Theodorus Turquet, Sieur de] a Physician. Makowski [John] Professor of Divinity at Franeker. Marefs [John des] Sieur de St Sorlin, and Marefs [Roland des] his elder brother. Marillac [Lewis de] Marshal of France.	Mascardi [Augustin] Chamberlain to Pope Urban VIII. Meynier [Honoratus de] a French author. Mesplede [Lewis] a French Dominican. Mestreaz [John] a Minister of the Church of Paris. Mexiriac [Claudius Gaspar Bachet, Lord of]. Micraeus [John] Professor of Divinity at Stetin. Millietiers [Theophilus Brachet, Sieur de la] a Lawyer, and afterwards a Divine. Monferrat [Montanus Michael] a Spanish Protestant. Montmaur [Peter de] Professor of the Greek tongue in the College Royal of Paris. Morgues [Matthew de] Sieur de St Germain. Morinus [John Baptist] Physician and Royal Professor of Mathematics at Paris. Motte-Aignon [James de la] a French author. Moulin [Peter du] a famous Protestant Minister. Musac, a gentleman of Burgundy. Mustapha, Emperor of the Turks. Neuffermain [Lewis de] a French Poet. Nibysius [Barthold] a famous Divine. Oginiski [Charles] a gentleman of Lithuania. Oholki [Simon] a Dominican. Oregias [Augustin] a great Philosopher. Ozman, Emperor of the Turks. Ottoboni [Peter] Pope under the name of Alexander VIII. Padilla [Louisa de] Countess d'A-randa. Pallaovicino [Ferrante] a satirical author. Paravicin [Vincent] a Protestant Minister. Pareus [Philip] a Grammarian, and Pareus [Daniel] his son. Pajor [Matthias] Professor of Divinity at Groningen. Peyre [James d'Auzoles] a ridiculous author. Peyres [Nicolas Claudius Fabri, Lord of]. Petravius [Dionysius] a Jesuit. Prideaux [John] Bp of Winchester. Racan [Honorat de Beuil, Marquis de]. Raynaud [Theophilus] a Jesuit. Reibing [James] Professor of Divinity at Tubingen. Reinefsus [Thomas] a Physician. Ryer [Andrew du] Sieur de Malezair. Rittangelus [John Stephen] a converted Jew. Rohan [Anne de] sister to the Duke of Rohan. Roreno [Marco Aurelio] Grand Prior of St Roc at Turenne. Ruarus [Martin] a Socinian Minister. Saint-Cyran [John du Verger de Hauranne, Abbot of]. Sancta-Clara [Francis of] an English Franciscan. Sanjon [James] a barefooted Carmelite. Saporita [Antony] Royal Professor of Physic in the university of Montpellier. Scheiblerus [Christopher] Superintendent of the Church, and Rector of the College at Dortmund.	Schiller [Elias] author of a book of Controversy. Schomburg [Henry de] a Marshal of France. Simon [Theodorus] famous for frequently changing his religion. Soubise [Benjamin de Rohan, Duke of]. Sozomenus [John] a Civilian. Spanheim [Frederic] Professor of Divinity at Leyden. Strozzi [Philip] a zealous republican in Florence. Theron [Vital] a French Jesuit. Thomas [Paul] Sieur de Girac. Trifan l'Hermite [Francis] Gentleman in Ordinary to the Duke of Orleans. Tronchin [Theodore] a Minister and Professor of Divinity. Vedelius [Nicolas] a noted reformed Divine. Villareal [Emmanuel Fernandes] Consul for the Portuguese nation at Rouen. Vinay [Alexander de] Minister of the Reformed Church of Annonay. Vorbius [William Henry] Minister of the Arminian congregation at Warmond. Usher [James] Archbp of Armagh. Wart [John de] a great warrior. Wilhem [David le-Loe de] Counsellor in the Council of the Princes of Orange. Abelby [Lewis] Bishop and Earl of Rhodes. Acheri [Lukae de] a Benedictine of the congregation of St Maur. Adam [John] a Jesuit. Aituma [Leo de] Resident for the Haas-towns at the Hague. Altingius [James] Professor of Divinity at Groningen. Ancillon [David] a Protestant Minister. Andreas [Tobias] Professor of History, &c. at Groningen. Angus [Thomas] an English Priest. Annas [Francis] Confessor to Lewis XIV. Anselm, a barefooted Augustine. Antonie [James] Knight of the Order of St James, and Canon of Seville. Apriso [Angelico] a learned Italian. Apriso [Paulo Augustino] a Lawyer, &c. at Florence. Arnauld [Antony] Doctor of the Sorbonne. Aubertin [N.] a French Historian. Baldus [James] a Jesuit and Latin Poet. Balestus [John] Advocate in the Parliament of Paris. Balthasar [Christopher] a learned Protestant in France. Banc [Laurence] Professor of the Civil Law in the University of Franeker. Bangius [Thomas] Doctor and Professor of Divinity in the University of Copenhagen. Berde [John de la] Counsellor of State, Marquis de Marolles, &c. Baron [Vincent] a Dominican. Baroni [Leonora] a fine Singer. Beaulieu [Lewis le Blanc Sieur de] Minister and Professor of Divinity at Sedan. Benedictus [Elpidio de] Cardinal Mazarin's Secretary, and afterwards his Agent at Rome. Benferade [Isaac de] a celebrated French author.

A CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE, &c.

[869]

A. D. Billaut (Adam) a pretty good French Poet. Blondel (Francis) Professor of Physic in the University of Paris. Bebart (Matthew) Minister at Alençon. Bebart (Samuel) Minister at Caen. Besquet (Francis) Bishop of Montpellier. Beslu (César Egasse du) Register and Historiographer of the University of Paris. Bourignon (Antoinette) a famous Fanatic. Brezé (Clara Clementia de Maille) daughter to the Marshal of that name. Brygn (John de) a Professor at Utrecht. Brun (Antony le) Ambassador of Spain at the Hague. Chigi (Fabio) Pope under the name of Alexander VII. Cygn (Martin du) a Jesuit. Comenius (John Amos) a Grammarian and Protestant Divine. Costa (Margaret) an Italian Poetess. Daffauci (Charles Coypeau Sieur) a Musician and French Poet. Des-Larreaux (James de Vallée Lord). Diana (John Nicolas de) a Jesuit. Drabicius (Nicolas) a famous Enthusiast. Drelincourt (Charles) Minister of the Church of Paris. Duaren (Francis) Professor of the Civil Law at Bourges. Dury (John) a Protestant Divine. Eccellenfius (Abraham) a learned Maronite. Eufache (David) a Protestant Minister. Fabricius (Vincent) a good Poet, Physician, &c. Ferrier (John) a Jesuit. Gaffarel (James) a learned Provincial. Gallatus (Angelus) a Jesuit. Golius (James) Mathematic and Arabic Professor in the University of Leyden. Grafwinckel (Theodore) a Civilian. Grenaille (Francis de) a Monk. Guichenon (Samuel) an Historian. Guise (Henry de Lorraine) Duke of. Hali-brigg, first Dragoman at the Grand Seigneur's court. Heidanus (Abraham) Professor of Divinity at Leyden. Hemicbius (John) Professor of Divinity in the University of Rintel. Hobbes (Thomas) author of the Leviathan. Hoornbeck (John) Professor of Divinity at Utrecht, and afterwards at Leyden. Hottinger (John Henry) a learned Swiss. Hugues (James) a Divine and Canon. Joly (Claudius) Chanter and Canon of the Church of Notre Dame at Paris. Jye (Alexander d') Minister of Grenoble. Larrogue (Matthew de) a famous Protestant Minister. Launoy (John de) Doctor of Divinity in the University of Paris. Leffeville (Eustachius Leclerc de) Bishop of Coutance.	A. D. Lautentracti (Stanislaus) a Socinian Minister. Macedo (Francis) a Jesuit, and Macedo (Antony) his brother, likewise a Jesuit. Maignan (Emmanuel) a Philosopher and Minim Friar. Maimbourg (Lewis) a Jesuit. Marca (Peter de) Archbishop of Toulouse. Marefius (Samuel) a Minister and Professor of Divinity. Margarin (Cornelius) Abbot of mount Cassin. Mey (John de) a Doctor of Physic, &c. at Middelburg. Menage (Giles) one of the most learned men of his time. Milton (John) a famous English Poet. Montfaueri, a famous Comedian. Morinus (Simon) a Fanatic. Morison (Robert) a Physician and Professor of Botany at Oxford. Morus (Alexander) Professor of Divinity at Middelburg. Nidhard (John Everard) a Jesuit. Pafcal (Blaise) a famous French author. Patin (Guy) Professor of Physic in the Royal College of Paris. Peyrared (John de) a Latin Poet and Critic. Peyrere (Isaac la) famous for his Treatise concerning the Pre-Adamites. Perrot (Nicolas) Sieur d'Ablancourt one of the great wits of his age. Piaficki (Paul) Bishop of Premisla in Poland. Pinon (James) Abbot of Condé. Pinfon (Francis) an advocate at Paris. Poquelin (John Baptist) known by the name of Moliere. Pries (John) a learned Englishman. Prienac (Daniel de) a Member of the French Academy. Prynn (William) an English Lawyer. Priolo (Benjamin) a French Historian. Quiller (Claudius) a Latin Poet. Reverend-de-Bougy (John) Marquis de Bougy. Ryer (Peter) a Member of the French Academy. Robertwal, Professor of Mathematics at Paris. Rodon (David de) Professor of Philosophy at Die, and afterwards at Orange. Refen (Reinhold) a good warrior. Rovenius (Philip) a titular Archbishop of Philippe. Ruffi (Antony de) Counsellor in the Seneschal's court of Marfeilles. Scheffer (John) a Professor in the University of Upsal. Scheffad (Annibal) a Danish Nobleman. Schomburg (Charles de) Duke of Haluin and Marshal of France. Sengbere (Polycarp) a Civilian. Sennertus (Andrew) Professor of the Oriental Tongues in the University of Wittemberg. Soubes (Lewis Rattuit Count de) Tabor (John Otto) a German Civilian. Tavernier (John Baptist) Baron d'Aubonne, a great traveller.	A. D. Vayer (Francis de la Mothe le) Member of the French Academy, &c. Vander-Linden (John Antonides) Professor of Physic at Leyden. Verdier (N. du) Historiographer of France. Wart (Bernard de) a Dominican Friar, &c. Zurrius (Boxhornius-Mark) Professor at Leyden. Zeytichem (Constantine Huygens Lord of) Secretary and Counsellor to the Princes of Orange. 1675 Apafi (Michael) Prince of Transylvania. Arnoldus (Nicolas) Professor of Divinity at Franeker. Bacone (Leo) Bishop of Glandeve. Barlow (Thomas) Bishop of Lincoln. Bafange (Henry) an Advocate in the Parliament of Normandy. Berault (Claude) Régius Professor of Syriac. Bigos (Emeric) a learned Norman. Blondel (Francis) the King's Professor of Mathematics and Architecture. Borri (Joseph Francis) a famous Chymist, Quack, and Heretic. Borricbius (Olaus) Professor of Philology, Poetry, &c. in the University of Copenhagen. Bofc (Peter du) a French Minister. Bombours (Dominique) a Jesuit. Boursault (Edmund) a French author. Brun (Charles le) chief Painter to the French King. Capifacchi (Raimond) a Cardinal. Cbeureau (Urban) a French Historian. Claude (John) Minister of the Church of Paris. Collatus (Peter Apollonius) a Priest of Novarra. Colomids (Paul) reader in the French Church at London. Cuin (Charles) one of the French Academy. Dati (Carlo) Professor of Philology at Florence. Donatus (Marcellus) Count of Ponzano. Drelincourt (Charles) Professor of Physic at Leyden. Felibien (Andrew) Sieur des Avaux, &c. Flavigny (Valerian de) Doctor of Divinity. Fente Moderata, a Venetian Lady, whose true name was Modesto Pozzo. Gabriel (Giles) Licentiate of the University of Louvain, &c. Gonet (John Baptist) a Dominican. Guarini (Guarinus) a Theatin Monk, &c. Hallé (Peter) Professor of Canon-Law in the University of Paris. Henault (N.) a French Poet. Hermant (Godfrey) Doctor of the Sorbonne. Hubert (Peter de) Lord of Burgh, &c. Jardins (Mary Catherine des) famous for her romances. Innocent XI, Pope. Kirftenius (Peter) Professor of Physic at Upsal, &c. Kruzen (Matthias) an avowed teacher of Atheism. Konig (George Matthias) Professor of Poetry, &c. in the University of Altorf. Kortolt
---	---	--

A. D. Koribolt (Christian) Doctor and Professor of Divinity at Kiel. Kuhlman (Quirinus) a Visionary. Lambecius (Peter) first Librarian to the Emperor. Lancelot (Claudius) a Benedictine Monk. Lefela (Francis de) a man famous for his embassies. Lefrus (John) author of the Polygamia Triumphatrix. Marescia (Joseph Vincent) of the Oratory of St Jerom de la Charité. Mafkaron (Julius) Bishop of Agen. Nicajis (Claudius) a learned Frenchman. Nicolls (Peter) one of the finest Pens in Europe. Orobis (Isaac) a Jewish Physician. Pagtas (N.) an Advocate of the Parliament of Paris. Pays (Renatus le) a Knight of St Maurice. Peliffon (Paul) one of the French Academy. Perex (Joseph) Professor of Divinity in the University of Salamanca.	A. D. Penzlin (Christopher) a Protestant Divine. Pinciar (John) a Protestant Minister. Portugal (Alphonso VI, King of). Pradillon (John Baptist) a Feuillant. Quetif (James) a Dominican. Rangouze, a French author. Rapin (Renatus) a Jesuit. Refinius (Peter) Counsellor and Professor at Copenhagen. Rex (Antony de) Advocate in the Parliament of Paris. Ricci (Michael Angelo) a Cardinal. Rocaberti (John Thomas de) Archbishop of Valencia. Roy (James le) Baron of the Holy Empire, and Lord of St Lambert. Rofs (Touffaint) Marquis de Coye, Secretary to the King's Cabinet, &c. Schomburg (Frederic de) Marshal of France. Serroni (Hyacinthus) first Archbishop of Alby.	A. D. Spinosa (Benedict de) a Jew by birth, and a Systematical Atheist by profession. Tellier (Michael le) Chancellor of France. Tristan de Saint Amand (John) an Antiquary and Medallist. Turretin (Francis) a Minister and Professor of Divinity at Geneva. Vaumoriere (Peter Dortigue Sieur de) Sub-Director to the Academy of the Abbot d'Aubignac. Viviani (Vincenzio) a great Mathematician. Weile (Frederic Raghat de) Minister at Spilk. Wittichius (Christopher) Professor of Divinity at Leyden. Aulney (Maria Catherina le Jumel de Berneville Countess d') famous for her writings. Tawvry (Daniel) Doctor of Physic of the Faculty of Paris.
--	--	---

A LIST

A LIST of those ARTICLES which are not mentioned in the CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE.

A Abbeville, the capital city of the Duchy of Ponthieu in Picardy.
Abdera, a maritime town in Thrace.
Abdias of Babylon, a Legendary Impostor.
Aberdeen, an Episcopal city of Scotland.
Abydos, a city of Egypt.
Acarnania, a country situated on the Ionian sea.
Acco, a fabulous old woman.
Achilles, the name of several persons.
Achillea, an island of the Euxine sea.
Achar, the name of several persons mentioned in fabulous History.
Adamites, a ridiculous sect.
Agricola, a name which a vast many authors bear.
Aguirre: persons of this name.
Aguillon, a small town of Guienne.
Almon, a Prince in Romance.
Alains, a barbarous people.
Alais, a city of France.
Alalcomenium, a small town of Berothia.
Albret, a family.
Albunea, a famous place in Italy.
Alcmaeon: persons of this name.
Alitieri: Cardinals of this name.
Amelia, a city of Italy.
Ammonius: writers of this name.
Anabaptists, a sect.
Anlo (Petrus ab) a fictitious name.
Andrinople, or Adrianople, a city of Thrace.
Andromachus: persons of this name.
Anicius, a Roman family.
Anna, the name of some persons mentioned in the Scripture.
Antinoi, or Antinopolis, a town in Egypt.
Antony, a Roman family.
Apicius: persons of this name.
Apollodorus: persons of this name.
Archelaus: persons of this name.
Arminius, one of the chief deities of Persia.
Arion, a wonderful horse.
Arnauld, a family of Auvergne.
Arodon (Benjamin d') a Jew.
Arria, the name of some Roman ladies.
Arfines: Queens of this name.
Artaxata, the capital city of Armenia.
Athenaeum, a public edifice in Rome.
Arax, or Atracia, a city of Thessaly.
Auriège, or rather Ariege, a river in France.
Avatus, a city of Palestine.
Babylon, a city of Mesopotamia.
Balbus, some persons of this name.
Balzac, a small lordship in Angoumois.
Bellai, a family in Anjou.
Belley, a city of France.
Berenice, the name of several women and Cities.
Berytus, a maritime town of Phoenicia.
Bezantites, or Bezantians, an imaginary sect.
Byblis, a maritime town of Phoenicia.
Bigeis, a Tuscan nymph.

VOL. V.

Bodegraven, a village of Holland on the Rhine.
Boreas, one of the four Cardinal winds.
Brachmanis, Indian Philosophers.
Burgundy (House of)
Burgundy, one of the circles of the empire.
Bufris: persons of this name.
Butas, a Greek Poet.
Cainites, a sect of Heretics.
Capitucchi, a family in Rome.
Cappadocia, a country in Asia.
Caraccioli, or Caraccioli: persons of this family.
Cassius, the name of a Roman family.
Cetbegus, a Roman family.
Chiderles, which among the Turks is, what St George is among the Christians.
Chigi, a noble family of Siena.
Comana: cities of this name.
Combabus, a Syrian Lord.
Conrad (Herimannus) a fictitious name.
Constance, a city of Germany.
Cris, the name of several ancient authors.
Dinant, a city in the Netherlands.
Dioscorides, an island in the Red-Sea.
Dioscurias, a city of Colchis.
Dryades: the name of certain Pagan female deities.
Drummond, a most noble and ancient family of Scotland.
Drusus, a Roman family.
Egnatia, a city of Italy.
Erebus, a place in the isle of Lesbos.
Erfurt, a city of Germany.
Esep, the name of several ancient Personages.
Esep, a Greek author of a romantic History of Alexander the Great.
Estampes, a city of France.
Eurydice, an Illyrian lady.
Faheddin, a Mahometan author.
Fannius, a Roman family.
Fervaux (John) the true author of the Annals of Bavaria.
Flora, an imaginary Courtesan.
Foutarabia, a city of Spain.
Fontevraud, or rather Frontevaux, a famous Abbey in the diocese of Poitiers.
Frangipani, a very ancient Roman family.
Fratricelli, a sect of Heretics.
Garonne, one of the four great rivers of France.
Gergenti, a town of Sicily.
Gesselin, authors of this name.
Guiscard, the name of a family.
Guise, a town of Picardy.
Gymnosophists, a sect of Philosophers.
Hay, a family of Scotland.
Halicarnassus, the capital city of the kingdom of Caria.
Hamadryades, a kind of nymphs.
Harpalice, a beautiful young woman in fabulous history.
Hierocles, a Greek author.
Hierophylus, an Athenian Physician.
Hirpini, a people of Italy.
Hortenfius, the name of a Plebeian family of Rome.
Japan, the name of a country.

Joachim, the fabulous husband of St Anne.
Ipres, or Ypres, an episcopal town in the Earldom of Flanders.
Istebians, a sect.
Italica, a town in Spain.
Juba: Princes of this name.
Julis, a town of the isle of Cea.
Juno, sister and wife of Jupiter.
Jupiter, the greatest of all the Heavens gods.
Kermatians, a sect in Arabia.
Lamia, a Roman family.
Lamia, a town of Thessaly.
Lamia, the daughter of Neptune.
Landau, a city of the Lower Alsace.
Lemnos, an isle in the Aegean sea.
Lesbos, an island of the Aegean sea.
Lefley, an illustrious family of Scotland.
Lestrygens, or rather Lestrygons, a very brutal people.
Leucas, first a Peninsula, then an island.
Leventz, a town of Hungary.
London, an ancient town in the Upper Poitou.
Lupercalia, a feast celebrated by the Romans.
Luxemburg, the capital city of the province of that name.
Macon, a city of Burgundy.
Mamillarians, a sect among the Anabaptists.
Manducus, a name which the Romans gave to certain figures.
Manichaei, an infamous sect of Heretics.
Marcionites, a sect of Heretics.
Mary, the Egyptian.
Mausoleum, the name of a magnificent monument erected to Mausolus.
Mecca, a town of Arabia.
Melchiorites, an imaginary sect.
Metella, name of some Roman ladies.
Methydrium, a city of Peloponnesus.
Mintoli, persons of this family.
Molionides, two brothers who have a good share in the fabulous History.
Montauban, a city of Guienne in Quercy.
Mopis, persons of this name.
Mosynians, or Mosynocians, certain mountaineers in the neighbourhood of the Euxine sea.
Motte, or Motte (La) a town in Lorraine.
Naucratis, a city of Egypt.
Nymphodorus of Amphipolis, a Greek author.
Nully, persons of this name.
Paraclete, an Abbey of Nuns founded by Abelard.
Parthenai, a city of Poitou.
Parthenai, a family.
Paulicians, a sect of Heretics.
Pelias, the name of a lance.
Perga, a city of Pamphilia.
Pergamum, a city of Asia in Mysia.
Phaselis, a sea-town in Lycia.
Phasis, a river that runs through Colchis into the Euxine sea.
Phihra, daughter of Oceanus.
Picardi, the followers of a certain Heretic.
Pitbon, a city of Egypt.

[10 M]

Ponzuoh,

Pozzuolo, a town in the kingdom of Naples.
Prætextatus (Papyrius) a Patrician of Rome.
Reckheim, a county, &c. of the empire.
Rigoristi, a name given in the Spanish Netherlands, to the Janfenists, the Fathers of the Oration, &c.
Rofes, a town in Catalonia.
Rotterdam, a city of Holland.
Sadducees, a sect among the Jews.
Santta-Maura, an island.
Salmacis, a fountain at Halicarnassus.
Scamander, a river of Phrygia near Troy.
Serbellone, an Italian family.
Sicyon, a town of Peloponnesus.
Synergists, a name given to certain Germ. Divines in the XVIth cent.

Siris, a river of Italy.
Sommona-codom, a name given by the Siamese to a certain extraordinary man.
Soubise, a town in Saintonge.
Stellingi, a name which certain Saxons took.
Teleboæ, a people who inhabited an island in the neighbourhood of Acarnania.
Telmessus, a sea-port town in the furthest part of Lycia.
Tenedos, an island in the Ægean sea.
Teos, one of the twelve cities of Ionia.
Termessus, a town of Pisidia.
Tettix, a native of Crete.
Thesmophoria, festivals celebrated in honour of Ceres, considered as a law-giver.
Tibarenians, a people of Asia.

Tibur, a city of Italy.
Tilli, or Thilli, a Lordship in Brabant.
Toulouse, a city of France.
Trabea (Quintus) a comic Poet.
Traerbach, a small town in the Palatinate.
Turlupius, a sect of impudent and scandalous Heretics.
Verona, a city of Italy.
Villena, a Marquitate on the confines of New Castille.
Ulm, an Imperial city.
Usson, a small town in Auvergne.
Westphalus (John) an imaginary person.
Zaburis, a name bestowed on a certain fort of men in Spain.
Zia, or Zea, an island of the Archipelago.

AN INDEX

A N I N D E X

Of the most

M A T E R I A L T H I N G S

Which are mentioned or explained in this Work.

For the use of this Index it must be observed, that the Roman numbers denote the volume, and the figures the page; when the figures stand alone they denote the text, and when they are followed by the letter a or b, they denote the first or second column of the remarks: and if the letter n be added, it denotes some marginal note.

A.

ABBEY of St Denys, the court had so much the more authority over it, as the Monks thereof were debauched. I. 31. b.
Abby. An Abbey given as a reward for a song. I. 428. n. (c).
Abbs. Court-Abbots compared to lap-dogs. IV. 64. b.
Abbs (George) Archbishop of Canterbury; it was adjudged that an involuntary murder had not disqualified him. I. 11, 12.
Abbreviators ought to have a good taste. I. 74. b. Should not suppress singular facts. 422. b. 423. a. Often give us balderdash. II. 712. a. See Abridgements.
Abdera, a city of Thrace, where on certain days a person was devoted, and then stoned to death. I. 20. Its laws set a note of infamy upon those who had spent their patrimony. II. 635. a.
Abderams compared to Alexander and Scipio in point of continence. I. 14. b. He did not plunder the city of Tours. II. 851. a. How he disposed of the daughter of Eudo, Duke of Aquitain. IV. 283.
Abderites, the distemper which they had. I. 19. a. b. The opinion which they entertained of Democritus. 20. b. Whether they wrote to Hippocrates to desire him to come and see Democritus. II. 638. a. What Cicero understands by an Abderite. 642. b.
Abderus, Hercules's favourite. I. 18. a.
Abdias's book the source of several fabulous stories. III. 577. b.
Abdissi, Patriarch of the Nestorians, whether he assisted at the Council of Trent. III. 359. a. b.
Abel (Leonard) is sent to the Levant with the character of Apostolic Nuncio. III. 259. b. He composed a book concerning the state of the Oriental Christians. ibid.
Abelard, his turn of wit. I. 27. a. Vanity was his distinguishing foible. ibid. He had an inclination to retire among the Infidels in order to secure himself from the prosecutions of the Inquisitors. 199. a. A catalogue of his manuscripts. 248. b. the printing of which did him no honour. 249. a. A list of his particular sentiments whether truly or falsely ascribed to him. 759. a. He continues still to be charged with the errors that were imputed to him. 760. a. b. St Bernard endeavours to prepossess all the world against him. 773. b. 774. a. His apology is laughed at. II. 533. b. His learning draws auditors to him from all parts. III. 70. a.

He is reduced to indigence by women. 71. a. Suffers an irreparable loss. 73. a. His misfortune is lamented. 75. a. particularly by his wife, who goes the length to murmur against providence. ibid. b. The arguments made use of to comfort him were not all good ones. 73. b. Two of his assassins were punished. 76. b. He would believe nothing but what was proved by natural reasons. IV. 80. b. Is persecuted, by whom, and for what. 469, 470. To whom we are indebted for the edition of his works. I. 248. and b. There are copies of them which carry the name of Francis d'Amboise, and others which carry that of Andrew Du Chesne. 249. a. b.
Abensberg. What name that city bore in the Roman History. I. 548. a. b.
Abiram. It is pretended that the Pagans alluded to the story of Corah, Dathan, and Abiram. I. 275. a.
Ablancourt (Fremont d') facts that concern him. IV. 589. b. 590. a. An examination into one of his notions, viz. that Princes ought to understand Latin. 590. b.
Ablancourt (Perrot d') revised six times the books he had a mind to publish. I. 487. b.
Abuspes, Grammarians are not agreed upon the signification of that word. II. 709. b.
Abortions, untimely or anticipated, are real murders. IV. 500. a. Have been practised a great while. ibid.
Abortive children, or untimely births, how great their number is. IV. 498. b. 499. a. b. as far as 502. a.
Abraham, his books are full of venom against the Christians. I. 43. b. His impious notion about the motive of God's forbidding our first parents to touch a certain fruit in the garden of Eden. II. 854. a.
Abraham, his dissimulation. I. 37. a. b. Is the Patriarch of the Refugees. 44. a. It is said that he became a convert. 45. a. Idle traditions touching the most considerable circumstances of his life. 44. a. b. as far as 46. a. b. The print of his feet honoured by the Saracens. 124. a. He lies with Hagar in obedience to Sarah. V. 54. b. 55. a. He is falsely said to have written the book of the creation. I. 173. a. Whether he authorized a law of Solon's touching marriage. II. 504. b. Whether he feared death more than any conjugal dishonour. V. 50. b.

Abraam

- Abram* (Fathet) his notes upon the paraphrase of Nonnus. I. 47. b. He draws a strange consequence from a passage of Cicero, relating to the Lupercalia. III. 933. b.
- Abridgments*: The necessary qualities of a good abridgment. I. 510. b. It requires a very good discernment. 518. a. Advice to those who write abridgments. II. 685. a. They would be found very faulty, if compared with the originals. 703. b.
- Abridgments and copiers of abridgments*: great sources of falsification. IV. 609. a.
- Abolition* from the crimes of Fornication, Sodomy, Bessiality: what it costs. I. 628. a. b. An abolition of a very rigorous kind. 96. b.
- Abstinence*: It is possible that a man may abstain long from eating and drinking. III. 582. b. Objections made to Laurence Joubert, touching the abstinence of Moses, Elias, and Jesus Christ; his answer. ibid.
- Abu-Gabshan* parts with a considerable employment for a bottle of wine. IV. 176. b.
- Abuses*, in what case it is thought that they should be tolerated in the Church. II. 374. a. When they have taken such deep root that a Magistrate would only endanger his authority by opposing them, in that case they ought to be tolerated. V. 179. b. Monks and parish-priests at this day call for a reformation of abuses, though they continue to be Catholics and great enemies to the Protestants. 68. b. The remedy of one abuse is often-times the introduction of another. II. 106. b.
- Abysini*, why their Emperors have born the name of Preftor-John. I. 36.
- Academy*: the founder of the middle or second Academy. I. 409. a. The founder of the third followed the doctrine of the second. II. 326. a. III. 697. a.
- Academy* (the French) injuriously treated. IV. 257. a. The History of it has always been looked upon as a master-piece. 534. n. (b). A disagreement between two lists of its members. I. 627. b.
- Acamas*, the isle of Cyprus had formerly that name. I. 53. a.
- Acarie*, Master of Accompts, called the Lacquey of the League, and for what reason. IV. 243. a.
- Acarnanians*, often at war with the Etolians. I. 55. Their generous policy. ibid.
- Acatalepta*, see Incomprehensibility.
- Acciaoli*, his daughters portioned for marriage at the public expence. I. 56.
- Acciaulus* (Zenobius) his paraphrase upon a poem of Marc Musurus in praise of Plato. IV. 295. a.
- Accidents*, Peter d'Ailli explained them in the same manner as Des Cartes does. I. 166. a. The idea which Philosophers give us of them. V. 221. a. b. They are not distinct from substances. III. 558. a. Their manner of subsisting without a subject in the Eucharist. IV. 59. a.
- Acissare*, or ακκισαρος, the signification of that word. I. 63. a. b.
- Accius* (Lucius) his character. I. 60. b. 61. a. b.
- Accords* (the Sieur des) cited. I. 346. b. III. 762. b. IV. 157. a.
- Accommodation*: worried Princes generally defer an accommodation with the victor as long as they can. V. 661.
- Accords (des)* an imaginary Lordship. I. 66. a. b.
- Account*; the first that was given of what had been said was unfaithful. II. 852. a. which was a bad omen for the time to come. ibid.
- Accursus* (Mariangelus); a passage of that author explained. I. 33. a. Why he called Sallust his countryman. 69. a.
- Accusations*; Some admirable heads of accusation. I. 391. a. Who those privileged persons are that may accuse with impunity. I. 758. a. b. 759. a. It is almost in vain to oppose reasons drawn from probability to an accusation that is attended with circumstances of fact. II. 240. b. To accuse people of state-crimes an ordinary artifice with persecutors. I. 30. a. It was not lawful to receive accusations against those who were absent in the service of the Republic. 351. II. 345. a. Whether a person is always obliged to repel accusations in order to be reckoned innocent. I. 784. a. b. A sure way of knowing whether they be slanderous. 795. a. b.
- Accused*. In certain cases nothing can be concluded from the silence of accused persons. I. 784. a. They ought to be believed, when they publicly deny things which may be easily proved, and which their adversaries do not prove. IV. 217. b.
- Accusers* meet with too much indulgence. I. 327. a. ought to undergo the punishment of retaliation when they accuse falsely. ibid. Those whom we have most reason to fear are the priests. 468. a. Professed accusers were hated among the Pagans, and that too at a time when accusing gave young Advocates of quality an opportunity of exercising themselves. II. 356. b. A reflexion upon that. ibid. Accusers have at all times taken notice of the manner how people talk of news, in order to ground their accusations thereupon. 627. a. The character of those who make it their business to accuse others of Heresy. IV. 780. b. Very often make use of religion for a pretence. I. 307. a. If people were reasonable they would make accusers stand in awe of them. 780. a. Ought to be severely punished when they suborn domestics to depose against their masters. II. 627. a. Are capable of doing any thing to make their adversaries odious. V. 170. b. See Informers.
- Acchillea* (a fountain so called), whether that word be a noun substantive or adjective. I. 86. b.
- Achilles*, that name was given equally to the champions of Venus, and to those of Mars. I. 82. a.
- Achilles* appeared to Homer surrounded with so much glory, that he could not bear the splendor of it. I. 85. b. Birds swept the temple of Achilles every morning. 85. a. n. (20). Whether love made a part of his character. II. 140. a. b. He would not suffer any other Greek to shoot darts at Hector. III. 183. b. By what name he was called whilst he wore woman's cloaths. IV. 659. a. How his designs upon Hemithea were prevented. V. 315. a. What was to be his destiny. ibid. a. b.
- Achilleum Argumentum*, what it signifies, and why. I. 82. b.
- Achilles Index* (the) of Mr Drelincourt very much improved in the second edition. II. 140. b.
- Acidalius*, why the Dissertation intitled Mulieris esse homines was ascribed to him. I. 89. a.
- Acotius*, what has been said of him and of his book of the stratagems of the Devil. I. 92. a. b. 93. a.
- Acrotatus*, the ingenuous exclamations with which the women and old men of Lacedemon followed him, as he was returning from the place where he had repulsed the enemies assaults. II. 523.
- Act*: An act that has been purloined from the records of the parliament of Paris. III. 297. b. 298. a.
- Action* of a Catholic gentleman the most singular and strange that ever was known. II. 91. a. b.
- Actions*: We find examples of good actions in each country, age, and religion. I. 561. a.
- Actions* (human), the fear and love of God are not their only spring. V. 811.
- Actions* (remarkable) are ascribed by the people sometimes to one King, sometimes to another. The same thing is practised with regard to saints. II. 770. b.
- Actors on the stage*, the advantage they have over Advocates. I. 61. b.
- Acts of the Apostles* and Apocalypse in French rhyme calculated for the stage: a very uncommon work. II. 477. a. b. Acted at Paris in the year 1541. ibid. The undertakers and Booksellers prosecuted. ibid. b. Extracts from that work. ibid. a. b. c.
- Acts* (public): at what time they began to be drawn up in the vulgar tongue in France and Spain. II. 379. a. III. 97. a. and in Germany. ibid. They were made in Latin for several ages almost all over the west. II. 517. a. The Spaniards, Germans, and French, began very late to make use of their own language in those writings. 518. b.
- Actuarius*, a particular dignity belonging only to the Physicians at the court of Constantinople. I. 99. a.
- Actuaria* (Don Antonio d'), to what length his violence proceeded in the civil-war of Castile. IV. 456. a. b.
- Adam*, how long he continued in the state of innocence. I. 22. a. b. Dreams of the Rabbins about his mourning for Abel's death, and divorcing himself from Eve's bed. 23. a. and about his knowledge. 101. b. 102. a. What the Talmudists say of his stature. ibid. From whence proceeded his fall according to Agrippa. 154. Whether he was an Hermaphrodite. 102. a. b. II. 856. a. b. An hypothesis which is not at all well calculated to justify the providence of God with respect to his fall. 857.

857. a. What was his escutcheon. III. 27. b. His article in this Dictionary raises the indignation of divers persons; the author's answer. I. 103. b. V.
- Adam* (Antonius ab): what that author was. V. 461. a. b.
- Adam* (Father), what he said of St Augustin, and St Paul. I. 106. a. b. One of his sermons gave occasion to a jest. 108. b.
- Adam* (Melchior) censured for several anachronisms. I. 139. a. He does not much examine what he compiles. V. 520. a. b.
- Adamites*, were calumniated. I. 111. b. Whether there be still any such in England and Italy. 112. a. b. Their error with respect to nakedness renewed, and carried to a more extravagant length in the XVth century. IV. 628. a. b. 629. a. b. Their uncleanness. 784. a. b. 785. a. b.
- Additions*. It is difficult to make pertinent additions to a book. IV. 79. b.
- Adelfra* (Marques) a Preacher who converted a Mahometan by one of his sermons. I. 326. n. (a.)
- Adiatorix* basely massacres a colony of the Romans. II. 532. b. But he is punished for it by Augustus. ibid.
- Adjectives*, whether those ending with an é masculine, may be placed before their substantives. IV. 887. b. 888. a.
- Adolphus*, an Epic Poem dedicated to Christina Queen of Sweden. III. 140. b. 141. a. b.
- Adolphus of Nassau* chosen Emperor of Germany. V. 67. Killed in an engagement by Albert of Austria. ibid.
- Adonijah*, why Solomon caused him to be put to death. V. 803.
- Adonis* (the) of Cavalier Marini, censured and defended. I. 387. a.
- Adonis*, son to Cinyras by Metharme his wife. IV. 641. Or son to Cinyras by his own daughter. 642.
- Adoptions*, what the practice of them was in old times. I. 325. b. n. (10).
- Adrian* (Matthew) a converted Jew, was the first Professor of the Hebrew tongue in the college of the three languages at Louvain. II. 236. b.
- Adversaria*, that word ridiculously translated Adversarius. V. 43. a.
- Adversarius*: An adversary accused of a false doctrine cannot mortify his enemies more than by appearing quite different from their representations. I. 654. b. One ought never to deny their good qualities by affecting an air of contempt for them. 696. b. Some people are concerned that they have not a sufficient number of adversaries. 339. b. People have always endeavoured to turn the person and doctrine of their adversaries into ridicule. III. 698. b. It is prudent, when one gets the better of them, to be satisfied with a moderate advantage. 972. b. Authors hardly ever consult their writings. IV. 637. a. b. 638. a. See Antagonist.
- Adversaries* in point of religion, a person should never make a merit of their hatred. II. 695. b. Why he should not. ibid.
- Adversity*, the unsettled way in which people have reasoned upon adversity and prosperity. IV. 194. a. False consequences that are drawn from adversity and prosperity. 55. a. b. 216. a. The manner in which adversity is accounted for, makes the condition of human life incomprehensible. 468. b.
- Advice*: it is dangerous to give advice about public affairs. IV. 795. a.
- Advocates*: who is their idol. I. 66, 67. They are subject to contradict themselves and for what reason, 351. b. 352. a. II. 626. a. b. IV. 805. a. It is even a privilege which Cicero allows them. I. 352. b. The humorous answer of an advocate touching the bad causes which he had taken upon him to plead. 224. b. Their business is more difficult than that of preachers. 61. b. Their labours avail nothing against the rashness of a corrupt judge. 224. What Ammianus Marcellinus says against those of his time. 226. a. b. They lay hold of every thing which they think advantageous to their cause. II. 343. b. The disadvantage which modern advocates lie under, when compared with those of antiquity. 724. b. Their qualities described in verse. 309. a. b. 310. a. An advocate refuses to charge himself with the interests of the Dukes of VOL. V.
- Angoulême at the time of her difference with the Constable of Bourbon. 761.
- Adultery*, whether it may be innocently committed to save the life of an husband or wife. I. 91. a. b. In what manner the ancient Romans punished women that were taken in the fact. 592. a. b. And by whom that custom was abolished. ibid. Adultery wished for by way of imprecation. II. 247. b. The encouragement people have to commit that crime. V. 17. a. b. How common it is. 425. a. b. Reflexions upon a trial for adultery. 112. a. b. 113. a. b. A very odd kind of punishment that was antiently inflicted on adulterers. I. 191. a. b. And which serves to explain a passage of Catullus. ibid. How those were punished that were taken in the very fact. III. 74. a. b. Adulteries punished with death at Orleans, and the reflexions which people about court made upon that punishment. V. 17. a. What punishment the Roman laws inflicted upon those that were guilty of it. 113. a. b. A plant that hindered women from committing adultery. IV. 610. a. b.
- Æneid*, a dislich on the order which Virgil gave to burn it. I. 375. a. b.
- Ædapius* gives a governor of Egypt a box on the ear. III. 445. a. b.
- Ælii*, the Antonini, Emperors of Rome were descended from that house. III. 711. a.
- Era* (Christian) a new beginning which a Visionary gives it. II. 123. a.
- Ætius*, the method he followed in explaining the Catechism. I. 472. a.
- Ætna*, a city built by Hiero King of Syracuse. II. 823. a. 825. b.
- Affairs*, what sort of people great affairs require. I. 178, 179. a. There are few great affairs but what owe their success as much, at least, to the misconduct of one of the parties, as to the prudence of the other. 588. a. To excel both in learning and the transaction of affairs is a very rare talent. II. 314. b.
- Affairs of State*, there are persons who render you suspected if you differ from them on these affairs. I. 681. a. Savonarola meddled too much with state affairs, and ruined himself thereby. V. 61. b. 62. a.
- Africa*, a design to send some persons secretly there to inform themselves of the state of Christianity. III. 527. a.
- Agamemnon*, according to the Scholiast on Theocritus was the same with Perimede. IV. 585.
- Agamemnon*, his amorous disposition makes one question the truth of his having observed the oath which he made to Achilles. II. 139. a.
- Agathon*, his discernment with respect to a vessel of milk that was presented to him. II. 636. b. Philostratus called him a Diviner upon that account. ibid.
- Agathocles*, plunders and ravages the islands of Corfu and Ithaca, the ridiculous reason he gives for it. I. 54. b.
- Agathon*: some of his sentences. I. 126. a.
- Age*, women are not the only persons that conceal it. III. 177. a. It is the only only thing which they never tell. 309. a. n. (8). Princesses cannot conceal their age. IV. 333. a. The extent of its autumn, and when a man is in the winter of life. I. 125. b. IV. 163. a.
- Age*. Our age is almost as easy to be imposed upon as any whatsoever. I. 7. b. In every age they can hardly believe what Historians say of antient times, if it is too remote from the modern customs. II. 710. a.
- Agésilas*, despised by the Egyptians on account of his small stature. V. 278. a. b. 279. a. b. Why his stratagems of war did not succeed. IV. 654. n. (9). He lived in great simplicity. I. 130. a. The theory of that Prince. ibid. b. 131. a. He was rather willing that the Persians should break the truce. 131. a. What answer he made to the person that surprised him riding on a hobby-horse. ibid. He regrets the loss of Agésilas. 134. a. b. A fine answer that Agésilas made. 130. b. He is compared with Conon. 550. a. b.
- Agésilas*. II. what answer that Prince made to those who told him that he had been an hostage. I. 133. b.

INDEX.

- Agatoridas* goes to Memphis, and on what errand. I. 208. b.
- Agis*, is the first King of Laedæmon, who was put to death in the city. I. 273. a.
- Agnes*, widow to Henry III. A question which she put to Peter Damianus. III. 80. b.
- Agnes Castus*, what the virtue of that herb is, and why it was firewed on the beds of the Greek women, during certain solemn rites. V. 334. a. b.
- Its virtue not near so great as that of the plant Leucophyllus. IV. 610. b.
- Agreda* (Mary d') extracts from a pamphlet touching the condemnation of her book. I. 137. b. 138. a.
- Aggressor*. Whether in personal reproaches he should suffer the defendants writings to go without an answer. I. 697. a. The aggressor is not he who gives the first blow, but he who prepares to give it. II. 104. a. Puffendorf's opinion in this point. ibid.
- According to John Bouchet and the Baron du Villars, this was the case of Henry II, with Charles V. ibid.
- Agricola* (John) was founder of the Antinomian sect. I. 140. Was one of those who drew up the Interim. 141.
- Agricola* (Rodolph) dedicates his Latin version of the Axiarchus of Plato to Rodolph Langius. III. 725.
- Agrigentum*, at what time and by whom that city was founded. III. 157. a. In what condition it was when the Romans settled there. ibid. b. What the qualities of it's soil were, and what use St Augustin made of those qualities. ibid. and 158. a. To what a pitch the devout zeal of the inhabitants for the fame of Hercules rose. 158. b.
- Agrippa* (Henry Cornelius) had not much credit with the Devil. I. 148. b. He at first looked upon Luther as a deliverer of the oppressed. 149. b. Was not for the raising of altar against altar. 155. a. Foretold that the confutable of Bourbon would still be victorious in the year 1526. For which he was disgraced. 147. b. 148. a. Sutcliffe charges him with having spoke dishonourably of Sixtus IV. V. 164. b.
- Agrippina* wife to Germanicus, what the said of the orator Afer. I. 120. a. Overcame the weakness of her own sex, by imitating the fortitude of the other. 523. a. An encomium which a Roman Historian has bestowed upon her. II. 757. a. She wanted to marry a second husband. ibid. b. What Tiberius said to her. IV. 143. b.
- Agrippina*, Nero's mother, all her rivals with the Emperor Claudius were reduced to two. III. 860. a. She caused one of them to be murdered in her exile. 861. b.
- Agrippina*, a piece writ by Cirano Bergerac, which was suppressed on account of some impieties which he had inserted in it. II. 825. a.
- Agropoli* (the Marquis of) particulars that concern him. V. 467. a. b.
- Aguirre* (Cardinal d') writ against the decisions of the Clergy of France assembled in the year 1682. I. 157. a. b. His zeal for the court of Rome raised him from being a simple Monk to the dignity of a Cardinal. ibid. b.
- Ajax*, what answer he made to his father who recommended to him that he should pray to God. I. 160. b. Invoked by the Greeks. 161. b. He and his son were extremely honoured by the Athenians. V. 304. His descendants were not very illustrious. ibid. b. His stature was like unto Saul's. I. 160.
- Ajax* (the Locrian) in what manner the crime which he committed upon Cassandra was expiated by the Locrians. II. 340. a. b.
- Aysha*, the History of that woman. IV. 48. a. b.
- Ailli* (Peter d') bigotted to judicial Astrology. I. 164. b. 165. a. He condemned several tenets of the Church of Rome. 165. b.
- Aymar* (James) relies upon the virtue of his wand. I. 7. a. b. 8. a. b. 9. a. b. Confounded at the palace of Condé, where he confesses his imposture. 7. b. reflexions thereupon. 8. b. 9. a.
- Air* is the principle of all things according to some Philosophers. II. 672. a. b. III. 649. b. 650. a. b.
- Aliba* is accused of having altered the Hebrew text of the Bible. I. 173. a.
- Alamanni* (Lewis or Aloisio) III. 90. a. IV. 11. b.
- Alarcon* charged with the person of Francis I, after his being taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia. III. 97. b.
- Alba* (The Dukes of) his answer to Henry II. II. 444. a. As a mark of his serenity. III. 274. b. 275. a. b.
- Albert* (the Archduke) the author of his History printed at Cologne in the year 1693 shews very little exactness. II. 128. a. b.
- Albertus Magnus*, it is said that his body was preserved from putrefaction. I. 183. b. He was so little that he was thought to be on his knees, while he was really standing. 184. a. His sagacity made him discover the mis-conduct of his servant maid by the tone of her voice. III. 636. b.
- Albertus* (Leander) his description of Italy. III. 693. a. When it was published. IV. 165. b.
- Albigenses*, it is not true that they were Manichees. IV. 97.
- Albret* (a certain Lord) killed in his tent, in the arms of his mistress. IV. 302. a.
- Albret* (Joan d') Queen of Navarre: Garasie sharply censured for publishing the tale of her Tapestry. III. 134. It was affirmed that he had cast gross reflexions on that Princess, but he cleared himself from that charge. ibid.
- Albumen*, a goddess worshipped by the Heathens. V. 350. b. 351. a. b.
- Alcazar*, whether it is a village, a borough, or a town. IV. 382. a.
- Alcademus*, Professor of Philosophy and Physics: several Princes desired very much to have him. IV. 763. a.
- Alceus* in describing his house speaks of nothing but helmets and bucklers. I. 426. b.
- Alexander* (the Great) the History of his amours praised with notes. II. 245. b.
- Alezius* (Andrew) united polite Literature with the Civil Law. I. 67. a. In what manner he justified himself as to his inconstant humour 195. a. He learned by the action of a peasant the lesson of a passage of Plautus. III. 154. b. He talks pretty freely of the Pope, in a letter to one of his friends. III. 590. b. 591. a. His mistake as to the time when Marc Antony harnessed a set of lions. 960. a. He never was Professor of the Civil Law at Milan. V. 139. b.
- Alcibiades*, by whom he was recalled to Athens. II. 571. a. He was always attended by two concubines. III. 703. a. He was the greatest lover of pleasures in the world, and the readiest to quit them when the exigency of his affairs required it. 414. a.
- Alcinoi Menfis* and Alcinoi Apologus, are two different proverbs. I. 201. a.
- Alcmena*, the story went that she disappeared during the ceremony of her funerals, and that the Thebans paid her divine honours. I. 208. She wore three moons on her forehead, and for what reason. 284. a. She is a very fit example to prove that a sincere ignorance is a good excuse. 206. a. Upon what conditions she offers herself for a wife. V. 306, 307, 308. Different opinions on that head. 307. b. 308. a. b.
- Alcoran*, it's text corrected by Bibliander. I. 801. b. The veneration which the Turks have for it. IV. 41. a. b. Whether Mahomet declared to some, that only the third part of it was true. 47. a. After what manner it was composed. ibid. It's chapter of the Elephant. 177. a. Revealed in one night to Mahomet at Mecca. I. 326. a. Composed in twenty years. ibid. Translated into the language of Arragon. 326. Andrew du Ryer's French translation of it censured by Winder. IV. 872. b. The English translation which is made upon the French one is alike faulty. ibid.
- Alcoran of the Cordeliers*, adorned with marginal notes: What it is. III. 82. a. b.
- Alcyonide*, a tragedy very much esteemed. IV. 873. b. 874. a.
- Aldegonde* (the Sieur de Sainte) receives a commission to go upon a new translation of the Bible into the Dutch tongue. II. 705. a.
- Adelmo* (Saint) in what manner he mortified his lust. III. 80. a. b. And how he likewise exposed himself to danger, to make the Devil mad. ibid. What he required of one of his devotees, in order to make trial of himself. 280. b.
- Aldobrandin* (Thomas) commits three faults in speaking of the temple of Venus Lamia. III. 715. b.
- Alexander* (Cardinal) whether he was a Jew. I. 215. a. b. 216. a.
- Alegambe* (Father) publishes a falsehood touching Theodorus Beza. I. 726. a. Commits a fault for which Mr

INDEX.

- Mr Ogier should have demanded reparation. III. 133. b. Alegambe and his continuator were ignorant of the disguises which a writer of their order made use of. 657. a. b. Alegambe is not always so exact as people imagine. IV. 76. a. b. He does not suppress what may enhance the birth and riches of the writers of his order. I. 747. a. is confused in his computations. ibid.
- Alston* (The Duke of) there was a prodigious antipathy between him and the King his brother. III. 407. b. 408. a. He is put upon very wicked designs by two of his favourites. IV. 935. a. b.
- Althaus* (Theophilus) a fictitious name which Lyferus borrowed. III. 973.
- Alexandra* (a Statue) why so called. II. 342. b.
- Alexandra*, a Poem that has very much exercised the Critics. III. 957. a. b.
- Alexander the Great*, his answer to the person that offered him the lyre of Paris. I. 83. a. A fine answer which he made to a Queen who sent him delicious refreshments. 100. He is alarmed on the proposals of Pexodares's Ambassador. ibid. b. He desires to see and honour the tomb of Ajax. 161. a. Whether he was chaste. 366. b. Whether he was treated by Apelles in the manner as is pretended. ibid. and 367. a. b. He was very superstitious, and put an extreme confidence in soothsayers. 447. a. His soothsayer did him more service than any of his generals. ibid. He sometimes lends a helping hand to the soothsayers, in order to make their predictions succeed. ibid. Sometimes also he disregards them. ibid. b. One ought not to be too much surprized at his superstition. ibid. He acquired no small skill both in the theory and practice of Physic. 465. a. Whether in the like situation others would have done no less than he. II. 414. a. b. Democritus could not have laughed at him. 637. a. He said that if he was not Alexander he would wish to be Diogenes. 666. b. Had once a design of returning into Europe, and upon what occasion. III. 356. b. Had books sent him into Asia, and particularly the productions of the Poets. ibid. Whether he had drank the cup of Hercules when he fell sick. 428. a. b. The thought which he made use of to comfort the King his father afflicted with a wound that he had received in a battle. 485. b. He draws these words from the mouth of the Priestess of Delphi, My son, thou art invincible. 568. b. By what invention his tutor made himself agreeable. 973. a. b. The opposition between his character and that of his father. IV. 8. a. b. Whether he could have any reasons for suppressing miracles that had been wrought in his favour. 607. b. 608. a. b. In what other Kings endeavoured to imitate him. 660. b. 661. a. He ruins Persepolis. V. 320. a. b. A reflexion upon his birth-day. III. 59. a. b. V. 360. a. He expended fourscore thousand talents upon learning the properties of animals. 351. b. He deprives Cleopha of her kingdom, enjoys her, and settles her again upon the throne. II. 523.
- Alexander*, King of the Indies, son to Alexander the Great by Cleopha. II. 523. a. b.
- Alexander Severus* (Emperor) had the image of Apollonius in the same place where that of Jesus Christ was. I. 381. a. He had in his chapel the images of Apollonius, Jesus Christ, Abraham, Orpheus, &c. and practised religious ceremonies in honour of them. ibid. b. Encolpius's History of that Emperor is not extant. II. 770. An impostor pretends to have translated it from the Greek. ibid. a. He associates to the empire Ovinus Camillus, who had aspired to it, and who renounces it. ibid. a. b.
- Alexander VI* (Pope) loses his life, by drinking of the poison which he had caused to be prepared for another. III. 321. a. There was in him neither truth, nor faith, nor religion. 765. b. Journal of his life. V. 757. He had like to have been crushed to death on St Peter's day. II. 472. a. b. He orders Mancinellus's tongue to be cut out, and his hands to be cut off. IV. 89. Causes Lorenzo to be thrown into the Tyber. 90. b. His conduct with respect to Savonarola, &c. V. 61. b. 62. a. b. & sequent.
- Alexander VII* (Pope) a story that is told about his religion. II. 474. b. 475. a. He disapproves the Duke of Savoy's conduct towards the Vaudois. 475. b. He speaks to some English gentlemen with a great deal of good-nature. ibid. He preaches up to them, maxims, which Mr Jurieu has praised, without foreseeing that he should one day oppose them. 476. a. It is pretended that he was related to the Grand Signior. ibid. He was basely deceived by three Dutch Bookellers whom he had brought to Rome. ibid. b. He died much more lamented by the Jesuits than by the Janenists. 476.
- Alexander* (Natalis) the character of his Theologie Morale V. 853.
- Alexandria*: the feast of Adonis was celebrated there in the time of St Cyril. I. 116. a. Its school deprav'd by the vain subtilties of the disputants. 268. Restored to a wonderful lustre by Ammonius. ibid. A Heathen Philosopher, teaches there openly the eternity of the world in the VIth century. 270. b. The inhabitants thereof, send Embassadors to Caligula to complain against the Jews. 374. Its chronicle gives us a pleasant chimera touching the daughter of Aquila. III. 316. b. 317. a.
- Alypius*: Astronomical tables, who the author of that work is, and what it cost. II. 379. a.
- Alban*, what he writ on the twilight, joined to Father Nonius's treatise upon the same subject. IV. 382. b.
- Alypius*, instead of persuading St Augustin to live single, suffers himself to be persuaded to marry. I. 503. a. b. The character of his disposition of mind. II. 401. a. n. e.
- Alatius*, no man ever carried the power of the Pope a greater length than he. I. 231. The pleasant reason he gave to Pope Alexander VII, why he did not take orders. ibid. b. The character which Mr Claude, Mr Simon, and Mr Sallo give him. ibid. a. b. 232. a.
- Alliance*: A monstrous alliance between the worship of the gods and the most filthy passions. I. 597. a. b.
- Alliances*, reflexions on those that are entered into with Heretics or Infidels. I. 407. a. b. The mutual reproaches which the French and Spaniards bestow upon one another, on account of their entering into alliances with Heretics. II. 338. a. The Pope may with a safe conscience make use of Infidel soldiers. ibid. a.
- Allix* declares that Antichrist shall perish either in the year 1716, 1720, or 1736. II. 125. b.
- Allum*, whether there be a virtue in Allum to make wood incombustible. I. 424. a. b.
- Allysons*: ridiculous allusions borrowed from a passage of St Bernard. I. 492. a.
- Almachius* (St) killed by the Gladiators. I. 230. b. It is nevertheless conjectured that he is an imaginary saint, and for what reason. 230. b. 231. a. b.
- Almanack*, that word being abridged was taken for a man's name, and the man supposed to be a martyr. I. 230. b. 231. a. b.
- Almanack*: Leon Morgard condemned to the galleys, on account of the predictions which he had put in his Almanack. III. 955. b. The contempt which the Physician Sylvius expressed for the Almanack. V. 138. a.
- Almonen Calif*, disturbs the devotion of the Mussulmen V. 286. By what means. ibid.
- Almoner*, at what time the title of the King's Great Almoner, and that of the Great Almoner of France, began to take place. II. 393. a. When and upon what occasion the Great Almoners of France were created, in virtue of their office, commanders of the order of the Holy Ghost. I. 258. b.
- Almi*, bad reasons to excuse one's self from giving any. II. 110. a. b. 112. a. b.
- Almucheft*, a looking-glass, what the virtue of it is. I. 598.
- Alisia Sigaa Tolatana*, the book composed under her name is absolutely to be condemned. V. 837.
- Alopo* (Pandolfo) is beheaded, and for what reason. IV. 306. b.
- Alphonso* King of Naples, how far he expressed his esteem for Ovid. IV. 433. a.
- Alphonso X*, King of Castile, the censure which he is said to have passed on the works of God. II. 379. b. 380. a.
- Alphonso*, two Kings of that name have been confounded, and several things taken from the one and ascribed to the other. II. 381. a. But neither of these took the pains to compile the Law-book or Code. 380. b. 381. a.

Alface

- Alface*, whether the free towns of that province could have continued to hold immediately of the empire, under the protection or guardianship of a King of France. III. 717. b. 718. a.
- Altieri* (Cardinal) was greatly concerned when he received the news of the conquests which Lewis XIV made upon the United Provinces. II. 758. b.
- Altieri*: Cardinals of that name. I. 237.
- Altingius*, a ready reply which he made. I. 240. a.
- His shift compared to that of St Athanasius. ibid.
- Alviano* (Bartholomew d'): Navagiero goes to the wars with him, and composes his Funeral Oration. IV. 315.
- Amadeus Guimenius*, who the author of that book was. IV. 833. b.
- Amadis*: the reading of the Amadis inclines one to lasciviousness. I. 65. b.
- Amalricus Augerii*, what he says of the She-Pope. IV. 739. a.
- Amama* (Sixtinus) proves Rosweide to be in an error. II. 150. b.
- Amend Flavien*, the fictitious name of an author. II. 27.
- Amantius*, the praises which he bestows on Capriata. II. 309. a. b. 310. a.
- Amaseus* (Romulus) has misunderstood a passage of Pausanias touching the epitaph of Æschylus. II. 826. a.
- Amasti*, the transmigration of his soul into the body of a lion. I. 382.
- Amastrii*, the History of that Princess. II. 676. a. b.
- And of the town which bore her name. ibid. b. 677. a. b.
- Amasury*, an Heretic condemned at Paris, and for what reason. I. 103. a. His doctrine touching the reunion of the two sexes. ibid. A reflexion upon that head. ibid. b.
- Amawi*, King of Jerusalem, assists Dorgan. IV. 383.
- Amazons*, their impiety punished by Achilles. I. 85. b. 86. a.
- Ambition* confounded for being too refined. II. 737. a. b. The want of it often proves the best sanctuary. III. 438. a. It stifles all natural affection. 647. a.
- Ambitious*: The ambitious live in a state of servitude. II. 427. b.
- Amboise* (Adrian d') publishes his father's treatise of devices. I. 248. a. His moral devices. ibid. His other works. ibid.
- Amboise* (Francis d') is mistaken when he fancies that Accursius spoke of Abelard. I. 32. b. 33. a.
- Ambrus* castle: it is not true that Francis I. was carried to that place. III. 97. a. The Marechal de Villeroi is shut up there. ibid. b.
- Ambrose* (St) his apology for the conduct of Sarah and Abraham. V. 55. a. In what manner he treated Theodosius. I. 593. a. b.
- Ambrosians*, a title which some sorcerers of Nancy in Lorrain gave themselves. III. 126. a.
- Ambrun*. The Archbishop of Ambrun presents a petition to the King against the Jansenists. IV. 765. a.
- Amé II*, Count of Savoy, a piece of History concerning him. I. 739. a. b.
- Amelat* translates a passage of Father Paul ill. III. 499. b. 500. a.
- America*, the first voyage that was made into that part of the world, under the protection of France. III. 783. a. b.
- Americans*, the depravity of their manners. III. 773. a. b. 774. a. b.
- Anyrius*, how he touched the judges that were ready to condemn his brother. II. 824. b.
- Anyrius*, what he did in favour of Antony, and how he was rewarded for it. II. 628. a.
- Anyot* misleads Vigenere in explaining a passage of Plutarch. I. 75. b. Whether he changed his religion. 260. a. b. He is censured for translating some passages of Plutarch ill. II. 14. b. 486. a. b. III. 56. a. What occasioned his being made Great Almoner of France. III. 323. b. He does not understand a passage of Plutarch touching Laius. 705. b. Nor another passage of Plutarch where mention is made of Lyfimachus. 713. b. n. (12).
- Amyraus* is reconciled to his most violent opposers. I. 261. b. 262. a. n. (9). His resolution in withstanding an Arrêt of the Council of State. 265. b. He was much esteemed by the Duke of Longueville. II. 475. a. A great imitator of Cameron. 288. b. 289. a.
- Ammianus Marcellinus*; Mariangelus Accursius pretends to have corrected five thousand faults in that Historian. I. 69. Quoted. 228. a. b. Ridicules the Advocates of his time. 226. a. b. Is censured for confounding one Mopius with another. IV. 253. a.
- Ammonius*, an excellent master in Philosophy. IV. 688.
- Ammonius Saccas*, upon what account he was called Theodidastus. I. 269. a. All his works are lost, if we may believe Henry Valefius. 270. a.
- Amours of the royal palace*, an order to buy up all the copies of that book, and to burn them upon the spot. IV. 506. b. Whether Bussi-Rabutin be the author of it. V. 753. b. 754. a.
- Amphiaras* was called the royal Prophet. I. 278. a. He won the prize in a horse-race by the fall of Polynices. 446. a. b.
- Amphibolus* was both a King and a Prophet. I. 281.
- Amphitheatre of honour*, a book against the royal authority, wrote by a Jesuit. I. 220. b.
- Amphytrion*: The Amphytrion of Moliere surpasses that of Plautus. I. 283. a. Observations upon the piece which bears that name. V. 308. a. b. 309. a. b.
- Amuratb* causes Fakreddin to be strangled in his own preference. III. 4.
- Anabaptism*, the reasons of the great progress which it has made. I. 287. a. The beginning of its fury. II. 83. a. b. A woman of that sect makes a judicious reflexion. IV. 852. a. b.
- Anabaptists* refuted by a Protestant writer in the same manner as the Catholics refute the Protestants. I. 287. a. b. Reasons why they are tolerated in the United-Provinces. 288. b. 289. a. They are charged with an extravagant doctrine. 290. a. b. The answer they return, when asked what would become of the magistracy, if all the world was of their opinion. III. 313. a. Who was their first Patriarch in the Netherlands and Lower Germany. 481. b. They are very rigid in their morals. IV. 86. a. b. 87. a. Certain Fanatics among them had a mind to renew the extravagancies of the Adamites, and were put to death for it. 628. a. b.
- Anchoret* (an) who boasts that he had seen the place where heaven and earth touch one another. IV. 678. a.
- Anacronisms*, most of the eulogies of illustrious men are full of them. II. 403. b. The Annalists themselves are not always exempt from them. ibid.
- Anacron*, his dissolute life excused by le Fevre. I. 675. a. b. His statue placed near that of Xanthippus in the citadel of Athens. V. 48. a. Of what country he was. 316. b.
- Anagrams*, who was the first restorer of them. II. 618.
- And where he found the pattern. ibid.
- Anarchy*: There is a source of anarchy in the state of man, which can never be wholly rectified. I. 499. a.
- Anastafius the Library-keeper*: It does not appear that he has mentioned the She-Pope. IV. 725. a. b. 726. a. b. That fable has been foisted into the manuscripts of his History. 725. a. b. Blondel observed that they were the very words of Martinus Polonus. ibid. b. Sarrauius observed that in the manuscript of the King's library the story of the She-Pope was an additional piece. 726. a. It is only told there by an it is said, that, &c. ibid. An examination into what Salmassius said touching an edition of that author published by the Jesuits of Mayence. ibid. b. 727. a. b.
- Anatomy*, a doubt proposed to Casuists touching a curious point of Anatomy. I. 109. a.
- Anaxagoras*, his indifference about the good things of this world. I. 294. a. b. II. 635. b. His doctrine touching the first formation of men and animals. I. 296, 297. a. b. 414. a. b. 415. a. b. His false supposition in establishing Homogeneties. 303. a. b. 304. a. b. 305. a. b. He was surnamed ψῆς, or the mind. 297. b. His sentiments explained. 298. a. b. He was the first who supposed that an intelligence was the efficient cause of the world. 299. a. b. 300. a. b. Was surnamed the Atheist. 301. b. His doctrine of the Homocameria is full of contradictions. 303. a. b. 304. a. b. 305. a. b. He was accused of impiety, and in danger of being stoned as an Atheist. 307. a. b. IV. 566. b. His witty sayings. I. 308. a. b. He suffers persecution for having dogmatized against the popular religion. II. 864. He taught a rational religion, while

I N D E X.

7

- while he explained by natural reasons what appeared extraordinary. IV. 565. a. He is accused of irreligion, under pretence that he explained meteors by philosophical reasons. 579. b.
- Anaximenes*, his hypothesis corrected. I. 302. a. b. 303. a. He taught that the air was the principle of all things. III. 649. b.
- Ancients*, a great many of them gave no credit to fables. I. 76. a. They had not variety enough of invention. 115. b. A controversy which has been raised of late years, about the superiority or inferiority of the Ancients. 283. a. If they were to come back to the world, they would see that many things were supposed to be contained in their books, which they never dreamt of. 462. a. b. A reflexion upon the comparison between the Ancients and Moderns. II. 553. a. b. How people come to be so ready to praise and support the Ancients. IV. 414. b. The difference between them and the Moderns, with respect to comedies. 743. a. b. The disease of admiring only them prevailed no less formerly than now. V. 492. b.
- Ancre* (the Marshal d'), a passage cited out of his trial. I. 397. b. Feigned by Malherbe the Poet to be cured by the god of the Seine. II. 543. a.
- Ancremum Monumentum*, a most curious and instructive inscription, but not entire. II. 231. a.
- Andlo* (Daniel ab) his book against Samuel des Marets. I. 322.
- Andradus*, his book very scarce, is nevertheless very often quoted. I. 324. a. The reason of it. ibid.
- Andreas* (James) attacked by Hemmingius. III. 391. A great promoter of Ubiquitism. ibid.
- Andreas* (Valerius) censured with respect to Balbequius and his embassies. II. 230. b. He is mistaken in the title of a book which he ascribes to Badius. I. 602. b.
- Andresii*, a province of Boeotia so called from Andrus, the son of the river Peneus. IV. 626. a. It was afterwards named Phleggyantis. ibid.
- Andrimple*, built by Orestes whose name it bore. I. 331. a. b.
- Androgynæ*, those of Plato a kind of Hermaphrodites. I. 102. b. What they were, what they attempted, and what became of them. V. 6. a. b. 7. a.
- Androis*, what it was. I. 182. b. 183. a. A word absolutely unknown, and invented by Naudé. 184. b.
- Andromache*, a tragedy fit to kill players. I. 333. a.
- Andromachus*, founder of a city in Sicily. V. 357. a.
- Andromeda*, a tragedy of Euripides. I. 19. a.
- Andronicus* (Emperor), what he did to upbraid the inhabitants of Constantinople with their wives leudness. III. 631. b.
- Aneas* (Bartholomew) is killed in a religious tumult. III. 624. b.
- Anecdotes*, what their sources are. I. 361. a. A curious fact for such as are fond of them. 724. a. b.
- Angelocrater*, there was little honour to be got by confuting him, and for what reason. III. 388. b. He publishes in 1601 a piece on Chronology, and is deputed in 1618 to the Synod of Dort. IV. 731. a.
- Angels*, there were two sorts of bad angels according to Athenagoras. I. 532. b. Nothing can be more needless than to dispute, whether they form unto themselves an human body when they appear. V. 215. a. b.
- Angels* (tutelar or guardian) the doctrine of the Heathens concerning them. II. 249. b. 250. a. And of some Protestants. III. 595. a. b. The doctrine of these angels antienter than the Christian religion. IV. 689. b. 690. a.
- Angerone*, a goddess that was the patroness of Silence. V. 184. b.
- Angers*, the corruption of that city. III. 60.
- Angevin* (the) or the little Angevin, John Maugin was thus surnamed. IV. 173. A sign of his mean extraction. ibid. a. b.
- Angevin*. Who was the most learned Angevin. III. 308. b.
- Anglara*, a town in Tuscany which Thuanus confounds with one in the Milanese called Angleria. II. 294. a. Quenstedt is almost guilty of the same mistake. ibid. n. (2).
- Angoulême* (the Duchess of), at the time of the difference between her and the Constable of Bourbon, V. 1. V. No. CXLIV.
- an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris refused to charge himself with her interests. II. 761.
- Anicetus*, his baseness and villany. IV. 399. a.
- Animals*, how they were produced according to Anaxagoras and Archelaus. I. 296. 415, 416. III. 650. a. b.
- Anjou* (Fulk Rechin, Earl of): his wife leaves him. III. 62. a. He makes a thousand mean submissions to her. ibid. b.
- Anjou* (Charles of) created King of Naples and Sicily by the Pope, did not obtain the peaceable possession of them, till he had defeated Manfred and Conradin. IV. 300. a.
- Annals*, it is proper that he should have several copies of his annals, and that he should lodge some of them in the hands of his friends. II. 283. b.
- Annat* (Father), a parallel betwixt his conduct and that of Father Nidhard. IV. 366. b.
- Anne* (St), how many husbands and children she had. III. 572. She is no where spoken of in the Scriptures, nor in the writings of the three first centuries. I. 342. The ridiculous stories that are told about her. III. 570. a. b. 571. a. b.
- Anne*, daughter to Phanael: whether she was a cloistered religious. I. 342.
- Anne*, sister to Dido: persecuted after her sister's death by their brother Pygmalion. IV. 642. a. b.
- Anne of Austria*, Queen of France, liked the relish of the fruits which came from Pomponne. I. 487. b. The King could not consent to declare her Regent. III. 816. b. 828. a. She gets the Parliament of Paris to make the King's last will void. ibid. b. Mascarion makes her Funeral Oration. IV. 172. Provoked at the scandalous reflexions that were thrown out against her during the siege of la Motte, she causes that place to be raised contrary to the articles of capitulation. 278. a. b. This piece of resentment blamed by the Marquis de Beauvau. ibid. b.
- Anonymiana* quoted. V. 280. a. b. 330. a.
- Anselme* (Father) much less intelligible than Mr le Laboureur, whom he epitomizes. II. 133. b. He is mistaken when he says that a good part of the inheritance of the house of Bourbon was restored. III. 864. a. His error with respect to the age of Madam de Rohan. IV. 481. a.
- Answer*; whether it be better to answer certain fiery and impetuous tempers, or not to do it. II. 195. b.
- Antagonist*. Whether a person ought not to take as much pains to represent his antagonist's reasons as his own in a fair light. II. 486. b. 487. a. b. 488. a. b.
- Anti-Anicianus*, a book that was never printed, and for what reason. I. 341. a. b.
- Anti-Baillet*, a passage of that book examined and censured. II. 180. a. b.
- Anti-Coton*, the author of that book quoted and censured. IV. 772. b. 773. a. b.
- Antichrist*, a very singular opinion concerning him. II. 113. a. b. In what manner he was to seize on fortified towns. IV. 265. b. 266. a. An author who describes all the periods of his reign. II. 122. Aloisio de Leon applies to Mahomet the predictions of the Apostles concerning Antichrist. III. 772. b.
- Antyllus* betrothed to Augustus's daughter, but murdered on account of his virile gown. III. 119. b.
- Anti-Mondori*, who was called by that name, and for what reason. IV. 82. a.
- Antoninians*, the followers of John Agricola were so called. III. 597. Father Garasse's scurrilities on that head. ibid. a. b. 598. a. b.
- Antioch*, the feast of Adonis was still celebrated in that city when Julian the Apostate made his entry there. I. 114. b.
- Antiochide* finding herself barren, has recourse to a pretended delivery. II. 304. b.
- Antiochus the Great* vanquished by the Romans. IV. 559. a. b.
- Antiochus* was desperately in love with his mother-in-law. V. 45. a.
- Antipater*, his disputes with Carneades. II. 329. a. How that Philosopher defined God. IV. 572. a.
- Antipathy* is the true cause of quarrels between husband and wife. III. 663. a.
- Antiphrasisti* takes place in religion. III. 949. a.

- Antipater*, King of the Lestrygons: eats one of Ulysses's Deputies. III. 786. a.
- Antipodes* placed by Pope Zachary in the number of chimeras that are pernicious to religion. V. 493. a. b.
- Antiquarians*, snares are often laid for them. III. 215. a. b.
- Antiquity* can never be admitted as a proof for any doctrine, without first determining the duration that is sufficient to distinguish truth from error. III. 744. a.
- Antiquities* (Roman), Flavius Blondus was almost the first who attempted to restore them. II. 32.
- Antiphones*, whether at the time that Diogenes was his scholar, he could have had Socrates for his master. II. 665. a. b. 666. a. In what manner he made the Athenians sensible of the abuse committed in the promotions to public posts. III. 616. b.
- Antiochus*, what health he drank with Epicles. IV. 571. b.
- Antony* (Caius), the ill treatment that he met with from his nephew. III. 115. a. b. 116. a.
- Antony* (Caius), the Triumvir's brother, what his end was, and how his death was revenged. III. 496. a. b.
- Antony* (Lucius), to whom he was indebted for his authority, and his triumph. III. 111. b.
- Antony* (Marc) sends to signify to Cleopatra, that she should come into Cilicia to justify her conduct. II. 631. The debauching of his wife hindered the city of Rome's being involved in an horrible confusion. 679. His answer to Julius Cæsar upon his demanding an account of the sale of Pompey's goods. ibid. b. 680. a. His difference with Dolabella. 680. a. He harangues the Senate upon peace and concord, and his harangue charms the men of probity. ibid. He sends his son for a hostage to the conspirators, who durst not come down from the capitol. ibid. With what spectacle he entertained himself at table during the time of the proscriptions. III. 113. a. How his first wife was called. ibid. b. How his second wife was called, and why he put her away. 114. b. He commits a thousand extortions at Rome. 119. a. He has even the audaciousness to sell Pompey's goods by inch of candle. ibid. He did not marry Cytheris. ibid. He causes lions to be yoked in his chariot. 959. b. 960. a. The trick which he served his wife, and the construction that was put upon it. 991. a. b. He enters himself into the society of the Luperci. 932. a. He causes Arfinoë to be killed, out of complaisance to Cleopatra. IV. 791. b.
- Antonia*, whether that family was a Patrician or Plebeian one. I. 356. a. b. 357. a. How it should be divided. 356. a. And what names belong to its different branches. ibid.
- Antoniana Margarita*, that book is grown very scarce. IV. 546. a.
- Antoninus*, Archbishop of Florence, quotes John Columna, and in several places copies James Columna. II. 529, 530. a. b.
- Antoninus Liberalis*, what he tells us about Alcmena. I. 208.
- Antonie*, King of Portugal: Philip II takes Portugal from him. V. 319.
- Antonio* (Don Nicolas), the faults of that author censured. I. 41. a. b. 42. a.
- Anti*, a false reason given for their wisdom. III. 528. b.
- Antwerp*, how the five bastions of its fortrefs were called. IV. 453. a. The King of Spain is advised to order that city to be burnt. V. 293. a. A popular insurrection there in 1567. II. 121.
- Apelles*, his adventure at the court of Egypt. I. 366. a. b.
- Apelles*, the tragedian, cried out in a musical tone while he was whipped. 370.
- Apellicon*, his library transported to Rome. V. 378. b. The history of him. 379. b.
- Aphrodisiasus* (Alexander), whether he believed the mortality of the soul. II. 567. a.
- Apicius Cælius*, who the author of that book is, and what it treats of. I. 371. a. b.
- Apion* tells an incredible story of a certain Physiognomist. I. 370. a. b. Boasted that he bestowed immortality on those to whom he dedicated his works. 373. b.
- Apocalypsa*. See Revelations.
- Apelle*, surnamed the Hyperborean. I. 4. b. The wonderful effects of the dart with which he had killed the Cyclops. 5. How he recovered that dart. ibid.
- Apello* is blamed for commending a Poet that had wrote a thousand obscene things. I. 427. a. His temple and oracle at Daphne rendered very famous by superstition and debauchery. 594. a. He asked the Merchant; for he did nothing gratis. II. 258. a. The priests of Apollo at Daphne was to be a virgin. 339. a. The virtue of his spittle. ibid. b. Apollo tells a lie in the oracle which he pronounced upon the destiny of Euripides. 863. b. 864. a. Who it was that built him a temple at Claros. IV. 97. a. The Athenians plunder him by sea and by land. 621. a. b. 622. a. b. Why he is called Smintheus. V. 312. a. Why spared by Verres. 315. b. He gets Coronis with child, and kills her father Phlegyas with arrows. 626.
- Apollonius Pergæus*: Mr Viviani restores the fifth book of his Conic sections. V. 498.
- Apollonius*, the Poet, is very excusable in having followed the crowd with respect to Chiron. I. 79. a.
- Apollonius Tyanæus* had mimicked the Son of God. I. 380. a. How he censured the Athenians. II. 81. b. The story that they tell of him with respect to the assassin of Domitian. V. 731, 732.
- Apologia pro Puritanis*, what that book is. II. 681.
- Apology for John Chastel and the Jesuits*: An analysis of that work. II. 457. b. 458. a. b. 459. a. Ascribed to the Jesuits, but it is highly probable that it was composed by John Boucher. 459. b. It is very scarce. ibid. The Jesuits suppress it, and for what reason. ibid.
- Apologies* should be consulted by those who write the lives of learned men, and by the author of such a book as this. II. 8. b.
- Apologist*: There is often room to believe that the sharpness of an Apologist offends people more than that of the aggressor. II. 296. b.
- Apologists*: It is a difficult matter to reduce the Apologists for certain people to a non-plus. V. 66. a. Savonarola's Apologists. ibid. b. 67. a. b. They are suspected of being guided by insatiation, or the interest of their community. 70. a.
- Apologues*, to whom the glory of inventing them belongs. II. 832. a. Whether the Antients believed that they came down from heaven. ibid.
- Apotampæus*, a name which the Jews gave to one of their victims. IV. 828. b. 832. b.
- Apostate*: a certain English Lord called an Apostate by the people of Geneva, because he did not believe that their discipline was Apostolical. II. 150.
- Apotropeia*, what the surest way of obtaining it was. IV. 572. a. b.
- Apparition*, whether, from the apparition of a soul, one can draw any proof of its immortality. II. 66. b. 67. a. b. An apparition may occasion a mortal distemper. 715. b. 716. a. There are apparitions against which the most ardent warriors could not be proof. ibid. Observations upon some of them. III. 881. a. b. See Phantoms.
- Appearances* are deceitful. I. 126. a. b. 127. a. A proof of the rash judgments which are only grounded on first appearances. ibid. 733. b.
- Applause*: The hopes thereof a great encouragement to authors. IV. 450. a.
- Apple*: The golden apple adjudged to Venus. III. 644. a. b.
- Application*. Too long application produces bad consequences. III. 342. a.
- Apuleius*, if he was a Magician, his crime was less than that of the Magicians of these times. I. 390. a. What things he was reproached with. 391. a. b. The Pagans compared his miracles to those of Jesus Christ. 394. One of his episodes has furnished Moliere with matter for a dramatic piece, and Mr de la Fontaine for a romance. 396. b.
- Aquapendente* (Fabricius d'), it is not true that du Laurens profited by his conversation with him. III. 746. b.
- Aquaviva* (Andrew-Matthew), celebrated for the false thing as Mr de Montausier. I. 397. b.
- Aquaviva*, General of the Jesuits, whether he approved Mariana's book de Institutione Principis. IV. 130. a. b.
- Aquila*, a city that rose upon the ruins of Amitemum. I. 69. a.
- Aquilis*.

- Aquila*, the sentence of Pilate found in that city was a supposititious piece. II. 556. b.
- Aquinas* (Thomas) knew something of the Cabala. II. 114. a. Was called the murex by his school-fellows, and for what reason. 802. b. Is censured by Vogelkang. 877. b. 878. a.
- Aquitain* (Eudo Duke of) what his daughter's name was. IV. 282. a. b. How she fell into the hands of the Calif of the Saracens. 283. a. b.
- Aquitain*. The annals of Aquitain by John Bouchet. II. 103. The judgment which Robert Cenalis and John Quintin pass upon it. ibid. a. b. 104. a.
- Aquitainians*, were formerly the ornament and glory of the Gauls in point of wit and eloquence. V. 124. a. b.
- Arabia*, the women there have a great deal of modesty. IV. 34. a.
- Arabians*, what they said of the stature of our first parents. I. 104. a. What they said of Adam's books. ibid. b. They worshipped a stone. 124. b. Their Philosophers rather chuse to swerve from the opinions of their Prophet Mahomet, than to contradict Aristotle. 469. b. The Arabians have introduced many things into the practice of Physic, that are contrary to the precepts of Hippocrates and Galen. II. 140. They continue exactly to observe the custom of marrying with the women of their own tribe. IV. 27. a. Some of their authors boast of having seen a copy of the Gospel, where mention was made of Mahomet. 46. b. 47. a.
- Aragon* (Ferdinand of) unjustly deprives John d'Albret of his kingdom. III. 623. a.
- Arbriſſel* (Robert d') how he lived with his Nuns. III. 63. a. b. 64. a. b.
- Aradia*, men were sacrificed to Jupiter in that country. III. 651. b.
- Arcadius* was ordered by Theodosius, to stand uncovered before his Preceptor. I. 507.
- Arcesilas* was a Pyrrhonist without bearing the name. I. 408. b. 409. a. He was the first disturber of the public peace among the Philosophers. 409. b. He carried the Hypothesis of uncertainty farther than Socrates. ibid. Why he espoused the side of the Epoché. ibid. 410. a. He did good and endeavoured to conceal it. 412. b. 413. a. What he said to Carneades the Epicurean. 413. b. Aristo of Chios was his antagonist upon the Hypothesis of uncertainty. 462. a. Whether he absolutely denied the existence of truths. II. 327. a. What difference there was between his opinions and those of Pyrrho. IV. 653. a. b. If he should return into the world he would be formidable to the Divines. 654. a.
- Archagathus* was the first Physician that ever came to Rome. II. 353. a.
- Archambald*, Archbishop of Bourdeaux, is deposed, and afterwards becomes Lord of St Maixent. IV. 479, 480.
- Archelaus*, upon what terms Pompey gave him the pontificate of Comana. II. 531. b. 532. a.
- Archelaus*, King of Macedonia, a witty saying of that Prince. I. 418. a. What he said upon his ordering a golden cup to be given to Euripides. II. 869. a. He delivers up Decamnichus to Euripides to be used by him at discretion, and why. 868. b. 869. a. One of his dogs sacrificed and eat. 870. b.
- Archelaus* (The Philosopher) what he taught touching the production of men and other animals. I. 416. a. b.
- Arch-Heretics*, one of them works a kind of miracle at Rome. II. 86. b.
- Archidamia* comes with sword in hand into the Lacedæmonian senate, to complain of the ill opinion that was entertained of the women's courage. II. 523.
- Archidamus* fined by the Ephori, and for what reason. I. 128. b.
- Archikochus* valued himself more upon being a soldier, than a Poet. I. 426. b. Whether the man that killed him was sent. V. 317. a. b.
- Archon*. Who the last perpetual Archon was. I. 208.
- Arçi* (the Marquis of) commits an assassination in Frejus, for which the Prince of Condé, and the Admiral are exceedingly concerned. II. 511. a.
- Arcturus* called Phafis, and for what reason. IV. 609.
- Artemberg*: (the Count d') his answer touching the troops of the circle of Burgundy, which were introduced into the Electorate of Cologne. II. 224. b.
- Arena*, a city, whence it was so called, and by whom it was built. III. 194.
- Areopagites*: The Areopagites could neither endure Atheists nor impious persons. II. 572. a. 573. a. A cause referred to them. 681. b. They cause Menedemus and Asclepiades to be summoned before them. I. 525. b.
- Arctin* (Peter) whether his books of devotion favour of a true convert. I. 438. b. His Ragionamenti, a book absolutely to be condemned. V. 837.
- Arexan*, the inhabitants thereof obliged to kneel before a lion of stone, and for what reason. II. 633. a. b.
- Argenis*, a famous book, translated into Italian, to satisfy the curiosity of the women. I. 644. b. Continually read by Cardinal Richelieu. 645. b. Likewise very much esteemed by Balzac. ibid. b. 646. a. It is nevertheless writ in bad Latin. 646. a. Translated into French. 646. b.
- Argenterius*, a Lawyer, writ every thing that he heard in conversation. III. 154. b.
- Argentocoxus*, how his wife excused the adulteries that were committed in Great Britain. III. 604. a. b.
- Argentum parum patum*, the meaning of these words. I. 227. a.
- Argentré*: (Bertrand d') confounds Francisco Sylvestro with Sylvestre Prierias. III. 32.
- Argonauts*, their arrival and their exploits in the life of Lemnos. III. 465. a. b. They are obliged to sail up the river Phasis. IV. 610. They are firnamed Minyans from Minyas. 626. b.
- Argonauts*: what the Argonauts of the Painter Cydias were fold for. III. 492. a.
- Argos*, Juno's temple there was entirely burnt down by the carelessness of the priests. II. 498. a. b. The inhabitants thereof made a vow to Apollo, when they plundered the city of Thebes. IV. 97.
- Argument*, whence it comes that the principal argument of a sect is called its Achilles. I. 82. b. In what case a negative argument takes place. II. 115. b. and in what case it is a good demonstration. 392. b. Books have been writ for and against its authority. III. 457. a. a. (15). A consideration on the force of it with respect to the She-Pope. IV. 734. a. b. 735. a. b. A refutation of the reasons that may be objected to it. 736. a. b. The Protestants allow it to be demonstrative in the question: whether St Peter was at Rome, and will not hear of it in the affair of the She-Pope. 737. a. Character of that argument. V. 648. b.
- Argumentum*: an inexcusable mistake of those who took Argumentum for Argumentum in Aulus Gellius. I. 82. b.
- Arianism*, its extent and duration. I. 476. a. b. The insurmountable difficulties in which a Protestant Divine has engaged himself upon that head. ibid. It is extirpated in Spain by Recaredus. 477. b.
- Arians*. The Arians seem to have been of a more tolerating spirit than the Orthodox. I. 477. b. Calvin's explications accused of favouring them. III. 538. b. A sect of them springs up at Lyons, against which Viret exerts himself. V. 483. a. b. They are solidly confuted by Lascius. III. 732. a.
- Ariste*, the judgment which Cardinal Hippolyto d'Est passed upon one of his poems. III. 764. a. A bull expedited in favour of his poems. ibid. The beginning of his poem cost a great deal of pains. 837. b. Whether he lived in lodgings. V. 400. b. 401. a.
- Aristagoras*, whether there was a Philosopher of that name, who was Socrates's master. II. 653. a. b.
- Aristarchus*, whether he was called the Prophet or Diviner. I. 451. b.
- Aristeus*, the son of Apollo, disappears. I. 456. Is placed among the stars. 457. The conformity of his History with that of Moses. ibid.
- Aristeus* (the Proconnesian) appeared in the world three ages after he had composed a poem. I. 458. b. 459. a. He boasted that his soul had left his body and rambl'd thro' different places. 458. b.
- Aristus*: Mr Viviani's divination on that author. V. 499.
- Aristineus*, what he tells us of his mistress. III. 704. a.
- Aristides*, his daughters portioned for marriage at the public expence. I. 56. His virtue. 278. b. From what motive he contributed towards Cimon's advancement. II. 504. b.
- Aristippus*, what his footman said to him about Laïs. II. 670. a.
- Aristodemus*, the Kings of Lacedæmon were defended from him. I. 130. a.

Aristomenes,

- Aristomenes*, the greatest hero that was among the Messenians. II. 650. a.
- Aristophanes*, why he composed the Comedy of the clouds, according to some. I. 418. b. To whom the public is indebted for the first edition of that author. IV. 295. In what manner he spoke of devotional watchings. V. 336. b. 337. a.
- Aristotle*, his learning compared to that of Adam. I. 101. b. 102. a. He ridicules Xenocrates. 112. b. His doctrine as to the necessity there is for some principle to be the first mover of matter. 299. a. He observes that Anaxagoras admitted an intelligence for the production of things only as a θεός ἀπὸ μυχῶν. 301. a. Whether he was a Profelyte of righteousness, or even a Jew. 466. a. b. His answer to those who demanded the reason of his retreat. 468. a. The greatest part of his works was brought to Rome with Apellicon's library. V. 377. b. Several copies of them were taken full of faults. ibid. They added to them the tables, which we have at present, after putting them in order. ibid. Who writ the paraphrase upon his Ethics. I. 336. a. Some have attempted to explain the mysteries of religion by his principles. 339. His Philosophy has been violently shaken in the XVIIth century. 464. but strongly supported by the Protestant and Catholic Divines. ibid. The extravagant praises that have been bestowed upon him. 468. b. 469. a. His conformity with Spinoza. 470. II. 411. a. 412. b. Whether he believed the immortality of the soul, and the Trinity, and whether he had any glimpses of the Incarnation of the Son of God. I. 470. b. 471. a. and IV. from 714. a. to 719. a. Whether he ought to be put in the number of the Refugees. I. 471. b. Whether he threw himself into the Eurypus. 473. a. b. 474. a. The professors that are strongly prejudiced in favour of Aristotle's Hypotheses, have much less reason on their side than the parliaments which proscribed all others. 470. Some authors have believed that his doctrine went the length of Atheism. 470. What is said as to his conversation with a Jew, does not seem to be well grounded. 465. b. 466. a. b. It is not probable that he behaved so ill to Plato, as he is said to have done 466. b. 467. a. Nor that he was guilty of impiety and idolatry in his amours. 467. a. b. It is doubted whether he acknowledged the immortality of the soul. 470. b. 471. a. It is not certain what kind of death he died. 473. a. b. 474. a. b. He was extremely honoured in his own city. 471. b. Who was the first and almost the last of the moderns, that comprehended Aristotle's opinions. II. 411. a. His Doctrine touching an universal intellect, which is the same in all men. 565. b. Whether he burnt all the books of those who had philosophized before him, and the books of Solomon. 643. b. 644. a. A foolish story of the Jews to that purpose. 644. ibid. He looks upon the eternal motion of matter to be an absurd supposition. 787. b. He is very ill used by Luther. III. 952. a. b. When and how nature forms women, according to that Philosopher. 144. b. It was with good reason that he spoke ill of the Lacedemonian women. 968. a. To what he compares those who leave off Philosophy, and apply themselves to other sciences. IV. 543. a. His opinion about the souls of beasts. 549. a. b. to 551. b. It is in vain that some people endeavour to find in his writings the seeds of Des Cartes's opinion, touching the souls of beasts. 551. b. 552. a. The reverse of Aristotle's Doctrine has been publicly defended, which occasioned great troubles. 835. a. b. The fate of his works Historically described. V. 377. b. 378. a. An inference very glorious for him, but which may raise some doubts concerning his works. 379. a. b. He is unjustly censured by the author of the Art of Thinking, in favour of Parmenides. 575. b. He advances facts which cannot be confirmed. 772. a. b. His Rhetoric translated into Latin, by M. A. Muretus, and explained by Benciis. I. 747. b. The agreement between the sects of Aristotle and Plato. 268. a. b.
- Arithmetic*: the authors that have writ upon that subject. V. 297. a. b. Tartaglia excels in it, and all the rest copy and plunder him. ibid.
- Arius*: Nicolas, Bishop of Mirra, gives him a box on the ear, in the council of Nice. II. 530. a. a. (15).
- Ark*: whether matrimonial functions were superseeded and suspended in the ark. II. 431. a. b.
- Arles*: none is admitted into the academy of Arles, but upon requesting it. IV. 459. a. The Cardinal of Arles. I. 178. How described by a Polander. ibid. a. b. 179. a. He dies in the odour of sanctity. ibid. a. b.
- Arlequiniana* quoted. I. 750. b.
- Arminianism*, is of an insinuating nature V. 513. a.
- Arminians*. The Arminians should not have exceeded the bounds set them by the Reformers. I. 481. a. b. Their Hypothesis cannot solve the principal difficulties upon the subject of Predestination. ibid. 482. a. They reject the authority of the Synod of Dort. II. 793. They are deposed and banished. ibid. The populace curses them as the first cause of the disorders, both in Church and State. ibid. a. They retire to Antwerp during the truce. ibid. b.
- Arminius*, a conjecture upon his disputes with Gomarus. I. 687. a. 688. b. His recommendations and those of Uytendbogard are prejudicial to Drusius. II. 705. a. He denies that his opinions were the same with those of Pelagius. III. 173. a. There is no fundamental hereby in them. 174. a. What he answered touching the writings which he had orders to confute. III. 676. An exhortation which Joseph Hall addresses to him. 343. a. b.
- Arms* (Coats of) John le Feron's book upon that subject. III. 27. a. Another book upon that subject. ibid. b. Adam's coat of arms, what? ibid.
- Arms*, people who have confessed that they threw down their arms when they fled. I. 189. a. b. What the arms of the Church were in primitive times, when she was persecuted. 592. a. Whether it is lawful for a private person, to bear arms against the allies of his sovereign, when he may either lift or not, as he pleases. II. 196. a. A book wherein it is maintained that ministers have a call to bear them, and the trouble which that brought the author into. I. 756. a. b. Mr Amyraut condemns one's talking up arms against his Prince upon any occasion whatever. 264. b. 265. a.
- Army*. A spiritual army, which was to be raised by the advice and inspiration of the Holy Ghost, and commanded by the King of France, to extirpate impieties and heresies. IV. 115. a. b. A Jansenist's reflexion thereupon. ibid. b. 116. a.
- Arnauld* (Antony) Advocate, whether he was of the Reformed religion. I. 484. b. 485. a. There were several persons of the Reformed religion in that family. II. 727. a. Among others Mr Arnauld, Comptroller of the Reftes. ibid. In his pleading against the Jesuits he employs the words of Lepidus. III. 956. a.
- Arnauld* (Antony) Doctor of the Sorbonne, the source of his quarrels with the Jesuits. I. 487. a. b. 488. a. He did not deserve to be filed one Arnauld. 489. b. 490. a. The secret of silencing him. ibid. b. The reasons which he gave for his silence, with regard to two books that were published against him. 494. b. His dispute with le Fevre Doctor of the Sorbonne. III. 70. b. A pretended letter from the King of France: 593. a. b. He is in the wrong to blame Quistorpius. 246. a. b. He is contradicted by Mr Claude with respect to Allatius and Hottinger. 528. b. Acknowledges that he had been in the wrong to Mr Mallet, as to the extravagancies of which he had believed him to be the first author. 854. b. Received a small ruffle on account of a citation from Luther. 950. a. Is quoted. IV. 719. a. b.
- Arnobius* vented very dangerous errors. I. 501. a. b. He grounds a very bad objection upon a false assertion. II. 498. a. He ridicules the Pagans for making nine nights necessary to Jupiter to get one child. III. 427. b. His way of arguing against Jupiter's adulteries. 646. a. b. He puts Paganism to a nonplus. 647. a. b. What answer he made to the Pagans when they accused the Christian religion, as being the cause of all the misfortunes which befel the empire. IV. 423. a. b. He is less orthodox upon the subject of matter considered as one of the principles, than the Stoics. 521. a. Has very strongly refuted those two sorts of gods, some whereof are beneficent and others mischievous. ibid. But he went too far. ibid. His notion touching the soul of man. 903. b. 904. a. A passage of his examined. ibid. What he observes concerning the nature

I N D E X.

11

- nature of God. V. 146. a. The confession he makes with respect to those who deny the Deity, or a providence. 217. a. b. 218. a. What his view was in saying that the Pagans had the Amphitryon of Plautus acted in order to appease Jupiter. 309. b. His answer to such of the Pagans as required some of Cicero's books to be prohibited. 506. b.
- Arnoldus*, the translation of a passage of his censured. I. 48. a. b.
- Arras*, the treaty of Arras relating to the submission of Charles VII King of France. II. 212. a. b.
- Arria* kills herself to give an example to her husband. IV. 594.
- Arriaga* quoted. V. 223. b. IV. 545. a. b. V. 611. a. 618. a.
- Arrian*, his extreme credulity for fables. I. 85. a. b.
- Arrows*: the flying arrow. I. 4. a. b.
- Arseus* causes Achilles to be put to death. She is received into Megabyzus's house. Marc Antony causes her to be killed out of complaisance to Cleopatra. IV. 791. a. b.
- Art*. The Civil Law requires that a person who excels in any art should have his life given him, altho' he may have deserved to lose it. III. 197. b. 198. a.
- Art of Love*: Ovid's books on that subject were less the cause than the pretence of banishing him. IV. 445.
- Art of Writing*: A man styled the first of all the writers of the kingdom. III. 123.
- Art of Slandering*: there is one according to Scaliger. Those who are ignorant of it hurt themselves more than they hurt others. I. 343. b.
- Art of War*: it was formerly very far from the state of perfection to which it is come now. I. 162.
- Art of Poetry*: one of its rules examined. IV. 744. a. b.
- Art of French Poetry*: Des Accords promised that work. I. 66. a. Daniel d'Auge's book upon that subject. 562. a.
- Art of Thinking*: that book referred to. I. 791. a. n. (36).
- Artagnan*: the Memoirs published under that name are supposititious. III. 881. a.
- Artemidorus* cited on the subject of dreams and their signification. I. 6. a.
- Artillery*, by whom invented. I. 183. b.
- Artists*. Famous artists are liable to be capricious. I. 377. b. And have often reason to repent it. ibid.
- Arundel*, (Earl of) his Marbles. IV. 771. a. b.
- Asiatics* were the aggressors in the first wars which they had with the Europeans. III. 372. a. b. Their readiness to believe the most ridiculous traditions. 576. a.
- Ascribe*: several persons ascribe to others, pieces which they themselves have composed. II. 353. a.
- Asking*: people often meet with a refusal, because they are too free in asking. I. 418. b.
- Asmodeus* transforms himself into an angel of light, in order to surprize devout women. II. 110. a.
- Aspasia* abused by the Poets, and upon the stage. IV. 569. a. Her History. 578. b. 579. a. b. 580. a. b.
- Aspasia*, Cyrus's mistress, an abridgment of her history. IV. 512. b. 513. a. b. 514. a. b. 515. a.
- Asprenas* accused of having poisoned an hundred and thirty guests with one dish. II. 354. b.
- Asi*: An asi that had a wonderful attention for Poetry. I. 267, 268. A story that is told of a Collier's asi. III. 804. a.
- Asi* (Buridan's), the original of that proverb. II. 226. b. 227. a. b.
- Asi* (golden), who is the author of its first translation into French. I. 395. b. It is a continued satire. 396. a. One might draw up a very good commentary on that romance. ibid. a. b. Some persons believe that it contains the mysteries of the grand operation. ibid. a.
- Asi*: Who first brought asses-flesh into vogue. IV. 768. a. b.
- African*: eldest son to Cleopatra an Indian Queen. II. 523. a.
- Assassins*, or murderers of Kings, their panegyrics rewarded by the Spaniards. II. 103. b.
- Assassins*, such as John Chastel, discover as much constancy as the most illustrious martyrs. II. 459. a. The proceed from the school of the Jesuits. ibid. b.
- V O L. V.
- Assembly*: one ought not slightly to believe all that is charged upon the religious assemblies of the Heretics. I. 111. b.
- Asterites*, a stone which the rays of the sun can set on fire. II. 834.
- Astrea*, what people blame in that romance. III. 866. b. 867. a.
- Astrology* (Judicial) the vanity of that science. I. 164. b. 165. a. Whether the birth and miracles of Christ could have been foretold by it. ibid. According to its rules a man ought sometimes to die several years before his death. 194. b. Persons that have been infatuated with it. 599. a. III. 591. b. 592. a. b. 619. b. 804. a. b. V. 254. b. 255. a. b. Its rules prove false. II. 321. a. b. The judgment which Castellan makes of it. III. 401. a. There are some fortuitous conjunctures which hinder people from seeing the vanity of it. 438. a. It's fatal effects. 499. a. b. The greatest men suffer themselves to be infatuated with it. IV. 260. b. 261. a. b. 262. a. A reflexion on its horoscopes. 369. a. b. 370. a. It would be a kind of Magic, if it could foretell future events. 938. a. b. 939. a. II. 391. a.
- Astrologer*. An Astrologer who starved himself to death, to confirm his prediction. II. 320. b. An Astrologer who frightens the Duke of Guise. III. 873. The greatest part of Astrologers are not cautious enough in their predictions. 436. b. They can turn their horoscopes to the advantage of their religion. 935. a. b. Astronomers sent to the Gallies, and for what reason. IV. 936. a. Their vanity and tricks. 261. b. Their subtleties. 264. a. b. They rather chuse to relate facts which are little to their credit, than to conceal the reasons which they can assign for them by their principles. 267. b. Astrologers exposed by Castendus. 531. b. 532. a. b. Astrologers confounded. V. 243. a. b. to 246. a. b. It is not an easy matter to discredit them. 245. a. b. Few of them venture to draw retrograde horoscopes. 295, 296. a. b. Why they cannot see the gallantries of their wives in the stars. 322. a. b. They threaten a deluge for the year 1524, and cause a general alarm. IV. 380.
- Astronomers* must needs have been free from sensuality. I. 295. b. 296. a. In what manner Ovid and Pliny speak of them. III. 462. a. b.
- Astronomy*, Socrates dissuaded the study of it. I. 311. a. b.
- Atellani* very scarce. An enquiry made at Rome into false ones. IV. 555. b. 556. a.
- Atellana*, what sort of Comedies they were. IV. 90.
- Atheism*, does not give us more false notions of the nature of God than the Pagan religion. I. 132. a. Whether it be a less evil than the worship of the Pagan deities. 382. a. Whether it be not a kind of Atheism to admit a first mover, and to maintain at the same time that the world is eternal. 562. b. It is almost without example among women. 639. a. It requires a certain degree of force and furious strength of mind to fall into Atheism. II. 450. b. 451. a. b. 452. a. b. 648. b. It is not by fables that Atheism must be combated. III. 132. a. b. There are three degrees of it. V. 324. a. b. When it began to appear in France and in Italy. 286. a. b.
- Atheists*, what, according to them, was the cause and origin of the laws that are established among men. II. 571. b. Their system. 552. a. b. 553. a. b. Those who are so by persuasion do not amuse themselves with preaching up impiety. III. 648. b. Whether it is possible for them to be Magicians. IV. 938. b. to 940. a. b. One is accused of being an Atheist, whenever he refuses to adopt all the particular articles of his sect. III. 470. b. 471. a. When and how men begin to turn Atheists. 768. b. An Atheist hanged and burnt at the Greve. IV. 845. b. Who, as some say, write the best against Atheists. III. 132. a. b. An explanation concerning the remarks which are diffused thro' this Dictionary, touching their good morals. V. 811. to 814. It is less surprizing that they should have lived like honest men, than that Idolaters should have done good actions. 811. Self-love was the end of their good actions. 812. Examples of their bad morals cited by the author, who had enquired after more. 813. Theoretical Atheists, Diagoras, Vanini, Spinoza, &c. ibid.
- Atbenans* is censured for a fault against good sense. I. 116. a. b. To whom the public is indebted for the first edition of that author. IV. 295. He makes 10 L.
- Herodotus

- Herodotus say what he does not say, with respect to the Egyptian priests, 789. b. 790. a.
- Athenæus* the Philosopher, what he said after he was set at liberty by Augustus. I. 537. b.
- Athenagoras*, whether as Deputy for the Christians he presented his apology to the Imperial Court. I. 531. a. b. 532. a. He had heterodox opinions. ibid. b. 533. a.
- Athenians* offer sacrifices in behalf of all the Greeks. I. 5. a. The worship which they paid to the god Boreas. II. 81. They introduce fictions and idle stories into their system of religion: ibid. b. 82. a. b. When and by whom they were delivered from the dominion of the thirty tyrants. 548. a. What value they set upon the freedom of their city. 558. b. They assist Aristagoras, and help him to burn the city of Sardis. 599. b. What they do against Diogenes. 652. a. 653. a. b. 654. a. b. An explication of their decree, touching the Tragedies of Æschylus. 826. b. A law of theirs which prohibited women and slaves to study Physics. 453. A curious piece of History on that subject. ibid. a. b. The Athenians censured for their want of courage, by Demetrius. 714. a. Their laws abrogated by Christianity. IV. 128. a. How they were cured of a panic that was occasioned by an eclipse of the sun. 565. b. 566. a. They put six of their generals to death most unjustly. 581. a. Plunder Apollo by sea and land. 621. b. 622. a. Forbid their Sophists to plead causes. 784. a. They suffered a man to marry his sister by the father's side but not by the mother's V. 49. b. Banishment the common fate of those who governed them. II. 259.
- Atheni*, a contest between Neptune and Minerva, which of them should give a name to that city. I. 445. A man was in danger of losing his life there, when he entertained certain notions touching the properties of the stars. 307. b. It was fertile in producing informers. 468. a. We have nothing but a fair representation of that Republic, which in truth was enslaved by the Demagogues. IV. 581. b. It was proposed there to add a new tribe to the ten old ones. 557. b. A collection of the decrees of the people of Athens, a work that is lost, and the loss of which is to be regretted. II. 562. a. The Areopagus of Athens, was formidable to Atheists and impious persons. 572. a. b. 573. a.
- Athenion*, by what means he became very powerful in Athens. V. 379. b.
- Athletics*, their abstinence. I. 142. a. The ancient Greeks and Romans made them wear girdles. III. 964. a.
- Atia*, the mother of Augustus, what country she was of. IV. 397. a. She durst not go into a bath, and for what reason. 407. b.
- Atlas*, the coast of Teuchira is called the mansions inhabited by him. IV. 252. b.
- Atomists*, are not so absurd in their system as the Spinozists in theirs: the reason of it. II. 644. a. They admit an infinite number of first principles. V. 827.
- Atoms*, the difference between the atoms of Democritus and those of Epicurus. II. 779. a. The advantage that may be drawn from the supposition of their being animated. ibid. b. 790. a. b. 791. a. b. 792. a. b. III. 790. b. 791. a. b. 792. a. Their motion of declination did no ways serve the two purposes for which Epicurus designed it. II. 791. a. b. 792. a. The absurdity of such a motion. ibid. Who was the inventor of atoms. III. 788. a. They are admitted with a vacuum, by a sect of Philosophers in the East. 792. a. An observation upon that Hypothesis. IV. 437. b. 438. a. The bare motion of atoms, is not able to produce that regularity which is to be seen in plants. 266. b. 267. a.
- Attack*: the greatest generals, and those who are appointed by Heaven to perform the greatest exploits, do not take all the towns which they attack. V. 655.
- Attention* of a profound and singular kind. II. 597. b. 637. b. 638. a.
- Atticus* (Pomponius) the longer his epistles were, the finer they were. I. 427. b. Statues were erected to him at Athens. 539. b. He was of the sect of Epicurus, and nevertheless a man of great worth. 541.
- Attila* kills himself on his wedding-day, by too much drinking. III. 482. a. Being softened by a speech he marches back beyond the Danube. 758. b. 759. a. His severity to one of his Panegyrist. IV. 169.
- Attilius*, whether he ought to be ranked among the Tragic or Comic writers. I. 60. b.
- Attorneys*: There never was a faint of that profession. IV. 487. b.
- Avarice*, a sentence of Bion's touching that vice, canonized by St Paul. II. 15. Bad excuses for that vice. V. 147. b. 148. a. b. The fordid avarice of a Professor of Physics. 136. a. b. 137. a.
- Avaux* (the Count d') sends several copies of the book intitled, Lux in Tenebris, &c. to Paris. III. 679. a.
- Auterlin*, the plan of his book on the Eucharist. I. 545. a. b.
- Autetierre* (the Viscount d') what trade he followed at Geneva for a livelihood. V. 187. b.
- Aubignac* (the Abbot d') his academy was composed of persons of merit and erudition. V. 444. b.
- Aubigné* (d') has improved upon a passage of Thuanus. I. 119. a. b. A passage of his criticized. 711. a. Examination of a story which he relates. II. 148. a. b. He renders his other stories suspected by his satirical strokes. ibid. b. His mistake as to the place where Goudimel was massacred. III. 197. a. Whether he was descended from Joan d'Albret, Queen of Navarre. IV. 331, 332. a. b. What he says of a book of taxes. 649. b. 650. a. Remarks upon two passages of his. V. 733. He is deputed by the King of Navarre touching the affront offered to his wife. IV. 341. b. Censured on that head. ibid.
- Aubigné* (Constant d') son to the foregoing: his children. I. 546. b.
- Audebert*, a Jesuit, offers in the name of his communion to give up many things for the sake of peace. I. 263. b. He enters into secret negotiations with some ministers for the re-union of the two religions. III. 123. a. b. Gives in a project of re-union to Cardinal Richelieu. V. 804.
- Audguier* (d') quoted. II. 128. b. 129. b. III. 300. b. 301. a. 857. a. 859. b. Two authors of that name. I. 548.
- Auditors*, their memory is a terrible thing to preachers, and advocates who contradict themselves. I. 351. b.
- Avein*, the small advantages that were reaped from that victory. III. 829. b.
- Aventine* (John) The Protestants published his annals from an entire manuscript. I. 549. a. His fate may be compared with that of Father Paul. 551. a. He is accused of having forged several satirical reflexions, in order to slander the Popes. III. 233. b. 234. a. He resolutely denies the story of the She-Pope, and paves the way for all those who have denied it since. IV. 731. b. 732. a. 710. b. He is cried down by the Cardinals, Baronius and Bellarmine. 732. a.
- Aventinus* (Mount) the mutinous populace withdraws to it. III. 490. b.
- Averroës* was Avicenna's rival and enemy. I. 553. a. His opinion touching the soul, or universal intellect, common to all particular understandings. 554. a. b. 555. a. b. II. 316. b. IV. 913. a. At present no body wastes time in reading him. I. 556. a. His irreligion. ibid. b. 557. a. b. He wished his soul might be among the Philosophers. IV. 704. b. N. Vernias, and A. Niphus maintain his opinion on the unity of the intellect. 377. b.
- Augsburg*, the magistrates of that city erect a school, which they call St Ann's. III. 145. b. When and how their library was enriched with good manuscripts. 478. a. What office is that of Dumoir, and that of Prætor in that city. V. 447. a. Popery is banished from thence. IV. 285. b. 286. a.
- Augurians*, reasons against the science of Auguries. II. 629. b. The Roman ladies went to seek for nuptial Auguries or presages. IV. 200. b.
- Augustin* (Saint) the reason he gives why Adam did not consummate his marriage till after his fall. I. 22. a. b. He is censured for his loose morality on a capital point. 91. a. b. In what he makes the opening of our first parents eyes to consist. 101. a. b. He is called an African, violent and full of heat. 106. a. is called obscure in his writings, and fickle in his notions with respect to the doctrine of Grace. ibid. He is ill treated by some Protestants. 109. b. He approves of Cicero's railery upon a religious worship which consisted in weeping. 114. a. His

- His exclamation on Abraham's concubinage. 123. a. He found an apology for perfection in Sarah's treatment of Hagar. ibid. Is deservedly reprimanded for it in the Philosophical Commentary. ibid. A passage of that Father against perfection. 287. b. 288. a. What he said of Apollonius Tyanzus. 282. a. and of Apuleius. 394. a. His authority with the Roman Catholics. 470. a. The picture which he has drawn of his youth. 562. a. b. 563. a. b. He gave himself up betimes to debauchery. 563. a. b. His system, for which the Church of Rome has engaged her respect, casts her into perplexity. 564. a. b. to 566. a. He asks of God the gift of continency, but is afraid of being taken at his word. 108. a. Has solidly refuted the doctrines of Democritus. 643. a. And has shewn us the difference between that Philosopher and Epicurus. ibid. He begs of God the grace of being delivered from certain dreams. III. 73. a. He is severely reprimanded by a modern author, on account of some notions touching the practice of the Cynics. 458. b. By what arguments he supports the miracles of the Scripture against the Heathens. 578. b. Reflexion on one of the effects of prejudice. ibid. and 579. a. He throws the blame of an ignominious peace which Jovian had made, upon Julian. 586. a. Ridicules Paganism. 642. a. One of his objections examined. 912. b. 913. a. It was an happy thing that he abandoned the Manichean Heresy. IV. 95, 96. He is unjustly censured by Tanaquillus Faber with respect to the licentiousness of the stage. 568. a. b. Was more fortunate than wife in his notions touching the soul of beasts. 901. b. His exaggeration of Sarah's decay. V. 53. b. He has not made a good apology for the conduct of Sarah and Abraham. 54. b. 55. a. b. People have no great opinion of the learning of St Augustin's Priars. 235. a. He made an improper choice of examples to convince the Heathens, that the mother of Jesus Christ was a virgin. 772. a. b. His maxim touching the necessity of speaking about obscene things. III. 135. b. What he said of the gods Stercutius and Cloacina, and of some people who seemed to sing when they broke wind. ibid.
- Augustin* (Antony) censured upon the subject of the Familia Hortensia. III. 490. a. He is sent by the Pope to Philip II. IV. 200. Is a friend of John Meiel's. ibid.
- Augustus* remits an hundred talents to the inhabitants of the island of Coos, for the Venus Anadyomene. I. 369. a. One of his jests. II. 356. b. He was the first who took cognizance of Defamatory Libels, in order to punish the authors of them. 353. a. b. 354. a. b. 355. a. b. 356. a. His design was to marry his daughter Julia to Cotison, King of the Getæ, and that he himself should marry the daughter of the same Cotison. 560. a. He makes choice in the enemies army of those whom he intended to admit to his greatest familiarity. 632. b. The Poets of his court were animated with the same spirit as the Poets of the present time. 715. a. He had a singular tenderness for Drusus. 717. a. How he would have the supreme authority called. 718. a. He causes a library to be erected in the temple of Apollo Palatinus. III. 8. a. To what length his weakness, touching dreams, proceeded. IV. 73. b. The empire was foretold to him when he was an infant. 369. a. Reflexion on that prediction. ibid. b. and 370. a. It was under him that dancing came to its perfection. 646. b. A fine edict of that Emperor for preserving the chastity of maids. V. 337. a. His treatment of Ovid. IV. 445. Idolized literally by that Poet. ibid. and 446. a. b. His grief and his anger must have been awakened when Ovid mentioned what he had seen, and what was the cause of his banishment. 443. b. Suetonius says nothing to insinuate his amours with his daughter or granddaughter. 444. a. Reasons against the conjecture of his being guilty of incest with his granddaughter. ibid. b. His policy in not recalling Ovid from banishment. ibid. and 445. a. He orders all instruments concerning debts, which occasioned calumnies and quarrels, to be burnt. III. 278. a.
- Avignon* sold to the Pope for a very inconsiderable sum. IV. 301, 304.
- Aulus Gellius*, a whole chapter of his quoted. I. 127. a. b. Examination of his apology for Virgil. II. 234. a. b. His opinion touching the absurdities that were ascribed to Democritus. 639. b. He did not understand a grasshopper by the word salutricula. III. 491. b. He is falsely corrected upon the subject of Lælius. 699. a. b. Censured. II. 259. a. The difference of that author's chapters according to the different editions. 385. a.
- Anno* (Madam d') quoted. IV. 365. a. b.
- Aurelian*, the severity of his morals was only fit for the sect of the Montanists. I. 571. a. What first name was given to him. ibid. b. The judgment which Vopiscus passed upon that Prince. 576. b. His elogy. 575. b. 576. a. In what manner he justifies himself for having led a Queen in triumph. V. 603. a.
- Aurelius* (Marcus), the piece attributed to that Emperor is not the history of his life, as Naudé believed it was. II. 321. His answer to those who advised him to divorce his wife. III. 793. a.
- Ausonius*, whether or not he was a Christian. I. 582. b. 583. a. b. He was censured with respect to the dead body of Hector. 81. b. To what a degree an epigram of that Poet was admired. II. 619. b. He ingeniously obviates an objection in his acknowledgment to Gratian. III. 107. a.
- Auspices*, reasons against the science of Auspices. II. 629. b. 630. a. Who invented it. V. 386.
- Austerities* of some Indian Philosophers. II. 115. a. b. 116. a. b. III. 312. b. 313. a. b.
- Australians*, their particular make. V. 4. a. b. 5. a. Their notion of eternal rest. ibid. a. b. Why they never speak of God. ibid. b. Their origin, and the notion they have with respect to that of the Europeans. ibid. 6. a. Who the author is that speaks of the Australians. 7. a. b.
- Austria* (the house of), from whence it derives its pedigree, according to the Benedictine Monks. I. 341. a. b. Who restored that house to all its former splendor in Germany. II. 692. It carries on the negotiation at Munster with great policy. 691. b. Its prosperity notwithstanding the threatenings of some pretended Prophets. 537, 538, 539, 690, 691, 692. III. 682. a. b. 683. a. Richelieu formed a design to humble it. I. 785, 786. a. Cardinal de Beaulieu opposes it, and is seconded by Marillac, Keeper of the Seals, &c. ibid. a. It causes the troops of the Circle of Burgundy to enter the Electorate of Cologne. II. 224. a. b.
- Austria* (Anne of) her answer to a Bookseller. I. 544. b. See Anne.
- Austria* (Don John of) headed a party that opposed the Queen-Regent. IV. 365.
- Authority* (the way of), people come back to it after having cried it down. I. 242. b. 243. a. IV. 474. a. Without it every sect is liable to be split into a great variety of subdivisions. I. 287. Whether the Roman Catholics and Protestants differ in that respect. IV. 65. a. The difficulties attending the said way. 361. a. b. to 364. a. 335. a. b. 336. a. It necessarily leads every particular man to be of the national religion. 792. a. To make a right use of the said way in our search after truth, we must first examine where it resides. 536. a. to 538. a.
- Authority of the Pope*: John-Thomas Rocaberti writes several volumes in defence of it, and caused to be printed at his own expence a collection in twenty volumes in folio under the title of Bibliotheca Pontificia. IV. 883.
- Authors*: An author divided into three, and his works in the same manner. I. 12. When a person has a mind to describe an author by his relations, he should speak of relations that are known. 652. b. At what time an author may be said to flourish and become illustrious. II. 396. b. His age may almost be as easily known by the strokes of his pen, as by the features of his face. IV. 689. a. Authors who quote no body hope to be quoted themselves. I. 20. a. They copy after each other. 23. b. Ought not to be cited for conjectures which other persons have advanced. 63. b. Ought to make their retreat in time. 120. a. b. II. 619. They are very unwilling to confess a mistake. 161. b. No authors cite themselves so often as those who suppress their names. 181. b. Several of them falsify facts in order to make them serve their purposes. 198. a. b. Some persons, thro' too much care of becoming good authors, never become authors at all. 200. b. Authors that were only rich in in words. 330. a. Those who amplify what they quote cannot be too much censured for it. 338. b. They ought never to suppress the principal circumstances of a fact. 372. a. It would be of great use to criticize on their false Logic. 394. b. They sometimes put off their creditors with an assignment on the next dedication. 442. a. Their address and policy. 451. 460. b. II. 643. b. Their rude and unpolite behaviour in former times, when they were at war with one another. I. 514. b. They occasion a great deal of obscurity by their neglecting to put the words in their natural order. 602. b. They change maxims as their occasions require; but chiefly Divines do so. 616. a. 617. a. b. A moral reflexion which may serve to comfort authors of a low rank. 701. a. It is very useful to collect examples of their insincerity. 799. b. Authors ought continually to be on their guard against distractions of mind. 759. a. Profane authors may be consulted in order to explain the chronology of the Scripture. 775. b. They ought to be acquainted with the most common books, and the most scarce pamphlets. II. 94. a. There are things which authors never publish when they rightly understand their duty. 266. b. There are some who would never have been authors if they had not been attacked. 328. a. Many falsely brag of having been familiarly acquainted with an author that is grown into reputation by his writings. 284. b. 404. b. Severe tribunals should be set up against some authors. 451. b. An author who is a Layman is more at liberty than a Preacher to speak his sentiments. 454. b. There are some authors who do not publish every part of a work according to its order. 484. b. They relate what the Antients tell us, with a thousand alterations. 535. b. It is hardly possible that future ages should not put several quite different constructions upon what authors say. 595. b. III. 447. b. The different circumstances in which they are, contribute much to make them more or less famous. II. 518. b. Their disputes never fail to produce effects that are fatal to the reputation which they had as men of worth. 583. b. Persons who have wrote books concerning authors of the same name. 633. a. b. They do not love that another should interfere with them. 683. a. The gross artifice of those who make a merit of being hated by people of other persuasions. 695. b. Whether some Protestant authors were hated by the Romans Catholics, because they defended the good cause well. ibid. Authors that quote no body do not deserve to be quoted. 778. a. b. 779. a. The most effectual method of restraining such of them as are given to slander. 800. a. b. Those of the first rank ought to die, as soon as their glory is arrived at its meridian. 825. a. It is sometimes dangerous to be too lavish in bestowing praises upon them. III. 249. b. Their tenderness for their own works is immoderate. 377. a. 378. b. 384. a. b. Their fate is deplorable: for even when they think that they apply their utmost attention, they mistake the sense of the easiest passages. 838. b. They forget in one place of the same book, what they have said in another. 14. b. There are some who compose treatises which are only fit to be posthumous ones. 175. b. 176. a. There are some who seem to compose with a wonderful facility, who nevertheless take great pains in writing. 261. b. 262. a. b. IV. 85. a. b. 86. a. They ought sometimes to prefer their own judgments before the judgments of others. 337. b. What they ought to do in order to obtain rewards from the public. 340. a. b. A cause of their mistakes, that spreads itself farther than is imagined. 451. b. There are some who correct their writings too much. 836. a. b. 877. a. There are some who are harder to be pleased in the beginning than in the sequel of their work. ibid. b. There are others, who, revising a work they desire to reprint, are at greater pains, than at the first composition. ibid. There are some who are only learned in their collections. 195. a. b. One of the causes which have produced chimerical authors. 402. b. There are scarce any who do not complain of the ingratitude of the age. 459. b. to 461. a. It is impossible that those who have a great many adversaries should not contract an habit of reproachful language. 475. a. They should mistrust their memory, and not alledge any thing without first consulting over again the books where they had read it. 568. b. They seldom give any thing for nothing, in point of praises and compliments. 595. a. b. Have a right to coin new words. 743. a. b. It were to be wished that they were neither poor nor rich. 894. b. 895. a. In what sense those who traffic with their works are to be commended, and in what sense to be blamed. 843. a. What authors have wrote collections of proverbs. V. 199. a. b. One is seldom at a loss to find out the religion of the present authors. 235. a. Their bad way of quoting. 325. b. 326. a. Famous authors get honour by indifferent performances. 340. b. Reflexion upon the conduct of those who procure the prohibition of their adversaries books. 343. a. And upon the consequences that may be drawn from their writings to their morals. 420. a. b. &c. There are some of them whom it would be very difficult to enrich. 403. b. Modern authors should advance nothing but what they have credible witnesses for. II. 639. a. A maxim which they ought carefully to study. V. 738. a. There are no authors so subject as Poets to forget their promises not to print any more. II. 83. a. Fontaine's verses upon that subject. ibid. Menage's chapters upon the same subject. ibid. b. It is a method of obliging an author in the most agreeable manner, to advise people to buy his books. 314. A great author of little books, who was so called, and in what sense. 528. An author who suffers some things to be inserted in his works gives a handle for saying that they are not his. 688, 689. The smallest change of letters in their proper names multiplies them without reason. III. 534. It is a crying injustice to despise authors who had great obstacles to surmount at a time when literature was but beginning to revive. IV. 166. a. Some authors surpass them at present, who would not have equalled them, if they had lived in their time. ibid. It is not without example, that a lacquey has become a distinguished author. 173. b. Typographical errors multiply them. 193. One cannot do an author a greater disservice than by proclaiming his works under too pompous a character. 284. a. Several are negligent in correcting their works, and give it over. 451. a. The ablest authors rather chuse to be silent than to attack a book that is too strong for them. V. 179. b. 180. a. It is allowable for them to contrive the matter so as to make their books acceptable. 810.

Automata: The hypothesis of Automata is the only way to get out of the plunge. II. 779. b. Whether or not, and how far, Des Cartes was the inventor of them. IV. 546. b. Whether the Antients taught that the souls of beasts were only Automata. 552. a. b. to 554. a. b. The greatest difficulties which attend that system. 908. b. 909. a. b. The Automata of Des Cartes are very advantageous to the true religion. 901. b. & seq.

Autumn of age, how far it reaches. IV. 163. a. Avengerius (in Latin Arvernus) boasted to have Julius Caesar's sword. II. 419. b. When and by what means they appeared at the court of France in the highest posts. I. 482. a.

Avengus (the Count Dauphin of) killed in the King's presence, and in full council. II. 463. a. b.

Auxerre, the rebellion of that city. I. 258. b. The service which the Sieur de Châtelux performed to the Chapter of that city, and what privilege was granted to him by the Chapter. II. 461. a.

Axtius (the Physician) condemned to make a public recantation of a calumny which he had vented. IV. 504. b.

Axtius, King of the Emeſenians, causes himself to be circumcised, to marry a Jew. II. 701.

Axtius, the length of its siege. I. 590. IV. 790.

Axum, twin-sister to Cain occasions the death of Abel, and how. I. 24. a. She marries Cain. ibid.

Babylonian

B.

Babylonian numbers, Horace would not suffer them to be consulted. II. 125.

Babylanius: They boasted of an antiquity which far exceeded the age of the world. I. 595. a. b. Father Hardouin's correction of a passage of Pliny touching the antiquity of letters among them, explained. 596. a. b.

Bacchus, the celebration of his feast required continence the preceding night. III. 934. a. He was adored by the Pagans under an infamous name. V. 134. a. b. He encroaches less upon Venus in the south, than Venus upon Bacchus in the north. II. 823. a. b.

Bacon: his new Atlantis. III. 345. a.

Baden, how the Swiss bathe there. V. 423. b.

Baden (the Marquis of) introduces the reformation in his dominions. III. 256.

Baduellus: his quarrel with William Bigot. II. 8. a. b.

Bagnio-keepers. The Bagnio-keepers of Paris had a mind to assassinate James des Farts, because he forbid the use of baths in time of pestilence. IV. 484. b.

Baiard fought a duel with Alphonso de Sotomajore, in the year 1503. V. 139. b.

Bajazet lets the Count de Nevers at liberty upon his paying his ransom. II. 206. a. b. 207. a. He sends to Rome the iron of the lance, which pierced the body of our Saviour. III. 566. a. b. He loved Philosophy. 729. a. b.

Baif (Lazarus de) goes as far as Rome to attend the lessons of a Greek Professor. IV. 295. b.

Baif (John Antony de), what he says of his poverty and education. V. 462. a. b.

Baillet quoted. I. 219. b. 220. a. b. III. 662. a. b.

Et passim alibi. Praised for his civility and equity. I. 796. a. His judgment upon what passed in the Conference of Ratibon. III. 536. a. He has forgot an Anti in the collection that he has made. 701. b. His civility to the author of this Dictionary is an excess of ceremony, prejudicial to the liberty which every body ought to enjoy in the commonwealth of learning. IV. 548. b. His discourse of the life of the saints. V. 433. b.

Bain, the Emperor Charles V is magnificently feasted there. III. 530. a. Henry entirely burns down the magnificent palace which was there. ibid. b.

Baldus, a quick repartee which he made. I. 616. a.

Baldus Lupatinus, upon a suspicion of Heresy is thrown into the sea, after he had been imprisoned twenty years. III. 557. a.

Ballets: The use of ballets was established in France, before Mary de Medicis brought Rinuccini there. IV. 879. a. b.

Balls dangerous to chastity. V. 23. a. b. to 25. a. b.

Balghane, a noble family in Scotland. III. 784.

Ballasarini. See Beaujeux.

Balucius, the history of his dispute with the Abbot Faget. IV. 102. b. 103. a. b. He has furnished the author with divers memoirs. 427. n. (a). V. 111. n. (a). a. n. (1).

Bahya, a river of the Peloponnesus, whence so called. V. 326. b.

Balzac, his pleasant reflexion on Alexander ab Alexandro. I. 224. a. Balzac and Balsac are very different. 622. a. A curious piece, which gives room to suspect that Balzac had once a mind to turn Huguenot in Holland. 623. a. b. Very ill used by Theophilus. ibid. b. His jokes on the impatience of modern women who have too cold husbands. II. 79. a. b. Quoted. 350. a. V. 333. a. b. n. (1), (2). He looked upon it as a sad punishment to be obliged to praise all new printed books. II. 620. b. He ridicules a Grammarian who heftored the Deity. 648. b. 649. a. His criticism on Alexander censured by Costar. 667. b. What he says of some devout women in Spain. III. 82. a. b. One plainly perceives that his productions cost him a great deal of pains. 262. b. IV. 85. a. b. The source of his difference with Phylarchus. III. 204. a. How much he contributed to the politeness which is spread over the kingdom of France. 855. a. He inveighs against Montmaur. V O L. V.

IV. 249. a. b. 250. a. b. He would fain have been thought the author of a work which he did not write. 279. a. b. 280. a. b. What he said of the contrariety of ingredients in the human composition. 441. a. He had too much vanity. 459. b. He expresses himself too eloquently upon the subject of his diseases. 461. a. How he speaks of the Prince of Condé with respect to a civil war. 488. b. He says that he loved the Protestants much. 528. a. Could not endure the word Panglossia. 531. b. He tells a witty saying of Cato the Censor. 754. b. 755. a. He is guilty of a small piece of plagiarism in making use of the words which Famianus Strada applied to Quintus Curtius. 811. b. A judgment passed upon his works. V. 345. b. 346. a. b. His character of d'Audiguier. I. 548. b. He brings a ridiculous charge against some anonymous persons. 801. a. b. He ridicules the vain display of reading, which was a custom that formerly prevailed at the bar. II. 105. b. A trick which he made use of to give one a great idea of his reading. 398. b. A supplement to the history of his dispute with Father Goulu. IV. 284. a. b. 285. a. b. Jokes upon his works. 284. b. He bestows hyperbolical praises on the Abbot de St Cyran. V. 15. b.

Bardel relates an elogy given to Luther by Léo X. III. 766. b.

Bargius, a learned Dane, would not accept the place of Hebrew Professor, but upon condition that he should go to Paris to perfect himself under Gabriel Sconita. IV. 493. a.

Barishment: some people have looked upon it as a piece of good fortune. I. 637. b. The common fate of those, who had the greatest share in the government of the commonwealth of Athens. II. 289.

Banquet of the wise-men: is a defamatory Libel composed by Father Garaffe, against the honour of one of the first Magistrates of France. III. 134. Alegambe does not deny it. ibid.

Banquets, there are some which are as dangerous to certain people, as a set battle to a Colonel. III. 846. a.

Baptism, in the Primitive Church, people received it naked, of what age or sex soever they were. III. 331. a. And several put off receiving it till the last moment of their lives. V. 257. b.

Bar, its tiresome wranglings. II. 724. a. b. The vain reading which people formerly displayed there. 105. b.

Baram, interpreter of dreams at the court of the King of Persia. I. 87.

Barbarossa (Frederic), whether he was trod under foot by the Pope. II. 406. a.

Barbarossa, King of Algiers, takes Fondi by assault, and what was his motive. III. 189. b.

Barbo (Nicholas), a noble Venetian, father to Pope Paul II. IV. 509.

Barbabbas passes for the Messiah. I. 173. Akiba declares for him. ibid.

Bark, how that powder was called at first. III. 931. b.

Barnes, editor of Euripides, his explication of Lucian's Balance examined. II. 865. b. 866. a.

Barneveldt, what he said to Gomarus and Arminius before the States of Holland. III. 174. a. One of his sons was beheaded at the Hague, and for what reason. 802. b.

Barocius (Petrus), his gentle remonstrances to Nicoletus Vernias, and Augustin Niphus. IV. 377. a. b.

Baronius dares not decide the point between Theodoret and Socrates, touching one of the Kings of Persia. I. 13. a. Is censured with respect to St Anne. 342. a. Deceives the Protestants in the idea of a book of Damian's, to the disadvantage of his own communion. II. 589. b. Why he never named, even while he confused, the centurions of Magdeburg. 643. b. Whence it comes to pass that he confirms certain flanders of the Pagan authors. III. 20. b. He commits a fault in Chronology, which was not known to Mr du Pin. 219. a. Is an enemy to sovereigns; and his annals are full of lies. V. 93. b. Expected to be made Pope after Paul V. 96. b. Continuation of his annals. II. 241. He is censured for what he says of Florimond de Remond's book touching the She-Pope. IV. 732.

10 M

Barrenness

- Barrenness: The Jews say that an husband ought not to cohabit with his wife, after he has found her barren for the space of ten years. I. 122. b. An obfacle to a widow's marriage. 393. b. Philosophers who pretended to cure it. III. 311. b.
- Barriero: (Don John de la) first Abbot of the Feuillants, his conduct during the troubles of the league, and his attachment to Henry III represented by Father Pradillon. IV. 764. a. b.
- Bartas (du) his Week is attacked with some sort of respect. III. 128. a. b.
- Barth (John) beats the Dutch men of war, and saves the corn which was in the ships under his convoy. IV. 211. a.
- Barthius censured. I. 538. b. He passes a reasonable judgment upon the works of Marfus. IV. 166. a. b. The justice which he does to authors who lived in the time that learning began to revive. ibid. He engages himself in a superfluous refutation touching the marrow of lions. I. 76. a. He is not consistent with himself. 118. a. His causeless fear of dying without posterity. 664. a. He censures several great men for ranking a modern Poet among the antient authors. II. 524. b. His blunder touching a courtesan, whom he takes for another. III. 701. b. He is censured with respect to Patricius of Siena. IV. 507. a. b.
- Bartholomew (Massacre of St) Charpentier's apology for that massacre. II. 446. a. b. 447. a. The cause of it falsely related. IV. 700. b. 701. a. b. An author who was not ashamed to make an ode in praise of it. II. 399.
- Bartolus desires some time to answer an objection. I. 615. a. Cinus was his master, not his scholar. II. 508. a.
- Basilians, a question whether there ever will be such a sect among the Anabaptists. IV. 87. b.
- Basil, all its relics were, in the time of the council, carried and placed in the room of the absent Bishops. I. 178. The memory of Erasmus is very much respected there: proof of it. II. 804. a. b. They threw his closet, &c. there. ibid. b. Twelve cart-loads of images are burnt there before the town-house. 813. a.
- Basil (St) would not have people trust to the mutilations of eunuchs. II. 533. b. A comparison which he alleges for that purpose. ibid. He makes a bad answer to the Manichees. IV. 112. b. 113. a. 515. a. b.
- Basilides (the great Duke) plunders the country of the Livonians. II. 42. a. b.
- Basnage quoted. II. 301. b. III. 943. b. IV. 91. a. 97. See the Dissertation upon Junius Brutus. V. 731. & seq.
- Basnage Sieur de Beauval: his Considerations sur deux Sermons de Mr Jurieu. V. 642. a. b. His Lettre sur les Differens de Mr Jurieu, & de Mr Bayle. 645. b. n. (53). His Mr Jurieu convicted of Imposture and Calumny. 646. b. 647. a.
- Bassepierre quoted. III. 301. a. b. 302. a. v. 531. a. 532. a. The head of that family is sprung from the commerce of a woman with a spirit. IV. 408. b. The History of some of his gallantries. V. 391. a. b.
- Bassora (the Prince of) pretends to be Mahomet's chief favourite, and by his credit with him to give such or such a place in Paradise. IV. 123. a.
- Basford, whether it is a dishonour to be one. III. 722. a.
- Basfords have commonly a good share of wit. II. 228.
- Bath: it was against decency among the Pagans, that a father and a son should bathe in the same place. I. 563. a. n. (6). See Baden.
- Baths were in use at Paris in the time of Charles VII. IV. 484. b.
- Bats (Violente de) causes her husband to be assassinated by her adulterers. V. 107. a. b. 108. a.
- Battle, it is ridiculous for a man to boast of having won a battle, when he draws no advantage from it. II. 413. a. b. The most common cause of its usefulness, is when the commander of the victorious army fears peace. ibid. n. (6).
- Battles; the gaining of battels more subject to Historical Pyrrhonism, than the talking of fortified places. III. 719. b.
- Bavaria (Lewis of) excluded from the rank of Emperors, but restored to it by a public retraction. II. 238. a. His reign counted for nothing by Rainaldus, who affects to call him by no other name than the Bavarian. ibid. His apology by Herwart is condemned by the Inquisition, and for what reason. 238. a. b. Who the true author of the annals of Bavaria is. III. 43. a. b.
- Bavaria (the Elector of) surprizes Ulm by an admirable stratagem which was well executed. V. 504.
- Bauderon, the son, accuses John de Renou of Plagiarism. IV. 864.
- Baudouin, King of Jerusalem, is poisoned by his own Physician. IV. 383.
- Baudouin (the Civilian) changes his religion as often as his linnen. I. 690. b. What he advised to be done for defeating the conference of Poissy. 692. a. He has writ a treatise of the means of attaining to a good reformation. 697. b. His answers to Calvin and Beza. III. 523. a. b. 524. a.
- Baudrand censured with respect to Antioch. I. 346. a. b. The change which happened to the city of Antioch, was just the reverse of what he makes it. 590. b.
- Baudri (Paul) Professor of sacred History at Utrecht, made himself very much esteemed by his Lectures. I. 672.
- Beans, who was the first that abstained from them. I. 277. b. The Egyptians abstained from them. IV. 670. a. b. The Pythagoreans likewise abstained from them, and for what reasons. ibid. b. 671. a. The Scbola Salernitana forbids the eating of them. ibid. b. Whether they can be converted into blood. 672. a.
- Bearn, put in a better condition than it was in before. IV. 317. a. b. The progress which the Protestant religion makes there. 325. a. b. to 327. a. b. The exercise of the Catholic religion is abolished there. ibid.
- Bearnois (or He of Bearn) a name which those concerned in the League gave to Henry IV. III. 276. a.
- Beast. A discovery which was made of the number of the beast. I. 719. b. 720. a.
- Beasts, the great disadvantages that attend moral reflexions grounded on their conduct. I. 640. a. b. 641. a. b. These moral reflexions are liable to be turned into a jest and so to be eluded. 640. a. Whether they could determine themselves, if two objects were present, which drew them with equal force, one one way, and the other another. II. 226. b. 227. a. Anaxagoras attributed to them an intelligent soul, to which he gave the same name as to God. I. 301. a. Their actions perhaps are one of the most profound mysteries, on which our reason can be exercised. 641. b. Several of them have been celebrated by the wits. III. 209. b. Whether Des Cartes may be looked upon as the inventor of the opinion which he had about them. IV. 548. a. b. What was the opinion of the antient Philosophers about the souls of beasts. ibid. b. 549. a. b. 550. a. b. Whether the Antients taught that they were no more than Automata. 551. b. to 554. a. b. The facts which concern the capacity of beasts are no less puzzling to the followers of Aristotle than to those of Des Cartes. 901. a. b. A catalogue of those who have believed that the souls of beasts were rational. 902. b. to 905. a. b. The ill consequences of the opinion which gives beasts a sensitive soul. 905. b. 906. a. b. &c. Beasts exposed for a spectacle after their death, in order to keep other beasts in awe. 908. b. Authors who have maintained that they have rational souls. 911. b. 912. a. b. &c. Their actions imputed to an external principle. 913. a. Authors who have maintained that beasts are mere machines, or who have confuted that opinion. ibid. b. 914. a. b. &c. Different opinions about their souls. V. 115. a. b. 116. a. b.
- Beausjoux renders himself famous at the Court of France in the reign of Henry III, by his inventions of ballets, concerts, &c. IV. 879. b.
- Beaune Montreuil (Francis de la) was so learned that she converted a Rabbini in a regular disputation. V. 298. b.
- Beauty, the picture of a perfect beauty. I. 399. a. Of a lasting kind. 401. a. II. 514. a. b. 515. a. III. 371. a. b. 372. a. It wounds us at a distance. 65. a. Thirty things necessary to make it perfect. 363. b. Wherein its force consists. 377. a. b. After some

- some time the beauty of wives begins to affect their husbands less. 646. a. Not only the spring but likewise the autumn of beauty is agreeable. IV. 236. a. There have been cities where not only the women, but also the men disputed about beauty. V. 312. b. n. (15).
- Beauvais*, privileges that were granted to the women of that city. II. 217. a. b.
- Beccanus*, his calumnies, and his false consequences against Calvinism. V. 441. a. b.
- Beer*, what we are told of their acute smell. II. 636. a.
- Behme* was an Enthusiast. III. 689. a.
- Being*: whether the idea of Being may be applied synonymously to God and his creatures. I. 488. b. The general doctrine of Philosophers touching the idea of it. V. 221. a. b. to 223. a. b.
- Bela*, King of Hungary, in what manner he recompensed the Frangipani's who had assisted him with money. III. 101. a. b.
- Believe*. Des-Barreaux pretended that there was nothing so difficult to a man of wit as to believe. II. 649. b.
- Bellino* (Gentile) a famous Venetian Painter returns from the Sultan's Court loaded with presents. IV. 54. a.
- Bellai*: Messieurs du Bellai concern themselves extremely in the good success of Henry VIIIth's divorce. I. 716. a. b. The Cardinal's conscientious marriage. 724. a. The art which William du Bellai used with the Protestants of Germany. 721. a. b. Facts that concern Martin du Bellai. 721. b. 722. a. They are the patrons of William Bigot. II. 8. a. b. Tarsognota translates into Italian a treatise of the Military Art, which is ascribed to William du Bellai. IV. 918. Different editions of Martin du Bellai's Memoirs. I. 722. a.
- Bellay* (the Bishop of) is puzzled about the power that is attributed to the Holy Virgin. III. 84. b.
- Bellantes* (Antony) a Nobleman of Siena, how he got off when accused of several misdemeanors. IV. 463.
- Bellarmin*, his contradictions. I. 132. a. A Protestant Professor makes a recantation of what he had charged him with. 727. b. 728. a. One of his usual sayings. 732. b. The vow which he made in case the Papal dignity should be conferred upon him. 733. b. 734. a. Said there were too many Christians. V. 525. b. Acknowledges and reckons up two hundred and thirty-seven contraries of doctrine among the Romish Divines. III. 343. b. Censured. I. 769. a.
- Belleforest*, scruples to translate what an Italian Monk had writ about love. I. 630. b.
- Bellier* (Peter) translates into French a part of Philo's works: the version is revised and augmented by Frederic Morel. III. 623.
- Belleuvre*, his embassy to save the life of Mary, Queen of Scots, was a meer farce. II. 760. a. Sent by Henry III to the King of Navarre, about the affront given to the Queen of Navarre. IV. 341. a. b. His negotiation in that affair. ibid.
- Belleuvre* (Pomponne de) First President in the parliament of Paris, refuses to the students of the Canon-Law the privilege of pleading. III. 346. a.
- Bellona*; what her priests had in common with the priests of Cybele. II. 531. b.
- Belaï* (John) represents to the Leaguers that the Canon-Laws excommunicate those who engage in intrigues about the succession in a Prince's life-time. III. 955. a.
- Belonius* cited. IV. 35. b. His observations. III. 749. b. 750. a.
- Belvedereus* (Theodorus) his writings against the Vauds, and the refutations of them by Peter Gilles. III. 162. b.
- Bembus* (Cardinal) the questions which he put to Sabinus. IV. 193. b. Confounds himself in speaking of those who go round the world eastward or westward. V. 781.
- Bencius*: four brothers of that name, Jesuits. I. 747.
- Benedict XII* (Pope): The taxes of the Penitentiary of Rome, appeared under his Pontificate. I. 629. b.
- Benedictines*, of what family the founder of their order was. I. 341.
- Beneficed*. A beneficed man deprived of all his revenues for not pronouncing the letter q as others did. IV. 837. a. b.
- Benefices*, the Venetian ministers at the Court of Rome durst not accept of any. I. 634. What answer Pope Hadrian VI. made to those who objected to him his inconsistent conduct with regard to their plurality. III. 330. a. Ecclesiastical Benefices given to Poets as rewards for the leud and profane verses which they had composed. IV. 896. b. John du Tillet is the author or promoter of the edict, which prohibits the remitting money to Rome for the dispatching of Benefices. V. 354. 355.
- Benefit*. To receive a benefit is to lose one's liberty. II. 206. a.
- Benergue*, a town where the neighbours meet in arms on the 25th of April. IV. 611. b.
- Bengy*, Professor at Bourges, particular facts that concern him. IV. 652. a. b.
- Benvenius* (Dominic) writes a book of the miracles and prophecies of Savonarola. V. 66. b.
- Bennon*, his miracles. I. 749. a.
- Benoit* (Renatus): whether he is the author of a book which clears the Protestants from the charge of Heresy. IV. 373. b.
- Benjerade*; the answer he made when he was but seven or eight years of age. I. 749. a. Another answer which he made to a courtier. 753. a. He contradicts himself in his sonnet upon Job. 967. b. 968. a. One of his Roundels quoted. V. 401. b.
- Benjrab*, a great Cabalist, how he was conceived in his mother's womb. II. 114. a.
- Benzenius* (Rutilius) defends the story, that Trajan's soul was delivered from Hell by the prayers of St Gregory. V. 397. b.
- Berault* (John) his translation of Barclay's Euphormio, with a key and commentary subjoined. I. 647. b. Quoted. II. 163. b. n. (21).
- Berebere* (de la) Memoirs sent for that President's life. I. 264. a.
- Berenice*, her leanness. I. 765. a. b. 766. a. b. Titus sends her away. 766. b. Her jealousy against her sister Drusilla. 767. b. II. 701. b.
- Berenice*, a play, the judgment that was passed upon it. I. 767. a. b.
- Bergamo* (Matthew de) created a Count Palatine by the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria. I. 769. a. b.
- Bergier*, his treatise on the Point of Day. V. 776.
- Bergius* (John) his dispute with Micraelius. IV. 210. a.
- Berigardus* looked upon as a great favourer of Pyrrhonism, and a propagator of impiety. I. 770. b. 771. a. b.
- Bern*: conferences which give occasion to the reformation of that Canton. I. 235. The churches of that Canton disapproved of their abolishing unleavened bread, the baptismal fonts, and the festivals at Geneva. II. 264. b.
- Bernard* (St) one of his maxims. I. 126. a. His character. 758. a. b. & seq. He preaches up the crusade, and promises very different success from that which attended it. III. 796. a.
- Bernartius* (John) injudiciously censures Pliny, with regard to an Egyptian King. IV. 667. a.
- Berneggerus* (Matthew) ascribes to a Jesuit, the speech which came out against the United Provinces, under the name of Herimannus Conrad. II. 550.
- Bernier* (Francis) mistakes a word in a passage of Gassendi. IV. 763. a. b. Quoted 42. b. 264. a.
- Bernier* (John) his character and works. III. 967. a. IV. 897. b.
- Beroaldus* (Philip): how ridiculous he makes himself, while he endeavours to justify Martial and others like unto him. V. 421. a. He observes that Boccace has taken one of his best tales from Apuleius. II. 37. b. 38. a.
- Beroaldus* (Matthew) censured. I. 538. a.
- Bertelier*, a new confutation of his pretended act. I. 783. b. 784. a. b. II. 61. b.
- Bertier*, Bookseller, what answer the Queen-Mother, made to him. I. 544. a. b.
- Betrade*, Queen of France, her History. III. 62. a. b. Her death. ibid. b.
- Bertrand* (the President) is very much out with regard to the Cassius that was so renowned for his integrity. II. 347. and b.
- Berulle*: persons of that family. I. 786.
- Besa*, the name of a city, and of a particular deity that was adored there. I. 348. b. The oracle of that god was still in being in the reign of Constantius. 37. and a.

Bisanzon.

- Beſançon*, Thomas Buyrete admitted Miniſter at nineteen years of age, founds a private church there. II. 694. a.
- Beſarion* (Cardinal) ſaid that the new ſaints made him call in queſtion the old ones. III. 740. a. How he was hindered from being made Pope. IV. 587. a. b. Being threatened with excommunication by Paul II, he ſigns a decree which he had not ſeen. IV. 511. b.
- Beſiality*; Abſolution from it, what it coſt. I. 628. a. b.
- Beton* (David), Archbiſhop of St Andrews, is killed in the revolutions of Scotland. III. 666. a.
- Betuffi* (Joſeph) his book intituled Imagini del Tempio della Signora Donna Giovanna Aragona. I. 402. a.
- Beuningen* (Conrad van), what he ſaid in favour of the toleration which was granted to the Mennonites in the United-Provinces. I. 288. b. 289. a. His opinion of a book which the Spaniards put out, to diſprove the pretenſions of the King of France. III. 850. a. b.
- Beza* (Theodore) treats Joſephus as he deſerves. I. 39. a. One of his letters was by ſome thought to be the foundation of the pretended Mahometaniſm of Paul Alciatus. 198. b. He is cleared from the abominable calumny which had been charged upon him. 546. a. b. 547. a. and 795. b. 796. a. His diſputes with Baudouin. 695. a. Whether he owned that Bellarmine had overthrown all the Proteſtant authors. 726. a. A cruel and impudent inveſtive of Scioppius againſt him. 745. b. 746. a. He is calumniated. 790. and a. b. 795. a. b. 798. a. b. Whilt he was young he kept a woman under the promiſe of marriage, which he performed at laſt. 791. b. 792. a. and 795. a. He does not explain all his reaſons for leaving Laufanne. 792. a. II. 274. a. b. Is reproached on account of the frequent corrections which he made in the editions of his New Teſtament. I. 792. b. A little Macaronic book is aſcribed to him. 791. b. As like-wiſe the Vindicia contra Tyrannos. V. 735. Bolſec's accuſation of him is not to be credited. II. 60. b. 61. a. b. He deſerves more credit than Maimbourg and Varillas, as to the hiſtorical order of Calvin's travels, in ſuch things as neither tend to increaſe nor diminſh the reputation of the latter. 236. a. b. He is upbraided with having too eagerly picked up the flying reports that were ſpread about his enemies. 364. a. His epigram on the picture of Eraſmus criticized. 810. b. He preſerves a commendable moderation in ſpeaking of the death of Henry II. III. 400. b. Is ſtruck with the Plague. 575. a. A ſtanza made on that occaſion. ibid. He looks upon the Eccleſiaſtical Hierarchy as a fundamental corruption. 666. b. What he ſays of Marot's morals. IV. 154. b. 155. a. His verſion of 100 Palms. 157. b. He does not give a fair answer to Dudithius, touching the ſentence of Zurich againſt Ochinus. 389. a. b. Broughton aims particularly at him, and writes him very rough letters. II. 150. He is blamed by Colomies for altering a paſſage in the French verſion of the Palms. IV. 164. b. He expreſſes a proper indignation againſt Simon Simonius. V. 150. b. 151. a. He writes the life of Calvin in Latin and in French. II. 274. There are ſome things in the one which are not in the other. ibid. He retired from Laufanne for reaſons that have not been well explained. ibid. a. b. His narrative touching Caraccioli different from that of Peter Martyr. 313. b. 314. a. b. He refutes the doctrine of Harchius upon the Eucharift. III. 352. and a. b. He is miſtaken about Marot's age. IV. 162. b. How he mentioned the ſtory of the She-Pope at the conference of Poiſſi. 735, 736, 737. What he relates of a woman and her two daughters. 882. a. b.
- Bias*, a maxim of that Philoſopher. III. 601. b. His dilemma upon marriage may receive a different turn. IV. 844. b.
- Bible*, the Hebrew text of it altered in what relates to the age of the Patriarchs. I. 173. a. The deſign of publiſhing it tranſlated into the Irith language meets with great oppoſition. 718. a. A queſtion which Bochart is ſaid to have been aſked touching that ſacred book. II. 41. a. It is tranſlated into the vulgar language in Spain. 379. A comiſſion ſent to Drufius, empowering him to go upon a new tranſlation of the Bible into the Dutch tongue. 705. a.
- Luther's tranſlation, and that which the Churches of the Low-Countries made uſe of judged defective. ibid. An objection ſcandalouſly retorted againſt the authors of that holy book. IV. 373. and a. b. What Politian is charged with ſaying of it. 704. a. b. Tranſlated into the Polith language. 825. b.
- Bible* (French) firſt printed at the deſire of Charles VIII. I. 1. a. Faliſhed as well by the way of ſuppreſſion, as by that of addition. ibid. b.
- Bible of Zurich*, by whom it was reviled and corrected. I. 802. a.
- Bible*, tranſlated into the Slavonian tongue by George Dalmatin. II. 585.
- Biblioteca Maxima Pontificia*. See Authority of the Pope.
- Bibliotèque of the Jeſuit authors*; by whom it was begun, and by whom continued. I. 210. and a. b. Qualities requiſite to make a good Bibliothecque, and the ordinary fault of thoſe who are employed in a work of that nature. ibid. b. 220. a. b. 221. a. b.
- Bibliotèque Univerſelle* quoted. I. 116. b.
- Biblus*, the Egyptians ſend thither every year a paſſe-board head, without any other ceremony than throwing it into the ſea. I. 116. a.
- Bibulus* (Conſul) is wholly taken up in making Paſquinades. I. 425. a. b.
- Bigarrures & Touches* (i. e. The Miſcellany and Touches) of Des Accords, books which are too free and trifling. I. 63, 64. a. b. 65. a. The editions of them. 64. b. 65. a. The Touches compoſed in two months, what the nature of that work is. 65. a.
- Bigot* (Emeric), what he ſaid to a man who waited for the ſecond editions of books. I. 319. b.
- Bigot* (John), father to William. II. 7.
- Bigot* (William) promiſed a treatiſe upon the neceſſity of matrimony. I. 603. a.
- Bigots*, their artifices to make a great many devout women fall into the ſnare. II. 110. a. There is no paſſion which they do not juſtify at the expence of religion. III. 533. b.
- Bilia* lived to be old without knowing that her huſband, who had a ſinking breath was different in that from other men. II. 726, 727. and a.
- Billicius* (Everard) defends the Univerſity and Clergy of Cologne againſt Melancthon, Bucer, and others. III. 240. b.
- Billon* quoted. I. 720. a. b. III. 280. b. 281. a. IV. 359. b. 360. a. b.
- Bindoni* (Bernardino) makes additions to the Italian edition of Philip de Bergamo's Chronicle. I. 769. a.
- Binet* (Stephen) a Jeſuit, declares, though not without trembling, for the ſalvation of Origen, while he examines the matter in the form of a rehearing of his trial. IV. 415. b. 416. a.
- Binet* (Claudius) cenſured for an inſipid hyperbole which he makes uſe of in ſpeaking of the birth of Ronſard. IV. 890. b.
- Bion*, his answer to Antigonus. II. 11. a.
- Bionti Sermons*, what one is to underſtand by that. II. 12. a.
- Birds* that ſwept the temple of Achilles every morning. I. 85. a. n. (20). A bird which can take up into the air a horſe with his rider. III. 132. b.
- Birds* deſtroy an army of Ethiopians. IV. 177. a.
- Their language underſtood by ſome people. 181, 182. and a. Worſhipped in Lemnos. III. 755. and b. The language of birds. V. 381. b. 382. a.
- Biraot* convicted of impurities, according to the teſtimony of Jarrige. I. 108. b. 109. a.
- Biron* (the Marſhal de) receives a terrible reprimand from the Duke of Anjou, and the occasion of it. III. 178. a. b. He performed great ſervices to Henry IV. ibid. b. 179. a. He gives that Prince too ſenſible a proof of his thinking himſelf a moſt neceſſary man. 179. b. He could not bear to ſee the faith given to the Huguenots violated. 180. a. He was fit for all ſorts of employments. ibid. a. b. He was too much given to wine. ibid. b. And was unwilling to finiſh the war. ibid. and 181. a. He becomes credulous and ſuperſtitious. ibid. a. b.
- Biron* (the Marſhal Duke de) his impious wiſh. III. 182. b. He affects to hate the Huguenots. 183. a. He diſplays an inſupportable vanity. ibid. a. b. He is confounded with his father in the point of learning.

- learning. ibid. b. 184. a. Henry IV saves his life three times. ibid. b. That Prince had a mind to make him his son-in-law. ibid. a. b. His duel with Carency. 856. a. b.
- Birth. Few people care to have the meanness of their birth talked of. I. 256. b. V. 125. a. b. It has ever been common to debase the birth of those whom fortune raises to the highest dignities. I. 350. b. V. 125. a. b. 126. a. 189. a. A mean birth is no crime. I. 360. b.
- Bishopric: a bishopric procured by the Muses. I. 237. and 238. a. b.
- Bishoprics: the abuse of giving bishoprics to children prevailed in the XVIth century. IV. 819.
- Bishops of the East subject to the King of Portugal, acknowledge no Patriarch. I. 22. There are Bishops, who having once obtained the mitre by preaching, preach no more after they are made Bishops. 238. a. Lent-Bishops; who were so called, by whom, and for what reason. 703. a. The dignity which is possessed, and the functions that are exercised by the Bishops of the Church of England. II. 759. b. A Bishop that was of an apostolic character. III. 69. and a. Bishops were highly respected by the Pagans themselves when their morals were good. IV. 104. b. They dishonour their profession when they set up for informers. ibid. 105. a. Good Bishops faithfully discharge their ministerial office. III. 772. b. The Protestants acknowledged Caraccioli for Bishop, after he had publicly embraced their religion. II. 313. and a. b. 314. a. b. By divine right all Bishops are equal to the Pope. IV. 198.
- Bishops of France prevailed with the King to deprive Caraccioli, who was acknowledged for Bishop by the Reformed, of his bishopric. II. 313. a. b. 314. a. b.
- Bitings (of an immodest kind), Orators as well as Poets have mentioned them. III. 56. a. b.
- Bitter, stories which the Rabbins tell concerning the slaughter of the Jews, at the taking of that city by the Romans. I. 649. a.
- Blacksmith of Salon: It is not possible for private men to discover certainly what concerns him. II. 386. b.
- Blasius (Junius) obtains the honour of a triumph from Tiberius. V. 277. a. b. 278. a.
- Blanc (William le) translates Xiphilin into Latin. V. 589. a.
- Blanc (Richard le) translates Cardan's book de Subtilitate into French. II. 322. b.
- Blancanus, the Jesuit, censured for a double mistake. I. 49. a.
- Blanche (Queen) exposed to detraction more than one way. V. 337. a. b. 338. a.
- Blanchinus (Bartholomew) writes the life of Urceus. V. 515.
- Blasphemies. The horrible blasphemies of a fanatic. III. 815. a. b. A blasphemy of a horrid and singular kind. V. 514. a. b. 515. a.
- Bleeding. The practice of frequent bleeding introduced at Paris by Botal. II. 99. and a. b. A dispute on that head between Botal and the Physicians of the Faculty. ibid. The use that Averrhoës made of it. ibid. b.
- Blesinius falsely relates several things of the Islanders, both with respect to witchcraft, III. 580. a. b. and lasciviousness. ibid. b. 581. a. b.
- Blind. One born blind cured by Hadrian. III. 319. a.
- Blois: A motion made by the States of Blois for excluding the King of Navarre from the succession to the crown of France. II. 5. a.
- Blond (John le) translates Carion's Chronicle into French, and writes an appendix to it. II. 324. a.
- Blondel (David), the character of his wit and memory. II. 22. a. b. 23. a. He censures Suidas touching the Sibyl Lampus unjustly. 252. b. What he says of the Fathers. III. 55. a. b. Omits several authors who have affirmed the story of Pope Joan. 78. b. Is mistaken as to the time when Lucidus flourished. 904. What he says of the story of the She-Pope. II. 24. a. b. 25. a. b. IV. 729, 730. Is not for losing time in enquiries about its origin, and censured on that account. 739. Finds that the said story in a manuscript of Anastasius the library-keeper is framed in the very words of Martinus Polonus. 725. b. 726. a. 738. b. 739. a.
- Blondus (Flavius), certain works of his translated into Italian by Lucio Fauno. III. 18.
- Blount (Charles) his writings condemned. I. 383. a. His translation of Philostratus. ibid. His tragical end. ibid.
- Boards: the avarice of those who keep Boards in universities. III. 167. b.
- Bobouiski, in Latin Bobovius and Bobovius, is the same with Halibeigh in the Dictionary. III. 341.
- Boccace falls in love with a Princess, and writes two excellent books for her sake. IV. 302. b. 304. b. What he relates of Guido Cavalcante. II. 398. a. b. His Decameron universally known. ibid. Of a thousand persons who read it, scarce two or three remember any thing that is not an adventure of gallantry, or pleasantries. ibid. What he says of Pope Joan. IV. 730. b. 731. a. How far his Decameron is to be condemned. V. 837.
- Boccalini, against what kind of authors he should have made Apollo hold his extraordinary session, and summon all the forces of Parnassus. II. 528. a. Does not follow the advice which he himself gives to Historians. 65. a. b. Complains with great wit of those who brought in the Neapolitan disease. IV. 284. b.
- Bochart has read a passage in Strabo, concerning Telmessus, wrong. V. 311. b. His conjecture upon a passage of Suidas, where that author speaks of the cray-fish of Tenedos, is one of the best that he has made. 312. a.
- Bodies, an explication of the doctrine of some of the Cartesians concerning the formation of bodies. II. 251. a. b. The difference between living Bodies and Bodies void of life according to Des Cartes. 660. b. 661. a. b. n. (51). Bodies are incapable of thinking. 661. b. n. (53). 662. a. b. The qualities of Bodies which strike our senses are only mere appearances. IV. 654. a. b. 655. a. b.
- Bodies (dead) that have remained exempt from corruption. I. 183. a. b. II. 442. b. III. 233. a. b.
- Bodin, one of the reasons for which he wrote his De monomania. I. 385. b. 386. a. His panegyric. II. 48. a. b. 49. a. He has wrote a dialogue about religions, in which he gives the advantage to the Jewish. 45. a. Is taken for a man without religion. 50. a. b. 51. a. b. An ingenious answer which an Englishman made to him. 53. a. He is censured for what he says of Cato's lending his wife. III. 495. a. Quoted. 403. b. 404. a. b. IV. 502. a. His prevarications to save the honour of the Astrologers. V. 244. b. to 246. a. b. A gross mistake charged upon him by la Mothe le Vayer. 112. b. He relates a singular answer of Henry II. III. 405.
- Borgia, what punishment was inflicted there upon bankrupts. II. 863. a.
- Bohemia, all the Ministers of that kingdom profcrib'd. II. 536. Facts which concern the revolution that happened there. V. 102. a. b. to 104. a. b.
- Bohemia (the King of), Elector Palatine: his exercises are to be seen in the Vatican library at Rome. I. 239. a.
- Bohemians divided into three sects. IV. 629. a. b. Lascius writes a book on the confession of faith of the Protestants of Bohemia. III. 732. b. 733. a. b. They degenerate from from their ancestors. ibid. n. (6).
- Bohorischi (Adam): he and Dalmatin translate the Bible into the Sclavonian tongue. II. 565. and a. b.
- Boilau (Dr), complaints against two of his books. V. 853.
- Boistead: an edict prohibiting the public exercise of the Romish religion in that town. III. 548. a. Disputes occasioned by the said edict. ibid. and b. Its Magistrates tolerate a fraternity of the Virgin, and enter themselves into it. IV. 121. a. b. 122. a.
- Boissiu (the President of) justly censures Casaubon, and Corradus for what they say about Pyrrhus, and the place of his interment. IV. 666. b. A character of his commentary on Ovid's poem against Ibis. 452. a. b.
- Bolduc, a Capuchin. Nothing can be more scandalous than what he says of Job's distemper. III. 573. a.
- Bolgen (Anne), her bad qualities. II. 57. b.

V O L V.

10 N

Bologna,

- Bologna*, its colony was settled four years before that of Pisaurum. I. 62. b.
- Bolsec*, a witness not credited even by the Roman Catholics. II. 61. b. 62. a. b. Insults Calvin for the frequent corrections of his Institution. 262. b. All his foolish stories against Calvin are given out as matters of fact by Cardinal Richelieu. 62. a. And will be so eternally by those who write against the Calvinists, if we except authors of reputation and gravity. ibid. and 61. a. b. What concerns the prostitution of his wife is not to be found in the French life of Calvin. 274. n. (p). A more particular account of the differences betwixt Calvin and him given in that life. ibid. b.
- Bona* (Cardinal). An author undertakes to criticize him, because he had never quoted him. IV. 2. a.
- Bona Sforza*, Queen of Poland, gives people large room to talk of her. I. 405. b. She is very angry with her son for marrying Barbara Radzivil. III. 847. and a. b. Their mutual reproaches on that head. 848. a.
- Bonanni* (a Jesuit) sets about composing a catalogue of the writers of his society. I. 219. a. Quoted. V. 164. b. Maintains a kind of paradox about Mofchus. II. 11. b.
- Bord*, the elogy of his Commentary upon Perseus. IV. 598. a. b.
- Bone*; what the Jews tell us of a small bone. I. 649. b. 650. a. b.
- Bons* (Honoratus) Doctor of the Canon-Law, is the author of a book, intitled, The Tree of Battles. III. 78. b. Affirms the story of Pope Joan. ibid. Several mistakes which concern that writer. 79. a. b.
- Bonfires*. What are the finest Bonfires that can be lighted up to please the people. III. 317. b. 318. a.
- Bongars* quoted. II. 69. a. b. What Veller wanted to have him reproached with, is probable enough. 70. a. The author of the new translation of his letters, censured. III. 155. b. V. 538. a. b. Bongars was somewhat credulous. III. 696. b. Falsely accused as being the author of the Idolum Halliensis. 838. a. b.
- Boniface VIII*, being solicited by one of the parties which divided the commonwealth of Florence, prevails with Charles de Valois, to compose the contentions of that city. II. 296. a.
- Bonifacius* (Balthasar) rashly attempts to criticize Athenæus touching Démocritus, and the manner in which he prolonged his life. II. 637. b. n. (38).
- Bonniwet* (Admiral) his attempt upon Margaret de Valois. I. 724. a. IV. 322. b.
- Book of the Creation*, the Cabalists pretend to work miracles by it. I. 173. a.
- Book*. A French book formerly was no more than a certain number of Latin pages, with a few lines of French. II. 105. b.
- Book of sentences* condemned to be burnt under the name of Abelard. I. 761. b.
- Book de tribus Impostoribus*, it is not probable that there ever was such a book. I. 437. a. IV. 861. a. V. 536. b. 537. a. Some say that Averroës supplied the materials of it. 557. a.
- Books*, their faults ought to be carefully remarked, when they may mislead a great many readers. I. 77. b. A book that should treat of the religion of a sovereign would sell well. 130. b. Some books are taken no notice of by zealots for a long time. 153. a. Authors who enlarge them, seldom take proper care to alter the dates. 154. a. They forget to make the proper alterations, when they abridge or transcribe passages. 158. a. The first editions of books only serve to make an author's works appear in a fairer character. 318. a. b. There is no edition so bad but some advantage may be reaped from it. 319. a. b. One should always set down the titles of books in the language that the author made use of. 344. b. Suppressions that are made in them only serve to draw one's attention the more. 498. a. b. 499. a. II. 94. a. b. Books deceive people sometimes, by the false prints that are put into them. 100. b. The faults of books are not excusable when they concern the principal subject. I. 579. a. The faults of great men lead other great men into errors. 523. b. Are like sparks of fire. 671. b. A consideration which should oblige authors to avoid the very smallest mistakes. II. 22. a. Books called Gentlemen in a compliment. 626. b. A person may very easily be mistaken as to those whom he fancies to be authors of such and such books. 682. b. V. 396. b. There are many books against which nothing would be said, if authors were obliged to insert them at length in their answers. II. 25. a. A book of admirable use, if we judge of it by the title. 236. and a. b. Bochart quotes it sometimes. ibid. b. Some books become more perfect by being revised and printed. 279. a. A beautiful passage of Mr Smith on that head. ibid. a. b. Books can never be good, when an author writes them purely for bread. 321. a. Faults that are often to be found in them. 323. a. b. Books condemned to be burnt. 355. a. b. 356. a. Callimachus said that a great book is always a great evil. 526. b. A book dedicated to our Lord Jesus Christ. 578. a. There is no book so despicable, but some advantage may be reaped from it. 582. a. The first that a man publishes is sometimes an accomplished piece. ibid. a. b. Some books are published under the names of celebrated authors, chiefly such books as concern magic. 640. b. 641. a. Considerations upon books that are full of quotations. 778. b. 779. a. Examiners of books detain manuscripts long, and strike many things out of them. 809. a. Some have been suppressed, others forged, and others fitted up as people had a mind. III. 67. a. What a man exposes himself to, when he only judges of a book by the title of it. 134. a. How dangerous impure books are. V. 38. and a. b. &c. It is of great use to publish several books upon the same subjects, when they are important. III. 335. a. b. Whether the condemnation of a book by a synod hinders it from being read. 377. b. 378. a. They are most of them extracts and copies of others. 471. b. Are often spoiled by too much polishing. 836. a. b. 837. b. The risk that posthumous books run. 848. b. The blind zeal of those who retrench whatever displeases them in books. 948. a. b. It is a more difficult task than people imagine to make additions to books. IV. 79. b. A book that contained nothing but the reproaches which two professors divulged one against the other. 122. a. In what manner those of the ancient Arabs were made. 177. b. A man that seeks to pass for the author of a book which he did not write, is guilty of a wilful cuckoldom. 280. b. Reasons which should hinder the greatest part of authors from publishing many books. 493. b. They generally contain nothing new. 590. b. Those who write books should first of all read Quintilian. 814. What Pliny says of the pompous titles of some. V. 2. b. Whether every word that cannot be spoken before a modest woman should be banished out of them. 132. b. 133. a. b. There are some which have been printed a great while, and which nevertheless remain unknown to the most learned authors. 462. a. Whether single men study better, and compose more good books, than those that are married. 524. b. 525. a. b. A great author of little books; who was called so, and in what sense. II. 528. The multiplicity of books debauches the mind. I. 65. a. The title of a book which alarmed the Court of Rome, and in consequence thereof was reformed. III. 122. Nothing is more apt to make them be looked upon as bad, than the pompous idea under which they are represented. IV. 284. a. A book too hard; the most understanding authors rather chuse to be silent, than to attack it. V. 179. b. Several books which are despised by men of parts; seem good to the author: how he read them. 802. How Antony Arnauld read them. ibid. Character of Jurieu's books. ibid. and 803. Why the States of Holland grant privileges to them. 804. The difference between a good and an useful book. 806. Great books are long expected, and meet with a thousand storms, when they first launch forth. 808. 809. A reflexion of la Bruyere upon the way that people judge of books. 809.
- Books of Devotion*, it does not belong to a vicious man to write them. I. 439. a. b.
- Books of Heretics*: whether those who prohibit the sale of Heretical books, ought to permit the objections of Heretics, to appear in the writings of the orthodox who confute them. II. 488. a. b. 489. a.
- Books* (Apocryphal) the objections made to these books are retorted. III. 601. a.
- Bookfellers*, what they do in order to enhance the price of books. I. 521. b. II. 23. a. b. 38. b. 809. b. Bookfellers who impose upon Alexander VII. 476. b. 477. a. b. They have a custom to print many titles for one and the same book. 524. a. III. 274. b. It

- It is not of them that we ought to complain, if they print bad books. II. 362. b. Some of their fly-tricks. 621. a. b. 809. k. Whether we can rely upon the commendations which they procure to the authors they print. 763. b. They give corrected editions of the French authors, with respect to the antiquated phrases. IV. 427. k. 428. a. The confusion which they cause, by reprinting the title pages of books. 476. a. The German Book-sellers generally add good indexes to the books they reprint. 498. k. Book-sellers are often ruined by authors. 834. a. b. A custom which they have, imposes on the Bibliographers. V. 547. b. An author who had sworn never to have any thing to do with them. II. 82. a. k. 83. a. The extreme negligence of a Book-seller. 322. b.
- Borras* was very warm in his love. II. 79. a. k. 80. a. b.
- Borael* (Adam) translates Broughton's Commentary on the Prophet Daniel into Latin. II. 150. a.
- Boral* (Peter) his mistake with respect to Desfontaines. IV. 538. a. b.
- Borella* (Camillo) takes a great deal of pains to prove in a book, that the sentence of Pilate found in the city of Aquila is fictitious. II. 556. k.
- Borri* (the Cavalier) had a strange thought concerning the conception of the Virgin. III. 571. a. b.
- Borjel* (Francis de) faults that concern him. II. 90. a.
- Borrell*: persons of that family. II. 90. a. b.
- Boré* (du) a minister; what a Catholic gentleman did at his return to Caen. II. 91. a. b.
- Borin* (the Count de) his treachery. II. 841. k. 842. a. Why he was not punished for it. ibid.
- Bouffier*, Bishop of Meaux, his error touching Ubiquity, and the first authors of that tenet. V. 549. k. Quoted. IV. 65. b. c. p. passim alibi.
- Bouchet* (Mr de) takes the Parlement de la Place privately to the castle of Couffy. IV. 682. a.
- Bouchel*, his Bibliothèque of the French law quoted. IV. 806.
- Boucher* (John) thought to be the author of the apology for John Chastel. II. 101. a. 103. a. n. (15). 459. b.
- Boucheras* receives an extraordinary commission to preside at trials for poisoning and witchcraft. II. 345. k.
- Bouches* (Peter) takes the poison which a neighbour's wife had prepared for her husband, and dies. II. 104.
- Boucheux*, his judicious advice touching the French tongue. II. 775. b. Quoted. V. 361. a. b.
- Bouillon* (the Duke of) promised to abjure his religion when he married Mademoiselle de Berghes. IV. 120. a.
- Boulai* (Du) commits faults, upon the subject of Faunus and Omphale. III. 934. b. His mistake touching a Roman lady, whom he took for a Vestal Virgin. V. 516. a. b. Quoted. 130. a.
- Boulduc* (Father) laughed at for the monasteries which he supposes to have been erected at Haran. I. 45. b.
- Boulogne* (Claudius Dormi Bishop of) is treated as a rebel, and cast into prison. IV. 258.
- Bourague*, what sort of an animal it is. IV. 42. b.
- Bourbon* (Antony de) King of Navarre, solicited to procure an agreement in religion. I. 691. b. See. Antony.
- Bourbon* (the Constable of) animated to the siege of Rome by predictions. I. 147. and b. 148. a. Makes his escape upon horses shod backwards. 482. Conspires against the state. IV. 694. a. b. How this conspiracy was discovered. 695. b. 696. a. At what time he entered into the party of Charles. V. II. 845.
- Bourbon* (Cardinal de) sets up, at the solicitation of the League, for the lawful successor to the crown of France. III. 520. a. b.
- Bourbon* (Frances de) eldest daughter to the Duke of Montpensier, openly professes the Protestant religion. III. 864. and b.
- Bourbon* (James de) imprisoned by his wife in the castle of Ovo. IV. 307. b. Escapes to Tarento, where he is besieged: he surrenders the place, and goes to be a Monk in France. ibid.
- Bourbon* (Nicholas) quoted. IV. 247. b. n. (19). Praises exceedingly the poem de Crucifixio, wrote by James Pinon. 651.
- Bourdeaux*. The parliament of Bourdeaux reprimanded. III. 512. a. b. Rejects the claim of two Protestant captains, whom it had condemned to death, not allowing them the privilege of being tried by a judicature of half Protestants and half Catholics. II. 289. a. b. And condemns a libel on that subject to be burnt ibid. b.
- Boursel*, who this author is in the translation of Thucydides's History. II. 237. b.
- Bourg* (Antony du) Lieutenant-Civil of the Prévôt of Paris, and afterwards Chancellor. II. 556. a.
- Bourg* (Anne du) what Henry II said to him. III. 400. a. He dissuades the conclusions of his advocate who tried to save his life by an officious lie. IV. 139. b. 140. a.
- Bourg on Braye*, when its citadel was seized. I. 738. b.
- Bourg-Fontaine*, the chimerical assembly of Bourg-Fontaine. I. 486. 491. a.
- Bourgeois* (Edme) Prior of the Dominicans; directs his discourse in the pulpit to James Clement, and calls him the holy martyr of Jesus Christ. III. 601. a. k. Is treated as a confessor and martyr by John Guignard. 276. a.
- Bourgeois* (Francis) General of the Oratory, collects the works of Cardinal Berulle, and adds a preface to them. I. 786. k.
- Bourgeois* (Antoinette) her visions touching Adam. I. 102. b. 103. a. b. The spirit which governed and led her. II. 111. a. b. Who was the learned man that she esteemed most. 540. a. How she discovered that John Rothe was no more than a false prophet. III. 690. a. Whether she had foretold the bombardment of Brussels. IV. 889. a. b. What her notion was of the perfect state of man, with respect to his generative faculty. V. 4. a. b.
- Bourgeoisism*, makes some noise in Scotland. II. 114. a. b.
- Bourgeois*, a passage quoted from one of his letters. II. 647. b. 648. a. IV. 806. a. b.
- Boutiller de Rance* (Armand) Abbot de la Trappe, understood the Greek Poets at ten years of age. I. 293. a. b. What he said upon hearing of the death of Mr Armand, Doctor of the Sorbonne. 498. a.
- Box on the ear*; Edesius gives a governor of Egypt one. III. 445. a. b.
- Boxius* (Thomas) his errors touching the Læstrigons. III. 786, 787.
- Braccia*, the inhabitants of Perugia, chose him for their Prince on account of his valour. II. 292. a.
- Brachmann* always carry a ring and a staff. I. 5. a.
- Braggadocio* (in learning) his character. I. 373. a. b. II. 253. a.
- Brandenburg* (the Elector of) what he wrote to Richard Cromwell touching the invasion of Poland by the Swedes. II. 539. b.
- Branden* (Charles, Duke of Suffolk) his intrigue with the Princess Royal. III. 88. a.
- Brandt* (Sebastian) his work intitled, Novis Stultorum. I. 602. b.
- Brantome* quoted. I. 256. a. b. 592. a. b. 723. a. 724. a. b. II. 207. k. 208. a. V. 36. a. 337. b. What he says of the beauty of Donna Maria of Aragon. I. 401. a. And of Don John of Austria's birth. II. 20. a. b. 21. a. His false way of reasoning about the children of great Lords. ibid. He speaks with too much disdain of the other Princes, who opposed the ambition of Charles V. 435. b. He improperly alleges the apology of the Prince of Orange, on occasion of Charles the fifth's sentiments in point of religion. 441. and a. b. His narrative touching Mary of England, Queen of France, is different from that of Mezerai, and Varillas. III. 88. a. b. According to him it is possible that a Queen may suppose a child in the midst of a numerous Court. 89. a. He is mistaken in two things with respect to a cup which Helen caused to be made by the pattern of one of her breasts. 363. a. A curious passage of his, touching a certain Prince and a certain Lady of a very good family. 835. a. b. What he says of the Cardinal de Lorraine's liberality towards the poor and the ladies. 872. a. What he thinks of the ladies who accompanied their husbands in the holy war. 795. b. 796. a. n. (25). He affirms four things touching Joan of Naples, which are all four false. IV. 305. a. Applauds the complaisance of Henry II, for the Duchess of Valentinois. 698. b. 699. a. His mistake touching Laurezza Strozzi, a Dominican Nun. V. 252. b.

Bragg.

- Brabl*, the Savages of that country have no religion. III. 781. a. b.
- Bravery*, whether there be any connexion between bravery and lust. III. 414. b. 415. a. b. Of all virtues it is the only one that is subject to fanatical transports. IV. 664. a. Joined with effeminacy and a strong inclination for pleasure. V. 271. a. b. 272. a. b.
- Brazen*: Some popular stories about certain brazen heads. I. 598. a.
- Breafts*; the severity of the Anabaptists against a man's handling of his mistress's breasts. IV. 87. b.
- Breda* confounded with Bretta. V. 357. b.
- Bredenburg* (John) accused of being a Spinofist, and for what reason. V. 207. b. 208. a. He dies nevertheless with lively sentiments of religion. 208. a.
- Bread*. What is meant by chapter-bread. II. 815. b.
- Bregi*, the French Embassador at the Court of Poland, what his pretensions were. III. 264. a. b.
- Bremen*, in what manner Calvinism was introduced into that city by Hardenberg. III. 352, 353. a. b.
- Brentius*, a zealous Ubiquitarian, forewarns all states not to allow the Zuinglians a toleration. II. 196.
- Bretley*, whether he and those he quotes have calumniated John Knox. III. 668. a. b. 669. a.
- Brefman* (Gregory) a Professor at Leipzig, praises Badoel, and his discourse on the marriage of men of learning, which he causes to be reprinted. I. 603. a.
- Bretagne* (the Duke of) neglects his wife, who was daughter to the King of Scotland, and falls in love with Antoinette de Maillezé, wife to the Lord Vil-lequier. II. 464. b. One of his most faithful servants makes remonstrances to him, against it in vain. ibid.
- Bretagne* (Anne of) becomes barren, and at length loses her life by the ignorance of the midwives, who assisted at her last delivery. III. 28. a.
- Breviary of Burgos*, the correction of it. IV. 76. a. b.
- Breuis* (William) the circumstance which he added in the story of Pope Joan. IV. 729.
- Brezi* (the Marshal de) desires to be prayed for in the Protestant Church of Saumur. I. 263. b. Draws his sword against the Marshal de Chastillon, and for what reason. III. 821. a.
- Brezi* (James de) punishes his wife's infidelity. II. 132. a. b.
- Briauville* (the Abbot de) invents the Heraldry cards. III. 51.
- Bride*: a bride whom a man carried to Church in his arms, to be married. IV. 324. a.
- Briefs*, some composers of briefs. I. 361. a. b.
- Briet* (Father) his faults with respect to Collatius. II. 524. b. 525. a. In speaking of Lucretius, he commits eight faults in eight lines. III. 917. b.
- Brin*, particulars relating to the siege of that place. V. 192. b.
- Brinwilliers* (the Lady de) among other proofs, her judges made use of her written confession, in order to condemn her. II. 460. b.
- Brissac* and Friburg, remained in the possession of France by the peace of Nimeguen. III. 720. a.
- Brissac*, his zeal for the glory of the French monarchy. III. 396. a.
- Briffon* (Barnaby) quoted. V. 17. b.
- Britons*, the barbarities which they exercised upon the Romans. V. 260. a. b.
- Brixen* (a town in Tirol) the assembly there declares that Gregory VII, had forfeited the Pontificate. III. 231.
- Brucard* (Bonaventure) the age in which he lived. II. 529. a. b. Writes a description of the Holy Land. ibid.
- Brodeau*, persons of that family. II. 145. b. 146. a. b.
- Bruckhusius*, his conjecture upon a passage of Propertius. IV. 585. b.
- Brogitarus* buys the Pontificate of Pefinus, and is put in possession of it. II. 628. b. But he was driven out as an Usurper. ibid.
- Brusse* (René de) condemned to lose his head by an Arrêt of the parliament of Paris. II. 840. a. How his son John entered again upon the possession of his father's estate. ibid. b.
- Brusser* (Simon) disputes with Villegaignon, and confounds him. V. 478. b.
- Brother*. A lay-brother that occasions a whole convent being set on fire. III. 284. b.
- Brothers*, a proverb of the Antients touching the hatred of brothers. II. 701. b.
- Broutalakas*, what the Greeks understand by that word. I. 508.
- Brown* (Thomas) his thoughts concerning the manner of human propagation. V. 6. a.
- Bruce* (Robert) in vain solicited by William Crichton to put the Chancellor of Scotland to death, and accused to the governor of the Low-Countries. II. 577.
- Brueys*, in what manner he attacks Mr Jurieu upon his prophecies. II. 683. b. 685. a. b. Wherein he is blame-worthy on that head. 684. b. 685. a. His reflexions upon Mr Jurieu's gay humour. 954. a. b.
- Brugenfs* (Lucas) what he says of the Scribes. V. 8. a. b. An observation which he makes. 11. b.
- Brugers* (La) quoted. II. 118. a. b. 119. a. 452. b. Delicately touches the curiosity of the fair sex for nudities. III. 964. a. The character he gives us of children. 815. b. n. (7). He ridicules the profusion of reading which certain authors shew. II. 105. b.
- Brus*, in Latin Braunius, his answer to Mr Stoupp's book. V. 204. a.
- Bruse* (La) was not sufficiently guarded in what he published, concerning the Nuncio Chigi. II. 474. b. 475. a. b.
- Bruchaut* extravagantly commended by Gregory the Great. III. 222. b. 223. a.
- Brusmas* (John) refutes the Polygamia triumphatrix, of Lylerus, by a book intituled, Mongamia Vindex. III. 973.
- Bruswic* (the Electores of) named to succeed to the crown of England. V. 194. b.
- Brusquet*, a King's Jester, famous in his way. II. 668. a. n. (32).
- Brusfeld*, whether the bombarding of that city was foretold by Mademoiselle Bourignon. See Bourignon.
- Brutum Fulmen*, a mistake of Thuanus and Decker, touching that book. III. 521. a. How the author was rewarded for it. ibid.
- Brutus* (Decimus) was a good judge of Poetry, and, was well versed both in the learning of Rome and Greece. I. 60. and a.
- Brutus and Cicero* had not the same taste in Oratory. II. 166. a.
- Brutus* (Lucius Junius) does himself condemn his own children to death. II. 162. a.
- Brutus* (Marcus Junius) his intrepidity. IV. 746. a. b.
- Brutus* (Stephanus Junius) a dissertation upon that disguised author. V. 731. et seq.
- Brutus* (John Michael) differs from other Historians in his opinion touching Constantia, Queen of Sicily. III. 395. b.
- Buccafoco*: the family-name of the Cardinal Sarnanus, or de Sarnano. V. 57.
- Bucer* said that if Thomas's works were suppressed, he could destroy the Church of Rome. I. 472. b. Conjecture upon the pretence there was for accusing him of Judaism. II. 175. a. b. His writing was very bad. IV. 285. a. He endeavours to make out that the sentiments of Luther and Zuinglius concerning the Lord's Supper, were at bottom the same. V. 103. b. Is recommended by Gropper to Herman de Wida, Archbishop of Cologne. III. 240. a. His intimacy with Gropper. ibid. a. b.
- Bucerism*, in what it consisted. II. 171. a. b.
- Buchanan*, the horrible slanders of Garaffe and Barclay against him. II. 181. a. b. 182. a. Whether his political maxims, are not the maxims of the Protestants. ibid. and b. His enemies cannot deny but that he was at least once in his life a Philosopher. 185. b. He is accused of having blackened Queen Mary. 282. a. b.
- Buderus* (William) compared to Badius. I. 601. and a. b. Represents himself as married to two wives. II. 189. b. Makes himself feared. 192. Gives a taste for uniting Polite Literature with the Civil-Law. I. 67. a. How his body was carried to the grave. IV. 845. b. He would have kept William Bigot at Paris, but Castellan prevented it. II. 8. a.
- Budos* (Louise de) wife to the Duke of Montmorency, hearkens to a proposal of marriage before her husband's death. III. 184. b.

Bail,

- Basil*, a bastard son to the Count de Sancerre, murdered at Orleans, by whom and for what. IV. 887. a. b.
- Bayette* (Thomas) falls into the hands of the murderers, at the massacre of Paris. II. 694. a.
- Beiffere*, his letter on the real effects of James Aymar's wand. I. 8. a. b. and n. (71). His letter to the author. 9. a. n. (75).
- Bulgaria*, the Manichean Heresy takes deep root there. IV. 512. a. b.
- Bulgarus*, a lecture which he makes, raises a laugh in the audience. II. 193. and b.
- Bull*, who it was that was devoted by the title of Bull-Carrier. I. 217. a. A Bull where the placing of the words, and the omission of a comma, occasions great obscurity. 607. a. b. One which declares the King of Navarre, to have forfeited the succession only on account of his Heresy. 739. a.
- Bupali Odium* and Bupali Pagna, whether or not they are proverbs, and what they signify. II. 203. a. b.
- Burcard*, his Journal. V. 757. Amply quoted, touching the affair of Savonarola. 63. b. 64. a. b. &c.
- Burdeus* (Peter Areas) an Augustin Monk is hanged and quartered for Adultery and Murder. V. 107. a. b.
- Burs* (Idelette de) Calvin's wife. II. 267. b. Her death. ibid.
- Burgundy* (Adolphus of) a letter which Erasmus writ to him. I. 782. b. He died in the year 1558. ibid.
- Burgundy* (James of) Grandson to Baldwin, a natural son of Philip the Good, turned Protestant. II. 215. a. But taking offence at the disputes between Calvin and Bolsec, he fell off. ibid.
- Burgundy* (John Duke of) after having caused the Duke of Orleans, the brother of Charles VI, to be murdered, is treacherously assassinated himself. II. 462. b. 463. a.
- Burgundy* (the branch of) always confederated with the greatest enemies of the French name. II. 462. b. 463. a. Aggrandizes itself very much. 214. b. The States of the province of Burgundy, resolve to disobey the King's edict. I. 720. a. b.
- Burial* refused from a motive of religious zeal. I. 139. b. 140. a. Was a thing indifferent to Diogenes the Cynic. II. 668. b. 669. a. We should never refuse it to our enemies. IV. 194. b. 195. a.
- Burlis* defended. II. 603. a. b. 604. a.
- Burman* quoted. III. 651. a. n. (67).
- Burnet*, examination of his controversy with Mr Varrillas about Camden's History. II. 283. b. 284. a. What he says of the Protestant Divines who were named to revise the Liturgy of Edward III. — 563. a. b. Makes a convert of the Earl of Rochester, and writes a book upon that head. V. 804. What they make him say concerning this Dictionary, and a confutation of it. 805. His criticism upon Sanders. 43. a. b.
- Burru*, by what argument he dissuaded Nero from divorcing Octavia. III. 794. a.
- Buſbequius*, his letters are a model of writing well for Embassadors. II. 232. a. Quoted. V. 529. b.
- Butas* made Plutarch by frequent correction. II. 237. b.
- Butcher*, whether that word ought to be taken in a literal sense, in Dante's satire against the third race of the Kings of France. II. 296. a. b.
- Butter-women* (the thanks of) it is the name of a satire, which was one of the sequels of the Anti-Coton. III. 207. a.
- Buxoval* very ill received at the Court of Queen Elizabeth, and for what reason. II. 754. a. b.
- Brevius*, whether a good answer has been made to the censurers of his Annals. II. 240. a. b.
- Cadnet* aspires to an alliance with the royal blood, after a Professor's widow had refused to marry him. II. 576. a. b.
- Calculus Apicius*, what that book treats of, and who was the author of it. I. 371. and a. b. 372. a.
- Cajado*, a Portuguese Poet, puts an imposture on the public. III. 215. b. 216. a.
- Cajetan*, his opinion about the formation of women. III. 144. b.
- Caille* (John de la), his mistakes touching Badius. I. 602. b. and Wechel. V. 537. b. 538. a.
- Cayet*, a learned man, and a fool. III. 883.
- Cain*, the occasion of his quarrel with Abel. I. 23. b. 24. a. b. In what manner he killed the latter. ibid. b. Why God took upon himself the immediate cognizance of that murder. II. 247. b. Abundance of fantastical conjectures about the mark which God set upon him. ibid. Reasons for which it is pretended that his offering was rejected by God. 248. a.
- Calamity* (public), exiles who would not return to their native country at such a price. II. 259. a. b. 260. a. b.
- Calais*, how long it was in the hands of the English, and when taken by Henry II. III. 25. a.
- Calanus* makes away with himself in the retinue of Alexander, to shun disgrace. III. 312. IV. 7. a.
- Calagnini* accused of falsehood with regard to Venus. I. 368. b. Attacks Cicero. IV. 69. a. Writes obscene verses. V. 422. a.
- Calchas* dies of vexation, and for what. IV. 253, 254.
- Calderinus* has been undeservedly placed among the witnesses of the truth by the Protestants. II. 252. b.
- Calendar*, see Kalendar.
- Calpin*, his Dictionary composed or corrected without exactness. I. 534. a. Pliny is falsely quoted there about the Lamia. III. 712. b. 713. a. b. The judgment that has been passed on that Dictionary. IV. 586. b. 587. a.
- Calf* (golden); the Rabbins tell us that the powder of that calf which Moses made the children of Israel swallow, stuck upon the beards of those who had worshipped it. I. 1. a. And had almost the same effect as the waters of jealousy. ibid. b.
- Caligula* takes for a reproach an inscription which was made with a design to please him. I. 121. Is charmed with a piece of his own composing. ibid. a. b. The question he asked a Player. 370. and a. b. Surprized in the act of incest with his sister. 358. II. 255. a. b. 702. a. b. His impiety. 255. b. 256. a. And his extravagancies to honour the memory of Drufilla. 703. a. b. He makes away with his coheir. 718. b. 719. a. The Jews refuse to put up his statue in the temple of Jerusalem. I. 374. b. What he said to his brother. 758. b. He restores books which had been suppressed for their invectives. II. 357. a. How he was killed. 359. a. b. At what age he took the virile gown. 702. b. Complains that in his reign there happened no great misfortunes. III. 433. b. Was not superstitious. IV. 7. b. How Macro endeavoured to insinuate himself into his favour. 20. b. 21. a. His ingratitude. ibid. b. and 22. a. b. He said that his mother was sprung from the incestuous embraces of Augustus and Julia. 332. b. In the flower of his youth he falls desperately in love with Ctesonia, who was not young. II. 256. a. b. IV. 695. b. A falsehood touching his nurse, which Guevara affirms, as if he had read it in Dion. II. 339. b. 340. a. His whimsical regard for his horie. IV. 918. a.
- Callimachus* had a maxim that a great book is always a great evil. II. 526. b.
- Callipedia*, what judgment ought to be formed of that poem and its author. IV. 808. a. b.
- Callisthenes*, what Suidas says of him. V. 360. a.
- Calonge*, Barony erected into a Marquise. IV. 866. b.
- Calprenede*, what he says of his Cassandra and Cleopatra. IV. 192. b. Made no memoirs nor collections for his works. V. 444. a.
- Calvary*; it is thought that Adam was buried there. I. 104. b.

C.

- CAbala* finds any thing in every text of Scripture. I. 174. b. 175. a. b. 176. a. b. What it teaches concerning the alliance of the elementary inhabitants with our species. 314. a. Its followers have a great esteem for the book of the creation. 173. a.
- Cacus*, the son of Vulcan; why the Romans said that he cast fire and flame out of his mouth. V. 45. a.

V O L. V.

10 O *

Calvin,

- Calvin*, his quarrel with Baudouin. I. 694. a. b.
Bertelier's testimony against him of no weight. 782.
a. b. 783. a. b. II. 61. b. What weight Bolzec's testimony against him can have. 58. a. b. 59. a.
b. 60. a. b. 61. a. b. He writes letters against Blandrata. 17. a. b. Bucer's letter to him. 173. b.
174. a. b. Being accused of making God the author of sin, he pleads his own cause at Bern, but they came to no decision there about his doctrine.
60. a. He was never in Priest's orders. 260. a.
Did not know that there were two Seneca's. ibid. b.
When and why he published his Institution. 261.
a. 262. a. b. 263. a. Refuses to submit to the regulations made by the Synod of Bern. 264. b.
Commended for not commenting on the Revelations. 265. b. The pleasant stories which they spread about of his devotion for St Hubert. 266.
a. b. His disinterestedness. 269. b. 270. a. His differences with Castilio. 361. b. 362. a. He is upbraided for having too eagerly picked up the flying news which was spread concerning his enemies. 364. a. Has not said much more against the Popes and the court of Rome than Castellan has. 370. b. 371. a. Whether he was ever in England. 663. a. Goes to Paris upon his return from his studies of the law. IV. 318. b. Had severely handled some persons whom the Queen of Navarre protected. 319. b. 320. a. Judges freely of the conduct of Sarah and Abraham. V. 53. b.
54. a. b. 55. b. In speaking of the Eucharist he makes use of phrases which seem to imply a substantial presence. 103. b. n. (47). Calumniated by a Lutheran. 548. b. 549. a. b. His sermons translated into Latin by Claudius Badolet. I. 603. He had been Maturin Cordier's pupil, and dedicates one of his books to him. II. 554. Divers of his books translated by Des Gallars. III. 124. a. b. A demon suggested to him his false glosses on the Scripture. 538. b. 539. a. b. Is not treated as an Arian by Hunnius, who says no more than that his expositions are favourable to the Arians. ibid. His Institution translated into Italian by Giulio Cesare Paschali. IV. 492. See Peter de la Place at Poitiers. 681. a. Messieurs Du Tillet were his pupils. V. 356. a. He disputes at Frankfort with Justus Velsius. 450. b. Some people wrongfully ascribe the Anatomy of the Mals to him. 461. b.
He converts Paul Volsius. 507. What he says about the origin and effects of sin. 822. What God he has introduced, as the Roman Catholics pretend. 824. His advertisement touching the general inventory of relics. II. 274. b. His nephew Prior of the Carmelites at Paris. V. 43. Schul-tingius undertakes to refute his Institution. 86.
His Institution compared to Martyr's Common-Places. ibid. b. The great esteem in which that book is held. ibid. b. 87. a. Abridgments that are made of it. ibid. A supplement to what has been said of its different editions. 87. a. b. 88. c.
How they vary from one another. ibid. a. b. Marlorat composes the indexes of it. 88. a. It has been printed times without number. ibid. b. Faults of the author of the Essais de Litterature touching that Institution. ibid. b. His Geneva Catechism, and a remark upon the date of it. ibid. a.
Calvinism, the author of the True History of Calvinism censured for his minute observations. I. 796.
a. b. Whether Calvinism favours the passions. II.
843. a. b. The judgment which some Lutherans pass upon it. III. 477. a. b. Introduced into Bremen by Hardenberg, and how. 352, 353.
Calvinists, violences that were exercised upon them by the Lutherans. III. 535. a. b. 536. a. Their martyrdom looked upon as a false martyrdom by some Lutherans. 541. b. 542. a. Are falsely accused of designing to establish an equality of conditions. IV. 919. a. b. 920. a. b. The Lutherarans join with the Catholics against them. II.
121.
Calvino-Turcismus cited. I. 789. b. 790. a. 797. a.
Who was the author of that book. V. 275.
a. b.
Calvinus Judaizans, the history of that book. III.
537. a. b.
Calvisius (Sethus) censured as to the time of Ovid's death. IV. 447. a. b.
Calumniator (public), every one that owns himself to be such with respect to things of consequence, should hide himself from the eyes of men. III.
554. b. 555. a.
Calumniators meet with too much indulgence. I. 327.
a. Are capable of putting in practice the most shameful artifices. 393. b. 394. a. The best way to be revenged of them sometimes is to return them no answer. 784. b. The way to discover them.
795. a. b. Their knavish tricks. 714. b. 715. a.
There are several Escobar's and Banni's who absolve them. II. 154. a. Policy finds its interests in letting them go unpunished sometimes. 626. b. 627. a.
A good saying of Simonides touching calumniators.
726. b. How they were treated in the time of Gregory I. III. 221. b. 222. a. How they must be silenced. IV. 25. a. b. They have nothing to fear when they are powerful. 351. a. b. 352. a.
Bring those whom they calumniate into great trouble sometimes. V. 249. a. b. 250. a. Calumniators on the score of hereby, they seldom receive the punishment which they deserve. 512. b.
Calumny, its spirit. I. 393. b. In what case calumny should be left unanswered and despised. 491.
b. Such as are easily refuted do service to those they were designed to defame. 727. b. 728. a.
Plain and diabolical calumnies which have nevertheless turned to the advantage of those that were the authors of them. III. 90. b. 91. a. b. Advantages drawn from them in religious disputes. IV.
101. b. What thoughts calumny raised in St Basil. V. 102. b. Peoples readiness to believe it.
103. a.
Calceoglia (Vincent), a Physician at Brescia, publishes a book, which is confuted by Donzellinus.
II. 689.
Cambyses, to what he compares new stratagems of war.
I. 129. a. b.
Cambis eats his wife, and then kills himself. IV.
563. a. b.
Cambry, a powerful league formed against the Venetians there. III. 811. a.
Camden, his testimony concerning Buchanan's repentance is not altogether solid. II. 182. b. 183. a.
But preferable at the same time to that of Mr du Puy related by Varillas. ibid. a. The praises that have been bestowed upon him. 279. b. 280. a.
A gentleman breaks off the nose of his statue. 284. b.
In what manner part of the memoirs he made use of were lost. ibid. and 285. a. b.
Camleon, who is the author of the book which treats of the occult qualities of that animal. II.
639. b.
Cameli, the Turks have a great veneration for them.
IV. 40. b. According to these a certain camel will rise again. 41. a.
Camener (Timan) proposed by Alexander Hegius, and chosen director of the school at Munster. II.
242.
Camerrarius (Joachim) changes the state of the question in defending Herodotus, who attributes envy and jealousy to God. IV. 575. a. b.
Camerrarius (Philip) does not find it likely that Francis I. deliberated in his council whether he should make Charles V. prisoner or not. II.
437. b.
Cameron, his conference with Tilenus. II. 285. b.
286. a. What he got by preaching up Passive Obedience. ibid. and b. Thought that many things in the Reformed Church wanted a farther reformation. 288. a. b. It was from him Mr Amy-raut had the doctrine of Universal Grace. ibid. b.
289. a.
Camillus, the greatest action of his life. II. 290.
His descendants lived in obscurity. ibid. b. 291.
a. b. Whether it be true, that he forced the Gauls to restore the money which had been given to them, when they besieged the capitol. 709.
Camillus (Ovinus) having aspired to the empire, is associated to it by Alexander Severus, and begs it as a favour that he may have leave to resign. II.
770. a. b. Is killed. ibid. b.
Campognelle (Madam de), Babzac's niece, the history of her marriage. I. 622. b. 623. a. b.
Campanella; his city of the sun. III. 545. a. b.
Campanus (John) makes the peasants of Juliers believe that the end of the world was near. V. 238.
a. b.
Campbel (Alexander), a Dominican, his tragical end.
I. 221. a.
Campion,

- Campion*, his dispute with Whitakers. III. 940. a. b. 941. a. b.
- Campi* (the Abbot of), his dissertation upon medals. V. 122. a. b.
- Camus* (John-Peter), Bishop of Belley, what he says of the episcopal see of that town. I. 737. b. 738. a. b. His differences with the Monks of that diocese. ibid.
- Cana* (marriage of), who were the two betrothed persons. III. 577. a. b. And whether they consummated the marriage. ibid.
- Canabius*, what virtue that fountain had. III. 636. a. b.
- Candale* (the Duke of) challenged by Cerifantes. II. 408. a. b.
- Canibals*; the cruelty of canibals was exercised in America. III. 774. a.
- Canonizations*, the vast expence made at them. III. 330. a. b.
- Canons* (gospel) to whom the invention of them is to be ascribed. I. 269. b. The difference between them and the harmony of Ammonius. ibid.
- Canst* (Father) his false quotation with respect to Lucius Cassius. II. 345. a. b.
- Canterbury* (St Thomas, Archbishop of), his persecutor becomes his votary. III. 797. b.
- Canterus* (Andrew) was a prodigy of learning in his younger years. III. 217. b.
- Capilupi*, his Cento Virgilianus. V. 770. b.
- Capistran* (a Franciscan) obliges the Jews to wear the letter Thau. IV. 309. b.
- Capitals* or large Greek letters, who brought them again into use. III. 732.
- Capitol*, the dogs who guarded it were not to bark in the day-time, at those who came to pay their devotions in the temple. I. 773. b. Application of this to mythical dogs. ibid.
- Capitulation*; the sudden news of one coming after a great many false misrepresentations aggravates the disgust which people have at being imposed upon. III. 719. b. Should not be granted to those whom there is a design to punish. IV. 278. b.
- Cappadocia*, at what time it became a province of the Roman empire. I. 423. a.
- Cappadocians* very superstitious. II. 304. a.
- Cappel* (William) translates Machiavel's Prince. IV. 15. a. a. (59).
- Caprea*, the leaps of that island immortalized. IV. 19. a. b.
- Captains*, what qualities they must have in order to succeed in great enterprises. II. 413. a. b. 414. a. Several have dreaded the sovereign judge of the world, upon remembering the blood that they had shed in wars which they thought just. 417. a. Some Captains branded with infamy, and for what reason. III. 284. There are some who love their pleasures, but who love glory still more. IV. 414. a. V. 271. a. b. 272. a. b.
- Capuchins*, when that order of Monks commenced. IV. 386. a. b. How far Pope Paul III was incensed against the whole order, and for what reason. 388. b. A charge of forgery which proved unfortunate to the Capuchins of Paris. III. 896. a. b.
- Caracalla*, a perfidious action of his, which may be looked upon as the model of the St Bartholomew. I. 513. It is not true that he married his step-mother. III. 604. b. 605. a. b. 606. a. He was no less Julia's son than Geta. 606. a. He puts four Vestals to death, one of whom he had enjoyed. 605. b. Kills his brother Geta in the arms of his mother. 605. When, and upon what occasion, he was proclaimed by the soldiers an associate to the empire. 607. b. How far his zeal for Alexander the Great went. IV. 7. b.
- Carben* (Victor de), a Rabbin converted to Christianity. V. 540. a. b. 541. a.
- Cardan*, there are according to him twelve sublime geniuses who have excelled in the sciences. I. 191. a. His heaviest misfortunes. II. 315. b. He was rather a superstitious man, than an hardy unbeliever. ibid. Had more of the Fanatic in him than the Atheist. 316. a. A madman. 321. a. He abstained from nourishment, that his prediction might prove true. 320. b. What he says of the Magic schools that had been in Spain. IV. 725. b. His ingenuity. II. 7. 8. His disputes with Tartaglia. V. 297. and a.
- Cardinal* of quality, a competent judge in the affair of beauty. I. 399. a. Why there are so few Cardinals in the catalogue of Saints according to Bellarmine. 732. b. They are very seldom quite unanimous in the election of Popes. II. 472. Begin to be luxurious. 860. and b. 861. a. b.
- Cardinals*; the Pope shuts the mouths of the new Cardinals, and opens them again in another consistory. IV. 284. b. n. (5). Obligated by Paul II to sign bulls and decrees which they were wholly ignorant of. 511. a. b.
- Cariani* were the first who set crests on their helmets. IV. 790. a. b.
- Carls* (Don), a book wrote concerning his stubbornness, caprice, whims, and maggots. II. 96. a.
- Carmel*, the oracle of the god so called. V. 466. b. 467. a. b.
- Carmelite-Nuns* introduced into France. I. 785. a. Their direction given to the superior of the oratory. ibid. The Monks of the same order who wanted the direction of them, clamour loudly. ibid. Certain Carmelite-Nuns intermeddle with the political differences of Richelieu and Berulle. 786. a.
- Carmelites* (Friars), upon what they ground the antiquity of their order. V. 466. b. 467. a. b. They libel Cardinal Berulle. I. 785. a. A narrative of that quarrel. ibid. b. 786. a.
- Carnades* censures a common-place of consolation; his objections answered. I. 280. b. He limits in some degree the doctrine of incomprehensibility which Arcefilas taught. 410. b. Is very ill used by Numerius. II. 327. a. b. Had doctrines for his friends, and others for his scholars. ibid. a. It was impossible to discover what he thought the most probable. ibid. 334. b. It is said that the sun was darkened at the time of his death. 335. b. What he said of Chrysippus. 486. a. b. He entirely demolishes an invention of Chrysippus. 494. a. b. In what manner he used to joke, when he happened to fall upon any subtle disputes. 675. a. Whether he philosophized at the same time with Epicurus. 777. a. How he explained human liberty. 792. b. He argued against justice. 330. a. b. IV. 752. a.
- Carnival*, to continue it to the first Sunday in Lent, one needs only go to Milan. V. 778. b.
- Caroli*, some of his tricks. III. 15. a. b.
- Carpenterations*, they pretended to have the image of Jesus Christ, which was procured by Pilate. I. 472. a.
- Carrauca*, his being suspected of heresy gave ground for suspecting Charles V of the same thing. II. 336. a. b. Reflexion on the justice which the people did to his memory. 337. a. b.
- Carroufeli*, a law which is observed in them. III. 302. b.
- Carula*, a town in Italy, at this day called Cascina. IV. 713. b. n. (66).
- Carulanus* (Martinus), the same with Martinus Polonus. IV. 713. b.
- Cartesianism*, what retards the progress of it. I. 472. b. Involved in Theological disputes. II. 696. a. b. 697. a. Introduced into the schools by Wittichius. V. 564. Which procured him a great number of opponents. ibid. It is the least in favour with the great and powerful in Holland. ibid.
- Cartesians*, the judgment which la Bourignon passes on their principles. II. 111. b. The ablest among them are obliged to admit of mediate intelligences. 251. a. b. An explication of the doctrine of some of them concerning the formation of bodies. ibid. A Cartesian called learned, for saying that this proposition two and two make four, admits of no difficulty. 389. b. The arguments of these Philosophers against substantial forms prove too much. V. 116. b. Their principle for proving the immortality of the soul is not evident to all the world. IV. 717. b. 718. a. b. Et seq. What incommodes them most in the system of Automata. 908. b. 909. a. b. Et seq. 912. b. 913. a. b. The advantage which they give to the Pyrrhonists. 654. a.
- Cartage* built an hundred and twenty-six years after the temple of Solomon. IV. 642.
- Cartaginians*, who was the first of all the Romans that beat them at sea. II. 726.
- Carthusians*; the pleasant answer which a Carthusian made to Philip de Comines. III. 223. a. Carthusians fined in two thousand pistoles by whom, and for what. 541. b.

Cartigni,

- Cartigni*, a demoniac in Savoy, who was tried in sixteen languages. III. 211. b.
- Cart-load*; whether a cart-load of skins was the source of the war between the Duke of Burgundy and the Swiss. II. 219. a.
- Carvial* (Cardinal) is the only one that withstands Paul II. Who obliged the Cardinals to sign bulls and decrees which they had never seen. IV. 511. b.
- Casa* (John de la), why the Protestants have exclaimed so much against his verses. IV. 235. a. He writes against Vergerius, and why. 410. a. What he aimed at in his abominable Capitolo del Forno. V. 422. a. b. Many have condemned it, without reading it. 423. a. A poem which he addresses to the Germans. 458. a. His book against Vergerius. ibid. a. b. &c.
- Casaubon* (Isaac), a considerable omission of his. I. 519. b. His conjecture on a passage of Strabo approved. II. 632. a. b. He wrongfully censures Xiphilin touching Hadrian's Genealogy. III. 316. b. Had freed himself from the slavery of writing over and blotting out. IV. 85. b. Contradicts the great Julius Scaliger, but at the same time humbles himself with respect at the foot of his throne. 597. b. 598. a. His opinion about the four verses that are ascribed to Nero, is very odd. 596. a. Justly censured with respect to the place of Pyrrhus's burial. 660. b. Is cruelly taken to pieces in a satire. V. 98. a. b. Laughs at the fable of the She-Pope. IV. 739. b. 740. a. Blames St Chrysostome for telling obscene stories. V. 852. and a. b. Is himself censured in his turn. ibid. &c.
- Casaubon* (Meric), his observation on Homer with respect to the good and evil that there is in nature. V. 576. b. In what respect he considered Euripides as an inspired writer. ibid.
- Caselius*, Professor at Helmstadt; those who had an eye to Ecclesiastical preferments, durst not study under him. IV. 772. a. b.
- Caspian Sea* taken for the Pontus Euxinus. IV. 678. a.
- Cassander*, his consultation. I. 691. b. 692. a. Composes a Latin discourse, which is the origin of a very sharp quarrel. 694. a. b. 695. a. From whom he took his conciliating spirit. V. 551.
- Cassini* commissioned to find means for preventing the inundations of the Chiana. V. 499. a. b.
- Cassini* (Samuel de) calumniates the Vaudois. IV. 916. b.
- Cassius* (Lucius), his tribunal was called the rock of the accused. I. 351. II. 345. and a. His maxim cui bono. 345, 346. and b. 347. a. His severity gave occasion to all rigid judges being styled Cassiani. ibid. a. b.
- Cassius Longinus* (Caius) harangues his soldiers. II. 350. b.
- Cassius Severus* (Titus) took pleasure in accusing people. II. 356. b. Gave occasion to the law which Augustus made against defamatory libels. V. 743.
- Cassock*: one ought never to despise a man in a cassock, how low an object soever he may seem. I. 361.
- Cassolus* could not answer the question that was put to him. I. 616. a.
- Castalo* disguised under the name of Martinus Bellius, wrote against punishing Heretics. I. 789. a. b. Broached some very singular opinions. II. 360. b. Gave signal examples of moderation. 364. b. His extreme poverty. 365. b. 366. a. Whether he be the author of a dialogue against the right which is allowed to the Civil Magistrate, of putting Heretics to death. V. 167. a. b. His differences with Calvin more particularly related in the French life of Calvin than in the Latin one. II. 274. b.
- Castellan*, a pleasant answer which he made to Francis I. who asked him if he was a gentleman. II. 367. a. b. Gets his landlord's daughter with child. 369. b. 370. a. b. His application to study was surprising. ibid. b. He did not stay long at Rome, and the reason of it. ibid. and 371. a. Was of opinion that indulgence should be used towards inquisitors and informers. 372. a. b. How he checked a Cardinal for the reproaches he had cast upon him with respect to Dolet. 683. b. 684. a. What he said of Astrology. 401. a. b.
- Castellan* (John), an account of his martyrdom wrote by Lambert. III. 708.
- Castello* (James de) was of such a small stature that Pope Boniface VIII ordered him to rise, thinking he was upon his knees. I. 326.
- Castile*, when, and on what occasion, the Kings of that country began to lay hands on the Ecclesiastical revenues. II. 378. a. And who was the first that permitted all the public acts to be drawn up in the vulgar tongue. 379. Disorders occasioned in that kingdom by a dream which a woman had. IV. 456. a.
- Castor and Pollux* make an inroad into Attica. I. 52. a.
- Castor*; whether the Castor who composed many books, be the same with the son-in-law of Dejoctarus. II. 630. b. 631. a. Three reasons for the negative. ibid. There was another Castor besides, who was an excellent Botanist. 631. b.
- Castrate*; persons who castrated themselves out of complaisance. II. 535. and a. b.
- Castration*, the punishment that was inflicted on adulterers. III. 74. a. b. What other persons were condemned to it. 77. a.
- Castritius*, his answer to the Consul Carbo was like that which had been made by some others. II. 384. and b. The meaning of that answer. ibid.
- Castro* (Alphonus de) censured for two reasons, with respect to Damascus and the time in which he lived. II. 586. a.
- Castro* (Roderigo à) seconds Marinello in the composition of his book on the diseases of women. IV. 148. a. b.
- Castrocaro* persecutes the Vaudois. III. 757, 758.
- Casulists*, a doubt proposed to them on an Anatomical curiosity. I. 109. a. They are obliged to treat of subjects full of obscenity, in order to solve cases of conscience. 182. a. Their books testify that there are married women who make use of drugs to cause abortion. II. 314. b. Their books contain the art of cavilling with God. III. 894. b. Nothing that concerns matrimonial causes escapes their curiosity. V. 40. b. 41. a. b. Loofe Casulists take a great advantage of Abraham's conduct with regard to Sarah. 51. a. Write down minutely all kinds of immodesty, which they only know by the report of vicious men. III. 135. b. Are obliged to write or say things which are shocking to modesty. V. 853.
- Casus Regius*: whether that book be justly ascribed to the Abbot de St Cyran. V. 15. b. 16. a.
- Cat*. A pension left to a cat, and a famous law-suit about it. IV. 918. b.
- Catalani*, what they did to obtain from heaven the recovery of Mr de Marca. IV. 100. b.
- Catalogue* of the witnesses of the truth, by whom collected. I. 165. b. The occasion of that book. III. 560. a. b.
- Catalogues of Heretics*, the writers of them follow one another like sheep. I. 760. b.
- Catalonia*, Lewis Meplede's book concerning the right which the crown of France has to that province. IV. 199. a.
- Catechism* explained according to the method of Aristotle's Categories. I. 472. a.
- Catechism of Calvin* criticized by John d'Espagne. II. 837. a. b. Does not differ much, in explaining the Eucharist, from the opinion of J. Poinet, who admits a Real Presence, but which is no more than sacramental at the same time. IV. 693. b. The date of it. V. 88. a.
- Categoriet*, a question concerning them. V. 436. a.
- Catherine de Medicis*, her conferences with the Duke of Alba. I. 119. a. b. Her terrible rebuke to Amyot. 258. a. Her own artifices played against her. III. 419. b. The answer which Henry the Great made to her one day. 422. a. It is said that she made Machiavel's Prince her peculiar study. IV. 15. and b. 16. a. A letter that was wrote to her. 160. a. b. 161. a. b. Fables uttered in her Funeral Oration. V. 36. a. Reflexion upon her conduct. 255. a. Her insensibility with regard to slanders. 760, 761. A maxim ascribed to her. 750. See Medicis.
- Catherine de Navarre*, sister to Henry the Great, refuses to marry with the condition of going to Mass. IV. 330. a. b. Found no great satisfaction in her marriage. ibid. 331. a. She continues steadfast in her religion. ibid.
- Catholic*: of what Prince it was said, that he was a good Catholic, but a very bad Christian. III. 809. b.
- Catholicism*

- Catholicism*; who was the first that made use of that word for the title of a Dictionary. I. 614. b.
- Catholicon*, a passage from that book; describing a procession of the League. IV. 243. b.
- Catholics* and Protestants reproach each other with having Adamites among them. I. 712. and a. b. Several Roman Catholics have all their life-time made profession of the Catholic religion, although they wished for a reformation in many things. 659. They are not at all scrupulous when the question is about the conquests which they make upon the Protestants. II. 246. b. What their making the sign of the cross serves for. 616. b. English Catholics, their threatenings and imprecations against their country. III. 521. b. The reason of ringing a bell at noon in Roman Catholic countries. IV. 50. a. The free exercise of their religion is promised them in Holland. III. 675. a.
- Catiline*, by what means his conspiracy began to be discovered. III. 112. b. 113. a. How we may suppose him to have passed for one of Fulvia's husbands. 112. b.
- Catinat* (Mr de) did not raise the siege of Sufa, on the contrary he took it, and kept it till the peace. IV. 210. b. Was not beaten at Coni. ibid. 211. a. Gains the battle of Marlaglia. ibid. It is false that he was forced by the allies, to return beyond the Alps. ibid.
- Cato* the Censor expels one Manlius from the senate, and why. I. 40. b. What he said in order to deprive Ilocrates's school. 615. a. It is said that no one durst ask an unjust thing of him. II. 27. a. b. The offers which he made to King Ptolomy, in order to engage him to surrender up the island of Cyprus to the Romans. 507. The respect which the people shewed him, at the Floral Games, and Martial's railery. III. 54. a. He harangues vehemently against the liberty which the women took of running in crowds. IV. 769. b. The judgment he passed upon the three Philosophers that came Embassadors from Athens. II. 329. b. And why he advised them to be sent back immediately. ibid. and IV. 751. b. 752. a. His Origines. 750. a. b. His contempt for all the Greek literature. 751. b. He is blamed for indulging the lewdness of his Domestics. 754. a. His usury. ibid. and. b. He is rallied. V. 434. a.
- Cato Uticensis* says that God does not hear the prayers of the slothful. I. 94. b. Desired rather to be an honest man, than to seem so. II. 420. b. 421. a. Part of his History. IV. 745. a. b. 746. a. His surprize at a letter which he read. V. 123. a. b. He censures Caesar's opinion touching the punishment of bad men; but he only does it indirectly and with moderation. II. 418. a.
- Catibo* (Angelo) his gift of prophecy. II. 391. b. 392. a. Reflexions on that head. ibid. a. b. 393. a.
- Catullus* writes verses against Caesar. IV. 88. a. b.
- Caucasus* (Mount) why so called. II. 82. b.
- Cave* (William) treats the story of Pope Joan as a mere fable, and maintains that it has been thrust into the chronicle of Martin Polonus, by another hand. IV. 709. a.
- Cavern*: what use the Lacedemonians made of a cavern near the mountain Taygetus. III. 965. a. b.
- Cause*, the Schoolmen plagued themselves to assign a cause for every effect. II. 227. a.
- Cause* (First) the doctrine of some Philosophers concerning it. II. 672. a. b. 673. a. b.
- Cause*, some are very easily defended, though the Defendant be a little in the wrong. I. 391. b. The best may be lost in certain circumstances. IV. 852. b. 853. a. Some causes which bear the name of ludicrous. 799. a. b. 802. a. b.
- Cause* (Occasional) whether the Devil makes use of the staff as an occasional cause. I. 4. b. Reflexion upon the Hypothesis of occasional causes. II. 251. a. b. Its use. 767. b. There is no Hypothesis more capable of giving an account of events. IV. 690. a. May be of some use towards accounting for dreams. 72. a. And explaining the Phenomena relating to bodies. 94. b. Whether they produced the miracles of the ancient law. 609. a. b. This system does not bring in God acting miraculously. 914. b. Whether it can be of any use towards resolving some difficulties touching Providence. V. 371. a. b. 372. a.
- Causin*, to what he compares St Paul and St Augustin. V O L. V.
- Celso*, his sympathy with the sun. II. 402. b. And Henry the fourth's prognostication concerning him. ibid. and 403. a. He gives us the long particulars of a story all taken out of his own head. III. 19. b. 20. d. Condemns a censure of Longin. V. 328. b. 329. a.
- Cea*, the inhabitants of that island place Aristeus, son to Apollo, in the number of the gods. I. 456. a. See Zia.
- Cedrenus*, mistaking Xiphilin's meaning falls into a gross error, touching Hadrian's extradition. III. 316. b.
- Ceylon*, a comical opinion of the inhabitants of that island, touching the tears of Eve. I. 23. a. A mountain of that island, called the Peak of Adam, and for what reason. 104. a.
- Celestin* III, what he did to shew that he could give the Imperial crown to whom he pleased. III. 394. a.
- Celibacy*; Agrippa declaimed against the law of Celibacy. I. 156. b. That law has terrible consequences, and is an inexhaustible source of imparities and disorders. II. 554. b. 588. a. b. III. 13. b. 14. a. b. 224. b. 225. a. b. IV. 240. and a. b. The vow of Celibacy is rash. III. 13. b. The number of Clergymen who cannot bear the yoke of it is innumerable. 235. a. Whether Philosophers ought to prefer it to marriage. 382. b. Whether it be possible to be observed. 595. a. b. The suppression of Celibacy was very inconvenient to the great Protestant Lords in Germany. 727. b. Cannot be defended by the disorders of some married persons. V. 425. b. 426. a. Joseph Hall disputes upon that subject. 344. a. b. 345. a. A curious passage of the History of Huldric Mutius on the same subject. IV. 296. a. b. 297. a. Passages from others to the like purpose. 411. a. b.
- Celsus* laughs at the Christians, and at their Do not examine, only believe. V. 816. Confuted by Origen ibid. and 817.
- Celsus*, has raised beasts above men. IV. 911. b.
- Celte*, whence so called. III. 433. a.
- Celtes* (Conrad) there were some famous Latin Poets in Germany before him. III. 724. and b.
- Cenalis* (Robert) his judgment on John Bouchet's Annals of Aquitain. II. 103. a.
- Centaurs*, killed in the quarrel between the Centaurs and Lapithæ. I. 537. a.
- Censor*. He who is very guilty, himself ought not to set up for a Censor. 210. b.
- Censors of Books*, their little attention. I. 101. a. They detain manuscripts too long, and strike many things out of them. II. 809. a.
- Censure*; the inclination which people have for censure. I. 696. a. Censures that are gross and indiscreet, produce very bad consequences. 377. b. The inconveniences which attend those Censures, which fall upon a multitude of propositions, in a loose and indeterminate manner, and without particularizing each proposition. 340. a. 607. a. The fatal effects of it, when it is ill managed. III. 464. a. b. 465. a. b.
- Centula*, city, why so called. I. 10. a.
- Centuriators of Magdeburg*, what they relate touching Gregory the Great, deserves no credit. III. 224. b. 225. a. b. &c. How they were treated. 600. b. Some facts which concern their work. 560. b. 561. a. b. & seq. Their Epistle Dedicatory to Queen Elizabeth. 562. a. b. 563. a. b.
- Century*, the XVth and XVIIth, compared in point of learning. I. 92. b. 220. b. 221. a. b.
- Cepio* favours the Knights cause against the pretensions of the Senate. II. 711. b.
- Ceramica*; there was in Athens, a fine street, and likewise a suburb, which were called by that name, but for different reasons. IV. 343. b.
- Cerdagne*, taken for the island of Sardinia, by a learned Civilian. II. 464. b.
- Ceremonies* (Sacred) ought not to be divulged. III. 216. b. It is better to hear with them, than to remember the Church. 343. a. b.
- Ceres*, for what benefactions the world stood indebted to her. V. 333. a. In what manner her feast called Thesmophoria, was celebrated. ibid. b. How Baubo cured her of her melancholy. 336. a. b. And what was the consequence of that. ibid.
- Cerrigo*. See Cybera.

- Crispianus* has wrote some very pretty Latin verses, which are quoted by Menage. III. 102. b. n. (18).
- Cervantes* (Michael) his novels translated by d'Audiguer. I. 548. a.
- Cesar* (Augustus) owes the greatest part of his glory to the interest he had among the learned men of his Court. V. 660.
- Cesar* (Julius) whether that which Valerius Maximus relates concerning Accius, ought to be applied to him. I. 59. a. Was a Poet when very young. ibid. His soul supposed to have been changed into a star. 348. b. He deserved death, but it was not the business of three or four private persons, to undertake to punish him. II. 165. b. What weapons his murderers made use of to kill him, and with what weapons they were killed themselves. 349. a. Valerius Maximus is the only Historian who speaks of his apparition to Cassius. ibid. b. Whether he ever returned into Gaul after the passage of the Rubicon. 304. b. An instance of his moderation. ibid. a. Whether some others in the like situation could have done what he did. 414. a. b. The three celebrated words which he wrote to a friend. 415. b. Different judgments on his Commentaries. 417. b. 418. a. Some facts relating to the same book. 425. a. b. Who was the first that published it in Greek. III. 620. and a. He does not vouchsafe to rise up to the Senate. II. 421. b. 422. a. b. V. 399. a. Attempts of his favourites to procure him the title of King. II. 420. a. Why he gave no decision in Dejotarus's cause. 626. a. b. 627. a. Said he had nothing to fear from such fat and well-dressed men as Dolabella and Marc Antony. 679. b. What sort of friends he made choice of, according to Cicero. 680. a. The effect which Cicero's oration for Ligarius had upon him. III. 831. b. He is too fond of discoursing upon the profession of others. 871. a. Seizes upon the treasure which was kept in the temple of Saturn. IV. 204. b. 205. a. b. Suppresses that action in his History. ibid. Makes Pompey his son-in-law. 281. a. Was wont to forget nothing but injuries. 488. b. n. (48). Receives a love-letter in the Senate-house. V. 123. b. Indulged his soldiers in all manner of debauchery after a great victory. 271. a. Withed for a sudden death. 439. b. The Arvernii shewed his sword hung up in one of their temples. II. 419. b. His Commentaries translated and commented on by Vigenere. I. 631. a. A parallel drawn between him and Henry IV. by Antony de Baudouin. ibid.
- Cesarinus*, a letter of St Chrysostome to that Monk. II. 5. b.
- Cest-Sancy*, on what terms he married the Countess de Moret. III. 266. a. b.
- Cesonia*, Caligula's wife, facts that concern her. II. 256. a. b.
- Cervantes*: it was falsely affirmed that the Count de Souches, was born there. V. 192.
- Chabot* (Joan) publicly professes the Protestant religion without quitting the habit of a Nun. IV. 470.
- Chains*: why Kings were loaded with Chains of gold or silver. I. 516. b.
- Chaise* (Father de la) a satire against him. I. 343. a. b. 344. a.
- Chakondyle* has spoke of the Bohemians from very bad authority. II. 298. a.
- Challenges* of a remarkable kind. II. 208. a. b.
- Chamber-maid*: a young fellow in the disguise of a Chamber-maid. I. 405.
- Chambers of the Edit*, when granted to the Huguenots. III. 156. b.
- Chambers of Meditations*: places into which the Jesuits carry the greatest sinners. &c. II. 457. a. Described. ibid.
- Chambre* (the Abbot de la) what he took for his text in the funeral oration on the French Queen. III. 601. b.
- Chamier* dies like Zuinglius, with his sword in his hand. II. 432. a. b. 433. a. His character. ibid. and b.
- Champion des Dames*, who was the author of that Poem. III. 77.
- Chanaan*, the cause of his wickedness, and the first symptoms of it. II. 431. b.
- Change*: we ought to continue in the communion we were brought up in, unless we can be gainers by the change. IV. 375. a.
- Changes in point of belief*, proved by authentic facts. IV. 737. a. Maintained to be impossible by the Roman Controversists, with regard to the Escharist, by Messieurs de Port-Royal, and with regard to all the articles of Faith by Langevin. ibid. n. (150).
- Change*; that land is in Burgundy. II. 435. b.
- Chantrelle*, Queen Margaret's gallant. V. 529. b. 530. a.
- Chaos*, who was the first of the Philosophers that supposed an Intelligence to reduce it into form. I. 299. a. b. 300. a. b. The ancient Philosophers went back as far as the Chaos, and the first original of all things. 302. a. b. 303. a. Whether the ideas of the Antients, who have mentioned the Chaos are just, and whether they could pretend with any show of reason, that this state subsisted no longer. 304. 305. 306. IV. 434. b. as far as 442. b. Different significations of that word. V. 323. a. b. &c. What it was according to Plato. 634. b.
- Chapelet du S. Sacrement*: a piece composed by a filter of Antony Arnauld, ascribed to the Abbot de St Cyrano, and condemned by the Sorbonne. V. 16. and b.
- Chapter of Paris*, its tyrannical treatment of the Parlement punished. II. 383. a. b. When those kind of enfranchisings became very common. ibid. b.
- Chapman* (Samuel) quoted. III. 93. a. Convinced Mr Jurieu of having reflected on the Dutch, very little less than Tavernier has done. V. 300. a.
- Character*. The true Character of turbulent zealots. I. 716. a. b.
- Character* (Round) in Printing; who was the first that brought them into France. I. 600. a.
- Charenton*, its national synod of 1631, charges its Deputies not to deliver their speech to the King on their knees, but standing as the Clergy of the kingdom do. I. 261. a. After a long contest, an audience is obtained in the manner it was desired. ibid. Fruidefs attempts to set up a college there. II. 686. On what occasion their was preaching in the church-yard of Charenton. 695. b. 696. a.
- Charicles* disgraces himself by his conduct, with respect to Pythonice's tomb. III. 357. a.
- Chariot* (Triumphal) drawn by four white horses, was looked upon by the Romans, as a thing peculiarly sacred to the sovereign of the gods. II. 290. a.
- Chariots* (falling) invented by Stevin; Grotius writes a Poem on that subject. V. 236. and b.
- Charivari* (or Mock-Music) which was given to a woman that was married again immediately after the death of her husband, authorized by law. II. 104. a. Approved of by a great many Lawyers. ibid. n. (3). Disapproved of by Faber and Chaffancu. ibid. n. (3).
- Charlemagne*, his life ascribed to Plutarch by Wicelius. I. 57. How that Emperor discovered his daughter's intrigue with his Secretary, and in what manner he behaved after the discovery. II. 744. b. 745. a. Whether he created the Peers of France. III. 336. a. The book which John du Tillet published under his name, is as old as his time at least. A dispute on that head. V. 355. a. b. 356. a.
- Charles*, Duke of Sudermania, declared King of Sweden, by the States of the Kingdom. V. 652. Proposes to the King of Denmark, that they should terminate their quarrel by a duel. 653.
- Charles V*, whether he made use of the counsels of Agrippa. I. 152. a. Accuses the Princes and States of the Empire, Henry II, of having entered into a League with Soliman. 407. a. b. Agrees with the Pope to accuse him in full council. ibid. a. An excellent saying of his. 587. a. He discovers to Philip II the true birth of Don John, and charges him to acknowledge him as his brother. 587. and a. b. What he said of Languey's pen. 720. a. What occasioned people to say that he died a Lutheran. II. 336. a. b. 440. a. b. He offers to fight Francis I, in single combat. 437. a. Whether he was very chaste. 442. a. b. Who assisted at his last moments. 336. a. And with what sentiments he died. ibid. Facts concerning his confessor. ibid. and b. The reason of his being preferred to his competitor for the empire. 435. b. 436. a. By what intrigues he prevented his being stopped at the Court of Francis I. 841. a. And reduced the Court of France to strange extremities. ibid. b. 842. a. Of which he did not know how to make a proper use. 841. b. His impostures against Francis I, produce all the effect that he could expect from them. III. 90. b. 91. a. b. &c. He repents of having neglected the Latin tongue. 223.

323. a. b. Does violence to nature two different ways in two marriages. 966. a. A Lord in the Low-Countries blew up the house where he had entertained that Emperor. IV. 40. b. A generous action of his. III. 950. b. He takes possession of the Milanese. V. 129. a. Subdues Constance. II. 551. What it was that chiefly traversed his design of an universal monarchy. V. 671. He was somewhat too late in pacifying the differences in point of religion. 672.
- Charles VI*, King of France, the misery and disorder of France under that Prince. II. 213. b. 214. a.
- Charles VII*, King of France, the bad reputation of the Queen his mother. II. 209. a. b. A sentence passed against him. 210. a. b. 211. a. He makes a kind of Amende honorable. 212. a. b. 213. a. If he had had courage and genius enough, he never would have prostituted his honour as he did. 213. b. What Mezerai says of him. III. 798. b.
- Charles VIII*, King of France; Haillan gives out that he was supposititious. III. 337. a. His education. 799. a. He was extremely infirm both in body and mind; and the reason of his being so. 813. a. b. Before his time the Pox was unknown in France. IV. 574. a. A Surgeon kneels before his statue, and for what reason. ibid. Savonarola had prophesied that he should return into Italy. V. 59, 60. That Monk's affection to him, and the reason of it. 72. His death. 58. b. 60. a. It contributed nothing towards Savonarola's downfall. 58. b. His expedition looked upon as one of the greatest misfortunes that ever befel Italy. 60. a. Savonarola exhorts him by letters to return into Italy. 70. b.
- Charles IX*, King of France, what he said to the Admiral de Coligni. I. 14. a. b. He harangues his Parliament with a courageous and threatening boldness. 256. a. III. 512. b. Does not esteem Amyot's Poetry. I. 259. a. And reproaches him with his avarice. 256. a. To whom he owed his ill qualities. II. 509. a. His policy with respect to Poets. 617. b. And witty authors. IV. 894. b. Threatens the King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé. III. 418. a. b. Did himself, from his chamber-window, fire upon the Huguenots that were flying from the massacre. IV. 471. a. It was unjustly laid to his charge that he did not love women. V. 392. a. b. 393. a. b.
- Charles X*, pretended King of France: what the League did for him against Henry IV. IV. 730. a.
- Charles I*, King of England; his death being imputed to the Presbyterian party, occasions the drawing of a thousand odious consequences against the Protestants of France. I. 265. a. His execution condemned by several Protestant writers. III. 426. a. He is supposed to have died a member of the Romish Church, in a book that was dedicated to his son. IV. 215. b. Was not the author of a book which was ascribed to him. 221. a. b. See. His Prayer in the Time of Captivity. 222. b. 223. a.
- Charles II*, King of England, papers that were found in his strong-box concerning the controversy between the Protestants and the Church of Rome. II. 700. b. A book which was dedicated to him by Milletiere. IV. 215. a.
- Charles II*, King of Spain, to what his recovery was ascribed. IV. 355. a.
- Charles*, Duke of Calabria, enjoins a Neapolitan gentleman to maintain an old horse which he had abandoned, after having received considerable services from him. IV. 918. b.
- Charlevoix*, what snares were laid to ruin him. III. 265. a. b.
- Charpentier* commits a blunder in an harangue which he had prepared. III. 649. a.
- Charron*, placed by Garasse in the catalogue of Atheists. II. 450. a. b. Had a mind to be a Cartesian. 448. a. Contracted a very strict friendship with Montagne. ibid. and b. Quoted. 453. a. b. 454. a. What Sorel observes concerning this author. ibid. b. 455. a. It has been said that he was more dangerous than Montagne. 454. b. His doctrine touching the incomprehensibility of the Divine Nature. V. 145. a. b. 146. a. He approves the doctrine of John Huarte concerning wits. III. 528. b. n. (4). How the faculties of Divinity in France dealt with his treatise Of Wisdom. V. 810.
- Chartier* (Alain), several pieces not composed by him were mixed with his works. IV. 163. a.
- Chassaneu*, what story he relates concerning the Virgin Mary. IV. 805. a.
- Chastel* (John), the apology for him. II. 101. a. 103. a. n. (15). His attempt on the life of Henry IV, and its consequences. 456. a. b. See seq. Who was the author of his apology. 459. b. A conjecture upon what moved the Parliament of Paris to involve the Jesuits in his cause. III. 280. and a. b.
- Chastelus* (du) quoted. III. 818. b. IV. 142. b. 143. b. See.
- Chastity* did not continue long upon earth. I. 380. a. A surprising example of that virtue. II. 108. b. 109. a. V. 603. b. 604. a. Chastity not only immanent, but transitive or penetrative. II. 108. b. 109. a. Why private persons stumble more in that respect, than with regard to all the other virtues. 382. a. The most ardent love of it does not necessarily exclude the mechanical dispositions to incontinency. 556. b. 557. a. III. 99. b. In order to preserve it, one ought to wish for a quality like that of the Hirpes. 72. b. It is not incompatible with bravery. 414. b. Attended with an incredible circumstance. 186. a. b. 187. a. Some nations have quite lost the ideas of honour with regard to this virtue. 580. b. 581. a. b. 604. a. b. and 773. a. b. See Continency. It is reported that the emerald is a great friend to chastity: a curious example on that head. IV. 864. b.
- Chastity of Conversation*: a new proof against what Mr Chevreau advances concerning it. V. 540. a. b.
- Châtel* (John du), a soothsayer and fortune-teller, his deposition against Concini and his wife. III. 126. b.
- Chatillard*, a French gentleman beheaded in Scotland, for making an attempt upon the honour of the Queen. IV. 896. b.
- Châtillon* (Marthal), the first seed of division betwixt him and Marthal Brezé. III. 821. a.
- Châtillon* (Admiral) plainly pointed at in a seditious harangue that was pronounced in the name of the Clergy. IV. 815. b.
- Chervagnac*, observations upon his memoirs. V. 191. b. 192. a. b.
- Chaumont*, his negligence when he read the books that he went about to confute. II. 580. a.
- Cheese*, who invented the secret of making it. I. 455. a.
- Chelonis* frees herself from a nice and difficult juncture. II. 467.
- Chennitius* treated as a formidable adversary by Don Nicolas Antonio. I. 323. a. b.
- Chenailles*, an agreeable house upon the Loire. II. 647. a.
- Chersistrate*, mother to Epicurus, why that woman could not fail to form a sage. II. 775. a.
- Cherifs* are held in such veneration among the Turks, that they alone wear the green turban. IV. 40. b.
- Cherifoglis* turns Mahometas out of spite. III. 730. b.
- Chesne* (Andrew du), it is probable that the world is indebted to him for the edition of Abelard's works. I. 249. b.
- Chest*, a book treating of that game is spoken of as ready to come out. II. 53. a. b. 54. a. b. A famous player at it. III. 162.
- Chevillier*, his treatise on the origin of Printing at Paris: a curious passage of that book. I. 780. a. Quoted with respect to Aretin's sonnets. 440. a.
- Chevreau* (Urban) confounds himself while he relies on the testimony of Herodotus. I. 72. a. b. Is put right with respect to the martyrdom of St Babylas. 594. b. 595. a. A very probable conjecture touching a mistake in his history. II. 352. b. What he says of old men who marry. IV. 88. b. And of a cause about adultery. V. 112. a. b. 113. a. His judgment concerning the quarrel between Girac and Collar. 345. and b. His notions with regard to politeness of stile, and a confutation of them. 843. and a. b. 856.
- Chevreuse* (the Duke of), as proxy to the King of Great-Britain, marries the Princess Henriette-Mary of France. III. 300. a.
- Chevreuse* (the Dukes of), the mischief she occasions. III. 303. a. b. 304. a. b. 305. a.

Chiabrera

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

- and Aristides, present apologies on their behalf. 520. Those of the IVth century, made frequent mention of the antiquity of their families. 379. b. The prepossession of their communions one against another. 579. a. It is strange that they, whose system is so pure, should be so corrupt in their manners. 649. a. There were Christians found among the Senators themselves who endeavoured to maintain the celebration of the Lupercalia. 933. They cannot justly reproach the Infidels, as to morals. IV. 33. b. 34. a. Have been infinitely more cruel than the followers of Mahomet. 32. a. b. Were accused of being the cause of all the public calamities. V. 454. a. b. And in their turn accused their enemies of the same thing. ibid. Rallied and laughed at by Celsus for their, examine not, only believe. 816. Defended by Origen. ibid. and 817. Captives to faith, and not judges of doctrines. 822. Every good Christian ought to be satisfied with his faith being founded on the word of God. 829. Their disputes should only be carried to the tribunal of Revelation. 830.
- Christina de Pise*, what she relates concerning Novella. I. 325. a.
- Christina*, Queen of Sweden, writes to the general of the Jesuits, desiring that two of their society might be dispatched to her. IV. 3. and a. b. How she was taken out of a lake, into which she fell. 526. a. n. (122). Never a day passed but she read some pages of Tacitus. V. 281. a.
- Christmas Songs*. The Catholics reproached with the prophane tunes of their Christmas Songs. IV. 160. a.
- Chronicle* (Martinian) so called from Martinus Polonus the author of it: translated into French with the additions of Verneron and Castell. IV. 713.
- Chronicle-Writers*, many of them copy the same false stories. I. 30. a.
- Chronologers*, some of them relate their own History very confusedly. I. 389. a.
- Chronology*; whether the Chronology of the Scripture could have been disentangled without the help of prophane authors. I. 775. b. There is little Chronology in most of the Greek and Latin Historians. II. 309. b. Several authors have neglected it, where there was no occasion to give a precise account of the time in which people lived. 352. b.
- Chronological Accounts*: It would be of great service to the compilers of History, if Chronological Accounts were published like that of Father de Londe. IV. 211. b. Chronological Accounts that clash with appearances, are never to be admitted, but in the utmost necessity. II. 162. b.
- Chronologies* are very liable to the glosses and additions of those into whose hands they fall. IV. 728. a.
- Church*, it was said to have begun in Abel. I. 23. b. Whether, if it had not been for Aristotle, the Church would have wanted some of its articles of Faith. 469. a. b. Whether it be true that the Church never employed the secular arm against the sects. 476. b. 477. a. b. The infallibility of it cannot be maintained as to facts. 494. a. Cannot subsist without her liturgy and discipline. II. 112. b. When it is proper to tolerate abuses therein. 374. a. Those who are possessed of great dignities in the Church, may easily give a free scope to their passions. III. 223. a. A Fanatic taught that there was no pure Church upon earth. 673. a. What rendered the reformation of the Church difficult, and even impossible. 686. b. 687. a. What use ought to be made of its revenues. IV. 271. b. What it has most to fear. 474. a. b.
- Church of England* accused of tarrying still in the suburbs of Babylon. III. 343. a. Looked upon as an heaven in comparison of Amsterdam. ibid.
- Church Militant*, those who talk so much of it, are more in the right than they think. II. 149. b. 150. a. b.
- Church* (New system of) whence that book of Mr Jureu, which has so many imperfections, came to be looked upon as his master-piece. IV. 363. b. 364. a.
- Church of Rome*, whether it may be accused of having condemned the doctrine of St Augustin. I. 609. b. 610. a. Receives with open arms any one that offers himself to it. II. 246. b. There are several abuses in that Church, which in all probability will last as long as it. III. 87. b. Junius believed that salvation might be obtained in the Church of V O L. V.
- Rome. 628. a. b. It seems to have adopted the religion of the god Terminus. 744. a. Has the advantage over the Laity in point of revenge. 567. b. 568. a. b. With what vigilance it minds the business of conversions. IV. 373. a. Whether there were warrantable reasons for quitting the communion of that Church. 375. a. b. n. (35). It has not been weakened in the last ten years of the XVIIth century. II. 125. b. See Papery.
- Church* (Gallican) its origin rendered obscure by the false zeal of the Monks. II. 94. a. b.
- Churches*: the privilege of some Churches in London. IV. 637. a. b.
- Churches of the Vaudois*: Peter Gilles, by order of his superiors, composes the History of them. III. 161, 162. They send Yse into England. 597.
- Churchmen*, great flatterers of Princes. I. 233. b. There are few Churchmen of great abilities, who do not endeavour to make a noise in the world. 717. b. See Ecclesiastics.
- Cicero* writes a treatise upon the deliverance of the soul of Trajan from Hell, by the prayers of St Gregory. V. 397. b.
- Cicero* blames those who despise their own tongue, and the authors of their own nation. I. 60. a. b. Ridicules the worship of Adonis. 114. a. St Augustin approves his raillery. ibid. and b. A passage of that Orator corrected with regard to Albutius. 185. a. b. Another explained. 186. a. His treatise De Gloria. 202. and b. &c. How he justifies himself as to the contradictions he was reproached with. 352. b. 353. a. Believed to be author of the letters to Cerealia. 395. a. b. What he says of his friend Atticus's letters. 427. b. Ridicules the interpreters of dreams. 448. a. Was afraid of Atticus's nails. 452. b. His letters to Atticus comprehend the History of those times, and in some sort a prophecy of what was to follow. 541. b. A thought of his concerning the dogs of the Capitol. 773. b. II. 372. a. His eloquence was not relished by all the world. 166. b. He is made Governor of Cilicia. 303. b. Demands quarter from Arcefilas, and Carneades. 330. b. There are certain facts with regard to which his authority is not decisive. 343. a. b. It was, according to him, a great blemish on the family of Junia, to have produced an Orator, who exercised the trade of an Accuser. 356. b. 357. a. He laughs at the notion of hell. 418. b. 419. a. If he did not believe what he said of Cæsar, he ought to have believed it. 423. b. 424. a. He is reproached as guilty of an unpardonable fault, for speaking Greek in a Greek Senate. 516. b. Took many things out of Crantor's book of Consolation, when he composed a book upon the same subject. 562. a. Contradicts himself. 626. a. b. 627. a. He displays his eloquence on occasion of the Pontificate of Pessinus being sold. 628. b. 629. a. The judgment that he passes on a tenet of Democritus. 642. b. 643. a. His deference to the authority of Diczarchus. 657. a. b. Either he did not understand the doctrine of that Philosopher, or else the latter contradicts himself. 660. a. His Rhetorical Legerdemain. 678. a. b. 679. a. He gives a very ill character of Cæsar as to the choice of his friends. 680. a. His wife by order of the Vestal Virgins, signifies to him that he should put his designs in execution for the good of his country. 746. b. The judgment he passes on an hypothesis of Epicurus. 792. a. What he says of a solution which Carneades invented for the Epicureans. ibid. b. To perfect himself in the action of an Orator, he put himself under the discipline of two famous Actors. 835. He was killed while he was reading the Meleæ of Euripides. 871. b. Whether he was confused in a demonstrative manner by his friend Atticus, on the subject of Fannius the Historian. III. 8. a. b. His taste is different from Plutarch's, with respect to a witticism, which concerns the birth of Alexander. 59. a. b. A base and brutal vengeance exercised upon him. 113. a. His inclination for peace. 515. b. He upbraids the Philosophers with having introduced gods that were destitute of life and knowledge. 653. a. b. His maxim, that a doctrine which grows old must be true. 744. a. His oration for Ligarius. 831. and a. b. He contradicts himself with respect to Lucilius. 907. a. The injury which his freed-man did by publishing after his death, a collection of his jests. 939. a.

- Two passages of his, which St. Augustin has preserved to us. IV. 441. b. His works that are lost were some of the finest that he wrote. 509. a. b. He could not answer the difficulties which Cotta started upon the question, Whether the faculty of Reason in man be a gift of the gods. 516. b. 517. d. He makes Cotta wish that his objections against the existence of the gods might be confuted. 516. b. n. (34). According to him providence labours to procure pleasures to mankind. 573. a. His taste, with respect to the history of a tyrant, who was a very crafty man. 619. a. b. Whether he taught that beasts were no more than Automata. 552. a. b. Reflexion upon what he says concerning the Divinity of Romulus. V. 77. b. 78. a. He is accused of improprieties and barbarisms by Scippius. 94. b. His raillery touching one of the daughters of Servilia. 123. a. His religion was more in his heart than in his head. 208. a. b. Admired the verses of Pacuvius concerning Telamon's being angry with Teucer. 317. a. b. 318. a. What Pliny relates as a witty repartee of his. 350. b. Whom he employed to put his library in order. 379. and b. 380. a. b. He divorced his wife Terentia several years before his death. 380. a. b. He treats Dolabella tenderly. 408. a. b. 409. a. Offers to go with him to Syria as his Lieutenant. 408. b. He inveighs strongly against him after the death of Trebonius. 409. a. Is inconsolable after his daughter's death. ibid. b. 410. a. b. Is accused of having had an incestuous passion for her. ibid. b. Wants to build a temple to her. 411. a. b. Was ignorant of the reason why God placed us in the world. 412. a. b. In his affliction he would have relished Arnobius better than Lactantius. 413. b. The idolaters required that some of his books should be prohibited by the Senate. 506. b. His observation concerning the antient Greek Comedies. 746, 747. Sentences extracted from his familiar epistles by Daniel d'Auge. I. 562. a. An analysis of his orations published by Martin du Cygne. II. 499.
- Ciceronians*, why so called. II. 804. b. The whimsical superstition of that sect. IV. 69. b.
- Cid*, how that piece was received by the public. IV. 620. a.
- Cydus* (Painter), how much his Argonauts cost. III. 492. a.
- Cyllene*; the height of that mountain. II. 659. b.
- Cymbalum Mundi*, who was so called. I. 373. b. One does not understand the meaning of that expression, when it is opposed to sympannum famæ publicæ. ibid.
- Cymbalum Mundi*, extracts from that book. IV. 583. b. 584. a.
- Cimon* had put in practice the stratagem which Agesipolis made use of. I. 133. a.
- Cynegirus*, we are to believe nothing but what Herodotus tells us concerning the action which he did. II. 827. b.
- Cynics* (a sect of Philosophers), who was their founder. II. 665. They preached up some very good moral precepts. 671. a. b. Why called Cynics. III. 458. b. 459. a. The sophism by which they defend their infamous practices. ibid.
- Cinyras*, some will have him to be Noah. II. 506. b. Reigned in Cyprus when the Grecians made war against Troy. IV. 641. Had Adonis by his own daughter. 642.
- Cynisca* was the first woman that obtained the prize in the chariot-races of the Olympic games. I. 131. b.
- Cynism*, according to the Stoics, was the shortest way to attain to virtue. II. 671. b.
- Cing Mars*, the source of his aversion for Cardinal Richelieu. I. 826. a. b. Is condemned to death. IV. 142. a.
- Cispanius*; his hypothesis touching Ovid's death. IV. 447. a.
- Cypresses*, called the Virgins, and for what reason. I. 210. b. Why they were formerly put in the houses of the dead. III. 73. a. n. (21).
- Cyprus*; that island was formerly called Acamas. I. 53. a.
- Cypselus*; the first institution of tyranny is ascribed to him. IV. 563. a.
- Cyran* (Abbot of St), what he thought of the Council of Trent. I. 36. b. The esteem which he expresses for the society of the Jesuits. III. 133. a. His criticism on Garaffe is an excellent piece. ibid.
- Circe*, the virtue of her wand. I. 5. a.
- Circles*, persons who pretended to have found out the quadrature of it. III. 862. b. 863. a. According to Mathematicians, it can only exist ideally. V. 612. b.
- Circumstances*, of what consequence it is to be placed in such and such circumstances. II. 518. b.
- Cyrenaics*, a sect of Philosophers. III. 424. b. Wherein they differed from the Cynics. ibid. 425. a.
- Cyril* (St), his conduct censured by the Emperor. IV. 347. b. His irregularities, with respect to Nestorius. ibid. 348. a. He does not deserve to be used tenderly. 885. b.
- Cyril Lucar*, his confession was conformable to the opinions of Geneva. I. 509.
- Cyrus*, how he liked Aspasia. II. 512. b. 513. a. b. Why he judged himself more worthy of the sceptre than his elder brother. 598. a.
- Cîteaux*, Abbey, by whom founded. II. 383. b. n. (12).
- Cythera*: an island of the Archipelago, now called Cerigo. IV. 124. n. (a).
- Cytheris*, how Mark Antony, whose concubine she was, behaved to her. III. 118. a. b. 119. a. b. He did not however marry her. 119. a. b. See Lycoris in the Dictionary.
- City*; one that was reputed holy among the Pagans. I. 420. a. b. Cities that oppose burthenome edicts only make their condition worse. IV. 353. a.
- Clarence* (Duke of), in what manner he was put to death. II. 739. a. b.
- Clarus*, who built a temple there to Apollo. IV. 97. a. b.
- Claude*, Minister at Charenton, has reproached the Jansenists with inconsistencies. I. 18. b. His dispute with Mr. Arnauld. 493. a. b. II. 518. b. He accuses St. Augustin of having been a turncoat in his opinion, concerning the penal laws against Heretics. I. 566. b. His opinion on that subject might have exposed him to censure. ibid. His Plaintes des Protestans quoted. IV. 815. a. b. The advice he gave to a man who had been a prodigious reader. III. 70. a. Reflexion upon what he says touching the Devil's conference with Luther. V. 73. a. b.
- Claudia*, Queen of France, how she came by a vile distemper which hastened her death. III. 89. b.
- Claudian*, Mariangelus Accursius said that he had corrected near seven hundred faults in that Poet. I. 69. a. Reflexions upon his doubts about providence. IV. 932. b. 933. a. b. &c.
- Claudian*, a famous Musician. III. 197. a. b.
- Claudius*, saluted Emperor in the camp of the Pretorian cohorts. II. 359. The Senate was forced to approve this election, whether they would or not. ibid. How his mother treated him. I. 358. b. He knew nothing of the infamy of his wife Messalina, when all the world knew that she prostituted herself in the stews. III. 382. a. All the ladies of beauty and distinction rival one another in their pretensions to marry him. 860. b. 861. a.
- Clavus* (de), an excellent Chymist of the XVIIth century. II. 468. a. Had the secret of making the forms of plants revive from their ashes. ibid.
- Cleanthes*. In what true cleanliness consists. I. 187. b.
- Cleanthes* said that Arcefilas destroyed the duties by his words, but established them by his actions. I. 413. a. What he has related touching Boreas, the mountain Niphates, &c. II. 82. b.
- Clearchus*, what he relates touching the conferences which Aristotle had with a Jew. I. 465. b. Whether he deserves to be credited. ibid. 466. a.
- Clementy* is pernicious on certain occasions. II. 528. a. b.
- Clement Alexandrinus*, what his opinion was concerning Diagoras, and some others who passed for Atheists. II. 656. a. b.
- Clement VII* (Pope), the answer which he made to Pompey Colonna. II. 529. a. b. And when he was solicited to grant a dispensation to some ladies. V. 161. b. 162. a. When he was created Pope. III. 592. b.
- Clement VIII* (Pope), in order to incline Scipio Gentilis to accept of a Professor's place at Bologna, promises him liberty of conscience. III. 155. a. His sentiments touching the Scientia Media. V. 824.
- Clement* (James) stabs Henry III, prompted thereto by a vision which was approved by a Monk. III. 601.

601. a. b. It is probable that the Preachers of the League had been acquainted with the design of that parricide. II. 101. b. Some have been so bold as to maintain that he did not kill Henry III. 411. b. 412. a. b. 413. a. The Jesuits commend him. IV. 129. a. His action is looked upon as a gift of the Holy Ghost by John Guignard. III. 276. a. He is instructed by Bourgoign, and compared to Judith by Guignard. ibid.
- Clenard* sent to Braga to set up a school there. III. 734. a.
- Cleopatra*, wherein the force of her charms consisted. II. 631. a. b. 632. a. She had a criminal conversation with Delliis. ibid. b. Did not well entertain those who made her taste the sweets of love. ibid. a.
- Cleopatra*, sister to Alexander, had great interest with him, and likewise with their mother Olympias. II. 675. a.
- Clostratus*, his cycle corrected. III. 254. a.
- Clerc* (le), his letter to Mr Jurieu concerning Episcopius. II. 795. b. 796. a. Reflexions upon that letter, and the consequences of it. ibid. and b.
- Clergy*, their debaucheries are agreeable to the court. I. 30. b. It is more dangerous to offend them than to offend religion. 468. a. They are a true Imperium in Imperio. II. 149. b. The same spirit, which, under Christianity, has enriched the Clergy, prevailed also under the Pagan religion. 531. a. Their lewdness in keeping concubines. 545. b. n. (20). And their bad lives. III. 328. b. 329. a. b. See Concubinage and Celibacy.
- Clergy of Africa* solicits the secular arm against the followers of Pelagius. I. 229. a. b. 230. a.
- Clergy of France* have made great use of St Augustin's reasons to justify persecution. I. 567. a. See Ecclesiastics. They make an ill-grounded complaint against the Protestants. IV. 479. a. b. What they propose to the court for the extirpation of Heretics. 815. a. They accuse the Protestants of having blotted out of their Psalms a prayer for the King. 164. a. Mr Daille's answer to this charge. ibid. b.
- Clergyman*. A Clergyman who owns that continence is beyond his power, gives people great reason to suspect his conduct in the time that preceded his marriage. III. 344. b. See Ecclesiastics.
- Clermont in Auvergne*; the history of two married persons whom the inhabitants of that city call the two lovers. III. 381. a. b. A synagogue of the Jews pulled down there. 220. a.
- Clermont* dispatched by the King of Navarre to demand the removal of the garrisons from his fortified places. IV. 341. b.
- Clevis* (Lewis de), Bachelor in Divinity, whose thesis concerning Episcopacy meets with difficulties, and for which Flavigny made an apology. III. 53. and a. b.
- Clitarchus* is not a faithful writer. IV. 9. a.
- Clitomachus*, what he said of Carneades. II. 327. a. b. 334. b. His book of Consolation. 331. b.
- Cloaths*: a man tears his cloaths, and for what reason. II. 159. and b. 160. a.
- Clodia*, Catullus's mistress. II. 394. Prostituted herself to the first Comer. ibid. Accuses Corlius of several crimes. IV. 202. a. Gets the surname of Quadrantaria. ibid. b. Was the same whom Catullus called Lesbia. ibid. a.
- Clodius* sells the Pontificate of Pessinus. II. 648. b. Which gave Cicero an occasion to display his eloquence. ibid.
- Closteri*, what Erasmus thought of them. I. 272. a. b. They have occasioned a proverb. V. 23. b.
- Cloze-school*: rare precepts relating to the cloze-school. I. 174. a. b.
- Cloviz*, whether Aimonius was the first who loaded the birth of that Prince with ignominy. I. 669. a. There is scarce any truth in what is told of the Kings of France before him. V. 494. b. n. (13).
- Cloviz*, an Epic Poem, by whose assistance it was finished and polished. IV. 114. and a. b.
- Coach*: learning seldom enables a man to roll about in his coach. II. 708. a.
- Cobourg*, a city in Franconia, Prince John Casimir, Duke of Saxony erects a famous school there. III. 660.
- Cocceius*, his doctrine was the least in favour with the great and powerful in Holland, but was most to the relief of young people, and of such as set up for men of wit. V. 564.
- Cockbus*, what kind of a machine he employed, tho' to no purpose, against the Lutherans. III. 143. b. 144. a. His accusations against Luther. 942. a. A book which he intitles Luther with seven Heads, and in which he relates all his impurities. 136. a. b.
- Cock*; the Jews offer a cock for their sins in the feast of Reconciliation. III. 125. b. The ceremonies which attend that oblation. ibid.
- Cock-fighting*; the Antients were exceedingly fond of that diversion, and wagered all they were worth that such or such a cock would be victorious in the battle. IV. 819. b. Quinquarian censured for being too much addicted to such pastime. ibid.
- Cocenas*, his crime and punishment. IV. 935. a. b. 936. a. His confession upon the rack. 939. b. 940. a. By whom his head was buried. V. 526. a. b.
- Codes*, compilation of divers Codes. II. 380. b. 381. a.
- Codinus*, who first published his book de Officialibus Palatii Constantinopolitani et Officiis magnæ Ecclesiæ. III. 627. a.
- Coffeteau* complains of Du Plessis Mornai upon the subject of Gregory VII. III. 230. a. Very much perplexed in one part of his answer to Du Plessis. 565. b. Makes but a poor answer to Du Plessis with respect to the praises which Langius bestows on Luther. 723. a. b. Takes a town for a man. IV. 763. b. Is censured by Rivet with respect to Turpin, and Pope Calixtus. V. 417. b. Does not make a solid answer to Du Plessis, touching John de Wefalia. 542. a. b.
- Coelius* defended by Cicero against the accusations of Clodia. IV. 202. a.
- Coffin*, whether it is possible to suspend an iron coffin between two loadstones. IV. 43. a.
- Cagliani*, Minion to Joan II, Queen of Naples. IV. 309. b.
- Coffin*; whence comes this proverb, il est né coiffé. III. 591. b. 592. a.
- Colbert*, his moderation with regard to a sonnet, wherein he was very much abused. III. 393. b. He hinders the printing of several books against the house of Austria. 767. a.
- Coligny* (Admiral de) refuses to be a churchman. I. 784. b. 786. a. b. The mistakes of the author who wrote his life. IV. 696. b. 697. a. How he was killed. I. 746. and b. Passionate verses wrote on his death by John des Caurins. II. 399.
- Coligny* (the Count de) fights a duel with the Duke of Guise. III. 303. a. b. &c. His brother carries off a young lady. 365. b.
- Calin* falls into disgrace with Francis I, and loses his office of reader. II. 371. b. 372. a. How this happened. ibid.
- Collado*, or Colladon, carries his censure against Laurens too far. III. 746. a. b.
- Collection* of several impertinent authors. III. 854. b.
- Collections*, in what case they are to be looked upon as precious treasures. I. 536.
- Collections*: The collections of men of letters resemble Virgil's fame. I. 19. a. Collections of spiritual songs set to the most burlesque tunes. 478. a. b.
- Collections* made for the churches of Germany, and particularly for those of the Palatinate. I. 241.
- College*, the foundation of that of Navarre. II. 224. b. The building of its library. I. 164. a. The college della Sapienza at Rome, by whom the building of it was finished, and by whom it was adorned with a fine library. II. 476.
- Collenuccio*; his Neapolitan History translated into Latin by Stouppa. V. 247, 248.
- Colletti*, what Mr Menage designed to do with respect to him. II. 159. b.
- Colletti* (Francis) makes an abridgment of the Annals of Paris. IV. 270. a.
- Collier*, a story that is told of a Collier's ass. III. 804. a.
- Cologne*, its Divines censured by Luther on the subject of Aristotle's doctrines. I. 470. b. The young people who turn Catholics are educated in a college there. IV. 372. b. 373. a. The university of that city opposes the design of Langius to make learning flourish again. III. 724. a. b.

Cologn

- Cologn* (the Elector of), a conversation which he had with a peasant concerning his train. III. 768. b. The last Elector very much exclaimed against, and for what reason. II. 224. a. b. Laid under the ban of the empire. ibid. His method of justifying himself. ibid.
- Cologn*: a congress held there to make peace in the Low-Countries. II. 223. a. The quarrel which its chapter had with Gebhard Truchses. 224. b.
- Colomies* cited. I. 259. b. Blamed for telling a certain story on the authority of Isaac Vossius. 666. b. What he says concerning one of Grotius's books. III. 247. b. He wrongfully ascribes an oration of Broughton's to Drusus. II. 150. b. Cenfures Blondel touching the story of the She-Pope inserted in a manuscript of Anastasius. IV. 738. and b.
- Colomies* usually took the arms of their mother town. I. 20. a.
- Colomius* is suspected of Heterodoxy because of his moderation, when the Arminian disputes began to rise. III. 360.
- Colonna* (Antony) sends Galeacius Florimond to Paris in quality of his agent. III. 58.
- Colonna* (Afcanio) his misfortunes. I. 400. b. 401. a. 402. b.
- Colonna* (Marc Antony) procures his father to be imprisoned for high-treason. I. 400. b. 401. a.
- Colonna* (Profer) at the age of seventy years, falls in love with Clara Visconti, and proceeds to public extravagancies. IV. 378. b. 379. a.
- Colonna* (the Conftable) his son cannot obtain the niece of Prince Marc Antony Borghese in marriage. II. 471. He marries a niece of Cardinal Mazarin. 472. a. Which proved an unhappy marriage. ibid.
- Colophos*: that city destroyed by Lyfimachus. III. 779. a. Who it was that built it. IV. 97. a.
- Colossus of Rhodus*, the inattention of Scaliger, when he computed the weight of it. II. 390. a.
- Colours* are not in bodies. IV. 654. a. b.
- Column*: a column of marble, erected in honour of Julius Caesar, has Divine honours paid to it. II. 680. a. What those called Roftrates were. 726. Miracles told of one. I. 274. a.
- Columna* (James) an Historian whom Antony, Archbishop of Florence copies in several places. II. 529, 530. and a. b. Several authors make mention of him. ibid.
- Com*, a city in Persia, what Saint is worshipped there by the Mussulmans. III. 16. a. b. 17. a. b. Lela, is the name given there to the Blessed Virgin. ibid. a.
- Comana*, the Pontif of that place was likewise its sovereign. I. 421. a.
- Combat*: a Combat, twenty-two against twenty-two. II. 128. and a.
- Combats*: the inequality of success in Combats where justice seems to be equal. III. 300. b.
- Combination*: a remarkable Combination of Moral and Physical things, which Father Malebranch speaks of. II. 16. a.
- Comedian*; See Player.
- Comedies*; one favoured with a prodigy. IV. 300. and a. b. Another represented before the King and Queen of Navarre. 324. b. 325. a. Wherein the difference betwixt the Antients and Moderns conflicts with respect to Comedy. 741. b. 742. a. One employed to represent the abuses of Popery. V. 85. a. b. Which is the same that was acted before the King and Queen of Navarre. ibid. b. The licence which the Greek Comedy had to vent scandal. IV. 568. a. b. 569. a.
- Comenius*, his portraiture very like that of some other Fanatics. II. 538. a. b. 539. a. Some persons have been surprized that he lived so long. 539. and b. The cordial and spiritual esteem which Mrs Bourignon and he had for one another. 540. a. How he extricated himself from the embarrassment he was in between the fear of God and the fear of man. 692. Deputed into Hungary. ibid. a. His Janua Linguarum translated into Greek by Theodore Simonis. III. 548. b. He is suspected of Political contrivances. 682. a.
- Comes* (Natalis) blamed. II. 82. b. See Noel le Compe.
- Comets*, a strange opinion about them. II. 51. a. Are looked upon as evil prefaces. 113. It was entirely for his book intitled, Thoughts on the Comets, that the Magistrates of Rotterdam deposed the author, and there was no mention made of his Advice to the Refugees. V. 647. a. b. The design of the Pemises sur les Cometes. 813.
- Comforters*, are troublesome, when they do not take a proper time. II. 564. b.
- Comines* (Philip de) Haillan's judgment of him. III. 335. b. 336. a. He praises Savonarola, and ascribes to him the glory of having prophesied. V. 58. b. 59. a. b. Reflexions upon his narrative. ibid. b. 60. a. He was better acquainted with state affairs than with the conduct of those who deal in prediction-makers. 59. b. Is too good-natured with respect to Savonarola, and puts too favourable a construction upon his prophecies, in order to help him out with them. 60. a. He serves as a witness to those who censure that Monk. ibid. b. 61. a.
- Commendon* puts a stop to a paper-war. II. 605. a.
- Commentaries* and marginal notes are very useful for the right understanding of satires. I. 35. b.
- Commentator* (Historical) should compare together the reasons pro and con, with all the impartiality of a faithful relater. V. 810.
- Commentators*; what they ought to aim at. III. 45. a.
- Commings* (Mr de) what he said to Mr Amyraut. I. 264. a. b.
- Commire* (Father) his name was Commere. IV. 854. b.
- Commiffary-General* of the Horfe, that office was unknown in the Netherlands before the year 1567. I. 673. a.
- Commiffioners* are ever suspected, and for what reason. IV. 241. b. A decree of the parliament of Paris relating to them. ibid.
- Commodus*, a Roman Emperor, exposes a man to be devoured by wild beasts, for reading the life of Caligula. V. 265. b.
- Commonwealib* of learning, has a greater number of subtle men now, than it had in the preceding age. I. 92. b. The liberty which every body ought to enjoy in it, and how far that liberty should extend. IV. 548. b.
- Commonwealib*, it is a misfortune to them that some Philosophers have applied themselves wholly to the study of nature. I. 295. a. An alteration of government will always be inevitable in such as amuse themselves with conquests. II. 165. b. 166. a. See Republics.
- Communion*, the effect of disputes which are raised in a Communion. I. 241. b. It is not for the temporal interest of any Communion, that all the members of it should be men of judgment. II. 708. a.
- Company*; there is nothing worse than bad company. I. 279. b.
- Comparison* of the minds of men with apples. I. 60. b. 61. a. Of able men with beasts for sacrifice. 619. b. A remark upon the design of comparisons. V. 360. b. 361. a. b. A comparison of the author's, which gave offence to several, vindicated. 824.
- Compel them to come in*. Reflexion on that maxim. III. 40. a. b.
- Compilations*, their ordinary defects. I. 219. b. Those who continue and enlarge them oftentimes, occasion confusion by their neglect. 615. a. b. If they every where pleased one kind of people, they would not be good. III. 337. b. Should be calculated to serve every body. V. 806. What the nature of them ought to be. ibid.
- Compilers* often want exactness, and the reason of it. I. 60. a. Such a Compiler whom our age might not esteem in the least, would be admired a thousand years hence. 536. A passage that ought to serve for a looking-glass to Compilers. II. 232. b. 233. a. An instance of the alterations which facts undergo, by passing through their hands. 802. a. They highly injure the reputation of great men, by compiling all that they say without any discernment. III. 939. a. b. One that relates and comments has all the privileges of the writers that he makes use of. V. 799.
- Compliments*, an example of the falsities with which they are generally stuffed. IV. 101. a.
- Conchini* and his wife make use of the Cabala, and the Jewish books. I. 397. b. 398. a.
- Conclave*; there is nothing more rare, than for a Cardinal to be sure of his Election to the Papal Dignity, before he enters the conclave. III. 608. a. How the best concerted intrigues are frustrated there. I. 361. b.
- Conclavist*,

INDEX.

33

- Concile*, the pleasant answer of one, whose allowance they wanted to retrench at the council of Basil. I. 178. a. b. 179. a.
- Concord in the Church*, the earnest desire of Joseph Hall to see it once established. III. 343. b.
- Concord*: what the book of the Concord is. III. 250. a. b.
- Concord* (the book of) sternly rejected by the King of Denmark. III. 390. a. A magnificent copy of it, which that Prince threw into the fire. 391. a. Does more harm in Germany, than if the Turks had entered it with fire and sword. ibid. b. A letter from the Reformed Churches in Holland against that book, and who is supposed to have writ the letter. ibid. 392. a. b.
- Concord* between the Lutherans, and Calvinists, why it has never been brought about, and why it probably never will. III. 526. a. b. By what emblem the Antients, represented the power of Concord. IV. 232.
- Concordats* passed between Francis I and Leo X, and the abuses which it occasioned. IV. 764. a. b. to 766. a. b.
- Concubinage of the priests*, the time has been, when it was hardly looked upon as shameful. III. 887. a.
- Concubine*: A concubine and a whore are commonly esteemed two very distinct characters. II. 315. a. The power of the concubines of Princes offends none but such as hardly read any thing. IV. 455. b. There have been parishes which obliged their priests to keep a concubine, in order to secure the honour of their wives. III. 345. a.
- Condé* (Lewis I, Prince of) condemned to be beheaded. III. 287. a. n. (11). IV. 327. b.
- Condé* (the Prince of) a narrative of the ceremonies that were observed at her abjuration, and a remarkable particular on that occasion. V. 319. a. b.
- Condé* (Lewis II, Prince of) by whom he was arrested, and by whom conducted to Bois de Vincennes. I. 184. Whether he married below himself, when he took to wife the Marfhal de Brezé's daughter. II. 135. a. b. 136. a. Particulars that do honour to his memory. 137. b. He writes with his own hand a little before his death, to recommend the Prince's his wife to the King. 138. b. The declaration which he made of his Orthodoxy at his death. IV. 504. a. b. How he concerned himself in the business relating to the author of the Pre-Adamites. 530. b. The judgment which some passed upon his conduct at the battle of Senef. V. 190. b. 191. a. b. He sends for Spinoza, and talks with him. 205. a. b.
- Condé* (the Prince of) wounded by one of her Domestics. II. 138. and a. b.
- Condé, Condous*, there was no French General of that name in the year 1691. IV. 210. b.
- Condé* (Henry Julius, Prince of) his discernment fatal to impostors. I. 7. b. He draws from James Aymar, a confession of his tricks. 8. b.
- Condere*, the signification of that word. I. 252. b.
- Conditions*, there is none more deplorable than that of a man who cannot die when he desires it. III. 319. a. b. Those are often the happiest which seem least to be so. I. 308. b.
- Conduet*, an example of a very uniform conduct. I. 580. a. b.
- Conette*, how he triumphed over the head-dresses and the attire of the women. II. 544. a. b. IV. 667. b.
- Conference*, the ministers once looked upon every proposal of a conference as a snare. II. 520. b. A conference, broke off and renewed with regard to the Duche's of Bouillon. IV. 921. a. A conference between Cardinal du Perron and Sieur Beraud, and the issue of it. 923. a. b.
- Conference of Poissy*, an intrigue designed to break it off. I. 691. b. The ministers of that conference consulted on the question, whether children, baptized by a woman, should be re-baptized. 704. b. Offence taken by the prelates of that conference. 790. b. 791. a.
- Confession* by letters maintained by Suarez, and condemned by Clement VIII. I. 661. a. Ought not to be revealed on any account, or in obedience to the command of any one whatever. II. 460. a. b. The abuses of it, and complaints that are made against them. ibid. a. Their own written confessions are made use of against criminals. ibid. b. Sick
- persons put it off as a bad omen. IV. 537. b. n. (24).
- Confession of Augsburg*; remarks upon the variations of it. II. 122. a. b. Presented to the Emperor at the Diet in that city, in the year 1530. IV. 185.
- Laurens Tuppius translates into Latin a book which the Princes of that Confession caused to be wrote, touching the Council of Trent. V. 514. a. b. 515. a. b.
- Confessionaries*, what impure cases are heard there. V. 41. a. b.
- Confessors* would not be qualified to remedy the complaints of their penitents, if they had not a thorough insight into all manner of obscenities. I. 182. a. V. 40. a. b. Whether others besides them must not know the obscenities of the confessionary. I. 182. a. Laymen disguised as Priests, and sent to confess criminals. II. 459. b. 460. a. b. Named with a prohibition to apply to others. ibid. a. Several Priests revealed confessions to Savonarola. V. 61. a.
- Confucius*, is as blind as the other Literati of China, with regard to the true God. IV. 81. b.
- Congress*, what an uncertain and shameful way it is of discovering a man's impotency. IV. 801. a. b. &c. The author's apology for what he has said of it in this Dictionary. 803. b. 804. a. 881. a. b. 882. a. b. The immodest practice of it condemned. V. 799.
- Coni*, Mr Catinat was not forced to raise the siege of it, neither was he beaten there. IV. 210. b. 211. a. It was Mr de Dulonde who commanded the besiegers there, and who was disgraced for retiring, as the French believed, without any necessity. ibid.
- Conjectures*, a person may be happier in his Conjectures, without being consequently a man of more skill. I. 148. a.
- Conjunctions* of the planets, how many great Conjunctions there have been since the creation of the world. I. 164. b.
- Conquerors*; reason prompts them both to stop, and not to stop. I. 14. a.
- Conquests*: though the conquests of a monarch are not the interest of his people, yet they ruin themselves with more satisfaction for the sake of a warlike Prince, than for the sake of any other. V. 664.
- Conrart*, his opinion touching the translations of Amyot and the Abbot Tallemant. I. 259. a. Consults Laurence Dreilincourt on the French tongue. II. 694. b. The verses which Lewis de Neufgermain made for him. IV. 357. b. 358. a. He is consulted by the Sieur d'Ablancourt. 591. a. b. Mr Rolé succeeds him in the French Academy. 917.
- Conscience*; a doubt upon a case of conscience. I. 109. a. A man should not hazard his conscience in order to push himself. 224. b. One is obliged to follow its dictates always. 166. b. The people whose interest it was most to defend this maxim, have been for some time the opposers of it. ibid. One cannot be too reserved in accusing others of preaching against their consciences. II. 374. a. Whether it can be forced to embrace the true religion. III. 220. b. 221. a. The contradictions which those who assert such a thing, fall into. ibid. The directors of consciences ought to have but short conversations with devout women. 230. b. The light of conscience is not able to withstand the greatest part of the passions. 375. a. b. 376. a. Its liberty. 676. a. b. 677. a. b. A comparison of the Power of conscience with that of the point of honour. IV. 500. a. b. A tender conscience will grieve even for a fault that is purely material. 929. b.
- Conscience* (erroneous), the privileges of it. I. 166. b. Never did any Philosopher say a more sensible thing on that subject than what Archelars said. 418. a. An author who confutes himself in writing upon that subject. II. 476. a.
- Conscientiarists*, a sect of Atheists. III. 671. and a. b.
- Consequences* (opposite) drawn from the same principle, but solidly refuted by Seneca. II. 14. b. 15. a.
- Consequences*: it is allowed to point out to an adversary those which result from his doctrine, whether he rejects or admits them. V. 644. b. 645. a. Some of them have such a close connexion with the principle from which they are drawn, that it is impossible

10 R

- impossible to conceive how a man of sense can admit that and reject these. 645. a.
- Confessory* (Walloon) at Rotterdam, their proceedings against this Dictionary. I. lxxix, lxxx, lxxxi.
- Consolation*, a common-place of Consolation examined. I. 280. a. b. Carneades refuted it. ibid. b. III. 73. b. A pernicious maxim of Consolation. I. 428. a. A common-place of Consolation. 699. b. 700. a. b. Another common-place. II. 561. a. b. 562. a. b. Another. III. 73. a. b.
- Conspiracy* requires dispatch; and this spoils all very often. II. 428. a. Some persons suffer themselves to be drawn into one by motives which they think good. 553. b. A law which makes those who have notice of a conspiracy, and do not reveal it, guilty of a capital crime. III. 802. a. b.
- Conspiracy*, the not discovering one is a crime punishable with death. IV. 346. a. b.
- Constance*, Queen of Sicily, is with child at the age of fifty-two, and resolves to be brought to bed publicly. III. 394. b. 395. a.
- Constantine*, the strange and surprizing extravagancy of his decree against the Arians. I. 474. a. b. 475. a. His donation. II. 594. b. 595. a. b. His cruelties. III. 18. a. b. 19. a. b. To what cause the Pagan authors ascribe his conversion. 20. a. He orders all contentious libels to be burnt. 278. a.
- Constantine* (Copronymus) fouls the baptismal font without knowing it. II. 422. b.
- Constantine* (Dame) the midwife, her crimes and punishment. IV. 498. a. 499. a. b.
- Constantinople*, its Patriarch strangled during the session of the Council of Florence. I. 266.
- Constantius*; why he throws himself into a terrible passion. I. 37. a.
- Constitution*; an effect of the strange power of it. II. 719. a. b.
- Consul*, whether he re-defended to the Pretorship. II. 345. a. b. Two Consuls deposed from their Consulate, for shewing disrespect to a letter from the Senate. 291. a.
- Consulate*, two brothers discharge that office at the same time, a thing which had never been seen before. I. 341. Who was the first stranger that was honoured with it at Rome. 611. b. There were not two degrees of it. 613. a. The cause of their mistake who have thought so. ibid.
- Contempt*: one ought not to shew contempt for any person whatever. I. 366. 376, 377. a. b. 421. b. 422. a.
- Conti* (the Prince of), his judgment of two sonnets. I. 752. a.
- Continence*, a rare example of that virtue. I. 14. b. 357. Found in a married life. 34. and a. b. Such a state between a man and a woman who have every thing else in common, is too great a violence offered to nature. ibid. Prejudicial to the health of the fair sex sometimes. 390. b. 391. a. The gift of it is not a thing on which a man may depend. III. 13. b. How those who make a vow of Continency ought to conduct themselves. 64. b. Men devoted to it ought to wish for the same qualities as the Hirpes had. 72. b. What it ought to cause in order to be a true virtue. 620. Is rather a quality of constitution than of Morality. IV. 332. a. Whether it be possible: Reasons pro and con. III. 344. b. 345. a. Reckoned impossible among Protestants, and among some Roman Catholics. 345. a. A Clergyman who owns that it is beyond the power of man, gives great reason to suspect his conduct in the time that preceded his marriage. 344. b. This controversy ought to be handled with circumspection. ibid. See Fornication.
- Continuation of an history*: when authors find one ready done, they chuse rather to copy it, than be at the trouble to compose a new one. IV. 210. b.
- Contradictions*, Polemic Divines and Lawyers are very subject to them. I. 351. b. 352. a. These have sincerity enough to own it, but not those. ibid. and b. 353. a. The excuses which Baldus makes for them. 616. b. It is an ill character to be of a spirit of contradiction. II. 376. b. Whether they are of any use. III. 135. a.
- Contraries*. One may feel one of the Contraries without having ever felt the other. IV. 514. a. b. &c.
- Controversies*, those who handle them give too much injurious language to their adversaries, and disguise their strongest arguments. I. 718. b. The way of - handling them right. ibid. Who has given them the best form. 734. a. There are some, where neither peace nor war can be made but to one's confusion. III. 84. a. Cannot be ended by indeterminate, ambiguous, and intricate forms of expression, where each party finds its own account. IV. 287. a. It is chiefly in the matter of controversy that the understanding is the dupe of the Passions. 737. a.
- Controversy*, examples which are a little puzzling to those of the Roman party. I. 179. a. b. Two of their greatest faults. 718. b. n. (14). Are great liars. 790. a. Their zeal very often stifles their knowledge and their virtue. ibid. b. An Historian ought to lay no stress on the abusive language which they give each other. 795. a. Most of them aggravate the evil of the other party, and extenuate the evil of their own cause, as much as they can. II. 136. b. All of them mutually complain of the artifices of those who write against them. 488. b. Those among the Protestants who defended their cause like men of honour have never been hated by the Roman Catholics. 695. a. b. Of what weight the testimony of a Controversy is upon a fact reflecting on the other party. III. 764. b. One must take care not to be surprized by their air of triumph. IV. 56. a. Most of them are inclined to give things a malicious turn. 137. b. See Disputes. They know not how to distinguish between what is to the purpose, and what is mere cavilling. I. 236. b. After they have used all their strength against some weak part of the opposite cause, they leave the strongest unanswered, and assume a disdainful arrogance. II. 223. b. Ought not to stop at the authors of their own party, without consulting those who write against them. IV. 825. a. b. Are wont to reduce their adversaries to an absurdity. V. 824. Such as defend their cause well vex their adversaries. 846.
- Controversy* (Roman), their perplexity touching the book of Taxes. I. 629. b.
- Coetzen*, Jesuit, describes the violences exercised by the Lutherans upon the Calvinists. III. 535. a. Refutes the visions of Braumbom. II. 126. b. 127.
- Convents*, the institution of them ascribed to the devil. I. 272. a. The spirit of the gospel does not reign there. II. 109. A strange corruption of morals there in the XVth century. 276. a. b. 277. a. b.
- Conversation*, those who have the address to revive a languishing conversation, are a great help in the world. I. 701. b. 702. a. There are some who write down what they hear there. III. 154. b. Such persons are dangerous. ibid. People that are very agreeable in conversation. IV. 591. a. The strange slavery of those who have the reputation of excelling in it. 707. b. n. (93). Things are miserably confounded in the indeterminate discourses of Conversation: we have a thousand instances of it in the Scaligeriana, and in the Menagiana. 727. b.
- Conversions*, writers who undertake to speak of them, are apt to fall into contradictions. I. 477. b. Conversions wrought by dragooning will be eternally abhorred by honest men. IV. 535.
- Converts* are almost forced to speak ill of the party which they forsake. II. 130. b.
- Cookery*. The history of a book of Cookery. I. 371. a. b.
- Cooks*. What Cooks are the most excellent. I. 100.
- Coos*, Augustus remits to the inhabitants of that island, an hundred talents of the tribute which they were indebted to his Exchequer, and upon what account. I. 369. a.
- Cop* (Luke le) translates into French the History of the Confession of Augsberg, wrote by Chytraeus. II. 122. b.
- Copernicus*: the beauty of his system. V. 825.
- Copies* become imperfect in proportion as they multiply. I. 747. b.
- Coppenius* (Bartholomew) cannot obtain leave to go and dispute with the Jesuits. IV. 74. a.
- Coquets*, the fate of people depends very often upon their caprices. II. 841. a. A sign by which one may know them. IV. 688. a.
- Coras*, a famous Civilian at Toulouse. III. 580. b.
- Coras*, an apostate Minister, some of his adventures. III. 579. b. 580. a. b.
- Cardemisi*,

- Cordemi*, an examination of what he says concerning Eudes and Charles Martel. I. 15. a. His reflexion upon the boldness of some modern authors. 16. b. 17. a. b.
- Corderius* (Maturinus), his pious fraud with regard to his scholars. IV. 574. b.
- Cords* for discipline; two thousand crowns were laid out upon them in one week. IV. 314. a.
- Corcianna*, a collection of verses printed at Rome. I. 68. b. 69. a.
- Corinna*; that name does not stand for Julia in Ovid's Art of Love. IV. 444. a.
- Corythus* raises the jealousy of Paris, and is killed by him. IV. 401. a.
- Corinth*, in what manner Venus was served and worshipped there. III. 699. b. 700. a. The women of that city, at the tyrant's summons, repair to Juno's temple, where they are stripped, and their cloaths burnt. IV. 563. a.
- Corinthians*, what they do to discharge themselves of the infamy of having killed Medea's sons. II. 874. a.
- Cornarius* (John) has translated a passage of Parthenius ill. I. 52. b. Translates out of Greek into Latin Parthenius's book de Amatorii Affectionibus. IV. 482. a. Is mistaken about the motive of the dedication to Cornelius Gallus. ibid. b. 483. a.
- Cornelia*, her fidelity to Pompey proved the accidental cause of his destruction. IV. 282. a. b.
- Cornelius Gallus*: Parthenius dedicates his book de Amatorii Affectionibus to him. IV. 482. b. The false motive which Cornarius assigns for it. ibid. 483. a. The reason which Parthenius himself gives for the dedication. ibid.
- Cornelius à Lapide*, in a great passion with certain authors. I. 40. b. Attributes his own thoughts to the Jews. 104. b. 105. a.
- Cornelius Nepos*, Verona and Cataneus dispute between them the honour of having produced him. II. 357. b.
- Cornelius* (Antony), a name borrowed to conceal the true author of a book, which Father Garasse calls impious. V. 536. a. b.
- Cornetius* (Cornelius), upon what condition he married the daughter of Dideric de Groot. III. 241. b.
- Cornuel* (Madam); her frank reflexion upon seeing a man, who she had been told was impotent. II. 534. b. 535. a.
- Corona Regia*, a satire against King James I. II. 338. a.
- Coronis* is got with child by Apollo; where, and when, she was delivered of Æsculapius. IV. 626.
- Corradus* commits a blunder in not having rightly understood Asconius. II. 347. b. Mistakes Plutarch's meaning with respect to Lucullus, and the social war. III. 493. b.
- Correcting*: several authors find the correcting or revising of their works too troublesome, and give it over. IV. 451. a. An author should be advised by his friends in correcting his works. 591. a. b.
- Correctness*. There is a certain degree of correctness beyond which nothing can be done but what instead of perfecting the work, and giving it more nerves and strength, weakens and dissipates it. III. 836. b. 837. a. IV. 896. b. 897. a.
- Correctors* of the press are often very innocent of the faults that are to be met with in printed books. III. 661. a. b.
- Corrupt*: men can never be so generally corrupt, but some will avoid the contagion. III. 272. b.
- Corruption of the heart of man*: Nothing can be a better proof of it than shewing that those who have no supernatural assistance, are as wicked under the profession of a religion, as others who live in a state of Atheism. V. 812.
- Corfairs* (Turkish) made tractable by the game at Chess. II. 53.
- Corunna*, what is said concerning the foundation of it is a mere fable. III. 431. b.
- Cosmetic*, what is the object and use of that art. II. 575. a.
- Cosroes*, King of Persia, what he did to vex the Emperor Heraclius. IV. 350. a.
- Costar*, unjustly accused of a gross ignorance by Girac. I. 75. a. Took the ground or basis of his collections from Bacon's works. 599. b. 600. a. Did not comprehend Horace's thought with regard to Catus. II. 389. b. Justly censures Balzac, who had criticized Alexander. 667. b. Quoted. III. 262. a. 939. a. Has no reason to cite Erasmus on the subject of Billa. II. 727. and b. Was ignorant of what the Ancients had said concerning that Roman Lady. ibid. Is censured by Girac with respect to the custom which Pompey had of biting his mistress. III. 56. a. Censured for making use of one of Frangipani's jests. 102. a. Is charged with treason by Girac. 399. a. Censured with respect to Hercules, and the posture in which he desired to be painted. 430. a. b. How he argued against the Politician, who maintained that the most dangerous sovereigns were those who were too much sovereigns. 825. a. He justly censures Girac, with respect to the two vessels of Jupiter. IV. 93. a. b. Is rallied for his way of explaining some verses of Horace. V. 134. a. b. The History of his quarrels with Girac. 341. a. b. &c. Is strongly attacked upon his jokes of Gallantry. 343. a. b. A judgment on his dispute with Girac. 345. a. b. He does not approve a thought of Longinus. 360. a. b. Endeavours to find out the reasons why Sylla wanted to take the surname of Fortunate. 366. b. 367. a. Finds himself at a loss when he is obliged to account for a thing which he had advanced. 400. b. 401. a.
- Cotte* (Mr de la) a particular of which he informs the author. I. 602. b. n. (30).
- Cotin* (the Abbot de) quoted. I. 94. b. What he says of an epitaph that Menage had composed. III. 739. a. b. And of Epicurus. 929. b. 930. a. b.
- Coton* (Father) great outcries raised against him with respect to a woman possessed with the Devil. III. 214. b. Vindicated from the charge of leudness. 891. a. b. Discovered by his smell those who had violated the laws of chastity. IV. 125. a.
- Cotta* (Pontiff) his objection against the Divine providence. II. 713. a. His answer to those who instead of arguments only alledged public stories. III. 743. b. Overpowers with arguments those who say that reason is a gift which the gods have bestowed upon man. IV. 516. b. n. (34). 517. a. Why, according to him, it was dangerous to deny the existence of the gods. V. 239. b.
- Cottibi* (Minister) writes against a certain fast, after having changed his religion. I. 108. n. (4). A pleasant story which he tells. II. 581. a. b. Gives the epithet of Saint to Origen, for which he is censured by Daille. IV. 412. a.
- Coverdal* (Milon) carried always a woman about with him, and what name he gave her, according to Sanders. V. 42. b.
- Council of Basil*; upon a session-day, the relics of Basil were brought there, and placed in the room of the absent Bishops. I. 178.
- Council of Constance*: a project of reformation laid before it. I. 165. b. Cautions not to disoblige the Duke of Burgundy. IV. 605. a. b.
- Council of Pisa* promised the canonization of Savonarola to the Dominicans, upon condition that they would take part against Pope Julius II. V. 69, 70, 71.
- Council of Trent*, what the Abbot of St Cyran said of it. I. 36. b. V. 15. b. The spirit of that council. 704. a. Who was regarded as the right hand of it. IV. 291. b. Reasons why it was declared to Vergerius, that he could not assist there. V. 454. b. 455. a.
- Councils*, when that of Soissons, and when that of Sens was held. I. 29. b. 30. a. Whether many volumes of the councils be proper to convert Heretics. 604. b. 605. a. A satirical description of the council which condemned Abelard. 757. a. Who are the fittest persons to draw up the decisions of one. 703. b. 704. a. The Pope can do nothing against the canons of councils. III. 741. a. Compared with the States General. IV. 139. b. Why it is necessary that the Holy Ghost should preside in them. 348. a. b. They have only served to render Heretics obstinate, when they oppressed them by the Imperial authority. 349. b. 350. a. Whether general councils lawfully assembled, can err in points of faith. III. 595. a. b.
- Councils of war*, by what kind of proofs people sometimes maintain the opinions they have given there. I. 515. a. b.
- Counsellor*: a counsellor who burns the writings of the two contending parties. II. 647. a.

Counsellor

- Counsels or Precepts* (Evangelical) the wrong use that may be made of them, by the spinning out of consequences. I. 735. b.
- Countryman*, one who makes the present of a turnip to Lewis XI, King of France. III. 803. b.
- Courage*. Whether a man can lawfully be condemned to death for want of courage. III. 59. b.
- Courts*; a remarkable instance of the intrigues of Courts. I. 100. b. Their uneven conduct. II. 210. b. 211. a. A court without women is something absurd. IV. 354. b. It is the great model of most religions. 355. b. A description of the different parts that are acted there by those who solicit affairs. 460. b. How nice they are in the choice of men there. V. 419. a. b. Du Refuge's treatise on the Court, a very good one. IV. 850. a. b. 851. a. b.
- Court*. It is often the truest policy to pay one's court, even when they are in disgrace, to those whom we see in the road to high preferment. I. 422. a.
- Court of Rome*, its corruption. II. 370. b. 371. a. The Cardinals resent its being dishonoured in the Diet of the empire. III. 329. a. Was deeply dipt in James Clement's crime. 413. a. Its tyranny. IV. 330. b. 331. a. Marfilius of Padua, displays in a lively manner its pride, luxury, and other irregularities. 198.
- Court of France*, its corruption. IV. 329. a. 330. b. 333. b.
- Courtezans*; whether that word be less shocking than the word Putain (W. . .). V. 848.
- Courtezans* have always been, and still are, the way to preferment. II. 426. b. 427. a. And to the gaining of law-suits. 466. a. b. 467. a. Reduce their galants to beggary. III. 71. a. b. A courtesan who honoured and dishonoured learning at the same time. 694. and a. How they ought to die according to the principles of the Pagans. 702. b. Have very often a power over mens hearts, even when they are grown old. IV. 694. b. 695. a. Their pictures consecrated in temples. III. 57. a. b.
- Courtezans* conscientious. IV. 582. b. 583. a.
- Courtiers*, a remarkable instance of their intrigues. I. 100. b. The turn of a fine courtier. 583. b. They ought not in their court devotions to imitate the Huguenots who invoke none but God. II. 602. b. Compared to the Euripus. III. 585. a. Are commonly more ambitious than jealous. IV. 21. a. What talent they stand most in need of. 397. b. 398. a.
- Coufin* (President) denies a thing concerning President Ferrier, and the Chancellor de l'Hospital, which appears very probable. III. 38. a. Quoted. 215. a. b.
- Coza*, the name of the Sultan's Preceptor. IV. 425. a.
- Cragius* criticized with respect to the Lacedemonian habit. III. 968. b.
- Craig* (John) the design of his Theologie Christianæ Principia Mathematica. V. 835.
- Cramail* (the Count de) engages the Abbot of St Cyran to handle his Question Royale. V. 16. a.
- Cramier* (Daniel) Professor of Divinity at Stetin, and Super-intendant of the churches of Pomerania. IV. 210. n. (a).
- Crantor*, his book of Consolation. II. 561. a. b.
- Craon* (the Baron de) what effect a sermon had upon him. III. 60.
- Crapula*, the meaning of that word in the time of St Augustin. I. 567. a. b. 568. a.
- Craffus*, the Orator, does not desire that his readers should be altogether ignorant or very learned men. IV. 593. a.
- Craffus* rallies Dejotarus; but his raillery is returned. II. 630. b. His defeat and death. V. 273.
- Cræta* commits incest with her son. IV. 562. b. 563. a.
- Crates*, what he did to dissuade Hipparchia from the resolution she had taken to marry him. III. 457, 458. Where and how he consummated his marriage. 458. a.
- Cratippus*, his conference with Cicero and Nigidius. IV. 370. b.
- Crayfish*, whose shell represented an ax. V. 312. b. 313. a.
- Creation*; there is a book of the creation which was ascribed to Abraham. I. 45. b. All the Philosophers are constrained to admit of a creation. 304. b. 305. a. b. Those who deny it, must necessarily admit of mischievous Genii, as well as beneficent ones in the universe. II. 251. a. The importance of this doctrine. ibid. and b. It is necessary to admit of the creation of matter. III. 650. a. b. 651. a. And of that of motion, if we would conceive that God framed the world. IV. 436. b. 437. a. b. &c.
- Creators*, their Obediential power, according to the Schoolmen. II. 662. a. b. Their conservation is a continual creation. IV. 886. a. b.
- Credulity*, destroyed by her own fruitfulness. I. 87. a. Is the source of the multiplication of miracles. ibid. Blame-worthy in the Orthodox as well as in Heretics. 198. a. Reflexions upon the inclination of people to Credulity. II. 879. b. 880. a.
- Creed* (Apostles) whether the Apostles formed it by pieces. V. 435. b. 436. a.
- Cregut*, his apology. III. 596. a. b. 597. a. b.
- Crellius*, his opinion about the souls of beasts. IV. 905. a.
- Cremutius Cordus*, put to death by Tiberius, and for what reason. II. 355. b. n. (37).
- Cregui* (the Marshal de) his judgment of a Prior after having conversed fifteen days with him. II. 374. b. n. (57).
- Cregui* (the Duke of) Ambassador at Rome, receives an insult there which is said to have proceeded originally from a passion of gallantry. II. 470. b. A Legate à Latere comes to Paris to make satisfaction for it. ibid. n. (19).
- Crescentius* endeavours to retain to himself the sovereign power at Rome. IV. 428. In what manner he was punished for it. 429. a. b.
- Cressy*, reasons which facilitated the treaty of peace that was concluded there. III. 95. a. The Dauphin's protestation against it. ibid.
- Crevant*, the siege of that town. II. 461. and a.
- Cretutz* (Ernest John) has translated into Latin Boccalini's Pistra del Paragone Politico. II. 39. a.
- Crimes*; whether it be lawful to save one's life, or that of any other, by a crime. I. 91. a. b. Crimes of state are generally hooked in by Priests in their accusations. 30. and a. Crimes are maintained by crimes. II. 736. b. No crimes are committed without some prospect of advantage. 346. b. There are some which can only be committed by great men. III. 228. and a. The common excuse of those who commit very great ones. 858. b. It is a principle of the Natural as well as of the Divine law, that a man ought not to commit crimes with an intention to serve God. II. 576. a.
- Crinitus* (Peter) censured touching the name of a Tragedy. I. 59. b. His mistakes concerning Cæsius Severus. II. 358. a. b. He confounds a passage of Suetonius with regard to Cæsar and Catullus. 394. a. b. Makes verses in praise of an Assassin. III. 716. a. b.
- Crispus*, put to death by Constantine. III. 18. a. b. 19. a. b. 20. a.
- Critias* was an Atheist. II. 571. b. &c.
- Critical Learning*, the study of it is fallen. I. 220. b.
- Criticism*, a fatality inseparable from it. II. 773. a. It is permitted to jest in Criticism, but not to reason wrong. III. 631. b. How dangerous a work it is. 853. b.
- Critics* are liable to heap chimera's on chimera's. I. 35. b. Such as take advantage of an equivocal expression, ought not to omit the favourable sense. 119. b. The edge of their genius is often greatly blunted. 419. a. An instance of the confusion which they sometimes occasion in the commonwealth of learning. 543. and a. b. They seldom agree on the reading of the manuscripts. ibid. a. They sometimes change the readings to serve a turn, and when they do not understand them. ibid. b. It is surprizing that two excellent Critics should not have known a fact which few men of letters are ignorant of. ibid. Nothing contributes more to the multiplying of mistakes in their writings, than the licence which they take of extending, farther than they ought, the authorities upon which they build. II. 351. a. Such as criticize books, ought not to be confounded with the writers of satires and defamatory libels. 389. a. b. The reason of it. ibid. Those Critics who found fault with the book de Usu Patrum, do really commend it. 582. a. The most learned are apt to give us very false corrections. 633. a. Their illusions. 634. a. They were wont to put a piece of wax upon such places of

- of a book as seemed obscure to them. 640. b. The quarrels of Critics are useful in one sense, and scandalous in another. III. 253. b. 254. a. Whether such of them as are authors themselves, be more to be dreaded than others. 337. a. b. Their taste is far from being uniform. 589. a.
- Critolaus*, the Peripatetic, sent to Rome. II. 329. b.
- Cræsus* dismisses Solon without giving him any mark of his esteem. II. 831. a. Causes golden tiles to be consecrated in the temple of Delphos. IV. 622. b.
- Croisus* (or the members of the Crusade) why they did not succeed. I. 774. b.
- Croix* (Mr de la) his Etat présent des Nations & Eglises, &c. III. 4. n. (f).
- Crois*, it is said that the inscription of it was found at Rome in the Pontificate of Innocent. VIII. III. 566.
- Crotone* reformed from its luxury and debauchery by Pythagoras. IV. 667. a. b.
- Crown*: a woman that recovered, by her leudness, a crown which she could not preserve by her courage. II. 523.
- Crown-lands*. The States-General in France, will not consent to alienate them. III. 409. a.
- Croze* (Mr de) cited. I. 47. a. n. (3). II. 398. n. (a). 558. a. n. (3). IV. 809. a. n. (5).
- Crucifix*, the nocturnal apparitions of one to Bencius. I. 747. a.
- Crusades* justified. I. 710. a.
- Cræsus*, his blunder with respect to Stobæus, in a passage where he mentions Epicurus. II. 774. a. b. Other blunders of the same author. 775. a.
- Crusade* proved unsuccessful, and for what reasons. V. 339.
- Cuckold*, (voluntary) II. 239. a. Such an one excites the indignation of all the world against him. 60. a. A dispute about that word. III. 630. b. 631. a. b.
- Cuckoldom*, a common-place of consolation for that disgrace. I. 699. b. 670. a. It was what the Ancients prayed might light upon evil-doers. II. 247. b. Wished for in the form of an imprecation. 742. a. In some climates, husbands learn to bear that disgrace with patience. 743. a. b. Whether a man should carry it to be registered in the parliament rolls. 845. a. V. 112. a. b. In what case a husband may publish it without reproach. ibid.
- Cuckold*, a Comedy writ upon them, intitled, Nepheleococcy or Cloud of Cuckolds, which is very obscene, but full of invention, and seasoned with a good deal of sprightliness and wit. III. 883. a. b.
- Cujas*; an account of his daughter's conduct. V. 240. b. 241. a.
- Cui bono*, who was the author of that maxim. II. 346. and b. 347. a. And upon what principle it is founded. 346. b.
- Cunæus* abuses Aristotle for a piece of folly, which he never was guilty of. I. 466. a. An anecdote letter of his. V. 535. a. b.
- Cunilago*; the virtue of that plant. V. 334. a. b.
- Cups* of a prodigious size. III. 205. b. 206. a. b.
- Curate*, one who could not read the church books of the fairest character, and yet distinguished the smallest dice. III. 762. b. How the Curate of Midiani was excited to pray for the King. IV. 457. a. b. One who refused to pray for the health of a sick person, and why. 487. b. Those of Paris at law with the Jesuits. I. 167. a. n. (2).
- Curates*, there have been parishes which obliged them to keep each a concubine, that the honour of their wives might be secured. III. 345. a.
- Curator* of the university of Leyden, to whom that office was commonly given. I. 787.
- Curcellens* censured. II. 27. a. b. An extract from one of his letters to the Sieur Sorbiere touching Pope Alexander. VII. 475. b. He engages to attack Marelius. 583. b.
- Curio* (Augustin) confounds himself greatly in speaking of the Saracens. I. 15. a.
- Curiosity*. A remarkable example of private curiosity. I. 212.
- Cusanus* (Cardinal) quoted. I. 617. a. b.
- Cuspinian*, notes upon his Cæsars by Hungerus. III. 534.
- Custom*, its authority. I. 446. a. b. It concerns every body to conform to the customs of the places where they are. II. 645. a. Why it blunts the V O L. V. No. CXLV.
- senation. IV. 514. a. b. Can render innocent in one country, that which is contrary to public decency in another. II. 645. and a. Its caprices. 634. a.

D.

- Dacier* (Mr) limits the epithet of Achæmenides, to the time of Darius the son of Hyftaspes. I. 72. b. 73. a. Censures Vossius for confounding an Orator with a Poet. II. 354. a. Examination of that censure. ibid. His inattention. 388. a. b. III. 907. a. What he says concerning the genealogy of Drusus and Tiberius. II. 714. b. What he says of Lollius. III. 860. a. b. Gives a proof of his excellent judgment, in declaring for Horace against Quintilian, with respect to Lucilius. 908. a.
- Dacier* (Madam) understood a passage of Plato concerning Prodicus, better than Cresfollius. IV. 783. b.
- Dacquin*, a converted Jew, gives in a deposition against Concini and his wife. III. 125. b. 126. a.
- Demomagia*, a book of Elichius's, which the Magistrates of Marburg had a mind to suppress; but which he got published, notwithstanding their prohibition. II. 750. and a. b.
- Dæmons*: whether Dæmons can be the passive or active subjects of any generation. II. 751. b. Their original according to the Rabbins. 855. b. The doctrine of the Pagans concerning them. V. 572. a. b. A treatise on the nature of Dæmons. I. 294. Whether their apparitions were related by Rhetorical figures. V. 73. a. b.
- Daille*, his answer to Father Adam has remained without a reply. I. 108. and a. b. What he says of the Fathers in general, and of St Augustin in particular. 109. b. His books are commended by the Archbishop of Paris. 264. a. His treatise concerning the right use of the Fathers. II. 582. a. b. His quarrel with Marelius was soon ended. 583. a. He had a great share in Balzac's esteem. 584. b. His answer to the invectives of some passionate Lutherans. III. 218. a. Has not traced Campain and Whitaker's dispute. 940. a. The reproaches which are cast upon him by Cottibi, and Father Adam, touching Mr Morus. IV. 274. a. The opinion which Mr Morus had of him. 276. b. What censures he passes upon the title of Saint given to Origen by Cottibi. 412. and a. b. 413. a. b. &c. What he says of Tertullian. V. 142. b. With what view he read the accounts of travellers. 427. b. He filled the place of Samuel Durant at Charenton. II. 727. His answers to the reproaches of the Catholics touching the alteration of a passage in the Psalter. IV. 164. a. b.
- Daille*, the son, quoted touching a book of his father's. I. 108. a.
- Daimachus*: whether Ephorus could be his plagiarist. II. 773. a. b.
- Dalechamp*, a famous Physician, and of great practice. I. 536. b. Unhappy those who take things upon trust from him. 372. b. His translation of the verses of Ibius, cited by Athenæus, is neither free from faults of omission nor commission. IV. 232. a. A passage in his translation of Athenæus censured. II. 557. a. b. 558. a.
- Damage*; whether one is always obliged to make it up by restitution, or some other way. I. 13. b.
- Damagetus*, King of Jalyfus, for what reason he asked Aristomenes to give him one of his daughters in marriage. II. 650. a.
- Damianus* (Peter) what answer he made to the question which Agnes, widow to the Emperor Henry III, asked of him. III. 80. b. His Gomorrhæus. II. 588. a. b. 599. a. b. V. 855. a. b.
- Damnation* (Eternal) the Mystics are much exclaimed against, for giving their consent to it. IV. 943. a. b.
- Damned*: what the opinion of Prudentius was, concerning their state and number. IV. 788. b. 789. a.
- Damophila*; her hymns composed to the honour of Diana. IV. 554.
- Danaï*, a Courtesan, being condemned to death, when she came to the place of execution, dropt a most insolent murmur against providence. III. 779. b.

- Dancing* justly condemned by the Reformed Churches. V. 23. b.
- Dantean* (Lambert), cabals against the authority of the States of Holland in favour of England. II. 688. a. Commits some faults in speaking of Marcion. IV. 107. a. b.
- Dante* defeated in Scotland by the valour of a peasant. III. 332.
- Danger*: when the danger is over, people are apt to forget the vows which they made to God. II. 649. a.
- Danbawerus* overthrows the pacific design of the Elector Palatine. III. 526. b.
- Daniel*, neither he, nor the Angel which instructed him, nor the soul of Jesus Christ, understood his numbers. II. 122. a. b.
- Daniel* (Father) his hypothesis concerning the souls of beasts refuted. IV. 909. a. b. Quoted. I. 670. His defence of St Augustin against Mr de Launoi. III. 745. b.
- Danish women*, what is said of them in the memoirs of Beaujeu. II. 821. a.
- Dante*, the Poet; what revenge he took upon Prince Charles de Valois, and the reason of it. II. 296. a. b. His Comedy of Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise. 592. b. 593. a. b. He affords some proofs to those who say that he was a good Catholic, and to those who say he was not. 595. b. The answer which he made to the Prince of Verona. 596. b. He boasts of the share he had in Guido Cavalcante's friendship. 399.
- Darius*, the different anxieties which he undergoes on his wife's account. IV. 6. a.
- Darkness*; the removal of the darkness mentioned by Moses, was only with respect to the corporeal eye. I. 306. a. The darkness which happened during our Saviour's passion. IV. 624. b. 625. a. b.
- Darmstadt* bravely defended, but taken by storm during the war of Smalcalde. III. 386. b.
- Darnall* quoted. IV. 610. b. V. 528. b.
- Dassow* called an Heretic in point of love. II. 601. b. His zeal for the Dukes of Savoy. 602. b. 603. a. He is ill used by Loret. 604. a. b. Incurs the displeasure of the ladies at Montpellier. 601. b. III. 406. a.
- Date* ought to be nicely observed in prefaces. I. 493. a. The date of the setting up of a monument, taken for that of his death who was to be buried there. II. 515. n. (d).
- Dalbennus* (Peter) obtains, from the Elector Palatine, a retreat at Frankendal. III. 362. b. 363. a.
- Daughter*: It is not true that a daughter always follows her mother's example, whether it be good or bad. II. 702. a. Of what use daughters are in families sometimes. V. 34. a.
- Daughters of Adam*, their names. I. 23. a.
- David*, whether two families of his race passed into Spain at the time of the destruction of the first temple. I. 41. a. The explanation which the author has joined to that article, full of submission to the holy Scripture. V. 798. 807. The author's correction of that article. ibid.
- David*, Preacher to the King of Navarre, some particulars concerning him. IV. 324. b. 325. a.
- Davila*, his calumnies against Francis I, are unluckily too easy to be confuted. III. 94. a. He and Maimbourg directly contradict each other in their narrative touching the Duke of Guise. 292. b. 293. a. He falsely accuses a Minister of having preached up, that the French ought not to obey their King, and that they might lawfully kill him. IV. 920. a. Quoted and censured. ibid. and b. V. 529. a. b.
- Davison* renounces Astrology, and applies himself to Physic. IV. 258. b.
- Dawbin of France*; they give him Bongar's letters to read. II. 68. a.
- Dauphiné*; what a considerable place was that of the Civil and Criminal Recorder to the Parliament of Dauphiné. IV. 538. a.
- Daurat* compares the Parliament of Paris to Plato's Androgynes. III. 873. b.
- Day*, a Dissertation upon that subject. V. 775. Remarks on the definition of the Natural and Artificial Day. ibid. Nations who reckoned by nights. 776. Of the Civil and Astronomical Day. ibid. and 777. Inconveniences of the line of the point of Day. ibid. b. 778. a. b. They who go round the world, get or lose a Day. 778, 779. Puteanus has ill expressed himself in saying, that those who go round the world eastward lose a Day. 780. Authors who have committed the same fault as he. ibid. Pliny, Bembus, and Scaliger, criticized. 781. & seq. How two contagious places may differ twenty-four hours, as to the beginning of the Day. 779.
- Dead*; Urban Regius was of opinion that we should pray for them. IV. 854.
- Death*; there is little stress to be laid on the reports that are spread about the death of great men, and of distinguished authors. I. 88. a. b. 655. and b. 656. a. b. Moralists ought to be reserved in their reflexions on this head. I. 88. a. b. What should be the disposition of all men at the approach of death. 216. a. A thought of Arceilas concerning death. 413. Persons who promised to appear after their death. 631. II. 65. and b. 66. a. A common-place of consolation for death. I. 699. b. 700. a. b. An extraordinary death which was attributed to a just judgment of God, both by the Orthodox and Heterodox. II. 19. a. Rash and hasty reflexions are made on the death of Heretics. 373. b. 374. a. What some Pagans said of death. 418. a. b. 419. a. b. &c. It is a favour to the wretched. III. 643. b. 644. a. Lewis XI, King of France, had given strict charge that no man should pronounce that word to him. 803. b. 807. a. IV. 320. b. The grounds of consolation, which Epicurus and Lucretius alledged against death, considered. III. 926. a. b. 927. a. b. The Spinozists have no solid ground of consolation against it. 928. b. A resolution taken that the decrees of death should not be executed till the tenth day after sentence. 955. b. The doctrine of several Pagans concerning the characters of death. IV. 788. a. Reflexions upon sudden death. V. 439. a. b. How the Pagans recommended themselves to God, at the point of death. 628. b.
- Debauchees* raise people's contempt and horror, when they do not observe the rules of decency. IV. 232. a. b. They deserve to have no countenance shewn them, but their books ought to be cried down. III. 136. a.
- Debts*: Princes do not always make a conscience of paying their debts. II. 206. b.
- Decalogue*; its laws are impracticable in the state that mankind is in. II. 65. b. The sense of the seventh commandment perverted. 243. a.
- Decameron* of Boccace, facts concerning that book. II. 35. b. 36. a. b. The old translator of it. 36. a.
- Decannibus* conspires against Archelaus, and for what reason. II. 869. a.
- Deceive*: Sometimes a man deceives people by declaring his true intentions to them. I. 129. a. b. Nothing is more easy than to deceive those who never deceived others. 745. a. It is lawful to deceive children and sick persons. III. 319. a.
- Decemvirate* abrogated, and for what reason. I. 350.
- Decency*. The most dissolute persons are often religious observers of decency. IV. 407. a.
- Decibals*: his judgment of Peter Nonnius. IV. 382. b.
- Decimator*: a criticism on his faults touching the Preceptor of Achilles. I. 78. a. Statius is not in the least favourable to him. 79. a. b.
- Decisive* authors find themselves sometimes lead into a scrape. I. 76. b.
- Decius* was not denied entrance into the Church by St Babylas. I. 592. a. b. 593. a. b.
- Decius* (Philip), to what height the jealousy of profession between him and Mainus was carried. IV. 67. a.
- Deckber*, his mistake touching the book intitled Brutum Fulmen. III. 521. a. And touching the writing of Optatus Gallus. IV. 100. b.
- Deckber* (Conrad), accused by Father Labbe of having confounded Radulphus Flaviacensis with Ralph Higden. IV. 824. a.
- Declaimers*: their common fate. V. 798.
- Declamatory Speeches* that were made on imaginary subjects. II. 358. b.
- Decorum*: a decorum is always observed by the most profligate men when they can reap no advantage by offending against it. V. 160. a.
- Decrees* (Academical, Synodal, &c.) the manner in which they are extorted sometimes. I. 137. b. 138. a. b. 715. b.

Dicitur

- Decrees* often contain honourable things, which, properly speaking, are nothing but compliments. IV. 147. b. Were formerly stuffed with Greek and Latin. II. 105. b.
- Decretes* (the compilers of). The contempt and indignation which Mr de Mauillac expresses against the modern compilers of Decrees or arrêts. II. 562. a.
- Dedication*; one that was rewarded with a pension of three hundred crowns. I. 428.
- Defects*: some defects have given names to illustrious families. I. 610. a.
- Deification* (Poetical) of an illustrious lady. I. 398. a.
- b.* All sorts of languages were employed in it. 399. a.
- Dejanus* conceals his true sentiments from Cæsar. II. 625. b. A verse which he applied to two pieces of news which he had received at the same time.
627. a. He refuses to acknowledge that the science of Auguries, to which he was extremely addicted, had deluded him. 629. a. Cicero's Reflexions upon that head. ibid. n. (43). The ingenious answer which that King made to Crassus's railery. 630. b. His Embassadors over-reached by Mark Antony. III. 116. b.
- Deism*, when it began first to be talked of. V. 482. b. 483. a. See Impious.
- Deity*: The most profligate wretches mentioned in History have acknowledged a Deity. II. 257. b. A Deity which was so much the more respected by being unknown. 418. a. It requires a certain maniac force of mind to deny the existence of a Deity. 450. b. 451. a. and 648. a. 649. a. There are two sorts of unbelievers, with regard to the existence or non-existence of the Deity. 648. a. Why Lucan imagined that the Deity was better known in Greece and Italy than at Marseilles. 678. a. The Pagans laid great weight upon tradition, when they were to prove the existence of a Deity. 872. b. Whether a person that has lost all ideas of this may not still retain the ideas of virtue. III. 671. a. Some Heathens maintained the mortality of the deities of the second rank. 349. a. Numa would not have the Deity to be represented by any images. IV. 675. a. The fear and love of the Deity are not the only spring of human actions. V. 811.
- Delicacy*. The ridiculous delicacy of Garaffe, with regard to the word lavement. III. 136. b.
- Delivered*: a ridiculous custom observed in several countries, with respect to women newly delivered. V. 346. and a. 347. a. b.
- Delis*, its inhabitants were the first that crammed hens. III. 6. a.
- Delphians*, what they did in order to deliver themselves from the Pestilence and Famine with which they were punished for the death of Elop. II. 831. a.
- Delphos*, its temple seized upon and pillaged. IV. 621, 622. The gold and silver taken out of it, when turned into current money, amounted to ten thousand talents. 623. a. Its temple burnt by Phlegyas, and the punishment which Apollo inflicted upon him. 626.
- Del-Rio* confuted touching the Magic art of Agrippa. I. 152. a. 153. a.
- Deluge*; it is impossible to penetrate beyond it without the assistance of Moses. II. 854. b. Mechlinius, disciple of Albertus Magnus, maintains, that it was caused by the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn, &c. IV. 940. b. 941. a. b.
- Deluge*: the alarms that were occasioned by the prediction of an universal deluge. V. 243. a. 244. a. b. A prophecy that it was to happen in the year 1524 causes a mighty consternation. ibid.
- Demades* proposes to the Athenians that Alexander should be put in the number of the great gods. IV. 405. a.
- Δημαγωγός*, how that word ought to be translated. II. 714. b.
- Demagogus* kept the Republic of Athens in a state of true slavery. IV. 581. b.
- Demejia*: there is not any more inalienable than that which is founded upon mechanical passions. II. 531. a.
- Demetrius* censures the Athenians for their want of courage. III. 714. a. His thought has been disfigured by Athenæus's translator. ibid. He demands 250 talents of the Athenians, to be laid out in buying soap for his courtizans. ibid. Was easily induced to new marriages. IV. 662. a.
- Democritus*, the judgment which the Abderites formed of him. I. 20. b. II. 638. a. He neglects his temporal concerns. 635. a. b. A story that is told of his sagacity. 636. a. b. Was thought worthy of divine honours on account of some of his predictions. 641. a. What we are to think of his opinion about nature, which he calls God. 642. b. Whether it be very different from the opinion of Father Mallebranche. ibid. Whether a man of mean parts is capable of forming such an opinion. ibid. 643. a. His system of Atoms is not by much so absurd as Spinozism. 644. and a. How he defines the Vencreal Aft. ibid. a. b. He attributed all things to a necessitating destiny. 790. a. b. Seems to have assigned a soul to every atom. III. 790. b. 791. a. b.
- Demonstration* (moral), the true nature of it. I. 707. a. b. &c.
- Demonstratives*: why the brightest orations have been ascribed to the demonstrative kind. IV. 783. a.
- Demosthenes*: the longer his orations were, the finer they were. I. 427. b. A witty saying of his to those that were praising Philip as a great drinker. II. 598. a. He feigns a fore throat upon a certain occasion, that he might not be obliged to speak. III. 355. b. His apostrophe to Minerva. IV. 582. b. He is told in jest that his orations smelt of oil. 678. b. Callistratus induced him to dedicate himself entirely to the study of Eloquence. I. 259. Some pretend that he was a disciple of Plato. ibid.
- Demosthenes* (Polish), Stanislaus Orichovius was so called. IV. 411.
- Demyster*; there is no relying upon the authorities which he cites. IV. 542. a.
- Desir Royal*: a book wrote by Scipio de Grammont under that title. III. 210. What Naudé says of it. ibid. a. b.
- Denis the Carthusian* answers Gerfon's Critical Dissertation upon the spiritual marriage of Ruysbroeck. IV. 942. Is not one of those who turned into Latin the works of Ruysbroeck. 943. b.
- Denmark*; what the power of the High-Steward was there. V. 500. a. b.
- Denotes* abuses the authors of Tragi-Comic Pastorals very much. III. 259. a.
- Despt*, its university founded by Gustavus Adolphus. V. 660.
- Des-Adrets*; the reason why he embraced the Protestant party. I. 712. b. 713. a. He imitates St Paul's Evangelical Salutation. ibid. b.
- Des-Barreaux* was a famous Libertine. II. 649. b. 650. a. b.
- Des Cartes*, his epitaph. I. 309. a. Accused of Atheism. 327. a. Has justice done him. ibid. His argument for the existence of a God. 345. b. V. 495. b. 496. a. His followers have discovered a want of moderation. I. 472. b. From whom he borrowed some of his notions. II. 158. b. Des-Barreaux comes from Paris to Holland on purpose to see him. 647. a. His is praised in a Funeral Oration, by order of the first Magistrate of Utrecht. 766. b. His disinterestedness. III. 340. b. 341. a. b. The judgment he passes upon Astrology. 499. a. b. Who was his master in Optics. 659. b. 660. a. In what he has only revived the notions of other Philosophers. 788. b. 789. a. Reflexion upon the doubting which he requires, in order to come at the certainty of truth. IV. 81. b. His modesty truly Philosophical. 267. a. b. His maxim touching the suspension of our judgment ought not to be admitted in the affair of religion. 363. a. His notion of the manner in which the world might have been made. 437. b. His objections against a piece of Mr de Fermat. 485. a. Mr de Roberval answers these objections. ibid. Whether he may be looked upon as the inventor of the opinion which he had concerning the souls of beasts. 546. and a. 547. a. b. &c. Whether the seeds of his doctrine about the Automata are to be found in the Antients. 551. b. in 554. a. b. He acknowledges that his maxim, God can neither deceive nor be deceived, admits of a great many exceptions. 875. and b. 876. and a. b. &c. His doctrine about the souls of beasts rids us of a great many difficulties. 901. b. 902. a. b. &c. He is nevertheless deserted in this point by several of his followers. 902. b.

Deserters:

- Deferret*; their business is to please by agreeable lies. III. 719. b.
- Deferret* of a sect are generally not to be credited in what they say against it. II. 782. b.
- Defiderius* (Archbishop of Vienna), sharply reprov'd by St Gregory, and for what reason. III. 223. b. 224. a.
- Defors*; one ought to confine them within narrow bounds. II. 200. a.
- Deflandis* (the Abbot) has related an apocryphal story concerning Charnace. II. 446. b. Touching Fernelius. ibid. III. 25. a.
- Defsons* (John), Dean and Theologal of Senlis, has published some treatises against the rejoicings of the twelfth-day. IV. 299.
- Despauterius*; some of his verses taken for violent exorcisms. II. 147. a.
- Despaut*, a title of honour which the Greeks gave to the eastern Christian Princesses. IV. 52. a. b.
- Despreaux*; his satires stand in need of a commentary already. I. 35. b. n. 1. II. 600. b. His satire on the fair-sex. I. 639. a. His ruttng hind a false comparison. 641. a. He has perfectly well translated what Horace and Juvenal have said of the war which men make with one another. 639. b. 640. a. What it is he puts among the moral impossibilities. II. 650. a. b. Censured by Des Marets on the subject of Alexander. IV. 9. a. b. One cannot come into his opinion touching the four verses which he ascribes to Nero. 596. b. An observation in his Art Poétique examined. 744. a. b. He makes an excuse for not celebrating the King's victories. V. 361. a. Has not contradicted himself with respect to Moliere. IV. 744. a. b.
- Destiny*. See Fate.
- Devils*. The Devil mimicks God in all his works. I. 5. a. Whether he makes use of a rod as one of his occasional causes. ibid. In what case it would be better to harangue the Devils than men. 491. b. Two Devils examined. 698. b. 699. a. Several have been of opinion that the Devils could beget children. II. 113. b. 114. a. A compact entered into with the Devil. 243. a. b. The conquest which he obtained over the first woman was not a very glorious one. 852. b. It is astonishing that Christian Judges should admit the testimony of Devils as true, and reject the exceptions made against them. III. 213. a. The Devil opposes the truths which God declares to men. IV. 46. a. How he came to oppose the establishment of Mahometism. ibid. b. Whether it can well be concluded from the existence of Devils, that there is no God. 938. b. 939. a. The denying that the Devil has any power cannot be reconciled with the Scripture. 938. b. The great extent of his kingdom. V. 577. b. c. How far the progress of his arms goes. 578. a. b. He reigns much more in the time of war than in the time of peace. ibid. Martin del Rio does not argue consequentially upon certain extraordinary facts which he ascribes to the Devils. 597. and a. b. The Devil incapable of Atheism, and the promoter of all the sins of mankind. 813. The squabbles which the Devils had with Savonarola, of whom they were afraid. 72. b. A dramatical writer who often brings the Devils upon the stage. II. 478. a. b. The Devil suggests false glosses on the Scripture to Calvin, according to Hunnius. III. 538. b. 539. a. Discovers all his malice in Pareus's book. ibid. and b.
- Devout*; those who are fond of them, ascribe many more things to them than they themselves pretend to. V. 72. a.
- Devotion*; what is the most powerful motive to keep it up in the heart of man. II. 783. b. 784. a. There is nothing more dangerous to the mind, than too mystical and too abstracted devotions. IV. 87. b.
- Devout*. The jargon and mystical phrases of some devout women. IV. 926. a. b. c. A devout life suitable even to the temporal interests of men. V. 754. b. 755. a.
- Deuterofes*, or Jewish traditions, by whom compiled. I. 173. b. The observance of them reaches even to the close-stool. 174. a. b.
- Dexippus*, his love for his native-country. IV. 175. b.
- Diana*, an illustrious house. V. 194. a.
- Diabolus Sacramentarius*; the title of a book composed by the Lutheran John Schutzius. V. 89.
- Diacettin* conspires against Cardinal Julian de Medicis. IV. 11. b.
- Diagoras* (the Rhodian) a famous Athlet. I. 762. b. A compliment which a Lacedemonian made to him, differently related by Cicero and Plutarch. II. 651. a. b. He was the son of Mercury. 652. a.
- Diagoras*, firnamed the Atheist, what it was that hurried him into his impiety. II. 652. a. b. He publishes the motives of his apostacy. 654. a. Was really an Atheist. 656. b.
- DiallaBicon*, a book writ by John Poinet upon the subject of the Eucharist. IV. 692. Printed together with Bertran's treatise de Corpore & Sanguine Christi. ibid. b. And with the book of the Physician Harchius. 693. b. n. (15). And infered in the first volume of Beza's Opuscula. ibid. a. Translated into French, and ascribed to Antony Cooke. ibid. The Doctrine of it explained by Andrew Rivet, and John Cousin. ibid.
- Dialogue*; the rules of it. II. 809. b. 810. a. The title of a very pleasant dialogue, against those writers who love to make use of obsolete phrases. I. 69. b. 70. a.
- Diamond*; one sold at a very low price. II. 219. b.
- Diana* had not a Virgin-sacrifice, in the person of Iphigenia. I. 84. a. An admirable statue of that goddess. II. 203. Several Pagan cities boasted that they had the true statue of Diana. 530. a. b. 531. a. In what place her priestesses boasted of being able to walk on burning coals without hurt. ibid. a. An Historian's reflexion on the way how she came to let her temple at Ephesus be burnt. III. 59. a. b. IV. 405. b. V. 360. a. Where and when it was that they sung the hymns, which Damophila had compos'd to the honour of that goddess. IV. 554.
- Diana of Poitiers*; facts that concern her. IV. 160. a. b. 161. a.
- Dias* (John) in what manner he was massacred by his brother. II. 697. a. b.
- Dicæarchus* opposed the immortality of the soul. II. 657. b. A reasoning against his system. 658. a. b. The objections to that reasoning considered. 660. b. 661. a. b. &c.
- Diætor*; who was the first Roman that died in that office. III. 490.
- Dictionary*; what an hard matter it is to compose a Dictionary of Authors. I. 547. b.
- Dictionaries*, nothing should be suppressed in them. I. 80. b. Advice to those who make Supplements to them. 86. b. It is a great misfortune when people that compose them, have not all the necessary books. 331. b. An unpardonable omission censured. 398. a. The Italian Dictionary of the Academy della Crusca meets with almost as many Critics as Readers. 748. a. Historical Dictionaries do not sufficiently clear the chaos of facts, which they relate. 768. b. It is the fate of Dictionaries to improve by being often printed. II. 279. a. Dictionary of the Bible; a remark on one of its articles. 615. b. 616. a. b. The author of this Dictionary thought himself obliged to please sometimes one sort of people, and sometimes another. III. 173. b. Why he gives sometimes a greater extent to his remarks than the text requires. 871. b. The author of a Dictionary is sometimes transcribed by persons who know more than himself. IV. 496. b. A general observation against those who censure this one. 744. b. 745. a. Of all writers, those of Dictionaries ought least to be over scrupulous. V. 133. b. The nouns adjectives of inhabitants should be infered in Geographical Dictionaries. 235. The reader ought not to be surprized, when the authors sometimes make it appear in this Dictionary, that with respect to the most mysterious evangelical subjects, reason puts us to a stand. 615. a. If the gentlemen of the French Academy, would give us an universal Dictionary of all arts, they would engage in an endless work. 753. a. The writers of them take more pains to compile new things, than to mend the faults of their predecessors. 767. The nature of this Dictionary. 810. 854. Complaints made against some parts of it, and the authors conduct thereupon. 811. Had no right to represent people, otherwise than they actually were. 812. Remarks on a pamphlet intituled, The Judgment of the Public, and particularly of the Abbot Ranaud.

- Renaudot, on Mr Bayle's Critical Dictionary.* 797. to 809. How that libel should have been intitled, and its character. 797. The idea which the author had formed of his Dictionary. 800. &c. It is not true that the Chancellor of France burnt it in his house, or that he caused it to be burnt by the hand of the hangman. 806. Advertisement concerning the reprinting of part of this Dictionary. 808. Proceedings of the Walloon Consistory of Rotterdam against it. I. lxxix, lxxx, lxxxi. How that of the French academy was received. V. 809.
- Dictionary of French rhymes*; who the author of that book is. I. 65. b. 66. a.
- Didius* (Julianus) Emperor, caused all those to be burnt who consulted the Diviners, upon the Emperor's fortune. III. 955. a.
- Dido* no sooner saw Æneas, but she forgot all her fine resolutions. III. 189. a. An application of that. ibid. Was otherwise called Eliza. IV. 642. She was married to Sicharbas. ibid. Retires to Carthage. ibid.
- Die*: it is a miserable thing not to have it in our power to die when we earnestly long for it. III. 319. and a. b. A young lady who died jesting. 835. b.
- Dying*. Whether the oaths of dying persons ought to be taken for proofs. II. 55. b. They are often made to say things which they never said. III. 289. a. The Pagans applied their mouths to that of dying persons. IV. 135. b.
- Dioppe*; the precaution of Lewis XIV. was of no use to the inhabitants of that city. II. 31. b.
- Dieu* (Lewis de) in what manner he excused himself to Prince Maurice. II. 663. a.
- Difficulties*; it is only shallow wits that find difficulties no where. IV. 690. b.
- Digby* (Sir Kenelm) praised by Anglus. I. 339. a.
- Dignities*; when an honest man ought to refuse them. I. 540. a. People despise those who shew an indifference about them, and admire those who court them. II. 201. a.
- Digressions*. Effects of the spirit of digression. III. 373. b. They are a fault of which a very good use may be made. IV. 619. b. 620. a. People are not always reasonable in the censure which they pass upon them. V. 329. b. 330. a.
- Dijon*; a miracle which is told of a Senator of that city. III. 386. b.
- Dilemma against marriage*, who is the author of it. II. 13. b. 14. a.
- Dina*, a Danish woman, convicted of slander, and as such condemned to lose her head. V. 501. a.
- Dinant*; that town treated with the utmost rigour. II. 216. a. b.
- Diocles*; his surprize the first time he saw Epicurus in a temple. II. 784. a.
- Dioclesian* used to say that there is nothing more difficult than to reign well. I. 573. b.
- Diadorus Siculus*; what he says of the faults of Historians. V. 358. a. 359. b. What Pliny says of him. II. 82. a.
- Diadorus the Sophist*, a witty answer which Herophilus the Physician made to him. V. 618. b. 619. a.
- Diogenes Laërtius* generally did not know what he said, when he abridged the opinions of the Philosophers. I. 298. b. Although an Epicurean, he does not blame the peccavi of Bion. II. 13. b. Was not acquainted with all the stratagems of authors. 643. b.
- Diogenes of Apollonia*; his doctrine touching the first cause. II. 672. a. b. His system hardly differed at all from Spinozism. ibid. b. How he philosophized upon the production of the world. ibid. &c.
- Diogenes the Cynic*; his answer to Antisthenes, when he took a cudgel to turn him out. II. 665. a. And to Alexander. 667. b. 668. a. His eloquence. 669. a. b. He stood up in defence of the most abominable impurities. 669. b. III. 458. b. 459. a. b. Whether he was an Atheist. II. 670. and a. b. 671. a. He is taken by a Pirate, and draws an argument against providence from his slavery. III. 357. a. b. What must have been his sentiments touching the souls of beasts. IV. 547. a. b. He was not so far from Platonism, as it is commonly thought. ibid. b. Labourd to make himself insensible. ibid. Whether he made a good answer to the Philosopher who denied motion. V. 617. b. 618. a.
- V O L. V.
- Diogenes the Stic* sent to Rome. II. 675. b. Preaches by example upon patience. 674. a.
- Diomedes*; the explication of the fable which makes him to have fed his mares with the flesh of his guests. III. 712. b.
- Dion*; a wrong observation which he makes upon Hadrian's omitting the common preamble in his letter to the Senate. I. 649. b. Dion and Tacitus do not agree upon the reason, which induced Augustus to make a law against defamatory libels. II. 356. a. Dion speaks either as a bad Geographer, or as a bad Historian, touching the journey of Tiberius, towards Drusus. 716. b. He ascribes to Cicero a speech which he himself had forged. III. 114. b. He falsifies two things there, which ought to make us suspect his veracity in many others. ibid. An idle story which Guevara falsely warrants by his authority. II. 399. b. 400. a.
- Diomysus* the tyrant, how he expressed himself when he had a mind to say that a tyrant ought never to renounce his tyranny. IV. 564. b.
- Diomysus Halicarnassensis*; his good taste with respect to narratives. II. 635. b. What he relates touching the religion which Romulus established. III. 914. b. 915. a. b.
- Diomysus* falsely believed to be the Areopagite. II. 678. b.
- Diomysus* the Areopagite; who was called the second. IV. 942.
- Disparides*: it is believed that Fauſtus da Longiano had translated him into Italian, before Matthiolus published a like version. III. 861.
- Directors of consciences* are pretty often consulted, but seldom obeyed by the Christians. II. 419. a. Are seldom weary of the company of devout women. IV. 827. b. Have a great deal of business on their hands. V. 525. b.
- Disagreement* between Josephus and Tacitus, in the main circumstances of matters, that were near their time. I. 512. b.
- Discipline*; the terrible effects of that instrument. II. 700. a.
- Discipline* (Ecclesiastical) fallen into a very great relaxation. I. 223. a.
- Discipline* (Military) of a very strict and severe kind. I. 570. a. b.
- Discover*: not to discover a plot against the Government: a crime of itself capital. IV. 346. a. b.
- Discourse*: persons who find it much easier to discourse well off-hand, than to write a good book. II. 566. a. b. IV. 251. b.
- Discourses*: the ill effects of such discourses as are too free. III. 966. a.
- Discussions* (Philosophical) one should consult in them the ideas of order. V. 827.
- D'ſe*, or rather d'Yſe, Minister. III. 594. His disputes with Cregut. 596. a. b. &c.
- Dissease* (Pedicular) the Philosopher Pherecydes died of it. I. 211. b.
- Disgrace*. It is policy to pay one's court, even when they are in disgrace, to those whom we see in the road to high preferment. I. 422. a. The disgrace of cuckoldom and death have the same commonplace of consolation. 669. b. 700. a. Men endeavour to comfort themselves in their disgraces, by lessening the glory of the enemy, who has beat them. V. 659.
- Dispensation of marriage*; abstracts of the result of a congregation held at Rome for that purpose. IV. 633. a. b.
- Disputation*, what the laws of it require. IV. 934. a.
- Dispute*: what was the Dispute between Cain and Abel, according to the Targum of Jerusalem. I. 23. b. The effects of heat in a Dispute. 90. a. 309. b. Men who engage in Disputes, are commonly stronger in the offensive, than in the defensive. 598. a. Among all the Philosophical exercises, there is none where moderation is more necessary than in this. II. 847. a. We lose sight of truth by too much disputing. 848. b. and n. (33). A Dispute between two Divines, which lasted seventeen years. III. 972. a. There is not a more commodious way of coming off in a Dispute than a witty jest. IV. 713. a. b. The ill effects of Disputes. V. 229. a. b. In what the scandal of Disputes should be made at present to consist. I. 244. b.

- Their fate is such that one is scarce ever at full liberty to make use of maxims that are purely universal. 494. a. It is a great misfortune for some persons to engage in personal Disputes. One would think that their evil genius brings them to those unlucky circumstances. II. 584. b. Whence it comes that those about universal grace, are not considered now as Disputes of importance. ibid. The misfortune in Disputes of religion is, that the same persons are judges and parties. IV. 231. a. See Controversies. What a number of them would cease, would but the disputants understand one another. 347. a. The humour of disputing, is what seems the least approved in the economy of the Gospel. V. 816. A dislike for Disputes, and the love of ease induce Thomas Grynæus to retire from his employ. III. 256. When a person mentions the Disputes of authors, he should not forget to take notice of what first occasioned them. V. 352. b. Those between Calvin and Bolsec, scandalize James of Burgundy, who falls off from the doctrine of the Reformed. II. 215. a. The odious consequences which they force one to draw. III. 504. b. 505. a. b.
- Dispute* (Philosophical) the design of one. V. 816.
- Distempers*: the mind is subject to Epidemical Distempers as well as the body. I. 19. a. III. 948. b. Whether they made part of the primitive scheme of providence. II. 496. b. 497. a. Physicians formerly made them depend much upon the influence of the stars. III. 620, 621, and a. b. Feigned Distempers have been the means of preserving the lives of some people. IV. 767. b.
- Distillatio*; the meaning of that word when it is taken for a distemper. I. 619. a.
- Distrust* is often necessary. I. 71. b.
- Dyctatus*; a very generous action which he performed. II. 532. b.
- Diversions* (public) are schools of leudness. III. 261. a.
- Divination*; how Cratippus reasoned upon that subject. II. 565. b. 566. a.
- Diviners* are generally ramblers. I. 6. a. The difference between those who foretell things after the manner of an Oracle, and other Diviners. 276. b. A Diviner who performs greater services to a Prince than any of his Generals. 447. a. Is happy when he serves a Prince whom providence designs for great purposes. ibid. b. It is not to be wondered at, if they should boast of being masters of the science of dreams. 520. b. How vain their answers are. 542. a. b. In ancient times an army never marched without having some Diviner to go along with them. II. 251. A false argument which is alledged to prove that they certainly foretold future things. IV. 182. b. The sad fate of some Diviners. 254. a.
- Divines*, a judgment that was passed upon their debates. I. 242. b. 243. a. Their disputes occasion a great many mischiefs. 261. a. b. Their answers cannot always be so strong as the objections of a Philosopher. II. 455. b. 456. a. b. Their Controversies have always very much embarrassed the Princes and Magistrates. III. 504. a. b. 505. a. b. In an assembly where a re-union is treated of, they should be reduced to the bare plain function of Advocates. 526. b. They will always be worsted in a dispute wherein people shall only have recourse to the light of nature. V. 815. Maxims of the modern Divines concerning mysteries. 817.
- Divinus* (Polemic) apt to contradict themselves. I. 352. a.
- Divines*: Court-Divines concern themselves too much with Political affairs. V. 103. b.
- Divinity* and Philosophy are two faculties, which cannot well agree about their just boundaries. I. 472. b. Human sciences are the handmaids of Divinity. II. 698. Zealots would have a man to be more determinate and resolute than Bartolus in matters of Divinity. 706. a. Whether a thing that is true in Divinity can be false in Philosophy. III. 479. a. 951. a. b. 952. a. b. 953. a. 970. a. b. See Theology.
- Divinity* (Mythical) a specimen of that doctrine. V. 302. a. b. IV. 926. a. b. 927. a. b. Ruysbroeck passed for one of the greatest masters in that science. 942. and a. b.
- Divinities*. The Pagans imagined that there were Divinities jealous of the prosperities of mankind. II. 289. a. An heroic prayer on that head. ibid. and b. See God, Gods, and Deity.
- Divisibility in infinitum* would hinder all manner of contiguity. V. 611. b. & seq. Several difficulties against the Geometrical proofs of a divisibility in infinitum. 612. a. b. 613. a. It would suppose the penetration of dimensions. 611. b. 612. a.
- Divison*; there are some cases wherein societies are not destroyed by it. IV. 271. a. b.
- Divorce*; whether it be true that all the ancient and modern Divines are agreed about that matter. IV. 217. b. 218. a.
- Divorce* (satirical), a book wrote by the Sieur d'Aubigné, quoted. IV. 334. a. b. 340. a.
- Doctors* would often be taken for great Comedians, if it were lawful for one to judge of the thoughts of others. I. 564. b. It is happy for some of them that the people never trouble themselves to demand of them any account of their doctrine. ibid. Some of them may be compared to those English maffists which Father Maimbourg speaks of in one of his sermons. 773. b. IV. 64. a. b. Do not deserve to be blamed if their minds are not always bent in conversation. II. 566. a. IV. 251. b. Doctors in Law; when, where, and upon what occasion, the custom of creating them was introduced into the universities. III. 594. Passionate Doctors, what revenge their adversaries take of them. 542. a. b. It is very rare to find among them a person that is altogether exempt from avarice and ambition. 737. b. Many Doctors forced to renounce a thesis, in which they maintained that Ego amat was as good a phrase as Ego amo. IV. 837. b. 838. a.
- Doctors* (Ecclesiastical), whether they have any reason to stand in fear of the capacities of the people. I. 565. a.
- Doctors Degree*: Laurens is obliged to pass through all his exercises again, in order to take his Doctor's Degree a second time. III. 745. a.
- Doctrines*. There are a great many authors who can discover the weak side of a doctrine to admiration, but never where the force of it lies. I. 506. b. There is hardly a better way of attacking a doctrine, than by turning it into ridicule. V. 20. a. 481. b. Those who are over-fond of particular doctrines, consider all those who oppose them as false brethren. I. 739. b. Doctrines very opposite to the true faith. II. 156. a. What a person must know in order to judge of the nature of a doctrine. V. 231. b.
- Dogmatists*; the ordinary and inevitable rock which they split upon. I. 410. a. Did not propose the arguments of both parties with the same force. II. 487. b. Have too much presumption to be good Christians. IV. 655. b.
- Dogs*. Whether Agrippa's dog was not a natural one. I. 150. b. 151. a. A thought of Cicero concerning the dogs of the Capitol. 773. b. III. 372. a. b. IV. 74. b. Never enter into the churches or mosques of Misitra. III. 430. b. 431. a. Good dogs bark against all strangers, though they may be the greatest friends of their master's house. IV. 74. b. A sermon upon the different kinds of dogs. 64. a. b.
- Dog-star*; its raging heat abated by Aristen. I. 456. b. 457. a.
- Dolabella*, why thwarted by M. Antony. III. 115. a. His manners, his conduct, and the troubles of of which he was the cause. V. 406. b. He nevertheless performs a fine action for which he is highly praised. 408. a. b.
- Doler* (Stephen) his Epistle to Marot, and his Annotations on that Poet's Hell. IV. 163. a. The friendship between these two men. ibid. b.
- Domestic Affairs*; a rule which every body ought to observe in the management of them. I. 241. b. 242. a. Those who have the most interest in knowing how they proceed, are the last who receive notice of it. 28. III. 382. a.
- Domestics*; one ought to take pains to marry them. III. 193. a. How Cato the Censor regulated his domestics. IV. 753. b. 754. a.
- Domine non sum dignus*, &c. The words of the Centurion, with which a Spanish Ambassador received a visit of James I, King of England. I. 725. a.

Dominic

- Dominic* (St), according to Mayer, had the knowledge of the Philosophers stone. I. 182. a. Whether or not he gave blows with a spit to Francis of Assisi. III. 82. b. A Nun in an ecstasy sees him come into her chamber, and bring an ointment wherewith he rubbed her leg. IV. 137. a. b.
- Dominicans* are ever at war with the Franciscans. II. 239. a. The earnestness of their Generals to get the Pugio Fidei published. IV. 167. b. Their defenses. 199. a. b. See Jacobins.
- Dominion*; two things necessary to acquire and keep it. II. 421. b.
- Domini* (Marcus Antonius de), Joseph Hall writes a letter to him representing the necessity of remaining separate from the communion of the Church of Rome. III. 344.
- Domitian* returns the dignity of Empress to a woman who had prostituted herself to a Player. II. 685. a. Employed others to compose his letters, speeches, and edicts. III. 317. a. What is told of Apollonius Tyaneus, with respect to the person who assassinated Domitian. V. 731, 732. A decree of the Senate against his memory. IV. 729. b.
- Domna*; what that name was. III. 606. b.
- Donatists*; their error about Baptism condemned in a general council. III. 742. b.
- Doricus*, son to Diogenes, the history of him. II. 651. b.
- Dorotheus*; whether there was at Tyre a Bishop of that name who suffered martyrdom. II. 752. a. b.
- Dort*; its Synod would not admit the Remonstrants as members, but only as persons cited before them. II. 793. IV. 75. a. b. V. 510. a. b. 511. a. 513. b. 514. a. b.
- Dortmund*; facts which relate to the establishment of Lutheranism in that city. II. 121. a. b.
- Doutan* (the Sieur Count de), Constable of Scotland; is defeated and taken prisoner by the Sieur de Chastelux. II. 461. a.
- Douza* (George), affectionately received by Simon Simonides. V. 149. and a. b. 150. a. b.
- Dowry*. To receive a great dowry is to lose one's liberty. II. 206. a.
- Drabicius*; some people expected that he was to baptize the grand Turk. II. 693. a. Whether the name of Drabicius was unknown in France, in the year 1690. III. 679. a. He says nothing of Tokelley. 680. a. His tragical end. 681. a.
- Draco* wrote his laws in blood; the meaning of that expression. III. 969. a.
- Dragoning* will eternally be abhorred by honest men, whatever country or religion they be of. IV. 535.
- Dreams*. Cicero ridicules the interpreters of dreams. I. 448. a. Very judicious reasonings upon that subject. 510. a. b. The vanity of them. 520. a. b. Are ways of instructing not at all worthy of those intelligences to whom we impute them. ibid. a. Divers authors who have written on the interpretation of dreams. ibid. b. 521. a. Remarks upon a dream. III. 877. b. 878. a. b. 879. a. b. How much they employ the mind sometimes. IV. 63. b. A reflexion on the truth or falshood that may be contained in dreams, and whether they are sent to advertise us of future things. 72. a. b. 73. a. b. 74. a. b. There are dreams which confound unbelievers more than they are willing to own. 78. a. b. The dream of a woman produces strange confusion through a whole kingdom. 456. a. A Philosophical dream. V. 242. b. 243. a. b.
- Drelincourt* (Charles), Minister, the answer which he made to a Bishop. I. 505. b. Preached seven times in one day. II. 695. b. Defends the Protestant Ritual by the sentiments of a famous Franciscan. III. 43. a. Answers a complaint of the Clergy of France. IV. 479. and a. b. His reproachful words to the Bishop of Belley. 650. a. An extract from his answer to Prince Ernest, Landgrave of Hesse. 826. b. 827. a. Quoted. III. 267. a. b. IV. 356. b.
- Drelincourt*, Professor of Physic, his Elogium. I. 74. The information which he gave the author, touching one of the Akakia's. 172. a. b. His character. 335. a. II. 140. b. 694. b. 695. a. 696. IV. 497. n. (r). 505. a. n. (76). V. 504. and a. b. Et passim alibi.
- Dress*; women forbid all superfluity of dress. II. 98. a. b. 99. a. b.
- Drislenburgh* (Vincent) sets up for a prophet. I. 654. a.
- Drink*. Their way of drinking at Lacedæmon. II. 574. b.
- Drinker*. What Demosthenes said to those who praised Philip, King of Macedonia, as a great drinker. II. 598. a. Hard drinkers were esteemed among the Persians. ibid.
- Drunkness*; the horrible prevalency of that vice in the university of Franeker. I. 247. a. b. Who put a stop to it. ibid. a. More detested than fornication. II. 823. b. A fresh proof that it becomes fashionable among women. V. 540. a.
- Drusians*; a small part of the history of that people. III. 3. a.
- Drusilla*, daughter of Agrippa, whether she renounced the Jewish religion. II. 701. a.
- Drusilla* (Julia), her incest with her brother Caligula. II. 702. a. b. Impieties committed after her death to honour her memory. 703. a. b.
- Drusus*, the judgment which Father Simon passes upon him. II. 704. a. b. Accused of not being a sincere Protestant; and what answer he made to this charge. 705. b. 706. a. b. His only daughter is reduced to great misery. 707. b. 708. a. He is taken for the author of a letter of Broughton's, by Rosweide and Colomies. 150. b.
- Drusus* (Marcus Livius), the fine answer which he made to an Architect. II. 713. and 714. a. b.
- Drusus*, brother to Tiberius; it is said that he preserved his conjugal fidelity. I. 357. b. His elogy. II. 714. b. 715. a. b. 717. a. b.
- Drusus*, son to Tiberius, his friendship for Germanicus. II. 719. a. b.
- Drusus*, the son of Germanicus and Agrippina; a report spread that he had escaped out of prison. II. 721. a. b.
- Dualists*, Magi who admit of two co-eternal principles. V. 636. a. b.
- Duaren* was reported to have been a Protestant. II. 722. Gives a reason why he perceived the passion, which he had for going over to the Protestants, diminished. 726. b. Cited. III. 768. b.
- Dubravius*; what he tells us of the modes which a King of Bohemia brought from France. III. 969. a.
- Ducherius* (Gilebertus) his epigram against Julius II. III. 610. a. b.
- Duel*; the effects of a sermon against that way of fighting. III. 18. a. A book upon the true and ancient usage of duels. I. 547. a. b.
- Dualists*, what reason induces them to right themselves. IV. 887. a. b.
- Duncan*; particulars concerning that family. II. 408. a. 411. a. b. a. *
- Du-Plex* (Scipio), see Plux.
- Du Prat*, the prudent advice which he gave to the Count of Angoulême. III. 88. a.
- Durand* not being able to unite the Reformed and Lutherans, undertakes to re-unite all the sects of Christians. II. 731. b. His conference with Ferri and Ancillon. III. 34. a. b. He becomes a sort of visionary. ibid. b. 35. a. Mr Amyraut's mistake touching the time of his death. 34. a. b. The Oxford catalogue confounds him with a Jesuit. II. 731. b. A great pacificator, publishes several pieces. III. 343. b. 344. a.
- Durel*; his book in defence of Episcopacy, and the answer which was made to it. II. 313. a.
- Duret*, Physician; playing on the equivocal meaning Seigneur (Bloeder) used to say that he was a very little Seigneur (Lord). II. 99. a.
- Duronius*, while he was tribune of the people, repealed a law, restraining the immoderate expences of feasts. I. 351.
- Durazzo*; a history of the Princes of that name. IV. 305. a. b. 306. a. b.
- Durazzo* (Charles of) put to death, and for what reason. IV. 305. a.
- Durazzo* (Lewis of) imprisoned and poisoned in the castle dell' Ovo. IV. 306. a.
- Durazzo* (Robert of), Prince of the Morea, comes into France, where he is killed fighting. IV. 306. b.
- Duty* (Conjugal), rules touching that duty. I. 504. a. b. III. 80. b. 81. a. b. What the Cynics taught upon that head. II. 669. b. 670. a. III. 458. b. 459. a. b.

E.

E*ari*; a catalogue of persons who had the faculty of moving them. III. 429. b.

E*arib*. Aristarchus was one of the first who maintained that the earth turned round upon its center. I. 449. a. b. Whether it be animated. III. 659. a. b. Whether its bowels are divided like the air into three regions. IV. 258. a.

E*arib*: a kind of Earth which had great virtues. III. 751. b. 752. a. b.

E*aribquakes*; sacrifices which the Romans offered up on those occasions. V. 185. b.

E*ase*. There is a real and an apparent Ease in writing. III. 261. b. Ec. IV. 85. a. b. 86. a.

E*astern people*, a small specimen of their legends. I. 49. They are extravagant in their commendations. 51. The reason of it. ibid. It was their custom to consecrate golden figures, which represented those parts of the body in which they had suffered any inconvenience. 116. b. They used to say that those who recovered from a great fit of sickness, or escaped any imminent danger, were raised again out of the grave. ibid. They turned their faces towards one particular point of the Heavens when they prayed. IV. 176. a. Considerations upon their religion. 939. a. b.

E*at*. To die of excessive eating, is scandalous in any one, much more in men of letters. I. 443. a. It is a folly for people to adore what they eat. 556. b. Renaud de Beaune could eat a vast deal without being thereby made heavy or drowsy. V. 35. b.

E*aters*. We have I know not what natural aversion for great Eaters. II. 598. a.

E*berard*, a pretended Prince of Westphalia; what is told of him. III. 166. b. 167. a. b.

E*burones*; what people we are to understand by that. IV. 834. a.

E*cclēsia* (Augustin ab) writes the History of the Bishops of Piedmont. IV. 772. a. Another book of his intitled, Corona Regia Sabaudica. ibid.

E*cclēsiastics*; their irregular lives turned to advantage by the sovereigns. I. 30. b. 31. a. Love to change their posts. 56. a. Those of the XVIth century exercised their tyranny over the minds and consciences of men. 149. b. Are much to be dreaded, when they turn Accusers. 468. a. It is happy for them that the people under their direction have no great capacity. 564. b. Some Ecclesiastics who have writ love-verses. 630. b. Of what consequence it is to keep a close rein on them. II. 95. a. b. 96. a. The same spirit which has procured them so much wealth and honour, prevailed also under the Pagan religion. 531. a. The rigour of the ancient Canons with respect to them. III. 221. a. b. They praise all those who are liberal to the Church. 223. a. Many of them chuse rather to be excommunicated by the Pope, than to part with their wives. 229. a. Those of the northern countries submit to the law of Celibacy, more unwillingly than those of the southern. ibid. Those who cannot bear the yoke of Celibacy are innumerable. 235. a. Their vices incurable. 329. a. b. Who it was that introduced the custom of deposing such as lay with their wives after their ordination. 378. They should not be suffered to keep young servant maids, when they are not married. 736. b. It is dangerous to attack them. V. 434. b. 435. a. For what sum they obtained absolution from Fornication, Sodomy, Bestiality. I. 628. a. b. See Clergy. The artifices which they make use to excite a liberal piety. 738. b. 739. a. b. Those who formerly abstained from Adultery and Fornication, were looked upon as Eunuchs or Sodomites. III. 345. a.

E*ckius*; his Obelisks against Luther's thesis on Indulgences, published by Luther himself. IV. 772. b.

E*clyps*; who was the first among the Greeks, that could foretel the time of them. III. 462. a. An eclipse of the sun which happened during our Saviour's passion. IV. 624. b. 625. a. b. An eclipse of the moon occasions the ruin of a fleet to the Athenians. 566. a. b.

E*deffa* (Joffelin de Courtenay, Count of) dies in irons at Aleppo. IV. 383.

Edinburgb. When the castle of Edinburgh was built.

III. 783, 784.

Edict: what the Edict of January 1562 was, and in what situation the affairs of the Romish religion were then. III. 507. b. Ec. The parliament of Paris refuses to register it. 509. b. 513. a. Edict of July 1561, its restrictions. 507. b. n. (28). Edict of Nantes, by whom drawn up. II. 433. and b.

Edicts frequently contain honourable things which must not be taken in a literal sense. IV. 147. b.

Editions: what Mr Loyfel used to say of first editions. I. 318. b. The indolence of those who wait for the second. 319. a. b. There is no edition which some advantage may not be reaped from. ibid. b. There are authors who bestow more pains upon the second edition than they did upon the first. III. 837. b. Francis I, praised for having encouraged the printing of excellent editions. 97. b. The taste of preferring the most ample ones, has always prevailed. IV. 544. b. 545. a. b. There are persons who dare to falsify second editions, even in the author's life-time. 711. b.

Education sinks under the weight of nature. I. 80. a.

Edward (Saint) his simplicity contributed much to his obtaining a place in the Kalender. II. 707. a. He undergoes the penance of being scourged, and for what reason. ibid. and b.

Edward I, King of England makes an irruption into Scotland. III. 332. a.

Edward III, King of England, offended at an inscription that was put upon Windsor castle. V. 559. a. b. His mistress could do every thing with him, and her power ended only with the life of that Prince. 556. a. b.

Edward VI, his death occasioned great joy at Rome; but the reasons of that joy ceased in a little time. III. 617. b. 618. a. The Court of Rome offended at the title of King being given to him. 621.

Effigy: some persons have said that they had never been so cold as they were that day on which their effigy was burnt. II. 85. b.

Egg, according to the doctrine of the Antients, served for the generation of things. I. 101. a. 444. a. b. Compared with the words of Moses in his account of the creation. ibid. a. Another Egg, which, hatched by a dove, produced Venus, or Love. ibid. The mysterious meaning, which Dr Burnet finds in it. ibid. and b.

Egypt, priests in the nature of Deans or Superiors there were called prophets. I. 347. a. Who built the most celebrated pyramid in Egypt. III. 57. b. When and upon what occasion people of a different language came first to settle in that country. IV. 790. Which of their Kings drank wine first. ibid.

Egypt (the going out of) a Tragedy; who is the author of it. II. 880. and b.

Egyptians despise Agefilaus. I. 129. a. 130. a. Egnatius (Baptist) what answer he gave to the criticism which Robertellus had writ upon his works. III. 464. b.

Ebud: every Protestant has received an order like unto that which he received. II. 123. a.

Εἰδωλα; what Epicurus understood by that term. II. 388. a. And how it was interpreted by the Schoolmen. ibid.

Eleſtus; that word taken for a proper name, and for a title by Florimond de Remond and by Bodin. IV. 106. a. b.

Elegy. An Elegy composed in honour of those who had lost their lives at the battle of Marathon. II. 825. b.

Elements: whether the war of the Elements ceased after the chaos was disentangled. IV. 438. b. 439. a. b. 440. a.

Eleanor (Heiress of Guienne) is divorced from the King of France, and married to the King of England. III. 794. a. b. Her gallantry with Saladin. ibid. b. 795. a. Her jealousy, vengeance, and punishment on that account. 796. a. b. Her death. 797. a. b. She has been put in the catalogue of learned women. ibid. b.

Elect. The Elect among the Manichees were not allowed to exercise Agriculture. IV. 97. a. b.

Elephants:

- Elephants*; the chaſtity of thoſe animals. I. 641. b.
 White ones are held in great veneration in the eaſt.
 III. 549. b. When ſeen by the Romans for the firſt time. IV. 663. a.
- Elephantis* was a Courtezan, who had compoſed a book full of obſcenities. III. 703. b.
- Eleuſina Sacra paſſa*; who is the author of that book. IV. 648. b. n. (3). Quoted. 88. a.
- Eliau* (or rather Eliau) excuſes Anacreon. I. 292. a.
 Vents a corrupt maxim of morality. II. 654. b.
 His unjuſt partiality as an Hiſtorian. ibid. He or his tranſcribers wrote Pericles for Epicles. IV.
 571. b.
- Elias*; whether his complaint was that of a man inſpired. I. 106. b. 107. a.
- Eliot* (Thomas) wrote a book which he falſely aſcribed to Encolpius. II. 770. a.
- Elis*. The ſevere law which the inhabitants of Elis made againſt all women, who by ſtealth ſhould be preſent at the Olympic games. I. 762. That city grants the privilege of immunity to all Philoſophers.
 I. 656. b.
- Eliza*, ſiſter to Pygmalion, King of Tyre, is infinitely better known by the name of Dido. IV.
 642.
- Elizabeth*, Queen of England; how ſhe called Bodin.
 II. 49. b. Why in her reign no endeavours were uſed to juſtify her mother. 55. a. The difference there was between her and Agrippina. 757. b.
 758. a. In what manner the diſcourſed about the Earl of Eſſex. III. 182. a. A Fanatic curſes her with all manner of imprecations. 315. b. What Prince ſhe moſt deſired to ſee. 397. b. The reformation which ſhe eſtabliſhed. 562. b. 563. a. b. She commands William Criton the Jeſuit to be ſet at liberty. II. 576. b. More policy than ſincerity in what ſhe ſaid upon that occaſion. ibid. Thoſe who made her head of the Church, ſaid to be more criminal than the electors of the She-Pope would be.
 IV. 735. a. n. (126). Called Jeſabel by a preacher of the League. V. 273.
- Ellenodius* (Nicaſius) his Latin verſion of Nemeſius's book de Natura hominis. IV. 345. a. b. He treats George Valla's tranſlation with the utmoſt contempt.
ibid. b. 346. a.
- Elogies*; lying is not any more allowable in a writer of Elogies, than in an Hiſtorian. I. 693. b. An Elogy which is a mixture of good and bad. 754. b.
 An ill cuſtom of thoſe who write them. II. 253. b.
 See Encomiums.
- Eloquence*. The jealousy of Eloquence. I. 317. b. 318.
a. III. 492. b. 493. a. b. It generally appears finer to one's auditors than readers. II. 358. b. The ſurprizing effects of it. 299. a. b. 300. a. b. 374. b.
 375. a. How great the force of it is. IV. 566. b.
 567. a. b. 568. a. The talents of Eloquence, and a vaſt erudition ſeldom meet together. 757. b. 758.
a. b. Calliſtratus's force of Eloquence, raiſed in Demotheſes a ſtrong deſire of diſtinguiſhing himſelf the ſame way. II. 259.
- Eloquent*. A perſon may be Eloquent, tho' he does no more than pronounce the diſcourſes which have been compoſed by others. III. 410. a. b.
- Elpinice*; why ſhe met with a refusal, when ſhe ſollicited for her brother Cimon. IV. 578. b. Kept by her own brother. ibid.
- Embaffador* of the United Provinces; who was the firſt that was acknowledged for ſuch at the Court of France. I. 3.
- Embaffadors*; an inſtance of their little ſincerity. I.
 721. a. An article of their Catechiſm. ibid. They have as much occaſion for their ſwords as for their tongues. 724. b. A compliment which a Spaniſh Embaffador made to James I, King of England.
 725. a. Embaffadors are of the ſame make, be their religion what it will. II. 70. a. Do not ſcruple to divulge falſe news, and calumnies forged by themſelves. 154. a. Buſbequius's letters are to them a model of writing well. 232. a. Embaffadors who reſuſe to make their court to ladies of pleaſure.
 427. a. b. Their children are reckoned natives of the place where their fathers would reſide, were they not Embaffadors. III. 930. b. They ought to be cautious in writing news. V. 19. a. Tricks which are common with them. 20. b. 21. a. b. 22. a. b.
 The definition that has been given of them, wix.
 that they are men ſent abroad to lie for the good of the ſtate. 667.
- VOL. V.
- Embaffadors extraordinary*, what lady was inveſted with that character. III. 263, 264. and a. b.
- Embaffy*. The denomination of an Embaffy, is not taken from the town where the Embaffador has his audience, but from the court to which he is ſent.
 II. 230. a.
- Embezzeling*; whether the embezzeling of the public moneys ought to be puniſhed with death. IV.
 143. b. 144. a.
- Embroidery* (Gold) by whom invented. IV. 561. b.
- Emerald* preſerves from the falling-ſickneſs, ſtrengthens the memory, and enables one to reſiſt carnal concupiſcence. IV. 864. b.
- Emeritus*; no man ſhould be declared ſuch, while he begets children. II. 618. b.
- Emilius*, or Emilius, author of an Hiſtory of France, cannot be put upon the ſame level with the Salluſts and Livys. II. 764. b. 765. a.
- Emilia*, or Emilia Lepida, her crimes and death. II.
 721. b.
- Emilius*, or Emilius, (Antony) reſuſes a profeſſorſhip.
 III. 477. a.
- Emmerick* was formerly a good ſchool. II. 154.
- Empedocles* divided into two. III. 157. b. Was mi-ſtaken in annexing to the four elements amity and enmity. IV. 439. b. What Ariſtotele ſays of him.
 V. 584. b.
- Empire* (Roman) there were not ſo many diſorders as people fancy, committed there, after the ſoldiers took upon them to create and kill their Emperors.
 I. 572. b. In all the Roman empire there were but three Cities, which were permitted to have ſchools of law. 771. a.
- Empire and Emperor* did not concern themſelves with the troubles of the Low-Countries. II. 222. a. b.
 223. a. b. The Emperor acted only as a mediator between the King of Spain and the revolted Provinces. ibid. The empire is diſcharged of what concerns the circle of Burgundy. ibid.
- Empiricus* (Sextus) the ſubtilty and uſeleſſneſs of his Logic. IV. 655. b. 656. a. b. His ways of ſufpending the judgment. ibid.
- Employments*, the author did not deſire any, and had reſuſed ſome. V. 800. How he came to loſe his employment, and his behaviour thereupon. 801.
- Employments* (Public) when a public employment is to be conferred, the vigour of a man ſhould be con-ſidered, and not his age. IV. 784. b. Great application to ſtudy generally diſqualifies a man for them.
 II. 314. b. They do not leave an author time to finiſh his writings. 515. a. It were to be wiſhed that every man had an employment aſſigned to him, ſuch as beſt fitted his natural diſpoſition and capacity. III. 529. b.
- Εργασίαν νόμον*; the meaning of that phraſe. I.
 427. a.
- Encomiaſts*, many do not know the difference between them and Hiſtorians. V. 804.
- Encomiums*; we ought to be ſparing of them. III.
 896. b. 897. a. See Panegyriſts. A great abatement ſhould always be made with regard to public Encomiums beſtowed by friends. IV. 651. b.
- Encomiums* (Poetical) Expreſſions made uſe of in them, are not to be conſtrued literally. II. 309, 310.
- End*. In what Anaxagoras and Carneades make the chief end of man to conſiſt. I. 295. II. 332. a.
 The principle of Chriſtians, with regard to the chief end of life, is a principle only in Theory. 200. b.
 See Happineſs.
- Enemies*. There are no enemies worſe than thoſe who praife immoderately. I. 469. a. An author is not to be underſtood too rigorouſly, when he is ſpeaking of his profeſſed enemy. 2. b. We ought never to condemn any man upon the testimony of his enemies. III. 551. b. It is not always policy to oppoſe their conqueſts. 806. b. There is nothing more dangerous than to deſpiſe them in hard and difficult times. V. 22. a.
- Engage*; if it be an imprudence to engage in certain attempts, it is ſtill a greater one to abandon them after being once engaged. I. 365. b.
- Engaſtrimitis*; what they can do. III. 854. a.
- England*; the number of Heretics that were daily burnt there, ſo great, that it raiſed the price of wood. I. 272. b. The Parliament of England ex-erciſes an arbitrary power. II. 56. a. The Lutherans and Papiſts burnt there at the ſame time.
 180. A project there to reform the colleges of the

- the nation, hindered by the civil war. 536. In what respect the English nobility surpassed in former times, and to this day surpasses all other nations. 803. b. What difference there was between the feasts of the churchmen there, and those of the nobility. ibid. The learned men of that country have not been so easily imposed upon with respect to Euripides, as those of France. 871. a. The Emperor Hadrian causes a wall to be built there, and for what end. III. 318. Richard Smith is sent there in quality of Ordinary over all the Catholics, but the Jesuits force him to leave the kingdom. 665. a. Cruelties which the Romans and Britons exercised there by turns. V. 260. a. b. An encomium upon the universities there. 513. b. English; how they were converted to Christianity. III. 219. b. 220. a. Taken for gods by the inhabitants of New Albion, and why. IV. 572. b. Whether the English did almost conquer France. II. 463. b. Whether they made it tributary. 739. b. 740. a. Their Divines accused of inclining to Pelagianism and Socinianism. I. 656. a. The English Catholics throw out a thousand imprecations against their country. III. 521. b. It had not begun to be an usual thing amongst them in the year 1613, to publish discourses in the form of letters. 344, 345. Joseph Hall did not approve of English gentlemen travelling in foreign countries. 345. and b. Sanders's History of the English Schism. An account of that book, its editions and translations. V. 41. b. 42. a. b. 43. a. b.
- Engraving* sometimes is the means of falsifying History. II. 100. a. b.
- Ennius*, what Quintilian said of him. IV. 161. b.
- Enoch*. The Hebraizers may say that the Pagans alluded to the history of Enoch. I. 276. a.
- Enochia*; that city compared with Pontropolis. II. 248. a.
- Εντέλεια*, a word essential to Aristotle's Natural Philosophy, but almost unintelligible. I. 636. a.
- Enterprize*. An enterprize discovered by a very surprising accident. II. 577. a.
- Enthusiasts*, whether their extasies be compatible with the opinion of those who say that the soul is not distinct from the body. II. 660. a.
- Entremangeries Monachales*; a book wrote in opposition to the Entremangeries Ministrals of Fenardent. V. 57. b.
- Envy*, its tortures. III. 643. b. 644. a.
- Enzinas*, author of a Spanish translation of the New Testament. II. 697. b. 698. a.
- Epaminondas*, his grave reply to Callistratus. II. 259.
- Eparcbus*, Bishop of Corfu, had made a collection of excellent manuscripts, with which the library of Augsburg was enriched. III. 478. a. b.
- Epemnon* (the Duke d') maintains his haughty spirit even on his death-bed. III. 289. a. A present which the city of Rothen makes to him. 409. a. He was satisfied with his good fortune. V. 369. b.
- Epemeris* of Cæsar, a work wholly distinct from his Commentaries. I. 613. a.
- Ephefians*, one of their laws. I. 318. a. Their readiness to believe the most absurd traditions. III. 576. a.
- Ephori*, the fortune of the Lacedæmonian Kings depended upon their caprices. I. 135. a.
- Ephorus*, an Historian; the character of his genius. V. 327. b. 328. a.
- Epyaxa* behaves with all manner of courtesy to Cyrus. II. 512. a.
- Epic Poetry* formerly admitted childish meannesses. I. 81. a. Does not allow of them at present. 333. b.
- Epicarmus*, an excellent doctrine of his. I. 275. b.
- Epicles*, what health he drank with Antocles. IV. 571. b.
- Epictetus*; at what price his lamp was sold. III. 939. a.
- Epicureans* would not acknowledge any thing supernatural in dreams. I. 85. b. Whether one Epicurean was allowed to rally another, and on what. II. 389. a. Some of them lived up to the rules of Morality with more exactness than the greatest part of the Heathens. 347. V. 398. Their union. II. 777. a. b.
- Epicurus*; no ancient Philosopher came nearer the truth than he. II. 63. b. Some of his followers were very regular in their morals. 350. a. b.
- What was the voluptuousness that he recommended. 388. a. The hypothesis of prefiges and fortune is directly opposite to the system of that Philosopher. 419. b. He did himself wrong in not owning his obligations to Democritus. 642. b. III. 789. a. His opinion touching the composition of the soul. 790. b. His civility and extreme meekness. II. 776. b. 777. a. Whence proceeds the ill opinion which people have of him and his sect. 781. b. 782. a. b. to 786. b. A fictitious dispute between him and a Platonic Philosopher. 787. a. b. Another between him and a Pagan Priest. 789. b. 790. a. He takes unnecessary precautions. ibid. b. Epicurus should have allowed spirits, if he had reasoned consequentially. III. 919. b. 920. a. Whether he could possibly have reconciled his system to the public worship, and deceived the Athenians. 923. a. b. Censured by Plutarch. 926. a. b. And by Muretus. ibid. The hypothesis of the existence of the gods is the weakest part of his system. 929. a. b. Whether he owned a Providence. ibid. b. 930. a. b. His objection touching the evil which happens in the world ill refuted by Lactantius. 513. b. 514. a. b. He rejected Geometry and the other branches of the Mathematics. V. 620. a. b.
- Epidemical distempers*; the mind is subject to them as well as the body. I. 19. a.
- Epigones*, how that word should be translated. I. 117. a.
- Epigrams*. An epigram rewarded with five thousand quarters of corn. I. 428. Another cruelly censured. 654. b. 655. a. b. An epigram of Ausonius admired by Daurat. II. 619. b. What should be the qualities thereof. IV. 364. a. b.
- Epilepsy*; who defined the pleasure of love a little epilepsy. II. 644. a. b.
- Epinac* (Peter d'), Archbishop of Lyons, a famous Anti-Royalist, at the conferences of Surane. V. 34.
- Epiphanius* (St) does not say that acts of uncleanness were committed in the assemblies of the Adamites. I. 111. b. Has no other ground but a false tradition for the bellowing of a golden calf. II. 752. a. b. 753. a.
- Ephrates* almost destroyed by famine, and for what cause. IV. 665.
- Episcopacy*, as distinct from the priesthood, is no sacrament. III. 53. and b.
- Episcoparians* (English), a Monk undertakes to shew that the thirty-nine articles of their Church may be reconciled with the Council of Trent. V. 25.
- Epistles Dedicatory*; a common-place topic which is seldom omitted in that kind of epistles. I. 346. b. No longer produce any thing. III. 16. a. Are prepared for those who are likely to reward the author best. IV. 843. a. b. It is a fault not to date them. V. 256. a. When an Historian addresses an Epistle Dedicatory to some powerful patron, he gives room to suspect that he has not strictly adhered to the laws of History. II. 311. and b. 312. a. b. That of an Historian to a Prince, whose conduct he had justly blamed, would be imprudent. 312. a. b. The design of such Epistles. ibid. Nothing is more necessary to the author of such a work as this, than to consult them. II. 8. b. The editors of books do wrong to leave them out. I. 225. b. IV. 164. a. A piece of railery upon those who affirm, in their Epistles Dedicatory, that their works have, in a manner, been taken out of their hands by force. 173. b. 174. a. b.
- Epistola obscurorum Virorum*; an effect which the reading of them produced. II. 812. b. Who the author of that book is. III. 474. b. 475. a.
- Epitaphs*. Deceitful epitaphs. I. 105. b. One not well understood. 216. a. b. That of an A Grecian buried in holy ground. 328. a. b. When an author cites one, he ought not to change the least letter. III. 697. a. An epitaph full of presumption and orthodoxy. IV. 468. a. Many of them are only mere sallies of wit, and were never engraved upon tombs. I. 437. a. b. Rules to be observed by those who cite them. ibid. b. 438. a. They are more to be relied on than Histories, as to the day of a person's death. II. 698. b.
- Epoch*. The epoch of an event should not be marked with the indefinite term of this year. I. 50. a. b. 329. a.

Epich:

- Epoch*; to whom the invention of it is to be ascribed. I. 409. b. The opinion of the Academics concerning it. II. 325. a. b. 326. a. b. 327. a. b.
- Equivoque*; Prierias Sylvester's doctrine on that subject is very loose. IV. 772. and b. &c.
- Eraftratus*; how he discovered the distemper of Antiochus, who was desperately in love with his mother-in-law. V. 45. a.
- Erasmus* confuted for his explication of a Greek proverb. I. 17. a. b. And for the meaning he gives to a passage of Cicero. 19. a. Why he did not embrace the Protestant religion. 139. a. What Agricola prognosticated concerning him. 144. a. He considered Luther in the beginning as a deliverer. 149. b. Abuses Alexander. 216. b. Passes for a favourer of Lutheranism. ibid. 217. a. b. His letters are often ill dated and misplaced. 271. a. II. 325. b. The advice he gave to one of his friends concerning the proper ways of pushing his fortune. I. 271. a. b. He did not hate wine. 272. a. b. Confutes the poems of Androlinus. 330. a. Misrepresents a fact which Ælian relates in speaking of Alexander. 367. a. b. His contests with Beda. 714. a. b. 715. a. b. 716. a. b. The judicious advice which he gave to Berquin. 777. a. b. Quoted. 781. a. b. 782. a. One of his letters which had never been made public. II. 77. a. b. He could never obtain the favour to be quoted by Budæus. 191. b. 192. a. Is ill used by Egnatius. ibid. and b. His works were corrected by Castellan. 369. a. b. His strength did not lie in Greek language. ibid. a. Employed too little time in composing his books. ibid. His mistake touching the impure practice of Diogenes. 669. b. 670. a. His dispute with Eppendorf. 797. and a. b. 798. and a. b. 799. and a. An effect which the reading of a book, intitled, Epistole obscurorum Virorum, had upon him. 812. a. Why old-age was agreeable to him. 814. a. b. His heroic sentiments towards one of his adversaries. III. 47. a. b. Turns a coward with regard to the court of Rome. 146. a. Was not of opinion that Princes should be exhorted to take away from the Monks the great estates which they possessed. 147. a. b. How he explained this proverb, Take heed of a man with a black breast. 429. a. b. His Priests play him a malicious trick. 531. a. b. It is strange he had not read what authors say of Jupiter's being transformed into a cuckoo, to lie with Juno. 632. a. He writes a false piece of news touching the too hasty lying-in of Luther's wife. 947. b. Opens the way for the Reformation by his raileries. 948. a. 954. and b. Understands a sentence of Aristophanes, better than Valerius Maximus. IV. 577. b. 578. a. The Magistrates of Basil offer to buy his statue. 926. a. b. What he says touching the usefulness of History. V. 265. b. Endeavours used to destroy all his works. 293. a. He does an action which ought to serve for a model to all authors. 494. a. The reproachful things Polydore Virgil said of him. 497. a. b. Noel Beda charges, as a crime upon him, his giving the title of King of France, to the King of England. I. 715. a. 801. b.
- Erfurt*; the Augsburg Confession, and Hebrew, are taught in that university, by the consent of the Professors, who were all Roman Catholics, except one. II. 697.
- Erhardus* (George), his censure on a very obscene epigram of Campanus. II. 293. b.
- Eric*, King of Sweden, is dethroned. III. 138. Makes William Lemnius his Physician. 750.
- Eric-son* (Gustavus) drives the Danes out of all their garrison towns in Sweden. V. 651. Is proclaimed King of that country. ibid.
- Eryngo* (white), the virtue of that herb. IV. 607. a. b.
- Erythreus* (Valentine) was the first who enjoyed the Rectorship of the college of Altorf. 105.
- Erpenius* did not understand a passage of Elmacin. I. 52. b.
- Err.* It requires a superiority of reason and genius, to know how to pity those who err. IV. 323. a. b. A Monk favourable to such as err with a good intention. V. 25.
- Errata*. In what part of the book a person that acts fairly, should place the Errata. III. 257. a. The very large Errata of a very small book. V. 455. b.
- Errors*; whether those of the Antients be more excusable than those of the Moderns. I. 501. a. b. 502. a. The servile caution that is observed with respect to errors. II. 94. b. A pleasing error is in some cases better than a disagreeable truth. 369. b. 370. a. Every particular man has the right of the sword with respect to error. 389. a. How difficult it is for men to avoid it. IV. 538. a. When they are, or when they are not, to be feared. V. 810.
- Errors* (popular), whether a man ought to regulate his conduct by them. I. 680. b.
- Errors in religion*, by accident, take deeper root when they are attacked. IV. 353. a.
- Errol*, an eminent family in Scotland, its greatness and original. III. 332.
- Erudition*. France seems too much disgusted with all that favours of erudition. V. 428. a. See Learning.
- Eschylus*, or Æschylus; for how much his table-book was sold. III. 939. a.
- Eschines*, or Æschines, ignominiously reproached, and for what reason. II. 775. b. A story that he tells. V. 77. a. b.
- Escoteau* (Peter d'), although a Huguenot, and married man, was Abbot of St Sulpice of Belley; his conduct with the Monks, &c. is assaninated by those of his own party. I. 737. a. b. 738. a. b.
- Esculapius*, or Æsculapius, is born near Epidaurus: his mother was Coronis, the daughter of Phlegyas. IV. 626.
- Esculapius of Germany*; Gregory Horstius had that surname given him. III. 487.
- Esep*, or Æsep, a Player; his son swallows a pearl of great price. IV. 200. a.
- Esperatus* (Claudius), takes upon him to publish a silly story against Calvin. II. 267. a.
- Espece* (Claude d'), exclaims loudly against the enormities of the book of Taxes of the Romish Chancellor. I. 629. b. The Inquisition causes this passage in the Doctor's book to be expunged. ibid. His six books of Contenance translated into French by Crespet. II. 567. a. b.
- Esprit de Mr Arnauld*; the History of that book. I. 490. a. b. Its calumnies. 492. b. The author of it did not understand what good railery was. II. 527. a. He reflects upon the Episcopal Clergy. ibid. b. The promise which he makes to the King of France in the name of Drabicius, and in that of all the Protestants. 537. b. and n. (8). He did not know his Scaligerana well. 706. a. Makes no scruple to lye. V. 176. a. n. (72). He is accused and convicted of Socinianism by his own reasonings. 177. a. b. 178. a. Could bring no proofs to support the heinous accusation which he published against the gentlemen of Port-Royal. 178. a. b. It is astonishing that the author of such a book should have remained without answer. 300. b.
- Esprit des Cours de l'Europe*, the author of that book cited. III. 234. a. b. 235. a.
- Esprit* (James), when admitted into the French Academy. V. 419. a. A passage of that author examined. IV. 441. a.
- Essays on Literature*; the author of that book commits gross blunders in speaking of Ruybroeck. IV. 943. b. 944. a. b.
- Essays* (Charlotte de), her History. III. 307. b. 308. a. 517. a. b. 518. a.
- Essex* (the Earl of), whether Queen Elizabeth shewed his head to the Duke of Biron. III. 182. a.
- Estampes* (the Duchesse of) desires Francis I. to take from Madam de Chateau-Briand the jewels which he had given her. II. 462. a. Reflexions upon her Calvinism, and the motives, which, according to Varillas, induced her to embrace it. 843. a. b. Her pretended Lutheranism. ibid. b. Her husband causes a judicial enquiry to be made after her conduct, and for what reason. ibid. 844. a. Justification of the Duke of Estampes concerning the enquiry against his wife. ibid. b. 845. a. She forms a faction to oppose that of Diana de Poitiers. III. 401. a.
- Estee*: an answer very like that of a Philosopher, who boasted that he carried about him his whole estate. V. 146. b.
- Este* (Borfa d') was the first who had the title of Duke of Ferrara and Modena. V. 57. n. (c).
- Ethiopians*, a people of Livonia who adored a pine-tree. IV. 928. a. b.

Esrix,

- Estrix*, a Jesuit, writ the book de Fraudibus Hereticorum. IV. 847. a.
- Eternal duration of punishment*, considerations upon that doctrine. V. 175. b.
- Eternity*; the definition which Boëtius gives of it, is more incomprehensible than the doctrine of Transubstantiation. V. 596. a. b. 597. a. b.
- Ethelred*, King of England, refused to hear the Pope's Missionaries but in the open field, and why. III. 219. b. Is converted to Christianity, and the greatest part of the English follow his example. ibid.
- Ethiopia*; Lucian pretends that the science of the stars had its beginning there. III. 311.
- Etolians* often at war with the Acarnanians. I. 55.
- Etrée* (Gabrielle d') what she said upon seeing the pictures of two Princesses, when it was reported that Henry IV would marry one of them. V. 392. a.
- Eu* (the Count d') his amiable and good qualities. III. 865. a. His marriage. ibid. His infidelity to his wife. ibid. b. His death. ibid.
- Evagrius*, what he tells of certain Monks. I. 112. a.
- Evarigius*, King of the Goths; one of his Counsellors compared with Apollonius. I. 383. b.
- Eubates*; his wife erects a statue to him, to recompense his fidelity. III. 704. b.
- Eubulides* was the inventor of divers sophisms. II. 846. b. 847. a.
- Eucharist*. The Church of England has given no positive definition of the manner how the body of Christ is present in the Eucharist. I. 718. b. Beza calumniated on this subject. 797. b. &c. to 800. a. The manner how God preserves accidents without a subject in the Eucharist. IV. 59. a. b. 60. a. Expressions of Calvin on this head, which seem to admit of a corporal presence. V. 103. b. n. (47). The advocates for Transubstantiation make a wrong use of the words Change, Conversion, or Transfementation. 209. b. Bucer's ambiguous way of speaking on this subject. II. 177. a. b. After thirty-four years labour, the ministers could not agree in this point. ibid. b. Harchius attempts to find out a middle way in the doctrine of the Eucharist, between the Catholics and Protestants, but his project is laughed at by both. III. 352. John Poinet tries to reconcile the controversies about it, and particularly those of the Lutherans and Zuinglians. IV. 692. That author's opinion. 693. b. The opinion of the Calvinists in this point extremely ill used by John Schutzius, and a reflexion thereupon. V. 89. b. The warmth of disputes on this subject, between the Lutherans and Calvinists is over. ibid.
- Euchracia*; a Heretic gets her with child. IV. 780. a. She is put to death. ibid.
- Eudes* (Duke of Aquitain) acts a cunning part with Charles Martel. I. 15. a. Did not favour the irruption of the Saracens. 16. a. There was much more room for suspecting Charles Martel than him in that affair. ibid. and b. To which of these two chiefs, the honour of the victory belongs. ibid.
- Eudoxia* sends privately to Giferic, and conjures him to come and revenge the death of Valentinian. III. 759. b.
- Eve*, what her reason was for giving the name of Seth to one of her sons. I. 23. a.
- Events*: what those ought to do, who relate mysterious events. II. 386. a. b. 392. a. b. There are some which occasion much speculation, and are little spoken of. 400. a. The most considerable may depend upon a trifle. 422. a. It is of the last consequence to find them ranged in their natural order. 756. b. The difference between the accounts of Catholics and Protestants chiefly consists in the order of events. ibid. Great events hit our taste exceedingly. III. 433. b. 434. a. The Antients affirmed that a man's prudence had a less share in them than his good or ill fortune. IV. 460. a. b. We hardly ever judge of things but by the event. V. 104. a. b. We cannot read with pleasure a description of those events which were disagreeable to us. II. 311. b.
- Eugene of Savoy* (Prince) is not a brother's son of the Duke of Savoy, but Charles Emmanuel's great-grandson. IV. 210. b. Commanded only the Emperor's troops of Italy. ibid. Did not force the lines of the besiegers at Coni. ibid. 211. a.
- Evidence*; whether it be the mark and measure of truth. IV. 654. b. 655. a. b. V. 586. b.
- Evil*. Chimerical evils forged by the Poets, have served as an apology for real evils. I. 54. a. b. How it fares with people who judge of complicated evils. 95. a. Such is the condition of mankind, that they can only chafe between the lesser and greater evil. II. 211. b. Whether there is a greater proportion of evil than of good in the conditions of men. 832. a. b. IV. 844. a. b. V. 415. a. 423. b. 424. a. 576. a. b. &c. seq. Whether it be nothing. II. 846. a. Many people complain of the evil which they suffer, and say nothing at all of that which they themselves did before. III. 42. a. b. A reflexion upon the Heathens saying that the gods pushed men on to do evil. 374. a. b. IV. 441. b. 442. a. A physical evil ought never to be remedied by a moral evil. III. 965. a. The difficulties about the origin of evil are very ancient. IV. 92. a. b. 93. a. b. It is impossible to solve them without having recourse to Revelation. 94. a. b. &c. 112. b. 113. a. b. The origin of evil is incomprehensible. 513. a. b. &c. 524. b. 525. a. b. &c. 788. a. b. 932. b. 933. a. b. &c. V. 212. b. &c. How some excuse providence with respect to the origin of evil. 576. a. b. See Principles (the doctrine of two). Those who approve it deserve the same punishment as those who commit it. 764, 765. 824. The question about its origin, very difficult. 815, 816. 830, 831. The introduction thereof with the doctrines annexed to it, is one of the most impenetrable mysteries of religion. 822. 830. 831.
- Eumenes*, King of Pergamum, lived in a strict friendship with his brothers. IV. 558. a. b. 559. a.
- Eumenius*, the Rhetorician, had a yearly pension of fifteen thousand crowns. I. 196. a.
- Eumapius* said that the History of Apollonius should have been intitled, The Defects of a God upon Earth. I. 382. a.
- Eunuchs*; whether women may be safely trusted to their keeping. I. 31. b. II. 533. a. b. What St Basil says of them. III. 56. b. Two sorts of Eunuchs. ibid. Compared to oxen, whose horns are cut off, and who nevertheless do not cease to strike with their heads. 383. b. II. 533. b. Their impotence with regard to women, is no obstacle to their having the other qualities of great men. III. 414. b. They may be very brave. ibid.
- Eurus*, the trick which he made use of in order to raise an insurrection. I. 647. and b. 648. a.
- Euphorbia*, an herb; whence it had that name. III. 598. a. b.
- Euphormio*; that book severely censured. I. 646. a. Condemned by the Inquisition. ibid. Which did not hinder the author from being much caressed at Rome, and receiving favours on account of that very book. ibid. Translated into French by John Beault. ibid. Two other translations which leave the work at least as difficult as they found it. 647. b.
- Euphorus*; whether there has been any author of that name. II. 772. b. 773. a.
- Euphrates*, when it was the boundary of the empire. III. 317. and a. b.
- Evreumont* (St) author of a satire against the French academy. I. 559. a. n. (7), (8). Quoted. IV. 492. b. 615. b. 797. b.
- Eurydamus*; how he was punished by Jupiter, and for what. III. 630. b.
- Euripides* was delighted with a maxim of Agathon. I. 126. b. The energy of one of his sentences. ibid. Said that God concerns himself only with great things, and leaves the lesser to chance. 310. a. b. His custom was to introduce persons upon the stage, in whose mouths he put impious sentiments. II. 572. a. b. 573. a. b. An argument ad hominem which a courtesan alledged to him. III. 705. a.
- Europe*. The Christians in Europe are addicted to drunkenness and lewdness. II. 819. b.
- Europeans*; it was only by way of reprisal, that they stole away the King of Tyre's daughter. III. 372. a.
- Eusebius*; what he says of Apollonius Tyanæus, examined. I. 381. b. 382. a. b. He makes an improper use of a passage of Porphyrius, which he has preserved to us. II. 773. b. How he refuted the slanders of Hierocles against the Christian religion. III. 448. a. b. What he quotes from Phlegon. IV. 624. b. &c.

Eusebius

- Eusebius Cæpticus*, a controversial work of Jerom Massarius, under that title, where he feigns that a true believer gives an account of his faith before the Pope and the Inquisition. IV. 173. a. b.
- Eutymenus*; how much his son grew in three years, and what happened to him afterwards. V.
283. b.
- Eutymius Zigabenus*; the story which he tells of a stone. I. 124. a.
- Eutychius*; his narrative concerning the quarrel between Cain and Abel. I. 24. a.
- Eutropius*; whether a passage of that author has been well translated by the Abbot de Marolle. II. 255.
a. b.
- Exactions* imposed under divers pretences. II.
421. b.
- Examination* (the way of) when people have no further occasion for it, they return to the way of authority. I. 241. b. The difficulties which attend it.
IV. 361. a. b. 362. a. b. 363. a. 535. a. b. 536.
a. There are some who affirm that no body makes use of that way. ibid. and b. What are the greatest obstacles to a proper examination. 537. a. A common place against the way of examination. V. 441. a. b.
See Authority.
- Example*. An example which a modern author alleges to prove that a sincere ignorance is a good excuse. I. 206. a. An example of the bad custom which prevails of interesting religion in the disputes of learned men. II. 141. a. b. Those who set bad examples, ought to be severely punished. IV.
18. a. The contagion of bad examples. V.
755. b.
- Excommunication*, a severer punishment sometimes than the afflictive pains which the civil magistrate imposes. I. 96. a. Against what authors it is made use in the Protestant churches. V. 806. How Savonarola behaved, when he found himself lying under the sentence of excommunication, and the opinion of the Protestants upon that head examined. 70. b.
71. a.
- Excuses*; however good they may be, it is still better not to stand in need of them. II. 794. a. b.
795. a.
- Exercises* of the King of Bohemia, preserved in the Vatican Library. I. 239. a.
- Exercises* (public) Oecolampadius does not trouble himself about the honour that is to be gained by them in the universities. IV. 400.
- Exile*. An Exile is not qualified to write an History.
III. 345.
- Exorcism*. Despaunterius's Grammar presented to a woman possessed with a devil, as a formulary of exorcism. II. 147. a.
- Exorcists*, and mean and mercenary employment among the Pagans. II. 775. a. b. In what manner it was exercised. ibid. n. (15). What sort of questions they generally put to the possessed. III.
214. b.
- Exploits*; several give the glory of them to God, only out of policy. V. 366. a. b. 367. a. b.
- Expressions*. Some expressions offend us, though they import no more than other expressions at which we are not at all offended. I. 790. b. 791. a. We are apt to be deceived, when we stick to the first sense, which they offer to our mind. 595. b.
- Extempore*. A boy of ten years of age, who composed verses extempore. I. 360. and a. b.
- Extension*. Whether we have any idea of an extension that is immaterial. V. 143. b. 144. a. Extension is made up of parts which are each a particular substance. 208. b. 209. a. Objections against its existence. 608. b. 609. a. b. 610. a. b. & seq.
Whether there can be two sorts of it, the one di-visible, moveable, and impenetrable, and the other immoveable, indivisible, and penetrable. 615. b.
616. a. b. 617. a. b.
- Extraits*. Unfaithful extracts. I. 714. b. 715. a.
- Extravagancies*; to what extravagancies the human mind is liable. I. 103. a. b.
- Eye-brows* (joining each other) passed for a beauty among the Phrygians. II. 140.
- Ezekiel*; what a Rabbi affirms concerning his tomb.
V. 544. b.
- F.
- Faber (Antony) his judgment concerning the greatest Lawyers of his time. III. 201. a.
- Faber Stapulensis* delivered out of the hands of the Inquisitors by the Queen of Navarre. II. 261.
- Faber* (Tanaquillus) who are the persons qualified to judge of his books. I. 189. a. Censured for quoting Plato and Herodotus, on the subject of Anacreon. 290. b. 291. a. What he says to a Journalist. 452. a. Gives us a piece of secret History.
675. a. A common-place which he made use of.
745. a. b. Censured by Mr Dacier with little success. II. 388. a. b. In what he has very well shewn the mistakes of the interpreters of Horace, with regard to Cælius. ibid. b. 389. a. He wrongfully pronounces a definitive sentence upon a passage of Plutarch, touching Critias and his Atheism. 573.
b. 574. a. Unjustly censures St Augustin touching the liberties which the Comic Poets gave themselves.
IV. 568. a. b. He and Madlle his daughter criticized on the subject of Anacreon and his cotemporaries. V. 44. a. b.
- Fables* of the Ancients very ill concerted. I. 80. a.
They applied the unravelling of them to too many subjects. 115. b. People are unwilling to be un-deceived as to Fables, when they find their account in them. 362. Who invented, and who brought them to perfection. II. 828. a. b. The difference between a Fable and a fabulous narration. 829. a.
Freinhemius's mistake upon this head. ibid. Which are the most useful of all the Fables of antiquity.
831. b. 832. a. The apology which Strabo makes for them. ibid. How Seneca could say that the Romans had never attempted this sort of compositions. 833. and b. They should never be made use of to explain the mysteries of religion. IV. 896.
a. A conjecture about the origin of the ancient Fables. V. 288. a. Jewish Fables with respect to a false Messias. I. 648. a. b.
- Faces*. Some women have disfigured their faces, lest they should occasion a temptation. II. 109. a.
n. (5).
- Faciendaire*; an old French word which is very expressive, and which deserved to have been kept up.
IV. 640. a.
- Factions*. It is ordinary for all factions to produce libels. III. 517. b. There is nothing more advantageous, according to the notions of the world, than to be always for the strongest faction. V. 250. a.
It commonly happens that men of a peaceable disposition, are carried down with the torrent of a faction. 675.
- Facts*; there are some which one may pronounce to be false, purely because they are doubtful. I. 67. b.
To make one a credible witness in certain facts nothing more is necessary than the truth of the relation. 75. a. A fruitful source of falsifications in matters of fact. 186. b. Whether it be sufficient on all occasions to deny a fact, when an adversary does not prove it. 199. a. b. 200. a. b. The reason why they come to be so variously reported.
308. b. An exactness in relating them is inseparable from a tiresome prolixity. 335. a. Contrariety in matters of fact. II. 28. b. 29. a. b. There are many remarkable facts for which we have but a single testimony. 349. b. One should forbear to speak of facts till time has ripened them. 65. a.
There are some which reduce Philosophy to a non-plus. 391. b. 392. a. b. There are others the publishing of which only offends, because they are true. III. 148. b. We should in matters of fact follow the advice which Des Cartes gives with respect to philosophical speculations. 204. a. The ill-placing of circumstances makes a fact doubtful, though it be never so certain and true in itself. 226.
a. How the circumstances of facts come to be changed. 314. a. b. There is sometimes a great illusion in proving a fact by a reason of right. V.
11. a. b. They are exaggerated in passing from mouth to mouth. I. 747. b. Should not be affirmed as certain, when one does not find them in credible authors. III. 779. b. Those which are to be found every where, have less need to be supported by quotations than singular facts. ibid. The probability of a thing does not warrant the affirming it as a certain fact. ibid. Historical facts are 10 X
very

- very subject to a metamorphosis. IV. 89. b. A world of transcribers and great authors confound them with their conjectures. 609. a. A compiler of facts should not neglect to engage the reader's attention to those which have something singular in them. V. 642. a.
- Feneste* (the Baron of), one of his adventures pleasantly related by d'Aubigné. II. 243. b.
- Fairus*, his fables. IV. 613. a. b.
- Faget* (the Abbot), a dispute between him and Baluzius. IV. 102. b. 103. a. b.
- Fagnanus*, his intimate acquaintance with Pradilhon, General of the Feuillants. IV. 764. a.
- Fay* (du), a new remark upon his writings. III. 516. b. 517. a. b.
- Faydit* (Abbot) quoted. III. 739. b. After what manner he speaks of the author of the memoirs of M. L. C. D. R. V. 84. a. A very strong invective which he makes on the subject of the Trinity against the explications of the Schoolmen. 820. The insuperable perplexities to which he reduces them. ibid. n. (30). A long passage of his Telemaque cited and censured. IV. 643. a. b. 644. a.
- Fair*: whether any thing is lawful and fair against an open enemy. II. 154. a.
- Faith*. There is a local, and a temporary faith. I. 477. a. Bucer's judgment on this thesis, We are justified by faith alone. II. 178. a. b. What makes it become a true act of religion. 662. b. IV. 592. b. 593. a. b. 717. a. b. &c. to 720. a. b. Nothing but Faith can convince us that bodies do really exist. 654. a. n. (12). All the articles of Faith defended and attacked by the arms of Philosophy alone, do not come off honourably. V. 815. The first thing required by Christ and his Apostles. 816. It is a gift of God; and is not to be acquired by reasonings, and a train of Philosophical discussions. ibid. Wherein the Faith of a Christian, and the Science of a Philosopher differ. ibid. It ought to satisfy every good Christian, that his Faith is founded on the word of God. 829. It is the way by which it has pleased God to conduct Christians. 831. The most precious Faith is that, which, upon the Divine testimony, embraces the most opposite truths to Reason. 834. A railery upon this notion. ibid. Confutation of that railery. ibid. It serves for a sword and buckler against the knots of difficulties. 835. Few people seriously examine the nature of it. 836. It is proper to enumerate the arguments which respect the difficulties of the Christian Faith. ibid.
- Fall of Adam*: it is one of the greatest mysteries. V. 821.
- Falshood*. There are several things the falshood whereof is sufficiently exposed by barely relating them. I. 245. Whether it may appear in the same guise as truth. 410. b. People are ever publishing notorious falshoods. 343. a. b. 344. a. Whether time destroys them. III. 744. a.
- Famagosta*; the Turks take that town. IV. 23, 24.
- Families*; there are few which may not be reproached with some adventure. I. 490. b. An antient Roman family that was illustrious for chastity. II. 291. b. Fabulous traditions that are kept up in old families. 709. a. V. 400. The fabulous genealogy of several families. 468. a. b. 469. a. b. See Genealogist.
- Families* (Patrician), some of them became Plebeian. II. 167. a.
- Fanaticism*; its prodigious variety. III. 692. Is a more contagious evil than is imagined. ibid. A proof of Savonarola's fanaticism. V. 71. a. b.
- Fanatics* of Amsterdam who ran about stark-naked. I. 112. How dangerous those persons are to a state. 647. b. 648. a. They are perfect incendiaries. II. 143. and a. b. 537. Their usual faults. 538. a. b. Their first works overthrow their last. ibid. a. They are touched to the quick when they are upbraided with contradictions of that kind. ibid. Are watchful over events, in order to amend their predictions according to the news of the Gazette. ibid. b. Have often no other aim than to stir up the people. 539. a. Chuse rather to expose the authority of the Scriptures, than to own themselves in the wrong. ibid. Lose nothing of their credit, though they have deceived the public a hundred times. ibid. Are never at a loss. 692. a. Their obstinacy in finding out evasions. ibid. b. 693. a. b. n. (23). They will never want patrons, provided they have cunning enough to accommodate themselves to the passions of the times. 693. There are two sorts of them: which are the most suspected. III. 682. a. A touch-stone to discover whether they are sincere Fanatics. IV. 36. a. They cannot answer for themselves, and why. 115. b. Do not trouble themselves about the greatest difficulties. 116. a. b. The XVIIIth century was fruitful in Fanatics. 269. a. The sect of the Fanatics very well characterized. I. 241. b.
- Fannia*; at what time the law, which goes by that name, was made. V. 386. and b. 387. a.
- Fano* (Barthelemi Denys de) continues the History of Tarcagnota, and of Mambrin Rokko. IV. 918.
- Farces*. The present farces are more dangerous than those of our ancestors, and for what reason. V. 847.
- Fardella*, his Logic. V. 614. b. 615. a.
- Farel* sent with the character of a Deputy into Germany. I. 790. a. His dispute at Basil. III. 10. a. His too passionate zeal. ibid. and b. His intrepidity. ibid. Erasmus has used him very ill. ibid. 11. a. and 14. a. His marriage. 13. a. b.
- Farellists*: a chimerical sect. 15. b.
- Faret*; his Honnête Homme translated into Latin by Charles Oginski. IV. 402. Translated into Spanish, Italian, English, and High-Dutch. ibid.
- Fargis*, the French Ambassador in Spain, makes a disadvantageous treaty. I. 786. a.
- Farmers of the Taxes* are very seldom honest. V. 465. a. b. Would have afflicted most of the gods if they had been suffered to go on. I. 280. b. 281. a. b.
- Farnaby* criticized on the subject of an epigram against Fulvia. III. 163. a.
- Farnace* (P. de) writes the life of Peter de la Place. IV. 681. a. b. n. (2).
- Farts*: some people could dispose of them in such a manner, that they seemed to make them sing. III. 135. b.
- Fasting* is a thing which the Northern nations cannot easily bear. III. 231. a. May be of a very long continuance. 582. b. An objection proposed to Laurence Joubert about the fasting of Moses, Elias, and Jesus Christ. ibid. A system, according to which one might elude the laws of the Church with respect to fast-days. V. 777, 778.
- Fatality* annexed by the Pagans to certain inanimate things. II. 254. a.
- Fate*. The doctrine of the Stoics, touching Fate, made God the author of Sin. II. 489. a. b. 490. a. b. 491. a. IV. 519. b. &c. How they endeavoured to reconcile it with human liberty. II. 490. b. 491. a. This doctrine does not exclude all wishes. III. 924. a. Invektives of the Pagans against Fate. IV. 811. a. b. They believed that one word was sufficient to change it. II. 253. a. b.
- Father*. A father who gives his son a very good education. IV. 754. b. Nature has given a great deal of force to the affection of a father. 637. a.
- Fathers of the Church*: some of them were ignorant that it is unlawful to save either one's own life, or another's, at the expence of a crime. I. 38. a. b. Have inserted the most shocking impurities in their works. 103. b. Generally believed that Adam was buried upon mount Calvary. 104. b. Whether those of the first three centuries taught Arianism implicitly. 477. a. b. People are more or less tender of them in proportion as they are more or less of their way of thinking. 564. and a. b. They sometimes alledge very weak arguments against the Gentiles. II. 498. a. III. 55. a. Had reason to reproach the Pagans with the infamous amours of Jupiter. 130. a. b. What answer they made to the raileries of the Heathens upon the adventure of Jonas. 578. a. b. The doctrine of those of the first three centuries concerning the Trinity. IV. 601. a. b. 602. a. b. When the Protestant Divines of France began to read them. I. 756. The Fathers have published the impieties and obscenities of the antient Heretics. III. 135. b. 136. a. b. Are blame-worthy, if at bottom it was a pernicious and sinful thing. 136. a. Whether it be true that they wrote only for the learned, and in a language not understood by the vulgar. ibid. What they required of believers in a particular manner. V. 816. Did not discuss the mysteries of religion by the rules of Logic and Metaphysics. 817. n. (17).
- Fausla*, Hercules's whore, has Divine honours paid to her. III. 55. b.

Fausla

- Faults*. A reflexion on hidden faults. I. 619. b. It requires a great deal of dexterity to tell people their faults, without giving them room to be angry. 753. a. Men do not love to be told publicly of their faults. II. 311. b.
- Faults* in books. See Books.
- Favour*; what Regnier says of it. V. 370. b.
- Favours*; people court their daughters, however small their fortunes be. I. 460. b. The judicious reflexion of a great wit on that head. ibid. They labour to procure to themselves, or their relations, the most profitable and honourable employments. III. 826. and a. A favourite can bring in to fashion not only such cloaths, but also such meats as he likes. IV. 768. a. People take a pleasure in charging them with more crimes than they are really guilty of. V. 370. b.
- Fausta*; her lewd practices. IV. 201. a. b.
- Faustina*; how far she carried her immodesty. III. 794. b. n. (5).
- Faust*. The prodigious sumptuousness of a feast made at Rome by the Pope's Financier. II. 469. a. Another of a vast expence. 835. a. b. A law, which restrained the immoderate expence of feasts, repealed by Dronius. I. 351. A magnificent feast which was given by a gentleman of Lombardy. 402. a. b. Regulations for moderating the expence of them. III. 6. a. The Romans did not suffer maids to be present at feasts; and the Greeks did not even allow women to be there. 966. b. 967. a.
- Felix* does not go into Judaea, till after the condemnation of Cumanus. II. 702. b. Married three Queens. ibid.
- Feltri* (Victorinus of), one of the first restorers of ancient Latin. IV. 408.
- Ferdinand* I. besieges Buda, and his army is cut in pieces by Soliman. III. 532.
- Ferdinand* II, succeeding to the empire, saw himself dispossessed of two kingdoms. 819. b.
- Feria* (the Duke of) dies of grief, occasioned by the ill conduct of Aldringer. I. 211. b.
- Fermeiers*, mistress to Francis I, why infected by her husband. III. 89. a. b.
- Ferrand* is to be pitied for having engaged to apologize for St Francis. III. 83. a. b. Quoted. IV. 109. b. 110. a.
- Ferrara* (Renée de France, Duchess of) receives as many Refugees as the can at Montargis. V. 193. a.
- Ferris* (Father), Confessor to the King, writes a little book concerning probable opinions. IV. 64. a.
- Ferrier* (Arnoul du), a famous Professor of the Civil Law at Toulouse. II. 687.
- Fervent*; the impertinence of that Franciscan. II. 751. a. The apology he makes for the worship of the blessed Virgin. III. 85. a. n. (49). The accusations which he brings against Calvin. V. 53. b. 54. a. b.
- Fever* (purple), James des Parts was the first that wrote upon that subject. IV. 484.
- Feuillant* (the little), see the article Montgaillard, in the Dictionary.
- Feuillants*: the abbey and chief of the order situated in the diocese of Rieux. IV. 764.
- Fevre de la Boderie* (Guy le), translates from Italian John Andreas's book, intitled; The Selt of Mahomet demolished. I. 326. b.
- Fevre* (John le), author of a Dictionary of French rhymes. I. 65. b. 66. a.
- Fevrier* (John), a Jesuit, confounded with Father John Ferrier by Southwell. III. 43. a. b.
- Fichard* (John) publishes the writings of Julius Clarus. II. 515. a. b. The praises which he bestows on him are just. ibid. b.
- Ficinus* (Marfilius), what we are to understand by his Commentaries. IV. 689. a. See Marfilius Ficinus. He explains the doctrine of Guido Cavalcante, touching the nature of love. II. 399. b.
- Figures* (Arithmetical) have both their conveniencies and inconveniencies. I. 249. a.
- Filleau*, the King's Advocate at Poitiers, gloried in persecuting the Protestants upon all occasions. IV. 479. b. His account of what passed in the chimerical assembly of Bourg-Fontaine. I. 491. a.
- Financier*; probity is a rare thing to be met with in that employment. V. 465. a. b.
- Finæus* (Orontius), Peter Nonnius corrects several of his mistakes. IV. 382. b.
- Finland*; who was the first that translated the New Testament into the language of that country. I. 141.
- Fire* has often fallen upon sacrifices. I. 24. b. The Pagans boasted of having had this mark of approbation from heaven. 25. b. Who invented divinations by fire. 277. b. Trial by fire. 405. Priestesses who boasted that they could walk upon it without receiving any damage. II. 531. a. A lucky presage, when it kindled of itself upon the altars. 746. a. b. Which nevertheless had not always that construction put upon it. ibid. b. The story of a people who trod upon fire without being burnt. III. 466. and a. b. 467. and a. b. Was the principle of all things according to Heraclitus. V. 323. b. n. (23).
- Fish*: a fish adorned with ear-rings. I. 358.
- First-Simon*, a Jesuit, quoted. I. 756. a. III. 937. b. 945. b. Whether he disputed with Usher. V. 525. a. b.
- Flaccus*, a surname to be found in several cities of Italy. IV. 599. b.
- Flacius* (Matthias): a Roman Catholic having praised him without knowing him, repented of it after he came to know him. V. 124. b. See Illyricus.
- Flaminius* had like to have been refused the honour of a triumph, for not opening a letter from the Senate, till after he had routed the enemy. II. 291. a.
- Flaminius* (Lucius) causes a criminal to be put to death in his presence, while he was at dinner, and for what reason. IV. 17. b.
- Flatterers* do not regard a mere title. I. 233. b. Their sharpening tricks. IV. 430. a. b.
- Flattery*; the effect which it must naturally have upon the minds of Princes. II. 256. b. 257. a. A strange instance of that vice. III. 222. b. 223. a. Is one of the plagues of History. IV. 142. b. 143. a. A superannuated piece of flattery. I. 349. a.
- Flad*. Persons who owned that they had thrown down their arms and fled. I. 189. a. b.
- Flate* (golden), on what occasion that order of Knights was instituted. II. 215. a. b.
- Flemings*; whether or not their writers are passionate. II. 437. b. What Comines said of them. III. 806. a.
- Flesh*: the Brachmans eat no flesh. II. 115. and b. 116. a.
- Fleury* (Abbey). When the Protestants plundered it, they found there a great many good manuscripts. II. 69. a. Some of them were sold to the Queen of Sweden, and the rest fell to the Vatican. ibid.
- Floyd*, the Jesuit, quoted. I. 745. b. n. (49).
- Floral Games*; after what manner they were celebrated. III. 53. b. What passed one day between the people and Cato with respect to that celebration. 54. a. When, and by whose authority, they were exhibited for the first time. ibid. b. 55. a. How a fund was raised to defray the charges of them. ibid.
- Florence*, in Savonarola's time, was split into factions. V. 61. The great authority which that Monk had there. 57.
- Florentinus*, their ridiculous gestures and motions represented in a Comedy. IV. 10. a. b. It is pretended that they were more effectually converted by Savonarola's Sermons, than the Ninevites were by the preaching of Jonas. V. 57. b.
- Florilegium*, its author and use. III. 725. a. b.
- Florum* (a spirit of the order of Cherubims), his answer when he was asked what the spots in the moon were. II. 498. b. 499. a.
- Florus* censured for a gross fault which had not been taken notice of in the Variarum of Holland. II. 161. a. Commits a fault in Geography, with regard to the town of Horacka. IV. 662. b. 663. a.
- Flushing*, a city in Zealand, drives out the Spanish garrison. IV. 453.
- Focaria*; the use which the Latin of the lower age has made of that word. III. 736. b.
- Foe*, was the first founder of a sect among the Chinese. V. 202. a. b. 203. a.
- Fetus*: the formation of it is the most exquisite production of an intelligent Being. I. 305. b. and n. (129).
- Fois*, a college at Toulouse, has neither Professors nor any other teachers in it. II. 95. a.

Fois

- Foix (Paul de) why he refused to see Francis Patricius at Ferrara. I. 472.
- Foix (Gaillon de) a true thunderbolt of war. III. 812. a.
- Folcmbray, a palace built by Francis I, entirely burnt, by whom, and for what. III. 530. b.
- Folly. Erasmus's praise of it is very well received by the public; especially by people of distinction. II. 810. a. It has been printed about a hundred times, more or less. ibid.
- Fondi; Barbarossa, King of Algiers, besieges and takes it by assault. III. 189. b.
- Fontaine (la) quoted on the jealousy of sisters. II. 701. b. Makes a sophism in defence of his works. III. 260. a. Is censured on the subject of Æsop's life, written by Planudes. II. 829. a. b. Has not adjusted his reckoning in an Historical performance, so well as Madam Scuderi has done in a romance. 830. a. He might have given a better account of the translation which Socrates made of Æsop's fables. ibid. b. Whom he owns for masters. IV. 156. a. One of his tales is taken from Boccace and Apuleius. II. 38. a. b. He does not always point out the fountain he draws from. ibid. b. His verses on the vain promises which Poets make to print no more. 83. a. b. His tales, how far to be condemned. V. 837. Condemned by the sentence of a magistrate of Paris. 807. 838. n. (10). So much the more pernicious, as the expressions made use of in them, are not grossly obscene. 847.
- Fontanus (Petrus) an Adulterer meets with the punishment of Abelard. II. 8. b.
- Fontevraud; the complaisance that was shewn to an Abbe of that abbey. III. 67. a. The family of one of its Abbees. V. 298. b. And her death. II. 67. b.
- Forbes (John) see in the Dictionary, the article Lefley. III. 783.
- Force (James de la) how preserved in the massacre of St Bartholomew. III. 180. a.
- Forresti; Philip de Bergamo was of that family. I. 769. a.
- Foretel. Those who take upon them to foretel things to come, are happy when they serve a Prince, designed for great purposes. I. 447. b. Whether it be possible to foretel things to come, which have no dependence upon a necessary cause. II. 332. b.
- Formia the capital city of the Læstrigons, built by Lamus. III. 786.
- Forms (Substantial) a reflexion upon that doctrine. II. 250. a. b. 251. a. b. The inexplicable difficulties of it. III. 196. a. b. 362. a. Into how many absurdities they lead those who maintain them. IV. 266. a. b. Consequences that may be drawn from them. V. 594. b. 595. a. b. &c.
- Formularies; the more general they are, the better calculated are they to prevent schisms. I. 718. b. It is difficult to draw up one that shall cut off all occasion of dispute. III. 390. b. People sign them every day against their consciences, in order to avoid imprisonment, exile, death, &c. V. 811.
- Fornication; whether the magistrate has a right to punish it. I. 222. a. b. 223. a. b. The indulgence which is shewn to that vice. 222. b. 223. a. And for what reason. ibid. See Uncleannefs.
- Fortune; one ought not to abuse her favours. I. 71. b. Her favours are sooner acquired by unlawful than by lawful means. 224. b. Fraudulent ways of making one's fortune. 271. a. b. People debate as much as they can the birth of those whom she raises to the highest dignities. 350. b. People often complain without reason of what they call her caprices. 698. a. b. The system of the Atheists is inconsistent with the account that is given of such a being. II. 419. b. 438. a. IV. 55. a. b. She resembles women in this, that she prefers young persons to the old. II. 438. a. Scioptius unreasonably acts the part of a Divine upon this head. ibid. She loves to have her favours snatched from her. 736. a. Is never so much honoured, as when cursed and reviled. III. 428. b. 429. a. What Pliny says of Fortune. IV. 933. b. 934. a. She has among her creatures some that are elect, and some that are reprobate. 460. b. How a man ought to behave to her. ibid. Complaints against her. 477. and b. 478. a. A sacrifice which the Roman ladies offered to her. V. 130. a. What the Ancients said of her influence. 367. b. &c. Whether she favours some in a manner independent on their prudence, and persecutes others in a manner independent on their imprudence. 368. a. b. &c. It is hard to know what to make of her. 369. b. 370. a. b. The idea which the Pagans formed of her. 367. b. 368. a. b. 369. a. b. People often impute to her what they ought to charge on their own imprudence. 372. a. But on several occasions a man that is unhappy by his own fault, has as much right to complain of Fortune as an unfortunate man, who has punctually discharged his duty. ibid.
- Forum; there was a time when people could not have their statues placed there without a special privilege. II. 290. b.
- Fossense; her intrigue with Henry the Great. IV. 335. b. 336. a.
- Foucher, Canon of Dijon quoted. II. 331. b. 332. a. n. (101), (102), (104).
- Fougasse has translated into French the first century of Boccacini's Ragguagli di Parnasso. II. 38. n. (a).
- Founders of orders, have generally had female votaries, who constantly attended them. III. 888. b.
- Fountains which had a singular property. III. 636. a. b. 644. a. b.
- Fracastor dedicates one of his pieces to Marc Antony Flaminius, and to Galeacius Florimont. III. 58.
- France; the Prelates of that country have not the liberty of proposing what they please in their assemblies. I. 157. a. b. Carried on a correspondence with Count Tekeli. 171. a. Chose to wage war with the edict of Nantes, rather than with the house of Austria. 305. b. From whom its Kings are derived according to some. 529. a. b. 530. a. b. Has been full of seditious preachers. II. 95. 101. b. 102. a. And exposed to horrible factions. 208. b. 209. a. Was formerly a state like the empire of Germany. 222. a. The court of France sends an Ambassador extraordinary to the States General, in favour of the house of Orange. 153. b. Formerly its Kings were not of age till twenty-one years complete. 381. Was bubbled, and shamefully betrayed in a treaty of peace. 443. Its monarchy brought to the brink of ruin, by the immoderate ambition of the branch of Burgundy. 462. b. 463. a. Makes a peace which was very dishonourable in some respects. 739. b. 740. a. b. Goes upon the ancient maxim Divide & impera. III. 851. a. Not lawful for its Kings to marry bastards. 797. b. Makes a peace with England, that was more useful than glorious. 800. a. b. More money raised in it by Lewis XI, than by any of his predecessors. 800. Why its subjects are more quiet at this time than ever they were. 815. a. b. A great slavery for the court of France to want the Pope's bull for the making of Bishops. IV. 100. a. Its limits in the county of Rouffillon. 102. b. Was very unfortunate in the XVth and XVIth centuries. 310. a. b. The office of Prime Minister there compared to a net, in which all madmen are caught. V. 95. a. There is hardly a word of truth in what is related of its Kings before Clovis. 494. b. n. (13). France is become more Popish between the year 1690, and the year 1701. II. 125. a. b. A new plan upon which John du Tillet undertakes to write the History of France. V. 351.
- Frankfort; the magistrates of that city order a speech to be struck out of the catalogue of their fair. III. 169. b. The Dutch congregation there is entirely dispersed by persecution. 173. The Jews are driven from thence by popular commotions. 387. The divisions of the Reformed Church there. V. 450. b.
- Frankfort upon the Oder, when its university was erected. III. 539.
- Franché-Comté and the seventeen provinces of the Low-Countries, made up the circle of Burgundy. II. 222. Conquered in the year 1674. IV. 211. b.
- Francis I, King of France, an extemporary harangue made to him by Alcimus. I. 194. b. 195. a. Whether he enquired what an Aristotelian Philosopher was. II. 6. b. Makes a progress to the coasts of Normandy. II. 6. b. Makes a progress to the coasts of Normandy in hopes of finding a cool air. 189. The mandy in hopes of finding a cool air. 189. The evasion which he made use of to curry favour with the Protestants. I. 721. II. 261. b. 262. a. His indignation upon reading a passage of Dante. 296. His soul goes directly to Heaven without stopping.

- ping at Purgatory. 372. b. 373. a. The merry reason which his steward gave for it to the deputies of the Sorbonne. ibid. He boasted that he had never seen any learned man, whose knowledge he had not exhausted in two years. 374. b. III paid for all his cabals, to favour the amours of Henry VIII. 435. a. Desires one of his mistresses to return some jewels, which having received in ingots, he sends back again to her, and approves of her conduct. 462. a. b. What we are told concerning his amours with the Countess of Chateau-Briand. ibid. What we ought to think of the protestation which he is said to have made, with regard to the Dukes of Estampes. 845. and a. b. His complaints against providence. III. 89. and b. The prudent advice which was given him, before he came to the crown, by Gouffier Boisy, or Du Prat, or Mr de Grignaux. 88. a. b. 89. a. III served by his own mother. 90. b. The calumnies with which he is blackened. ibid. 91. a. b. 92. a. b. 93. a. He charges his children to revenge him on pain of his curse. 95. b. Judgment of the Histories that have been writ of him in his own time, or in that of his son Henry. 334. b. 335. a. He grew worse humoured as he advanced in years. 395. b. Was very unhappy in the choice of his ministers. ibid. Disgraces his favourite the Comte de Montmorency, at the same time that Solyman disgraces and puts to death his favourite Ibrahim Bassa. 588. b. Approves Marot's version of the Psalms. IV. 157. a. b. 160. b. 161. a. Desires Melanchthon to come into France. 185, 186. and a. b. 191. b. Receives signal services from his sister, and has an extraordinary friendship and esteem for her. 316. a. b. 317. a. Is something shaken with the proposal of a mass of seven points. 318. b. Whether his love for the Dukes of Estampes, began before his confinement, or after it. II. 845. When he was set at liberty. ibid.
- Francis II. The Protestants had been entirely ruined in France, if he had lived two years longer. III. 400. and b.
- Francis de Paula; a false miracle that has been ascribed to him. III. 95. b. 96. a.
- Francis de Sales has a great esteem for Peter Fenoillet, and gives him a benefice. III. 22. Said of Lewis XI, that he was a good Catholic, but a bad Christian. 809. b.
- Franciscans; a continual jealousy reigns between them and the Dominicans. II. 239. a. Very much puzzled about a book. III. 84. a. b. 85. a. Do not observe the rules of their order. ibid. b. 86. a. Preach absurd things concerning their founder. ibid. and b. Can have no property in any thing. IV. 198. The concern they had in Savonarola's affair, and the generous and open proceeding of one of them, in what related to the challenge about the trial of fire. V. 62. b. 63. a. b. 64. a. b. The advantage was wholly on their side in this affair. 64. a. b.
- Frankenstein faulty in his notes upon Priolo. III. 266. b.
- Franco-Gallia; a judgment passed on that book. III. 519. b. 520. a.
- Francker; by whose care the garden of that university was enlarged. V. 442. Who was the first that read lectures there. ibid. a. The disputes of that university silenced by authority. 817.
- Fraffen, Cordelier, would have been puzzled to answer Spinoza. I. 26. a.
- Fraternity; a fraternity or brotherhood, founded upon adoption, was no less an obstacle to marriage than a natural fraternity. V. 49. b. 50. a.
- Frauds (pious). I. 726. b. 727. a. 777. b. 778. a. 793. a. 796. b. 797. a. II. 176. a. b. 177. a.
- Frederic II, King of Denmark, rejects the articles of Union. III. 390. a.
- Frederic Barbarossa, and Lewis of Bavaria; Hungerus writes an apology for these two Princes. III. 534.
- Frederic, Elektor Palatine, created King of Bohemia. V. 677. Accepts that crown with the consent of the Protestant Princes of Germany. 678. Whether, in accepting it, he acted contrary to the rules of prudence. ibid. and b. 679.
- Freedom of Rome; those who obtained it, took upon them the name of him who procured them that honour. I. 610. a.
- Free-will; the different ideas that people form of it. I. 661. a. b. There are certain articles which it is difficult not to adopt, when once the doctrine of Free-will is embraced. 759. a. The definition of Free-will properly so called. II. 226. b. Does not hinder all the actions of man's will from being unavoidable consequences of Fate. 406. a. Was not possible to be explained by the system of Epicurus. 790. a. b. 791. a. His motion of declination did not mend the matter. ibid. b. 792. a. b. Carneades invents a more subtle solution. ibid. b. Some persons have made it a doubt whether a man was endowed with it. III. 374. b. The Thomists, the Janfenists, and the Calvinists, maintain the same side of the question here. 548. a. Difficulties upon this head. IV. 94. a. b. 95. a. b. 96. a. Whether it can be of any use, to solve the difficulties concerning the origin of evil. 112. b. 113. a. b. 414. b. 415. a. b. 416. a. 517. a. b. 521. d. b. 788. a. b. 789. a. Ochinus's labyrinths upon this subject. 390. b. 391. a. A doctrine which seems to destroy it. 782. b. Whether it be a good proof of the specific difference between the souls of men and those of beasts. 907. a. b. to 909. a. b. Victorious objections are made pro and con. V. 151. a. b. to 156. a. b. Reason is against it. 208. a. b. One cannot see how to reconcile it with the quality of a being that is created out of nothing. 212. b.
- Fregosa, the French Embassador, is killed, and false instructions are forged and ascribed to him. III. 91. a.
- Freher (Marquard) it is said that the Jesuits played him a shameful trick, and that he complained of it in a Manifesto which is not to be seen now. IV. 726. b. 727. a.
- Freher (Paul) his contradiction with respect to Geldenhaur. III. 148. and b. 149. a. b.
- Freignis (Nicolas) particulars concerning him. III. 105. a.
- French are very apt to let the life of an illustrious kinsman fall into oblivion. I. 705. II. 433. It is not true that they obtained a victory over the Dutch at Bodegrave. 43. and a. Besieged in little Leith, are forced to capitulate, and leave Scotland for ever. 146, 147. After having rendered themselves odious there. ibid. So disfigure proper names, that they cannot be known. III. 722. b. 723. a. Are driven out of Italy. 766. a. Have extremely magnified the part they had in the defeat of the Turks at the passage of Raab. 793. b. Their folly set in opposition to the wisdom of the Venetians. 814. b. They do not idolize their monarchs, so much as they are said to do. 815. a. Their genius full of vivacity and variety. I. 64. b. It is against their inclination to be tied down to one science. ibid. Whether a Frenchman may give the title of King of France to the King of England. 800. b. 801. a. Whether by so doing he declares his master an usurper, and renders himself guilty of Felony and Treason. ibid. St Romuald, Balzac, and N. Beda affirm it, and are confuted. ibid. and b. 801. b. They are to blame for having esteemed Guevara's Dial of Princes. III. 270. and a. b. Compared to the Romans by Langolius. V. 417.
- Friburg and Brisac remain in the possession of France by the peace of Nimeguen. III. 720. a.
- Fricius (Andrew) Orichovius disputes with him. IV. 411.
- Friderickburg; the Unitarians who had obtained leave to reside there, are ordered to depart by the Duke of Holstein. III. 902.
- Friends. What judgment we ought to form of those persons who keep even the least notes of their friends, with a design to take advantage of them, in case of a rupture. III. 553. a. The illusions to which friends are liable. IV. 272. a. b. Good advice that was given to a couple of friends. V. 148. b. 149. a. b.
- Friendship; an instance of a tender friendship. I. 525. a. b. 526. a. It is seldom of a very long continuance. II. 5. b. A rare proof which the wife of Augustin Niphus gave of it. IV. 379. b.
- Frisland; the writers of that country publish a thousand fables. II. 769. a.
- Freila, King of the Asturias, whether his wife was daughter to Eudes, Duke of Aquitain. IV. 283. a. b.

V Q L. V.

10 Y

Freissard;

- Freisford*; the harangue which he puts into the mouth of Joan, Queen of Naples, contains divers falsities. IV. 303. b. n. (49). Quoted. 897. a. b. 898. a. n. (1), (4).
- Frontenau*, a sect of Orators. III. 107.
- Frugality*. The extraordinary frugality of Agesilaus. I. 130. a. A remarkable instance of that virtue. III. 1. a. b.
- Fruterius*; the use that was made of his manuscripts after his death. III. 159. b. 160. a.
- Fugitives for Religion*; nothing more common than to see them ringing the alarm against the sects. III. 758.
- Fulac*, a small town, erects a school. II. 536. Is plundered by the Spaniards. ibid.
- Fulvia* receives the Roman ladies, who had recourse to her intercession against the Triumviri, in a very rough manner. III. 489.
- Fulvii*; the origin of that family. III. 114. a. b.
- Fumbling* is more used in the little towns, than in the great ones. IV. 461. b.
- Funds*: a kingdom cannot possibly preserve its reputation abroad, and keep its neighbours in awe, if the sovereign has not the funds in readiness. V. 659.
- Furterius* has committed a gross blunder in speaking of Cassius. II. 348. b. 349. a. The satirical strokes which he levels at those writers who live by their pen. IV. 843. a. His Dictionary corrected and improved by the Sieur de Beauval. I. 672. b.
- Furius*. The Furius of Catullus is very different from the Furius mentioned by Horace. II. 395. a. b. Vossius censured on that head. ibid.
- Furmerius*; the fact which he alleges to prove that the ancient Kings of Friesland were very long-lived is altogether improbable. I. 542. b. 543. a.
- Furstenberg* (the Prince of), his being forcibly carried away dissolves the conference about the general peace which was treating at Cologne. IV. 122. a.
- Future events*; those who venture to foretell them, are happy when they serve a Prince whom the providence of God designs for great purposes. I. 447. b. A wife man ought to be extremely reserved concerning them. 749. b. II. 749. b. The difficulty of foretelling them, when they have no dependance upon a necessary cause. 332. b. Those who take upon them to foretell future events are the most dangerous pests of mankind. III. 321. a.
- G.
- Gaboy Faro* (Aaron), a Portuguese Jew that was converted to Christianity. V. 539. a. (d).
- Gabalus* (le Comte de), whether that piece ought to pass for an original. II. 87. a. A fragment of it concerning Noah and his wife. 431. b. 432. a.
- Gaguin* does not defend Joan, Queen of Navarre, well against the calumnies with which she is blackened. II. 224. a. b. 225. a. Unjustly put upon a level with Paulus Æmilius. 764. b. 765. a.
- Gaillard* (Giles) turns Protestant, and publishes the motives of his conversion. IV. 884. a.
- Gain*: the love of gain occasions a great deal of meanness. I. 194. a. b.
- Galatinus* (Peter), a Franciscan, accused of having stolen from Porcettus Salvago. IV. 168. and a.
- Galba* would have been thought worthy of a crown, if he had never wore one. III. 405. and a. His complaisance to Mæcenæ. IV. 21. a.
- Galaxxo* (John) dies by poison, and not by over caring his wife. I. 404. a. b.
- Galus*, his objection against animated atoms. II. 779. b. He thinks it strange that Chrysippus should trouble himself to give a serious explication of poetical traditions. III. 648. b. Who was the first that translated his works into Latin. 775.
- Galileo* filed First Mathematician to the Grand Duke of Tuscany. V. 499. His bust honourably placed and respected by Viviani. ibid.
- Galiffard* is guilty of two overights concerning John Damascen. II. 886. a.
- Gallant*, one that meets with the punishment of Abelard. II. 8. b.
- Gallantry*; what is the greatest sin that can be committed in its empire. II. 602. a.
- Gallantries* of the Kings of France; the author of that work has adopted all the mistakes of Vasillas, and even made them worse. IV. 697. b. The first edition of it has more the air of a true History than the second. V. 393. b.
- Gallois* (le) censured for several errors with respect to Aretin's plagiarism. I. 435. a. b.
- Gall-nut*, certain insects produce it by pricking the oak. V. 499. b.
- Gallucci* (Father) confounds himself in the description of a fight. II. 130. b.
- Gallus Romæ Hopes*: a book composed under that title by Lewis de Mont-josieu. IV. 245. a. b.
- Gameren* (Hanard), who that author was. V. 236. a. (a).
- Games* (Compital) re-established by Tarquin the Proud. II. 163. b.
- Games* (Olympic), women were forbid to be present at them. I. 761. and a. b. III. 964. a.
- Gammus*; from whence that word comes. I. 633.
- Ganges* (King) put to death by the Gymnotophists. III. 311. b. The evils which happened after his murder. ibid.
- Gantois*. The Gantois reduced to reason by Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy. II. 214. a. b.
- Gap*; its national Synod orders that a new article should be inserted in the Confession of Faith, importing that the Pope is properly Antichrist. III. 39. a.
- Garamont* (Claudius) makes puncheons, and prepares moulds for the Roman capitals. V. 388. He was Tori's disciple. ibid.
- Garasse*; a passage concerning alabaster quoted from him. I. 174. a. b. One of his calumnies against Beza refuted by a Roman Catholic. 798. a. The pitiful shift he made use of. 799. a. b. His character. ibid. b. and 800. a. An impertinent story in his Doctrina Curieuse. II. 180. a. b. Another that is still more impertinent. 181. a. b. He vents a falsehood against Calvin with respect to Servetus. 265. a. Is a calumniator. 361. a. A train of his impertinences. 666. a. b. His judgment of Democritus and Diogenes severely censured. 667. a. b. His scurrilities with respect to the Antinomians. III. 597. a. b. 598. a. b. The liberty he takes to change facts in the History of Athenais. 780. a. b. How he abuses the authority of Præteolus to blacken the Calvinists. 936. a. b. Censures Pasquier, and takes occasion to give examples of a ridiculous ignorance. 908. b. Is guilty of several mistakes concerning some Magicians. IV. 939. b. 940. a. b. Publishes two violent satires under the name of Andreas Scioptius. V. 98. a. b. Is convicted of a gross mistake, with regard to Lucan and Tacitus. 282. a. b. Treats as an Atheist the anonymous author who concealed himself under the name of Antony Cornelius. 536. a. b. A suggestion of this Jesuit examined. 523. Sc. His mistakes concerning the Querela Infantium. II. 556. a. b.
- Garcia* (Martin) causes the Alcoran to be translated into the language of Arragon. I. 326.
- Gard* (Guy de la) translates into French Raduel's discourse on the marriage of men of letters, and gives it a wrong title. I. 604. a. b.
- Garden* (George) writes the life of John Forbes. III. 69.
- Gardens of Adonis* pass into a proverb. I. 114. b. And those of Alcinous likewise. 201. a.
- Gardis* (de la) traduced by Typotius. V. 374. a. b. 375. a. b.
- Gardiner* deposed in the reign of Edward VI, for not supporting the rights of the crown. IV. 692. a. And restored by Queen Mary. ibid. b. A jest concerning John Poinet ascribed to him, but falsely. 694. a. b.
- Garlick*; those who had eat of it were not allowed to enter into the temple of the mother of the gods. V. 240. a.
- Garnier* (Giles), a man who transformed himself into a were-wolf, condemned to be burnt by an arrêt of the Parliament of Dole. I. 562. b.
- Gassarus* (Achilles), a Physician, was a true Hæm Librorum. III. 110.
- Gassendus* drops his design of writing a criticism upon Aristotle for fear of perfection. I. 470. a. n. (80). Censured for taking an ironical praise in Horace for a serious one. II. 389. b. His elogy. ibid. Whether he suffered himself to be deceived by the Latin translator of Plutarch, with respect to Carneades and Leontium. 782. a. None has wrote

- so well as he in behalf of Epicurus. 783. a. b.
 Wherein he differs from Des Cartes. III. 790. a.
 He was never in better health, than at the time when he should have died according to the predictions of the Astrologers. IV. 264. a. Was a dreadful adversary to that sort of men. 531. b.
 532. a. b. Peirefkius desires him to write upon the Astronomical operation concerning Marfeilles.
 678. a. Uses all his skill to enervate Des Cartes's arguments for the immortality of the soul. 718. a.
 His doctrine relating to the conservation of the creatures absurd. 886. a. b. What he observed with respect to Mathematicians, and particularly Geometricians. V. 620. b.
Gaffus (the Marshal de), a panegyric on him forbid to be spoke. III. 438. a. How he refuted the reflections of the Abbot de la Riviere at the siege of Courtray. IV. 460. a. A saying of his. V.
 326. b.
Gauden is the author of Icon Basilike. IV. 221. b.
 222. a.
Gaulard (Sieur), tales under his name. I. 64. a.
Gaulier (James) multiplies the sects of the Protestants as much as he can. II. 434. b. Enlarges his catalogue of Heretics with the Melchiorites, an imaginary sect. IV. 193.
Gauric (Luke), what he declared to Henry II, in his horoscope. III. 401. b. 402. a.
Gautruche (Father), his faults remarked the more carefully because he is in every body's hands. I. 77.
b. n. (38).
Gaza, what he did for Argyropilus. I. 442.
Gazetteers, their relations not to be trusted to. I. 15.
b. The most curvy ones may promise themselves immortality for the gross lies they invent. II. 265.
b. 266. a. 296. a. It is as difficult to reconcile the Gazetteers with themselves, as to reconcile those of different parties. III. 718. b. 719. a. The ignorance of the Paris Gazetteer. ibid. and b. Their shifts to augment and diminish the troops of a place besieged. ibid. Those of the Imperial towns generally great liars. V. 504.
Gazettes; the former are more to be trusted than the latter in certain cases. I. 15. b. The invention of them was not the first way that was made use of to deceive the public. 129. Whether the Catholic Princes do right in suffering their vows and their pilgrimages in order to obtain a glorious campaign, to be put in the Gazettes. 161. a. Those of Am-sterдам are not used to celebrate the praises of the Popes. II. 475. b. They nevertheless praise Alexander VII. ibid. An observation upon the news which they contain. III. 271. b. The usefulness of an office that might be set up with respect to the Gazettes. V. 751. a. The judgment which Guy Patin passes upon the Paris Gazette. 752. b. Their use with respect to dates. IV. 211. b.
Gedicus has not rightly comprehended the true intention of the author, who made it a doubt whether women were human creatures. III. 143. a. b.
Gela; by whom that city was built. III. 157. a.
 Its inhabitants send a colony to Agrigentum.
ibid.
Gelis (Theophilus) translates the Anatomical History, and several other pieces of Du Laurens. III.
 745. b.
Geminus (Livius), his infamous flattery, and his horrible imprecations. II. 703. b.
Genealogies; those of the Jews attended with insurmountable difficulties. I. 41. a. Figures are not much more necessary in matters of Geometry than in matters of Genealogy. II. 133. a.
Genealogists, their impertinences. IV. 650. a. b. V.
 468. b. 469. a.
Genebrard treats Josephus as an impious person for having compared Alexander's passage through the sea of Pamphylia, with that of Moses through the Red-Sea. IV. 608. b. 609. a. A difficulty relating to the first edition of his Chronicle. 509. b. 510. a.
 He treated those who were not Catholics with severe calumnies. III. 733.
Gener, that word is taken indifferently in antient writ-ters, for father-in-law and brother-in-law. IV.
 644. b.
Generals of armies sometimes supply the enemy with an after-game. I. 764. a. There are a great many of them whose victories turn only to the profit of those who deal in mourning cloaths. II. 413. b.
 The Romans changed their Generals often. ibid.
 How much it concerns them to be diligent. 414. b.
 A political craft proves sometimes more useful to them than all their skill in war. 547. b. Their tricks to render themselves always necessary. V.
 126. a. It concerns no body so much as them to be free from the superstitions of Judicial Astrology.
 255. a. b. Too much circumspection is hurtful to them sometimes. 261. a. b.
Generation. The most excellent Naturalists before Aristotle admitted no generation, properly speaking.
 I. 470. b. The relations which Physicians pretend to find between the organs of generation, and the throat. II. 636. b.
Generosity; a very singular example of that virtue. I.
 482. b.
Genest (St) ended his days by a tragedy. IV. 487. b.
n. (37).
Genova; a false preface of Scaliger with respect to that city. I. 794. a. b. Disorders prevailed there, notwithstanding the reformation of doctrine. II.
 264. The Italian Consistory draws up articles of Faith there. III. 152. a. Its academy resolves to admit no other system but that of Aristotle. IV.
 240. b. When, and upon what occasion, a school for the languages, &c. was erected there. II. 274.
a. An oration which Broughton addressed to the inhabitants of Geneva. 150. a. A Greek and Latin copy of that oration. ibid. and b.
Genevois (the Prince of), why so called. III. 142.
 In attempting upon Beauvois he becomes his mother's prisoner. ibid.
Genii; whether they may not preserve their species by generation. II. 66. b. Whether any such beings really exist. 350. a. b. The doctrine of the Heathens touching a particular genius that attends every man. 249. b. 250. a. What Cardan says of his particular genius. 318. b. A small pattern of the Platonic doctrine concerning them. IV. 689. b.
 690. a.
Genius; men of an extraordinary genius. II. 661. b.
 662. a. That kind of genius which inclines to sport and toy with the Muses, is generally a preservative against the ill effects of too strong an application to study. III. 883.
Gennadius, Patriarch of Constantinople, receives the crozier from the hands of Mahomet II himself.
 IV. 53. a.
Genoa; that city, from Luitprandus's time, was rather called Janna than Genoa, and for what reason. I.
 614. a. Desires to have Charles VII for her Lord.
 II. 464. a.
Gentiles; one does not know what the Fathers dreamed of, in some of their arguments against them. II.
 498. a.
Gentilis; his differences with Calvin are more particularly described in the French than in the Latin life of Calvin. II. 274. b.
Genius, King of Illyricum, is led in triumph at Rome.
 I. 340. b. 341. a.
Gentlemen; most of the gentlemen of France come from a village. III. 137. a.
Geometrical exercises, a saying of Plato, that God is continually employed in them. V. 621. b.
Geometricians; the smallest degree of inattention may occasion a great many misreckonings in their calculations. II. 388. b.
Georgians; their manners. IV. 33. b.
Gerard (Balthazar), what example encouraged him to assassinate William I, Prince of Orange. III. 601. a.
 He assassinates that Prince. II. 459. a. n. (27).
 III. 601. a.
Germain (St), Bishop of Auxerre, restored to the Calendar by a decree of the Parliament. III. 897.
a. b.
Germanicus; to whom that surname was given, and for what reason. II. 716. What Tacitus says of him in describing his triumph. III. 921. b.
Germans; they require that the very hour of a person's birth should be inserted in his eulogy. II. 429.
a. But Roland Des-Marets blames them for it.
ibid. n. (1). Who is the most antient Historian of that nation. 743. The Germans, at a time, tricked by Pope Julius II. III. 614. b. Refuse to follow more than one profession at once. I. 64.
b. The losses which they sustained at the siege of Landau. III. 718. b. 719. a.
Germany; several Catholic Princes of that country send Deputies to Lewis XIII, to recommend to him the interests of their religion. II. 134. b. What place was

- was called the paradise of Germany. 816. b. What was the source of the war, which desolated Germany from the year 1618, to the peace of Munster. III. 657. a. It produced some famous Latin Poets before Conrad Celtes. 724. b.
- Gerfen* criticizes Ruybroeck's treatise of the spiritual marriage. IV. 942. John de Schoonhove and Dennis the Carthusian, write answers to his Critical Dissertation. ibid.
- Geruase of Tilbury* makes mention of the She-Pope, in his Otia Imperialia. IV. 738. b. 739. a. Martin Polonus takes from him the materials of his Chronicle. ibid. and b.
- Gesner* has expressed himself so ill in speaking of Tortellius, that he might easily occasion several gross faults. I. 433. b. 434. a. His inattention. II. 142. a. The books of an author which Gesner gave hopes would be published, have been mistaken for books actually printed. IV. 544. a. b.
- Geta*; their Embassadors who were sent on a treaty of peace or a truce, to persons whose wrath was provoked, presented themselves playing on the lyre. I. 83. a. They were the most warlike of all men, and for what reason. III. 312. b. Are in this respect a shame to the Christians. ibid. Treat Ovid with a great deal of humanity and civility. IV. 448. That Poet writes a poem in their language to the praise of Augustus. 445, 446. a. b.
- Ghost*. A Ghost which was said to have haunted a person every night. II. 522. and a. b.
- Ghost* (the Holy) why he deferred his coming into the world for ten days. I. 652. a. A mean and unworthy answer to that question. ibid. Among the Turks certain persons born of a virgin-mother, are called sons of the Holy Ghost. IV. 346. and a. b. The Popes moved Cardinal Pallavicini's pity, when they had no other assistance but his. V. 826.
- Gibbets*; the extraordinary height of some, and for what end. I. 591. and a. b.
- Gibius* (Father) enriches the works of Cardinal Beaulieu, with arguments and summaries. I. 786. b.
- Gießen*; the Landgrave of Hesse erects a college there, on which the Emperor did the year following bestow the title of university. III. 386, 387. The university of that town transported to Marpourg. V. 80.
- Gifanius*; a solution of the difficulties proposed about him. III. 158, 159, and a. b. 160. a. b. 161. a. It was he that wrote the life of Lucretius. IV. 476. a.
- Gifts* are commonly separated, some fall to one man's share and some to another's. IV. 758. a. b.
- Giges*; what his maxim was touching women who stript themselves naked. III. 331. a.
- Gil* (Father) a Jesuit, never knew any woman by sight. IV. 125. a.
- Gilles* (Peter) composes, by order of his superiors, an Ecclesiastical History of the churches of the Vaudois. III. 161, 162.
- Gymnosophists*, there were two sorts of them II. 117.
- Girac* censures Costar most injudiciously, I. 75. a. Does not act the part of an exact Critic. ibid. Does not reason consequentially. ibid. Is ignorant of what he should have known. ibid. and b. Explains Plutarch ill. ibid. b. Does not take the right way of confuting facts borrowed from the Pagan Mythology. ibid. b. 76. a. Quoted. 259. a. II. 813. b. 814. a. The judgment which he passes upon Amyot's translation of Plutarch. I. 259. a. b. He contrives into treason a passage of Costar's reply. III. 399. a. Justly censures Costar with respect to the two vessels of Jupiter. IV. 93. a. b. The History of his quarrels with Costar. V. 341. a. b. &c. to 346. a. b.
- Giraldus* miserably confounds things with respect to Parthenius. IV. 483. b.
- Girardus* (Albertus) translator of Stevin's works. V. 236. a.
- Girl*. Whether a girl that should read lectures, would promote or retard the improvement of her hearers, by hiding her handsome face. I. 325. a. b. The behaviour of one that was a novice in the affairs of love. II. 513. a. b. A girl who contradicts her father's words as to a promise which he made in her name. III. 258. a. IV. 87. b. 797. a. See Maid.
- Giseric*, King of the Vandals, takes Rome, &c. III. 759. b.
- Gladiators*; their shews abolished by Honorius. I. 230. a. They hired themselves to the first comer to kill one another. II. 196. a.
- Glandorpius* censured for making three Consuls out of one. I. 612. b. For dividing one Poet into two. II. 354. a. b. He censures Rutilius unjustly with respect to the Parthian war. 348. a. b. His notion about the time when the law Fannia was made, does not at all agree with what Pliny says of it. III. 6. a. b. 7. a. b. He imposes upon the reader twice, in speaking of Fulvia. 119. b. His error in taking Hortensius for Sylla's Lieutenant-General. 491. a. b.
- Glaphyra*; her dream; with the moral reflexions which Josephus has added to it. III. 164. a. b.
- Glaſi*. It was a custom with lovers, in drinking to apply their lips to the same part of the glaſs, to which their mistresses had applied theirs. III. 867. a. b.
- Glyceria*, a courtesan, rallies Stilpo. V. 242. b.
- Glory*; men are extremely greedy of it. II. 298. a. b. 299. a. It is inseparable from what is useful in affairs of war. 413. a. b. Those who aspire to the same glory, may very well esteem, but can never love one another. 867. a. b. The desire of it is the last thing which a man parts with. V. 325. b. There is nothing more uncommon than for a man to know how to enjoy quietly the glory that he has acquired. 365. b.
- Glossographers*; the great authority of those who commented upon the Civil-Law. I. 66. a. b. 67. a. Their ignorance of good literature made them fall into divers mistakes. 67. a. Who was the first of the French Lawyers that exploded their barbarisms. II. 721.
- Gloves* of Frangipani, whence so called. III. 102. a. b.
- Gnostics*; one need not scruple to believe that they admitted those powers and principles which it is said they did. II. 251. a. The impertinent stories which they told about the souls that ascended up to Heaven. 751. b. They ridiculed those who suffered martyrdom. IV. 108. b.
- Goat*. A Goat sacrificed to a Poet by his friends, in a carnival sport. III. 574. and a. b. What construction was put upon it. 575. a. b. A she-Goat, the mistress of an Italian General. I. 675. a. The she-Goats of a whole country burnt, and for what reason. ibid. b. Whether the blackness of a she-Goat can give any particular quality to her milk, and whether it be possible for a man to discern that quality. II. 636. a. b. The drinking of Goat's blood makes a man look pale. 712. a.
- Gobelin* (John) his judgment of Flavius Blondus. II. 32. a. b.
- Goblet* of the world; what the Arabian Philosophers understood by it. I. 469. b.
- G O D*. The doctrine of the School-men, touching the distinguishing character of God, and of his creatures. I. 136. b. His name called the Tetragramma. 244. b. 245. a. b. What the Heathens thought of a God that had died. 281. a. b. God has each the ideas of an infinity of worlds, different from each other, but regular to the last degree. 311. a. An argument to prove his existence. 345. b. Not to know him is a less evil than to attribute to him what the Pagans attributed to their gods. 382. a. His vengeance is less dreaded than that of men. 435. b. 436. a. One cannot perceive his greatness better than by despairing to comprehend it. 461. b. Whether the incomprehensibility of his nature, is a reason for neglecting the worship of him. 462. a. A maxim of some people, that we never have recourse to him, except when we distrust the valour and prudence of the Princes of this world. 573. a. His fore-knowledge is so far from destroying man's liberty, that, on the contrary, it establishes it. 661. b. Whether the things which never were, nor ever shall be, are possible to him. 759. a. 760. b. 761. a. God in the Scripture acts after the manner of men, and this his behaviour is answered in such a manner as if he were really taken for a man. II. 247. a. To obey his laws out of a due regard to his majesty, and against the strongest inclinations of nature, is the most acceptable worship.

- worship that can be paid to him. 315. b. 316. a.
 A bold and blasphemous censure passed on his works 379. b. In what manner the author of that censure was punished for it. ibid. 380. a. The uncertainty of tradition upon that head. ibid. Every body does not agree that there is a necessary connexion between his providence, and the immortality of the soul. 419. a. The Sadducees are a proof of this. ibid. It is possible to believe in him, and at the same time be persuaded that shame is only founded on a positive law. 670. a. Every objection against his existence, does not convince a man that there is no God. ibid. b. How far his glory was profited by the Pagan Poets. 742. b. The most perfect way of loving him, is to love him for his own sake. 780. a. In what sense it may be said that he is subject to laws. III. 462. b. Those who deny his existence have less right to deny Magic and Sorcery than others. 471. a. The great efficacy of his word. 625. a. b. Some nations are ignorant of his existence. 781. a. b. His spirituality proved. 791. b. The belief of his existence, without the belief of his providence, can neither be a motive to virtue, nor a restraint to vice. 923. b.
 The answer that was made to a Prince who asked the definition of God. V. 141. a. b. to 145. a. He could have made things otherwise than he has made them. 155. a. b. An objection against this, and the answer to it. ibid. As soon as he declares a new doctrine to men, the devil opposes it. IV. 46.
a. b. It has always been lawful and even necessary to prove his existence. 80. a. b. He is perfectly good. 416. b. 417. a. b. 418. a. b. 419. a. 572.
a. b. 788. a. b. The way to be like him. 675.
b. He is incapable of envy and jealousy. I. 311.
b. IV. 574. b. &c. It is infinitely more advantageous to believe that he exists, than to believe that he does not. 489. a. The desire of vindicating him has obliged the Divines to turn themselves a thousand ways. 523. a. b. Whether the doctrine that should make him the author of sin, would lead to Atheism. ibid. b. That system which places him in the highest degree of glory and elevation, ought to be preferred to all others. 524. a. Two opposite things lead men to the knowledge of him.
 572. b. An examination of what is usually said, that we must not measure his privileges and duties by the line of ours. 655. a. Whether it be as easy for him to produce a new soul every moment, as to reproduce the same. ibid. b. None but he is wise. 675. a. Whether he can lie or deceive. 876.
a. b. Whether it can well be concluded from the existence of God, that there are demons. 938. b.
 939. a. b. A reflexion on the incomprehensibility of his nature. V. 5. b. His immutability inconsistent with the nature of extension. 209. b. He cannot be the subject of inheritance of the thoughts of men. 210. a. b. He must necessarily be happy.
 211. b. Whether he be the immanent cause of the alterations in the universe. 588. b. A reflexion upon the consequences from the eternity or of the beginning of motion with respect to his existence.
 593. b. 594. a. Whether nothing but the eternity, of motion can prove the existence of a mover distinct from matter. ibid. a. b. Facts shewing that it is lawful for the Orthodox to dispute about the arguments for his existence. 595. b. 596. a. He is continually employed in Geometrical exercises, according to Plato's maxim. 621. b. The opinion of Divines touching his essence and substance being diffused through all bodies, is liable to a thousand difficulties. II. 100. b. He may be present in imaginary space. ibid. It was pretended that Savonarola conversed with him. V. 72. a. b.
 What the God of Calvin is, if we believe the Catholics and Bertius. 824. What the God of the Socinians is, according to Mr Jurieu. ibid. It becomes his Majesty to speak with authority, and not to argue. 833.
Goddesse; a tradition that prevailed concerning mortals that lay with them. I. 314. a.
Godau; what he says of the facility in composing.
 III. 262. b. Attacked by a Critic on the subject of an hymn. 823. and b. 824. a. b.
Godfrey (Theodore) publishes John d'Auton's History of Lewis XII. I. 589.
Gods; their amours. I. 454. a. b. Their Pederasty.
 II. 482. a. b. 483. a. Reflexions upon the Heathen system of a multitude of gods. 250. a. b. The
 VOL. V.
 Hebraicians pretend that they have all been taken from the Jewish tradition. 431. b. The false arguments which the Fathers alleged to destroy their worship. 498. a. Chimera's touching their original.
 673. a. b. The Pagans accused their gods of forcing them to evil. III. 374. b. 375. a. b. 376. a.
 Their condition was very miserable. 641. a. b. II.
 788. b. 789. a. Great Philosophers have assigned for the cause of their existence, a being that was not God. III. 649. a. b. 650. a. b. Others have deprived them of life and knowledge. 653. a. b.
 Cicero says that they were formerly men. V. 411.
b. See Divinities. Knowledge their chief priviledge. 587. b. 588. a. I. 311. a. b. The Romans were less jealous of the honour of their gods than of that of their countrymen. 761, 762. The Pagans represented them under the notion of beings which punished one crime by inducing the offender to commit another. IV. 229.
Gods (tutelar) of towns were called forth by the besiegers, when they thought it likely that they would be obliged to surrender. V. 185. a. b.
Goldast (Melchior) his brother murders a gentlewoman in the high-way near Straßbourg. III. 168. b. 169.
a. He inserts the Defensor Pacis of Marfilus de Mamburno, in the second tome of his monarchy.
 IV. 198. a.
Golius (James) was a good Protestant. III. 389. His profound knowledge of the Oriental tongues. ibid.
 525.
Golius (Peter) his voyages to the Levant, where he is treated with great civility on his brother's account.
 III. 389. a. b.
Gomarus; what Baudius prognosticated, would be the issue of his controversy with Arminius. I. 687. b.
 688. a. What Joseph Hall says of it. III. 343. b.
 He procures an edition of the Defensor Pacis writ by Marfilus of Padua. IV. 198. a. b.
Gombauld is rallied on his being ill lodged. V.
 401. b.
Gomen (Ruy) by what device he acquired the friendship of Philip II. V. 326. b. n. (10).
Gomorrhæus; what book it is. II. 588. a. b. 589.
a. b.
Gonzaga (Cecilia of) despises the pleasures of the world, and consecrates herself to God. II.
 551.
Gonzaga (Louisa Mary de) an Astrologer promises her a crown, and the prediction was fulfilled. III.
 826. b. See Poland (the Queen of).
Good surpassed by Evil according to Xenophanes. II.
 834. b. Whether it surpasses evil in the nature of things. V. 576. a. b. &c.
Good-fortune, one of the three qualities of a good Physician. III. 487, 488. and a. Reflexions on this head. ibid. and b. Whether good and bad fortune are the effect, one of them of prudence, and the other of imprudence. ibid. and 489. a. b. Whether there be in human life good-fortune independent on prudence. V. 367. b. 368. a. b. 370. a. b. 371. a.
b. 372. a. b. 373. a. b. People call by this name and impute to fortune that which is sometimes the effect of prudence. 371. a. b.
Good (Public) a cloak for avarice. II. 259, 260.
Goodness. What is the idea that we ought to have of perfect goodness. IV. 416. b. 417. a. b. 418. a.
b. Taken for simplicity. II. 164. a. b.
Good. Whether it comes nearer perfection to have a community of goods, or to keep every man his own, in order to supply therewith the necessities of others. II. 776. a. b. &c. People ascribe to worldly good all the defects which the Pagans ascribed to fortune. 369. b.
Good souls take it ill that a book which attacks their party should remain unanswered; and they are not able to discover the weak side of a bad confutation. V. 180. a.
Goose. A goose in love with a boy. I. 282. b. 283.
a. b. Another in love with a Philosopher. III.
 697. b.
Gordian (Emperor) Philip causes him to be deposed, and afterwards to be killed. I. 593. b.
Gordius, what preface he had of the crown. V. 310.
 and a. b.
Gorgias; to whom he served as a model for the lofti-ness of writing. II. 571. a. Harangued without preparation, and for what reason. IV. 784. a.

- Gortynians*, an Atheistical people of Phocis, the same with the Phleggyans. IV. 626. a.
- Gortys*, a city of Crete; by whom it was built. II. 875. a.
- Gospel*; Jesus Christ was willing it should clash not only with the religion of the Pagans, but likewise with their wisdom. V. 831.
- Gospel according to St John*; a Pagan quotes the beginning of it, to confirm Plato's doctrine. I. 255.
- Gospel* (New), several of Cardinal Palavicini's maxims are censured in it. III. 326. b.
- Gospels* published in the Anglo-Saxon tongue. III. 629. a. What Luther is charged with saying of the first three gospels. 940. a. 942. a.
- Gousselin* (William), French translator of Tartaglia's Arithmetic. V. 297. a. b.
- Goudron* (the Marquis de) marries a prostitute enriched by the great gifts of the Duke of Vitry. IV. 499. a. b.
- Gouffier de Boisy* put for Duprat in several relations. III. 88. a. n. (6).
- Gouls*; his answers to a criticism on a passage of his translation of Socrates's apology, examined. I. 514. a. b. A Supplement to the History of his dispute with Balzac. IV. 284. a. b.
- Governors* besieged always send to know where a King fixes his quarters, when he assists at a siege. III. 718. a. b.
- Gown*: an action of damages brought against a man for disordering the pleats of a gown. III. 492. a.
- Gracchi*; they transfer all the courts of judgment from the Senatorian to the Equestrian order. II. 710. a. b.
- Grace*; St Augustin, Calvin, Janfenius, the Thomists, were, at bottom, of the same way of thinking on that head. I. 106. a. III. 548. a. Bellarmine was likewise of the same opinion. I. 729. a. b. There is no system which can remove all the difficulties which are to be met with on that subject. 481. b. 482. a. The inamissibility of Grace determined by the Synod of Dort. II. 70. a. b. It has been said, that the doctrine of Grace is a sea that has neither shore nor bottom. III. 548. a. The weak side of this doctrine. IV. 846. b. 847. a. A person may err in this point through good motives. V. 153. a. b. It is a scandal that the disputes about Grace should produce so many divisions. 153. a. The cause of these disputes. 821.
- Grace* (Universal), whether that hypothesis be far from satisfying reason. I. 261. b. 262. a. The disputes which it occasioned. ibid. and b. These disputes are looked upon now with another eye than they were formerly. II. 584. b. See Predestination.
- Gracian*; two sorts of readers complain of his works. IV. 457. a. b.
- Grævius* is mistaken about the death of Francis Junius. III. 629.
- Grammar*; the not knowing one of its rules by heart, occasions a learned man being sent back to his rudiments. II. 404. a.
- Grammar* (French) more exact than the Greek or Latin grammar. I. 74. b. V. 327. b.
- Grammar* (Irish), who wrote the first. I. 718. a.
- Grammarians*: one that was made Emperor. I. 375. Another who thought that disputing on any material questions of Divinity, was so much time ill employed. II. 190. b. Censured for looking after the misfortunes of other people, while they are ignorant of their own disorders. 671. a. b. Grammarians and Philologists are easily provoked, and difficultly appeased. IV. 476. a.
- Grammont* (Marthal), how he talked of the Protestant religion. IV. 276. a. It was thought that he lost a battle on purpose. III. 59. b.
- Grand* (Mr le), his vindication of Sanders against Burnet. V. 43. b.
- Grandeur*. Our minds are not very capable of knowing true grandeur. IV. 669. b.
- Grandier*; what is affirmed of him in Mr d'Artignan's memoirs. III. 880. b. 881. a.
- Grangier* (Bonaventure) writes against the frequent practice of bleeding introduced by Botal. II. 99. a.
- Grape-stone*; Anacreon choaked by one. I. 292. and a. b.
- Gras* (Henry) publishes Antony Saporta's treatise de Tumorebus præter Naturam. V. 44.
- Gratitude* is not subject to the same laws among Princes, as it is among private persons. II. 755. a. b.
- Great men* are not so happy as people imagine. II. 219. b. 220. a. V. 581. b. 582. a. b. 583. a. b. In all places one should ever speak of them with respect. II. 754. b. It is necessary to watch the favourable moments for presenting one's self before them. III. 281. a. b. They easily make up their differences. IV. 698. a.
- Greece* deserves the epithet of lying, of fabulous, and of male feriata. I. 74. a. The General History of Greece is a book full of faults. IV. 581. b. 582. a.
- Greek language*, what work deserves to be called the treasure of it. II. 295.
- Greeks*; what title they gave to the King of Persia. I. 130. b. 514. b. A precept addressed to them to live in peace, to honour the Muses, and to compose their differences, according to the rules of equity. 208. b. They are reproached with being always children. II. 82. a. Decried for their false evidences. 303. a. Their affection for their own tongue. 517. b. In what respect the Trojan war was useful to them. III. 317. a. Being ingenious and voluptuous, they stood in need of a religion burthened with ceremonies. V. 814.
- Greeks* (modern) complain of the little affection which the Church of Rome has for them. I. 508. and a. b. Follow the opinions of John Damascen more than those of any other Father. II. 587. b. Their Priests falsely boast of a miracle every year at Easter. 746. a. What was the cause of the evils which they suffered at the taking of Constantinople. IV. 55. a. b. Four learned men of that country fled for refuge into France, under the reign of Charles VII. 169. b.
- Gregory Nazianzen*; an apology for him with respect to what he says of the kind of death which Aristotle died. I. 473. a. b. What he said of his father. III. 729. a. b. See Nazianzen.
- Gregory Nyssenus*; some think him author of the book which goes under the name of Nemesius. IV. 346.
- Gregory the Great*; whether he was a Benedictine Monk. III. 126. a. b. &c. By what means he was found out in his solitude. 219. a. Whether he was obliged to revoke the law of Celibacy. 225. a. b. He once doubted of the resurrection. 267. a. A book of Radulphus Flaviacensis ascribed to him. IV. 824. The ablest men of the Church of Rome confute now-a-days the story that is told of this Pope's having delivered the soul of Trajan from Hell. V. 397. and a. b.
- Gregory V*, Pope, how he was a near relation to Otho: IV. 428. a. b.
- Gregory VII*, Pope; a supplement to one of the remarks in his article. III. 517. b. Another supplement. IV. 296. a. b. 297. and a. b.
- Gregory XI*, Pope; complains to the Deputies of the Faculty of Theology at Paris, against the French translation of the Defensor Pacis of Marfilas of Padua. IV. 198. b.
- Gregory* (Peter) did not understand the author he cites in speaking of Diagoras. II. 655. b.
- Grim* (Egbert) quotes the testimony of 135 writers for the story of Pope Joan. III. 78. b.
- Gryneus*; famous men of that name. III. 255. b.
- Grind*; what the signification of that word is among the Hebrews. V. 37. a. b.
- Grifons*; their edict against Heretics. III. 757. a. They publish an edict against the Heretics, and Scipio Lentulus writes an apology for it. 758.
- Groendal*; Ruysbroeck founds a convent of Canons-Regular of the order of St Augustin at Groendal. IV. 942.
- Groningen*. Who first preached the reformation in the territory of Groningen. I. 238. a. And in the great church, after the reduction of that place to the power of the States-General. ibid. b. The Lutherans there drive out all those who followed the Reformation of Calvin. II. 768. That city associates itself with the United-Provinces. ibid. Erects its college into an university. ibid. Defends itself vigorously against the Bishop of Munster, and when. IV. 211. b.

Gropfer

- Gropper* betrays his master. V. 559. b. Compared to Judas, and accused of having strangled himself. ibid.
- Gros* (Valerius) defends the Vaudois against the Prior Rorencio. IV. 917. b.
- Grotius*; whether one has reason to be surprized at his taking Caligula for that man of sin whom St Paul describes. II. 257. n. (i). He was in the wrong not to have sent a copy of his history to his friends. 283. a. b. What made King Gustavus resolve to make use of him. III. 247. a. His book de Veritate Christianæ Religionis. 394. a. What he says with respect to the succours which the Spanish Ambassador solicited in England for the Duke of Rohan. 397. b. The confession which he makes use of to refute Mahometanism. IV. 28. a. b. He is accused of not speaking with respect enough of the rights of Kings. 120. a. It was said that he followed the religion of learned or prudent men. 860. a. What he says of an external intelligence with regard to some of the actions of beasts. 913. a. An incident of his dispute with Rivet. I. 235. a. b. 236. a. b. Censured by Rivet, answers nothing to the purpose. II. 173. b. 178. b. 179. a. b.
- Gruterus* treated unkindly by Baudius. III. 254. a. And scandalously by Philip Pareus. ibid. b. How many cruel reproaches he threw out against one of his adversaries. IV. 476. b.
- Guast* (du) an arrant villain. III. 858. b.
- Guasto* (the Marquis del) exhorts Aretin not to spare his faults. I. 436. b.
- Guastala* (the Countess of) founds a fraternity, where a very singular method was taken to overcome the flesh. V. 426. a.
- Guineestre*; his fury and scurrilous invectives against Henry III. III. 294. a.
- Guelderland* (the province of) erects an university at Harderwic. III. 361.
- Guercbe* (Sylvester de la), though not learned himself, had a great affection for learned men. III. 60. a. b.
- Guercbi* (Mademoiselle de), the history of her amours and death. IV. 498. b. 499. a. b.
- Gueret* (John), a Jesuit; the Professor under whom John Chaffel had studied Philosophy. II. 456. a. b. 457. a. Is put to the torture, confesses nothing, and is banished for ever. ibid. b.
- Guevara* (Antony de) imposes upon men of sense by his falacies. III. 705. b. His severe rebuke to the Bishop of Zamora. IV. 456. a. b. He has published an infinite number of falsehoods. 927. a. b. A Spanish impostor. II. 400. a. Fathers upon Dion a falsehood touching Caligula's nurse. ibid. Des Caurres robs him of several things without naming him. ibid. He trumps up an history of Marcus Aurelius. 770. a. III. 270. a. b.
- Guibetel* (Jourdain) confutes Huarte's Trial of Wits. III. 528. b. 529. a. b.
- Guicciardin* (Francis), his History put in the Index, and for what reason. III. 273. a. Was naturally averse to jesting. 274. b. He shews too great an inclination to excuse Savonarola. V. 62. b. 63. a. Amply quoted with respect to that Monk's affair. 58. b. 64. b. Censured on that head. 65. a. b.
- Guicciardin* (Lewis) imprisoned. III. 275. a. b.
- Guichenon* refutes a pious fraud concerning the foundation of a monastery. I. 739. a. b.
- Guienne* (Eleonora, heiress of) is courted in marriage by the King of England, after she had been divorced from the King of France on account of her leudness. III. 794. The sequel of her adventures. ibid. b. 795. a. b. 796. a. b. 797. a. b. Is put in the catalogue of learned women. 797. b.
- Guignard* (John), a Jesuit, is looked upon as a martyr. II. 459. a. n. (31).
- Guilleminot* (John), his vain efforts with regard to substantial forms. III. 362. b. n. (6).
- Guillet* vindicates two great men ill from the reproach of jealousy. II. 299. a. Should not have attempted to apologize for the nakedness of the Lacedæmonian maids. III. 967. b. 968. a.
- Guyon* (Lewis), his rash judgment concerning the description which Niphus gives of Joan of Arragon. I. 399. a. b.
- Guyon* (Madam), an obscene story of that visionary. V. 857. n. (114).
- Guise* (Messieurs de), the title of Prince is refused to them. III. 285. b. Whether they had ever any thoughts of turning Protestants. 286. a. b. 287. a. The hatred which the Protestants had conceived against them. 286. b. 287. a. The persecution which they exercised against the Protestants. V. 478. b.
- Guise* (the Chevalier de) kills the Barons of Lux, father and son. III. 300. a. b.
- Guise* (Francis, Duke of), why his death wrought a great alteration in the Council of Trent. III. 871. a. b.
- Guise* (Henry, Duke of) killed at Blois. III. 408. a. b. 857. a. b.
- Guitaut* arrests the Prince of Condé. I. 184. What he said to Madam de la Trimouille. 264. b.
- Guitmond*, author of three books against Berengarius confounded with Guy Aretin by Vossius. I. 433. a. b.
- Guns*: what great guns are in kingdoms. V. 62. n. (f).
- Guriler* believes that Babylon shall fall in the course of the XVIIIth century. II. 125. b.
- Gustavus* (Adolphus), King of Sweden; a story that is told of him. II. 135. b. Grants a truce of fifteen days to the Princes of the Catholic League. ibid. a. The esteem which he had for a book of Grotius. III. 247. a. He calls an assembly at Leipzig, of Lutherans and Calvinists, in order to endeavour at an accommodation. 476. a. Received some checks in Germany. V. 581. b. His victories give weight to Braunbom's prophecies, which were neglected before. II. 123. b. His death sinks their credit again. ibid. See the Historical Dissertation on his life. V. 651. etc.
- Gustavus* (Charles), King of Sweden, had no design against the Catholic religion, when he entered Poland. II. 539. b.

H.

- Habermorn*, his Anti-Valerian. V. 741. and a. b.
- Habit*, how that of the maids of Lacedæmon was made. III. 968. b. 969. a. b. The fashion of wearing short habits. ibid. b.
- Habit* (of a Monk) does not cure a man of his inclinations. I. 345. b.
- Habsburg* (Rodolphus, Count of) is elected Emperor by a re-union of the suffrages which had been divided betwixt two other Princes. II. 377. And acknowledged by the Pope, who by threatnings obliges Alphonfus, King of Castille, to a renunciation of his rights. ibid. and 378.
- Haddarfeban*; what he relates concerning Abraham. I. 44. b. 45. a.
- Hadrian* (a Roman Emperor), relishes an old piece of flattery. I. 349. a. Roughly spoken to by an Architect in presence of Trajan. 376. Disperes the Jews in a very cruel manner. 648. b. 649. a. Looked upon by that people as one of the greatest destroyers of their nation. 649. a. b. Whether he was personally in the war against them. ibid. b. In what manner he travelled. III. 320. b. His gratitude to his benefactresses. IV. 692. and b. He caused his wife to be poisoned. V. 266. b. 267. a.
- Hadrian VI*, how he was elected Pope. III. 272. b. Was too scrupulous. I. 733. a. III. 326. b. Persists in his first opinion, that a Pope may err even in matters belonging to faith. 328. a. Was so far from running into the luxury of his predecessor, that his charge was not above twelve crowns a-day. 327. a. How he was dissuaded from demolishing the statue of Pasquin. V. 758, 759.
- Haemsted*; from whom that family is descended. III. 542. a. b. 543. a.
- Haerlem* besieged and taken by the Spaniards. III. 622.
- Hagar* is introduced into Abraham's bed by his wife. V. 54. b. 55. a. b.
- Hagenau*: which were the ten towns that made up what they call the Prefecture of Hagenau. III. 717. a. b. Subject to France. ibid. The French made it serve as a rampart in 1675. IV. 211. b.
- Hay* (Alexander), a Jesuit, is banished by an arrêt of the Parliament of Paris, and why. III. 333. a. b.
- Hailbrunnir* pretends to be sick, and for what reason. III. 656. a.

Haillen

- Haillen* (du) the reproaches which Du Pleix casts upon him. III. 338. a.
- Hair* the loss of it prejudicial to beauty. I. 292. a. III. 376. b. A man who had the power of moving his hair without any motion of his hand or head. 429. b. Whether it be lawful for men to wear long hair. IV. 22. b.
- Haicarnassius* (Dionysius) his own mistakes, in censuring those of Fabius Pictor, concerning the Tarquins. V. 290. b. 291. a. b.
- Halicarnassus*, who were the tyrants of that city. IV. 114. b.
- Hall* (Joseph) Quoted. III. 947. b. n. (126). What he wrote against Lipsius concerning his Histories of the miracles of the Holy Virgin. 846. b. 847. a. b.
- Hallier* (du) forced by the Duke of Lorraine to retire from before La Motte. IV. 278. a.
- Hamburg*, it's magistrates are very much troubled, on account of the disputes of their ministers, that divided the people. III. 504. b. 505. a. When that town began to have ordinary Syndics. 686. a.
- Hameston*, the only sanctuary of the faithful, during a certain time. III. 666. a.
- Hamilton*, (Patrick) the elogy of that martyr. I. 221. a.
- Hamilton* (John) an Archbishop, whether it be likely that Cardan foretold him he should be hanged. II. 316. b. 317. a.
- Hammon*, that god advised King Tementhis to beware of cocks. IV. 790. a.
- Hand*: what Anaxagoras said of our hands. I. 301. b. Several people send the picture of their hands in order to get their fortunes told. V. 285. and a.
- Handsome*: it is thought that Agesiulus II, forbid his picture to be drawn, because he was sensible he was not an handsome man. I. 130.
- Hangest* (Claudius) Calvin dedicates his Commentary upon Seneca's treatise de Clementia, to him. II. 260. a. 274. b.
- Hangings*, when, as it is pretended, they begun to be known at Rome. IV. 561. a. b.
- Hanover* (the Dukes of) discovers the impostures of James Aymar. I. 8. b.
- Happiness of man*, what is the formal and efficient cause of it. II. 780. b. Examination of Mr Arnauld's opinion concerning it. 781. a. b. It is one of the most evident Attributes of God. V. 828. Wherein Anaxagoras and Carneades made it to consist. I. 295. II. 332. a. b. Wherein Epicurus placed it. 780. b.
- Haran*, the brother of Abraham, how he died, and for what reason. I. 45. a.
- Harangues* very often displease those whom they praise. III. 823. a.
- Harangue*, who was the first that wrote his Harangues before he recited them. IV. 567. b. An indifferent one recited by an excellent Orator, may charm the hearers. ibid. The effect which one spoken by Callistratus had upon Demosthenes. II. 259.
- Harangues* formerly too much stuffed with Latin and Greek. II. 104. b. 105. a. b. 106. a. b.
- Hardouin* (Father) did very well to correct a passage of Pliny, relating to Lucilius. IV. 593. b. Makes a supposition concerning Pythagoras, that is inconsistent with the account given by Herodotus. 667. a. Prefers Plutarch to Varro and Verrius, with respect to some monuments. V. 288. b. 289. a.
- Harlai* (Achilles de) first President of the parliament of Paris, brutally used. II. 459. a.
- Harlotry of Rome*: the authors of such sort of books, are not original authors. I. 267. a.
- Harma*, what was said of that village in relation to Amphiaras, I. 274. a. b. 275. a.
- Harmony of the Gospel*, which goes under Ammonius's name, different from the Gospel-Canons. I. 269. b. 270. a. Whether Ammonius wrote it. ibid.
- Harpax*, the son of Boreas and Chloris. II. 82. b.
- Harpius* (Henry) his character. IV. 942. b. 943. a. Borrows a great deal from Ruysbroeck. ibid.
- Harperation*, a passage of that author corrected by Mauflac, which Vossius mentions as his own. I. 267. a. b.
- Hart* (Von der) his opinion of Cham's crime. II. 432. b. If believed might do hurt to the narratives of Moses. ibid.
- Hartnaccio* (Daniel) writes the life of Micralius. IV. 210. a. n. (2). Continues his Syntagma Historie Ecclesiasticae, and his Syntagma Historie Politicae. ibid. A criticism upon that continuation. ibid. and b. 211. a. b. Found fault with concerning Radulphus Flaviacensis. 824. b. 825. a. b.
- Hajenmullerus* (Elias) left the order of the Jesuits, to turn Lutheran. III. 555. a. b.
- Hatred*. That of sisters more violent than that of brothers. II. 701. b. A long digression on the accusation of a new Heresy, relating to the hatred of our neighbour. V. 642. a. b. & seq. An abstract of that accusation. ibid.
- Hautefort* (Madam d') Calumniated by a satirical author. V. 83. b. 84. a. But vindicated by the Abbot Faydit. 84. a. The sequel of her History. ibid. b.
- Haxart* (A Jesuit) his interest against the Jansenists. III. 245. b.
- Head*, a palboard head sent every year by the Egyptians to Byblus. I. 116. a.
- Heads brazen*, an account of several that are alleged to have spoken. I. 182. b. 183. a.
- Heads of garlic and poppies* offered in sacrifice instead of the heads of children. II. 163. a. b.
- Health*: better a little learning than no health. III. 342. a. Ought not to be neglected through a mistaken zeal for the service of the public. ibid.
- Hear/say*: ought never to be reported, but in two cases. I. 615. b. We ought to be distrustful of stories which have no other foundation. II. 475. b. What ought to be done with regard to such stories as are only grounded upon Hear/say. IV. 379. a.
- Heart*, the marks of a kind one. I. 464. a. b. It is malicious to search the intention of the heart, in order to judge of an action that is good in itself. IV. 571. a.
- Heaven*, the great men of Rome make a lottery of it. II. 713. b.
- Heavens*, objection against their motion. II. 29. b. Whether they are animated. IV. 872. a. b.
- Hebe*, what employment she had among the gods, and why she lost it. III. 131. a. 637. a.
- Hebraicisms*, according to them all the gods of the Pagans were taken from the Jewish tradition. II. 431. b. The proof which they alledge for it. ibid.
- Hebrew text of the bible*, when and why it was altered by the Jews. I. 173. a. b.
- Hecatombium*, what it is. I. 47.
- Hedge-sparrow*, Juvenal gives that name to a young fellow whose wife was unfaithful to him, and why he does it. III. 631. a. n. †.
- Hegesippus* attempted perhaps to ensnare the oracles. I. 132. b. 133. a.
- Hegira*, what that word signifies. IV. 27. b. 28. a. Is the Æra or Epoch of the Mahometans. V. 780. n. (10).
- Hegius* (Alexander) teaches at Deventer. II. 242. Declines the direction of the school of Munster, and proposes J. Cæsarius. ibid.
- Heidgger* did not well understand the thought of Father Merfenne concerning Hottinger. III. 525. b. Relates a pleasant story concerning St Germain and Loyola. 897. a. b.
- Heidelberg*, disorders committed in that town, when Tilly took it by assault. I. 239. and a. b. Its professors retire to Newstad, and why. III. 173. n. (a). The university there is restored. ibid. n. (b). The plundering of the Electoral library there. 252. The Pope's Commissioner has orders to transport all the manuscripts from thence to Rome. ibid. Ruined for opposing the Emperor, and for being faithful to him. IV. 475. a. Saved by Tilly's troops. 492.
- Heifer*: a brazen heifer which raised lust. V. 769. and a. b. 770. a. b.
- Heke*, a conduct worse than her's. I. 669. a. A thousand people talk of her, who know nothing of her being hanged. III. 367. a. Is guilty of a monstrous incest, which few writers have mentioned. IV. 402. a. b.
- Helensium*. The qualities of that herb. III. 367. a.
- Helinand*, a Monk of Fromond, when he lived. IV. 824. n. (b).
- Helioabalus* gave beautiful youths to his Magicians to be sacrificed. I. 348. a. Often eat peacocks and nightingales tongues. 370. b. 371. a.
- Hell*, the road to it as short from one place as from another. I. 308. b. All that was said concerning the

- the torments of Hell called fables and dreams by Cicero. II. 418. b. III. 743. b. And by Urceus. V. 515. b. Less than its porch. IV. 501. a. b. Prudentius believed that the damned have a day of rest every year, and that it is the day on which Our Saviour came out of Hell. IV. 787. a. If Spinoza had reasoned consequentially, he would not have treated the fear of it as a chimera. V. 216. a. b. Ruybroeck's resignation with regard to its torments. IV. 942, 943. a. b. Whether Trajan's soul was delivered from Hell by the prayers of St Gregory. V. 397. a. b.
- Hellebre* taken to render the conception free and serene. II. 328. a. b. A kind of it called Melampodium. IV. 183. a.
- Helisa*, the greatness of her grief, when she heard of Abelard's loss. III. 75. b. 76. a. What the Nuns of Paraclete do, that it may not be forgot, that she understood Greek. IV. 470.
- Hemithea* pursued by Achilles, and how the designs of the latter were prevented. V. 315. and a.
- Hembach*, on what occasion the Reformation was settled there. IV. 472. a. d.
- Henas* (Gabriel) his conjectures on the happiness of Paradise. III. 895. a.
- Hennius*, an head-dress of a prodigious height, which the women of the Low-Countries wore in former times. II. 544. a. b. What means a preacher made use of to put it out of fashion. ibid. b.
- Henry IV Emperor deprived of the Imperial Dignity by the Pope. III. 229. b. Forced to submit to the most unheard of indignities. 230. b. 231. a. Deposed a new. ibid. a. b. But at last prevails over his enemy. 231. and b. 232. and a. b.
- Henry II, King of France sends his protestations against the Council of Trent. I. 257. a. b. In vain courts the Swiss to renew an alliance. II. 195. Makes himself master of the city of Metz. 445. b. Undergoes interrogatories in favour of the Duke of Estampes. 843. Takes the title of Protector of the German liberty. III. 397. b. 403. b. Burns the fine house of Binche. 530. b. 531. a. And why. ibid. Is willing to give one of his daughters in marriage to John Sigismund. 533. b. Particulars relating to him. IV. 160. a. b. 161. a. His Differences with Pope Paul IV. 632. b. 633. a. b. Makes an edict against clandestine marriages. 636. a. b. To whose counsels the persecution of the Reformed under his reign ought to be attributed. 699. a. Employs against the Pope, a man whom he would have caused to be burnt in France. V. 457. a. According to John Bouchet, and the Baron du Villars, he was not the first who broke the truce of 1556. II. 104. a. b.
- Henry III, King of France, a discourse on the justice of deposing him. II. 100. b. Reprimands the Divines of Paris. 102. b. Provokes the Duchess of Montpensier by his indiscretion. 257. b. Endeavours to discover the author who disguised himself under the name of Stephanus Junius Brutus. III. 201. Some curious pieces relating to the action brought against him. 294. b. 295. a. b. Called nothing but Brother Henry in a certain Conclave. 410. a. Mysteries which were found in the circumstances of his death. 412. a. b. Particulars concerning the house where he was assassinated. 413. a. b. Forty-five gentlemen chosen for the security of his person. 857. a. Knew how to shew resolution and greatness of mind. ibid. b. 858. a. Was obliged to recompense the treasons of his subjects. ibid. b. 859. a. No Prince ever became more unlike himself than he did. IV. 132. b. 133. His inconstancy in point of religion. 333. a. Puts a barbarous affront upon his sister Margaret Queen of Navarre. 337. b. 338. a. A satire on his court, under the fiction of an island of Hermaphrodites newly discovered. V. 33. b. One of the most shameful passages of his reign. 254. a. b. An account of his death. II. 459. a. Acquaints the King of Navarre that his wife's behaviour had given him some uneasiness, and removes from about her the Ladies de Duras and de Bethune. IV. 341. a.
- Henry IV, King of France, the apology that was wrote for him, called a libel by the Leaguers. I. 739. a. b. Perseus's mistake in saying that this Prince entered into Geneva. 793. a. Ceremonies of his absolution. II. 100. a. b. III. 418. a. The Sieur d'Aubigné's raileries upon it. II. V O L. V.
100. b. Seditious sermons made against him. 101. b. 102. a. How he was prevailed upon to follow the advice which had been given him to go speedily to Paris. 553. a. His apology on account of the edict of Nantes. III. 209. b. A witty saying of his upon the Venetian Ambassador's burning some papers before him. 317. b. 318. a. Brings the Duke of Savoy to reason. 406. b. His conversation with Mr de Roui, about the qualities he thought proper in a wife. 417. a. b. What he is made to say concerning his wife. IV. 334. a. 339. b. 340. a. Did not deserve a faithful one. 336. a. Demands satisfaction for the affront given his queen. 338. a. b. And does not obtain it. ibid. 339. a. b. Through what motives he pardoned some of the Leaguers that deserved death. V. 27. b. Could not procure from his subjects the liberty of serving God according to the light of his own conscience. 35. a. A parallel between Cæsar and him. I. 631. Wounded by John Chastel. II. 456. What he said when he heard that that assassin was a disciple of the Jesuits. ibid. Looked upon as an excommunicated and relapsed Prince, a profaner of things sacred, a public enemy, an oppressor of religion, and consequently a tyrant and an usurper. 458. a. The absolution of the Pope not sufficient to re-instate him. ibid. b. How many degrees he was distant from the crown. ibid. John Guignard refuses to acknowledge him for King of France. III. 276. and a. b. Accused of negligence and even of fear with respect to the accusations against Guignard. 278. a.
- Henry II, King of England, in what manner he promised to expiate his share of the crime committed in the murder of Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury. III. 425. b. Breaks his promise, and why. ibid. 426. a.
- Henry VI, King of England, proclaimed King of France. IV. 730. a.
- Henry VII, King of England, a mad freak of his. III. 835. b. Desires Polydore Virgil to write the History of England. V. 496. b. 497. a.
- Henry VIII, King of England, censured in a passage of The vanity of Sciences. I. 150. a. Protestants and Papists ran equal hazard in his reign. 272. b. Opinion of the Divines of Wirtemberg, on his divorce. 657. b. 658. a. The design which Francis I. had to cause the Sorbonne to give a favourable opinion for it. 716. a. b. 717. a. b. Calvin complains of his being called the supreme head of the Church. II. 273. b. 274. a. He and Charles V. divide France between them. 435. a. Francis I. is sensibly affected with his death, which he should have looked upon as very lucky to him. III. 94.
- Henry d'Albert II, King of Navarre, begins to like the Reformation. IV. 318. a. b. 320. a.
- Henricus, a judgment of that work. IV. 808. b.
- Henricus (Lewis) his thoughts on the pleasures which the saints enjoy in Heaven. III. 895. a.
- Hens, what people first introduced the custom of cramming them. III. 6. a.
- Heracides, a passage of his treatise of Republics explained. I. 427. a.
- Heracides were forbidden to have children by a foreign woman. I. 135. a.
- Heracitus said that one and the same thing is and is not. I. 507. a. Conceals his writings in the temple of Diana, and why. II. 865. a. Says that the parts of the world live by the death of each other. IV. 525. a. Admits only fire for the principle of all things. V. 323. b. a. (23).
- Heracitus recovers by a treaty of peace the cross which the Persians had carried off. III. 425. a. What he did to vex Cosroës, King of Persia. IV. 350. a.
- Herbelet (Mr de) Regius Professor of Syriac, who it was that succeeded him. I. 756.
- Herbert (Baron) a great deist. I. 383. a. Scandalous annotations borrowed from a manuscript of his. ibid.
- Hercules, different accounts given by the Antients, of what he did with Diomedes and his mares. I. 17. b. 18. a. His stature judged of by the length of his foot. 104. a. Is called The Lion of three Nigbtis, and why. 206. a. A Greek Poet introduces him decrying virtue. II. 164. a. b. An idol of him put into the fire by an Atheist. 654. a. The zeal which the Agrigentines had for his statue. III. 158.

158. b. The prodigious bigness of his cup. 206.
a. b. There have been six heroes of this name according to Cicero, and forty-four according to Varro. 426. a. b. 427. a. Upbraid the Argonauts with their giving themselves over to their pleasures. 754. a. Whilst he digs the ground, he causes the head of a river to spring out of it. V. 76. b. The places where he was honoured most. 350. b. 351. a. b.
- Heretical Teachers*, whether it ought to be imputed as a crime peculiar to them, that they make use of methods suited to the capacities of the ignorant, in instructing them according to the false lights of their consciences. I. 478. a. b.
- Heresy*, whether obstinacy be its character. I. 477. b. 478. a. A contradiction, into which writers, who undertake to speak of conversions, are apt to fall in this respect. ibid. What Heresies were formerly the most dangerous in the opinion of the court of Rome. II. 545. Faults which are found in the catalogue of those of the XVIth century. V. 231. a. A common-place to assign them as the cause of the heavy strokes of Divine Justice. 473. a.
- Heretics*, all stories reported to their disadvantage are swallowed down, and numberless fables are raised about them among all sects, an hundred pious frauds are practised at their death, and many reflections made thereupon. I. 31. a. b. 198. a. b. 726. b. 727. a. 780. a. 796. b. II. 373. b. 374. a. Heretics who jumbled together the doctrines of the gospel and of the Philosophers. I. 253. Some people are satisfied, provided they can defame them. 290. b. Whether orthodox Princes can make alliances with them for the security of their States. 407. a. b. What methods were used against them by the orthodox Emperors. 476. b. 477. a. The ignorance or contradiction of a Protestant Divine, in relation to this point. ibid. It is dangerous to dispute with Heretics that are subtle and eloquent. 503. b. 504. a. Whether the Magistrates ought to punish them. 789. a. b. The reproaches which the French and Spaniards mutually sling upon each other concerning their alliances with Heretics. II. 338. a. b. Upon several occasions a man appears to be an Heretic only by his manner of expressing himself. 455. a. Reflexion on the punishments which some pretend should be inflicted on them. III. 147. a. b. Whether they ought to be tolerated in the same manner as Infidels are. 220. a. b. Scruples of the Church of Rome about the praises bestowed upon them. 438. b. 439. a. Those who write catalogues of them are commonly guilty of three pieces of injustice. 443. b. 444. a. b. Tolerated by the Emperor Julian. 585. a. b. The use of penal laws against them. IV. 96. a. b. 97. a. A dispute between Mr Jurieu, Mr Maimbourg, and Mr Ferrand, concerning the number of their martyrs. 108. b. as far as 112. a. Examination of all the pieces of this dispute. ibid. The usefulness of such an examination. 112. a. b. An account of the methods put in practice to convert Heretics. 373. b. as far as 376. a. Customary to suppose that they all come to a tragical end. 349. a. Whether they ought to be excused by the comparison taken from Judges and Physicians. 930. a. b. 931. a. b. Whether it be permitted to write against them in a fair, genteel manner, and to acknowledge their good qualities. V. 258. a. Princes do not preserve a consistent conduct with regard to Heretics. 457. a. Hofius would have them extirpated. III. 501. Accused of having corrupted the manuscripts of the Scriptures. 733. Accused of being almost continually guilty of some enormous crime. V. 388. and a.
- Hermadorvilla* (Henry de), chief Physician of Philip the Fair. II. 399.
- Hermaphrodites*; whether Adam was one. I. 102. a. b. Their origin, and the moral reflexions which may be drawn therefrom. V. 31. a. b. 32. a. An Hermaphrodite Monk that was brought-to-bed. 4. b. 5. a.
- Hermaphroditus*, an abominable piece. IV. 468. b. 469. a.
- Hermesianax*, an ancient Poet, writes love-verses. III. 779. a. And a Poem upon the city Colophon. ibid.
- Hermit*, one that let fall his Breviary at the sight of a couple who were diverting themselves at the sport of love. III. 63. b. 80. b.
- Hermogenus* took upon him to explain authors which he did not understand. II. 186. a.
- Heraclitus* never indulges his imagination more than when he makes Artabanus argue. I. 510. a. b. 511. a. Attributes envy and jealousy to the Divine Nature. IV. 574. b. 575. a. b. 576. a. b. 577. a. b. What Cicero says of him. V. 330. a.
- Heraclitus*, those of romance are very often ravished. III. 365. a. b.
- Heraclitus*, Homer had no idea of it. I. 81. b.
- Herald* (John) publishes Marianus Scotus from the original sent him by Latomus. IV. 728. a. b. (28). And Martin Polonus. 709. a. Accused rashly and ignorantly by Florentin de Remond of having thrust the story of the She-Pope into his edition of that author. ibid. and b.
- Hera* of an Epic Poem ought not to be buried in the Poem itself. I. 81. b. Ancient Heroes, dangerous fellow-travellers. V. 305. b.
- Herwart* (John-Henry) encourages Xylander to translate Dion Cassius into Latin. V. 588. b. 589. a.
- Hesiodus*, a man of a turbulent spirit. I. 98. The didich which was handed about against him. ibid.
- Hesychius*, Monks of Mount Athos. I. 89, 90. Are like the Quakers. ibid.
- Hesiod* becomes a Poet whilst he feeds his sheep. IV. 818. a. His genealogy of the gods. III. 649. a. b. 650. a. b.
- Hesse*, Fr. Lambert was one of the principal instruments employed to introduce the reformation there. III. 709. b.
- Hesse* (Philip, Landgrave of) his constitution obliges him to ask permission to have two wives at the same time. III. 942. a. b. The consequences of that affair. ibid. b. 943. a. b.
- Hesse* (Maurice, Landgrave of) rewards the dedication of a book of epigrams with an epigram. III. 880. b. See Maurice.
- Huicourt* (Marquis of) disclaims a letter which was wrote in his name against Mr Arnaud. I. 485. a.
- Hyccara* (a town of Sicily) taken, and its inhabitants sold. III. 699. a.
- Hilde* (Professor at Oxford) has wrote upon the religion of the ancient Persians. V. 635. a.
- Hierarchy*, Bucer did not condemn that in England. II. 171. a. b. 172. a.
- Hieres*, isles, called the golden isles. I. 407. Erected into a marquise by Henry II, for Gabriel d'Armont. ibid.
- Hierocles*, why he gives Ammonius the name of Theodidactus. I. 269. a. Draws a parallel between Jesus Christ and Apollonius. 380. b.
- Hiere*, King of Syracuse, founder of the city of Enna. II. 823. a. 825. b.
- Higinus*, a passage of that author proposed to the readers, in order to find out the meaning of it. III. 633. a. What advices he would have if Minerva gave to Penelope. IV. 543. b.
- Hilarion de Coste*, his omissions in relation to Queen Margaret. V. 532. b. 533. a. b. Quoted. III. 185. b. 186. a. (2). and a. n. (2). b. n. (6). 187. a. n. (1). 188. a. n. (4). and a. n. (7). b. n. (13). 189. a. n. (6). (4). and a. n. (1). ibid. n. (5). 530. a. n. (5). b. n. (13). 531. b. n. (26). (27). (28). (30). 532. b. n. (4). (6). (7). (8). 533. a. n. (10). (13). b. n. (15). (17). (18). et passim alibi.
- Hylobians*. A sort of Indian Philosophers. II. 117. a. Why so called. ibid.
- Hyperius*; John Pincier was his brother-in-law. IV. 647.
- Hypocrites*. Nothing is to be got by drawing their pictures and making them known. III. 204. b. 205. a. The most impious find Apologists. V. 58.
- Hypocritas*, the modern Apothecaries have profaned that word by applying it to the urine of their patients. III. 136. b.
- Hippias*, all he had about him was his own handy-work. II. 779. a.
- Hippocrates*, whether the letters that concern Democritus, which are among his, be genuine or not. II. 638. a. A paraphrase upon one of his letters by Alardus. V. 583. a. n. (105). Owes that he was mistaken. 791. a. (aa).
- Hippodamia*, the wife of Perithous. I. 538. a. b.

Hippomani.

- Hippiasus*. A dissertation on that subject. V. 766. Éc.
- Hippodam*. A Poet of a contemptible figure. II. 202. Represented in a ridiculous form. ibid.
- Hippus*, its inhabitants oblige Pinianus to promise them that he would embrace the priesthood in their city. I. 229.
- Hired mourners* who cried more than the relations of the dead. III. 842. a.
- Hirpi*, a people that walked upon fire. III. 466. and a. b.
- Hissers*, regulations to restrain their fury. IV. 646. b.
- Hyaspes*, father of Darius, applied himself to Magic. V. 631. b.
- History*, its privileges. I. 103. b. III. 460. a. V. 747, 748. Éc. Qualifications requisite for writing a good one. IV. 861. b. 862. a. b. 863. a. Writers of History are dispensed from taking an oath, their word being sufficient. I. 343. a. V. 748. Might clear up a great variety of particulars, without consisting of many pages. I. 422. b. 423. a. The undertaking of a general History a very difficult matter. 594. b. A proof of this. ibid. 595. a. b. The common fault of those who write one. V. 1. a. b. Whether it be permitted to relate infamous and abominable actions in a History. II. 31. a. b. A small matter suffices to metamorphose it into satire. 160. b. 161. a. The knowledge which is acquired by travelling, is very useful to those that compose a History. 168. a. b. In many cases Historical truths are not less impetrate than Physical ones. 543. b. We ought not to trust one written by a Domestic that has received great favours. III. 148. b. What rules should be followed in order to distinguish true and false facts in a History. 269. a. The inconveniencies of writing that of monarchs lately dead. 334. b. 335. a. In what cases it is lawful to write a History already handled by others. ibid. Reflexions on some facts that render it uncertain in a thousand things of importance. 856. b. Wherein the art of writing it well consists. IV. 126. a. b. Whether flatterers corrupt the truth of it more than satirical writers. 142. b. 143. a. Is nothing else but a representation of the misery of mankind. 424. and b. Whether the art of Oratory be of use in its composition. V. 328. a. b. There are authors who never would have draped of writing one, if they had not been prompted to it by personal discontent and modish passions. 362. b. By whom it ought to be written: great abuses in this respect. 747. 748. Éc. The respect which the ancient Romans had for it. 752. The difficulty of writing it. II. 310. a. b. A passage of Sallust on this subject. 311. a. b. More particularly that of our own country, and of our own times. 310. b. 311. a. If he who composes one ought to be void of all passion, he who judges of the work ought to be so too. 311. a. b. Books of History above all others verify that observation, pro capto lectoris habent sua fata Libelli. ibid. b. Cannot give pleasure in describing those things which gave pain when they happened. ibid. Is quite otherwise true than the reports of the people. 770. b. Writers of romances are obliged to follow it when they tell in a preface the foundation of their fictions. III. 166. b. Ought not to be handled, but by clean hands. 345. b. Its perfection consists in being unacceptable to all sects and nations. V. 846.
- History Ecclesiastical*. There is little order and exactness in it. I. 476. a.
- History fabulous*, full of contradictions. I. 78. a. b. 79. a. b.
- History of France*, who was the first that composed a body of it in French. III. 334. a. b.
- History* (Genealogical) commonly preceded by fabulous times, is often interrupted by some periods of obscure times. I. 750. a.
- History* (Roman) Paternus's abridgment of it is very curious. IV. 495. a.
- Historian Commentator*, we ought never to censure one, till after being instructed in the laws of History, and the privileges of a Commentary. V. 799.
- Historians*. Those who suppress certain facts, ought to be treated like those sellers who conceal what they ought to acquaint the buyers with. I. 13. Do not always stick close enough to the truth. 16. II. 763. b. 764. a. The ancient Historians took too great a liberty in altering and embellishing their memoirs. I. 39. b. III. 19. b. And accustomed themselves too much to relate things only in the gross. I. 422. b. An Historian ought to distrust pious frauds. 780. a. Historians deny all the facts by which they find themselves incommoded. II. 55. b. The laws which are prescribed to them are impracticable. 65. b. It is dangerous for them to speak truth. 284. b. There is little Chronology in most of the Greek and Latin Historians. 309. b. Are found to have contradictory opinions sometimes. 351. a. b. Which the Commentators have neglected to clear up. 352. a. Fall often into the sophism à non causa pro causa, than the Peripatetics. 403. b. 550. a. b. Particular Historians of a province are more to be credited than others, except in what is Apologetic. 463. a. Historians by their neglecting to circumstantiate things aright, throw us into inextricable uncertainties. 615. a. b. III. 485. a. b. The ancient Historians do not equal some of our Moderns. II. 550. a. Historians sometimes contradict one another so much, that it is difficult to chuse the best account. 635. b. Ought never to suppress any thing that may serve to discover their Authors characters, and mark the extent of their virtues and vices. 685. a. It is good to accustom young readers to seek among their variations for the ground of the greatest probabilities. 727. a. Are guilty of an unpardonable crime by suppressing some facts. 759. b. Deserve but little credit when they relate prodiges. 771. b. There are people among them as well as among the populace. 850. b. It fares with them as with travellers. III. 121. a. Their duty in relation to facts which they do not believe to be true. 226. b. 227. a. Have been very bold as to the speeches mentioned by them. 274. a. One of the causes of the variations which creep into their accounts. 314. a. b. The true character of an Historian. 336. a. b. IV. 861. b. 862. a. b. 863. a. Most of them are credulous and liars. III. 416. a. b. Very often vent the fancies of their own brain, in order to make use of their collections. 418. a. b. 419. a. Love to describe great events. 433. b. People seldom dispute about what religion they were of. IV. 104. a. b. 105. a. Ought to be disinterested. 258. a. b. Their variations about the most memorable adventures. 746. a. Ought not to disguise things through an affected modesty. V. 420. a. b. 421. a. b. That which charms most in an Historian. 263. a. b. And what is the most difficult part of his task. 264. b. Whether he ought to suppress the obscenities of those whose History he writes. 265. a. b. 266. a. b. When their mistakes ought to be excused, and when not. 359. b. 360. a. b. A satirical genius is incapable of discharging the duties of an Historian well. 362. a. b. Sometimes misrepresents the most essential qualities of an action. ibid. b. The modern ones are too prolix, and the ancient ones too concise. 744. Many of them perpetuate falsities. 748. and a. b. One of the causes of their illusions. ibid. Whether they ought to have gratitude. 531. a. b. Are often accused of being partial for no other reason, but because those who accuse them are remarkably so themselves. II. 310. a. b. It is more difficult to appear a faithful Historian, than to be such in reality. ibid. b. The imprudence of an Historian, who should dedicate his book to a monarch, whose misconduct he had taken the liberty to censure. 311. b. 312. a. b. Ought not to follow popular opinions, when they agree not with authors. 770. b. Ought to be perfectly disinterested. III. 345. a. b. Whoever conceives a resentment against a nation, ought to abstain from writing its History. ibid. b. An exact Historian always chuses his words with so much care that he does not leave his readers to guess. IV. 211. a. Morally and even naturally impossible, that they should all be silent upon some remarkable adventures. 734. b. Ought to relate not only the actions of Heretics, but likewise the strong and the weak side of their opinions. V. 810. Ought to describe people as they really were, and to suppress nothing. 812. Their highest glory is to do justice to their greatest enemies. 801. A great many people know no difference betwixt them and Encomiasts. 804.
- Histories general*, it is the custom of those who reprint them, to add such things as have happened between

- between the former editions. IV. 210. b. And when they find a continuation ready done, they chuse rather to copy it, than be at the trouble to compose a new one. ibid.
- Histories Sacred*, at the same time that the people were forbidden to see them in the book which contains them in purity, they were allowed to see them upon the stage, sullied with a thousand gross inventions. II. 477. b. 478. a.
- Historiographer*, is not to be trusted to. II. 131. b. A famous one who confessed ingenuously, that he did not know in what age Philip the Fair lived. 374. b.
- Hobbes*, his principles of Philosophy were not proper to rid him from the fear of the apparitions of spirits. III. 471. a. b. What he did to put the English out of conceit with the republican spirit. 467. and a. b. 468. a. IV. 581. b.
- Hofman* (Caspar) censured with respect to du Laurens. III. 746. b. n. (12).
- Hofman* (Melchior) Prateolus and Gualtier pretend that he was the founder of an imaginary sect, called Melchiorites. IV. 193.
- Hog* (Trojan) what the ancient Romans understood by that. V. 387. b.
- Holland* (Philemon) translates Bauderon's Pharmacopœia into Latin. I. 677. b. 678. a.
- Holland*, if Horace had seen the excessive care that is taken by the people of that country, in keeping their houses clean, he would have called it a false neatness. I. 187. b. Its states order a thesis concerning the sovereignty to be condemned. II. 688. a. Holland and Zeland offer to acknowledge Queen Elizabeth for their sovereign. 753. The Roman Catholics are promised a free exercise of their religion there. III. 675. a. It is the great ark of the Fugitives. 688. What a Turkish Emperor said of it. 806. a. It is difficult to find Printers there, except in two cases. IV. 476. b. 477. a. b. n. (7).
- Hollanders*, how vindicated from the accusation of having ruined the French army. III. 822. a. b. Had rather have the Spaniards for their neighbours than the French. 829. b.
- Homœomeritis*. The true idea that should be formed of them. I. 296. b. 297. a. b. Have consequences full of difficulties. 297. a. b. The very foundation of this hypothesis may be destroyed. 297. b. It implies many contradictions. ibid. Whether their formation requires an intelligence. 304. b. 305. a.
- Homer* censured for the speech of Phoenix. I. 79. b. One of his episodes has served Virgil as a model for one of the best passages of the Æneid. 80. b. Had no manner of idea of Heroism. 81. b. Obtains by his offerings a sight of Achilles, but cannot bear the splendor of the glory which surrounds him. 85. b. There are three verses in the Iliad which it is pretended are not his. 157. Anaxagoras was the first, who supposed that his poems were moral works. 306. He was too talkative and too downright. 333. b. Mysteries which are said to be contained in the two first letters of his Iliad. 374. a. Recourse is had to Magic, in order to discover his country. ibid. Arcefilaus called him his mistress. 408. a. His poems revised by Aristarchus the Grammarian. 450. and b. 451. a. And his two great works divided by the same author. 451. b. 452. a. The tradition concerning his death. 473. b. The Poets that have come after him, have made use of his inventions. II. 58. a. b. The ideas of reason were very much confused in his time. 139. b. Introduces a thousand mischiefs by his poetical impieties. III. 134. b. Describes no body by names borrowed from the mothers. IV. 232. a. His simplicity. 344. b. Does not make Telemachus speak with respect enough to his mother. 540. b. Two great provinces strive which shall have him. 594. a. Compares men to the leaves of trees, to birds and to flies. 657. a. b. Whence it happens that there has been so much difficulty in fixing upon the place of his birth. 924. a. b. Whether he has mentioned the Jews. V. 309. a. b. Was very ignorant of the globe. III. 787. J. Spondanus is the first that writes notes upon him in Latin. V. 224. a.
- Homonymy*, the meaning of that word. I. 232. a. Antient authors have wrote de Homonymis as well as Allatius. ibid.
- Honey*, who invented the secret of extracting it. I. 455. a. Its virtue for preserving health. II. 638. b.
- Honorius*, Alypius presents to him the request of the Clergy of Africa. I. 229. a. b. 230. a.
- Honour*, its laws looked upon as mere chimeras by a lady. I. 496. a. Some people want to enjoy it, and to have the glory of despising it at the same time. 680. b. What power the point of honour has over women. IV. 502. a. b. &c.
- Honfsdorf*, or Hondorf, compiler of examples of the Divine Justice. III. 573. b. 574. a. Cited. 165. n. (a), (d), (1).
- Hoornbeek*, that Divine's just complaint against the Antitrinitarians. II. 19. b.
- Horace* gives elegies to Homer which he does not deserve. I. 79. b. Cited with regard to Poets, that write in their old-age. 120. a. n. (2). Justified in his censuring Agamemnon for having left Ajax unburied. 161. a. b. Whence it is that he was so ingenious as to confess that he fled from battle, and threw down his arms. 189. a. b. Ridicules a Poet that made two hundred verses in an hour. 665. a. Makes use of a pitiful argument. II. 139. b. 140. a. 342. a. Is misunderstood concerning the laws against satires. 355. a. b. Whether, being himself an Epicurean, he could laugh at his brethren. 388. b. 389. a. Falls upon the admirers of the Antients with a Sorites. 494. a. Why he insults the Jewish nation, where he speaks of the miraculous stone at Egnatia. 745. a. b. A passage of this Poet concerning Fannius very difficult to be understood. III. 8. a. b. 9. a. b. A thought of his applied to the Guises. 292. b. n. (3). What he would have preferred to the reputation of being a fine writer. IV. 743. a. n. (16). What he says of those who affected to make use of old words. 830. b. n. (49).
- Horantius* writes a piece against Baius. I. 609. a.
- Horne* (John van), his notes upon Botal's works. II. 99.
- Hornius*, a mistake of that author's. II. 16. b. 17. a.
- Horns* (metaphorical), the Antients prayed that they might light upon evil-doers. II. 247. b. A very curious dispute about them. III. 631. a. b. 632. a.
- Horoscopes*, Astrologers who made that of Jesus Christ. I. 164. b. II. 319. b. 320. a. Their uncertainty. III. 401. a. b.
- Horse* which Pliny spoke of. I. 120. b. Mares which neighed at the sight of a painted horse. 369. a. b. A fatality which was said to attend the horse of Sejanus. II. 348. b. 349. a. Horses that grew better as they grew older. 309. b. A brazen horse that stirred up lustful desires. V. 767. A horse thirty-eight years old, whose master leaves him a pension, with a meadow, and his liberty. IV. 917. 918. Other examples of gratitude to horses. 918. a. b. Others. ibid. A contrary example. ibid.
- Hofmannus*, a chimerical Herefiarch which Moreti has given us, having been deceived by an error of the press. IV. 193.
- Hopinian* (Rodolphus) gives a very large detail of the variations of the Confession of Augsberg. II. 122. b.
- Hospital* (Michael de l'), his malis becomes a proverb. III. 506. b. Called an Atheist by some men. 510. a. Approved the doctrine of the Protestants in his heart. ibid. b. Discharged the duty of a Chancellor well. 513. b. 514. a. Supported the French monarchy by his extraordinary qualities. 865. Resembled Aristotle. IV. 504. b.
- Hoft*, a miracle which is said to have been manifested upon a host. III. 840. a. b.
- Hofstiensis*, the advice which he gives to midwives, touching the women they inspect. IV. 800. b.
- Hôtel de Flandres*, the place where they exhibited dramatical representations of the stories of sacred Scripture. II. 477. b.
- Hot-headed* men, how apt they are to judge rashly. III. 42. a. b.
- Hotman* (Antony) affirms, that the method of washing women who are to be inspected at a congress is deceitful. IV. 800. b.
- Hotman* (Francis) ill-defended by Beza. III. 523. b. 524. a. Turns into ridicule a question which Calderini asked his wife, and the answer that he gave him. I. 325. b. Criticized concerning an epigram upon

- upon Julius II. III. 610. b. 611. a. His complaints against Stouppa for want of religion. V. 247. a. b. Those that answered his Franco-Gallia. 417. a. b.
- Houliere* (Madam. des) cited. III. 393. a. What she says of Reason. IV. 440. a. n. (69). A ballad of her's. 503. b. 504. a. n. (64). The elevation and depth of her morality. 687. a. b. Gives way her self to the vanity which she blames in others. ibid. a.
- Houffes* (Noble), a book of John le Feron upon that subject. III. 27. and a.
- Houffais* (Amelot de la) refuses to reform Oflat's language. IV. 427. a. b.
- Howard*, Admiral of England, is the cause of the Earl of Essex's death, and why. II. 759. a. b.
- Huber*, his apology for the Hollanders in answer to the accusations of Cavalier Nani. III. 822. a.
- Huberus* (Samuel), Minister of a village near Bearn, gets himself expelled by his boldness in contradicting some of the doctrines of Beza. III. 535. a. b. Retires to Wirtemberg, and is expelled from thence for teaching that God has elected all men to eternal life. ibid. b. Retires to Ratibon, where, continuing obstinate in his errors, he is deprived of his place. ibid. Had the two chief qualifications of a good Disputant. V. 102. a.
- Huet*, Bishop of Avranches, why he did not finish his Latin translation of a Greek romance. III. 866. a. What he thinks of the character of these kind of writings. ibid. and b.
- Huguenots*, what sort of sermons they like best. II. 520. b. Party-Huguenots, and State-Huguenots. III. 39. a. n. (7). What opinions they were of each of them in the assembly of Saumur, and who the heads of those opinions were. ibid. a. An Abbot of the monastery of the order of Citeaux, who was a Huguenot. I. 737. b. 738. a. b.
- Humility* is not always found with the staff and the wallet. II. 665, 666. and b.
- Humorists*, how much their academy is esteemed at Rome. IV. 531. a.
- Hunaud* submits to Charles Martel, and has the Duchy of Aquitain granted him. II. 851.
- Hungary* (Lewis, King of), loses a battle against the Turks, and is smothered in a bog. III. 871. a.
- Hungary* (Andrew, son of Charles, King of), strangled, how, and for what reason. IV. 300, 301. a. How used after his death. 305. a. b.
- Hunting*, the Bishops of the XVIth century gave themselves to it very much. IV. 819. b. It was forbid them by the canons. ibid.
- Hurtado*, his writings are full of solecisms. IV. 829. a.
- Hus* (John), the advice that was given him before his condemnation. I. 165. a. b. By whom he was condemned to death. ibid. An account of his punishment given by Poggius. II. 277. a. b. Alledges the adventure of the She-Pope before the Council of Constance, and is not censured for it. IV. 710. b.
- Husband*, in what case it is a piece of leudness in him to come near his wife. IV. 761. a. A husband that is an author, may be either an easy husband, or a troublesome one. V. 380. b. 381. a.
- Husbands*: our laws do not suffer them to revenge the unfaithfulness of their wives, by putting them and their galants to death. II. 133. b. Should not be too long absent from their wives. 743. b. Antiquity represents those who were dishonoured by their wives as extremely good-natured. III. 306. a. Are very often unacquainted with the galantries of their wives when they are the town-talk. 381. b. 382. a. Are no longer affected with their wives beauty at a certain period of time. 646. a. b. Love their wives best when they do not approach them but by stealth. 964. a. b. Are kind to their spouses. IV. 220. b. Those who are impotent should, at least, be civil and complaisant to them. 760. b. The right which they had over their wives in ancient times. V. 427. a. b.
- Hussites* reproach the Roman Catholics with the story of the She-Pope. IV. 710. b.
- Hutten* (John) killed by Duke Ulric of Wirtemberg. III. 539. Is digged up four years after his murder, and bleeds when they touch him. ibid. a. b.
- Hutten* (Ulric) published an invective against Alcander. I. 215. b.
- Hutterus* loads Bucer with reproaches for his sentiments concerning Justification. II. 178. a. b.
- J.
- Jachens*, a subtle Peripatetic, brings the question concerning substantial forms into great repute in the university at Leyden. III. 361, 362. and a.
- Jacobins* of Cologne, how they were forced to give satisfaction to the Count of Nevenar. III. 473. a. b. Launoi said that he feared the Jacobins penknife more than their pen. 742. b. Those of Florence make a stout resistance when their convent is attacked in order to take Savonarola from thence. V. 66. a. b. The Council of Pisa promised them the canonization of this Monk, provided that they would declare themselves against Pope Julius II. 69, 70, 71. Their behaviour in the affair of Savonarola, when challenged to the trial of fire. 62. a. b. &c.
- Jaldabaoth*, what that is, according to some antient Heretics. II. 851. b. 852. a.
- Jambics*, a sort of verse, by whom invented. III. 464. a.
- James* (Epistle of St), what Luther called it. III. 939. b. Was suspected by a great many in the antient Church. 941. b. Althamerus attacks it with the utmost brutality. I. 235. and a. b. 236. a. b.
- James I*, King of England, is extremely angry with Thuanus for his History. II. 281. b. Commands Camden to send him a catalogue of errors concerning the troubles of Scotland. ibid. Whether Camden's Annals were patched and curtailed by his order. 280. b. 281. a. Causes Pareus's Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans to be burnt by the hands of the hangman. IV. 473. a. b. Is cruelly treated in a satire. 795. a. b. His zeal against the Heretics. V. 509. a. b. How he used Lipsius's book concerning N. D. of Hall. III. 847. b.
- Jane* of France, prodigies which Father de Bony says were observed upon the dissolution of her marriage. III. 810. b.
- Jansenism*, what place it proceeded from in Holland, and who was its apostle. I. 499. b. What is its weak side according to the Molinists. IV. 846. b. n. (6).
- Jansenists*, the complaint that one of them makes against the Archbishop of Aix. I. 35. b. The reason of this complaint. ibid. and 36. a. b. Publish a pamphlet against Father Adam. 106. a. Those who censured Odoricus Raynaldus are themselves liable to censure. 179. b. 180. a. b. War raised betwixt them and the Jesuits. 498. a. b. 499. a. Some of them are drawn into Noordstrandt, which is attended with great law-suits. II. 111. a. The origin of their war with the Jesuits. III. 133. a. b. The bulls of the Popes do not hinder them from proceeding in their disputes. 390. b. Their Deputies, in their return from Rome to Paris, pass by Zurich, where they visit Hottinger. 526. a. Are very zealous in causing two decrees of the court of Rome to be printed. 567. a. b. Father le Tellier's Reflexions thereupon. ibid. The Jansenists compared in a sermon to bull-dogs. IV. 64. a. b. De Marca opposed them greatly. 101. a. b. 102. a. Are accused of Calvinism, for what reason. 123. b. Denote themselves commonly in French by on, and why. 492. a. b. Are looked upon as the best Moralists. V. 847.
- Janua* (Joannes de), whether he and Jacobus de Voragine are one and the same author. I. 614. a. Mistakes about this. ibid. and b.
- Janua Caelorum refrata*, what is made to appear in that book concerning Arianism. I. 476. b. Its author attacks The System of the Church in the title of a Peripatetic Philosopher, and quite overturns it. II. 540. b. What pretence was made use of for leaving it unanswered. ibid.
- Janna Linguarum refrata*, how many times printed, and in how many languages. II. 536. a. b.
- Japone*, whether there is any thing surprising in their having persecuted the Christians. III. 551. a.

- Jaqueline of Bavaria*. Her History. II. 211. b. 212. a. Marries Francis de Boifel. 90. a. b. Gives all her dominions to the Duke of Burgundy to save her husband's life. ibid. Died in 1436. ibid. b.
- Jaquinet* (Theodore) translates several of Joseph Hall's books into French. III. 342.
- Jardins* (La Demoiselle de) cited. I. 460. b.
- Jarrige* cited. I. 108. b. 109. a.
- Jason* chief of the Argonauts. III. 465. a. b. The conquest of the Golden Fleece is proposed to him. IV. 532. b. 533. a.
- Jason*, a Civilian, has given the Doctors of Law a very bad example. I. 196. a.
- Jaurisac*, raileries on him. IV. 284. b.
- Jaurisac* (John) assassinates the Prince of Orange. II. 459. a. n. (27). A Jacobin chuses rather to be strangled than reveal his confession. 460. b.
- Jhecu*, why he called the Lacedæmonian maids Phænomerides. III. 968. b.
- Ibis*: no piece ever discovered more gall than Ovid's poem against Ibis. IV. 451. b. 452. a. b. The best commentary extant upon that satire is Mr Boileau's. 452. a. The Abbé de Marolles dedicates his translation of that Poem to James Pinou. ibid. b. 651.
- Jarius* erects a statue of modesty. IV. 538. a. b.
- Jebe* (d') Governor of la Motte is taken off by a cannon-ball, whilst he defends it. IV. 278. a.
- Jem Baglike*, the author of that book. IV. 221. a. b.
- Iconoclasts*. Their proceedings against images, lessen the cruelty of the revenge which their enemies took. II. 512. a. b. Those that have wrote against them, have made the truth of their Histories suspected by their idle stories. 587. a. b.
- Ideas*: Malebranche's doctrine, that our ideas are distinct from our understanding, is an old one. I. 255. 555. a. b. II. 642. b. What difference there is between our sensations and our ideas. 781. a. b. Nothing is more difficult for a Prince than to answer the high ideas which a whole people have preconceived of him, and nothing more blasting to his reputation, than not to answer them. V. 654.
- Idem*: that word is sometimes used for famile. V. 214. a. b.
- Idolaters*, it is more surprizing that they have done good actions, than that Atheists have lived like honest men. V. 811.
- Idols*, who was the first that made them of clay. I. 44. b. What Democritus and Epicurus understood by that word. II. 388. a.
- Jealous*, those that are most so, trust their wives to the care of eunuchs. I. 31. b.
- Jealousy*, a singular example of its force. II. 277. a. The jealousy of men is not so copious in inventions as the love of women. 533. a. Disposes men so ill against the fair sex in general. 857. a. b. The rock which those who are possessed with it suffer. III. 643. b. Whether it be necessary in society. 965. a. Is not always uniform, in its causes and effects. IV. 48. a. Some considerations on this passion. V. 110. a. b.
- Jemison* (Robert) a Jesuit, challenges Sir Humphry Lynde, and answers his Safe Way. III. 971. a. b.
- Jeremiah*, a passage of his letter, as it is inserted in the book of Baruch. I. 597. a. n. (14).
- Jerem*, his friendship for Paula, makes ill-natured people slander him. I. 31. b. Said that the saures of beautiful women ought to be avoided by flight. III. 65. a. b. His maxims concerning marriage in general, and second marriages in particular. 192. a. How he explains what is said of David's taking the Shunamite to bed with him. 281. a. b. What he affirms concerning the shame that people ought to have of their own nakedness. V. 130. b. Was against young girls being ever absent from their mothers, in devotional watchings. 337. a. His invectives against Vigilantius. 471. a. b. Whether we ought to trust the representation which he gives us of that man's opinions. ibid. b.
- Jerusalem*, its destruction is a powerful argument against the Jews. I. 173. b. Its temple is tried to be re-built in vain. 228. The description of its temple is a very difficult thing. 618. a.
- Jesse*, the story which the Rabbins tell of him. II. 605. a. b.
- Jesters*, what those who have wit do. I. 128. b. 701. b. Prefer their jests to their frauds. 187. a. Never ought to rally upon a false fact. II. 527. a. Those who set up for jesters, find themselves obliged to divert people at their own cost. 599. a. Sacrifice every thing to their passion for putting off a jest. III. 137. a. b.
- Jesting*: the power of the habit of jesting. I. 751. a.
- Jests*: a jest saves a soldier's life. I. 709. a. Some jests examined. II. 527. a. b. See Raileries.
- Jesuits*, why they are more disagreeable to the Senate of Venice, than the other Monks are. I. 30. b. Some of them speak disrespectfully of St Austin. 106. a. 109. a. b. Entice away young men, whose education is committed to them. 169. 642. The answer made by their Provincial. 169. a. b. Their society has been hitherto the most learned of all regular societies. 220. a. Authors of a great many libels. ibid. b. Whether they are as learned now as formerly. ibid. 221. a. b. Very severe speeches made against them. 251. From whose pen their Catechism came. 484. b. Were formidable, notwithstanding the decree of their banishment. ibid. The war betwixt them and the Janseists breaks out again. 498. a. Whether they acted imprudently in causing the eulogies of Mr Arnauld and Mr Pascal to be suppressed. ibid. and b. 499. a. It is doing them service to publish calumnies against them, which may easily be confuted. 726. b. 727. a. The small number of Anti-Molinists which they suffer in their great body is of some use. 728. a. b. Who was the first of their order that taught Philosophy at Paris. II. 590. A certain Jesuit does a kind thing to a Protestant. 663. a. There are very few universities with which the Jesuits have not had some dispute. 700. b. n. (2). Their cabals to hinder the examination of their books. III. 133. a. b. A satire against them. 563. b. 564. a. b. Dispute with the other Catholics concerning Episcopal jurisdiction. 665. a. b. Whether their institution, as well as that of other Monks, be founded on Fanaticism. 885. b. Were called Theatines, and why. 887. a. b. Have been calumniated from their first establishment. 888. b. The most horrible things that can be said against them become probable without any proof. 891. a. b. 892. a. b. They turn the hatred of the world against them to their advantage. ibid. b. 893. a. b. The doctrines which have rendered them odious, were hashed before their time: they have only raised consequence upon consequence. ibid. b. 894. a. Why they have been formally and expressly charged with these doctrines. ibid. b. Whether there be two sorts of them, the one married and the other unmarried. 897. b. 898. a. b. And whether they have great credit with the Imperial Court. 898. a. b. What their motive is for teaching the immaculate conception of the Holy Virgin. 932. a. How they attacked Stephen Piquier, concerning his plea against them. IV. 80. a. b. How far some of them have carried the love of chastity. 125. a. b. 126. a. And by what means they said in Spain, that they kept themselves always chaste, though conversing familiarly with fine women. 125. b. 126. a. How the faults in the government of their society were published. 131. b. They decry the fathers of the Oratory in Mons and Liege, as Nestorians. 350. a. b. How they vindicate themselves from the accusation of corrupting Christian Morality. 475. a. b. Very few of them turn Protestants. 855. b. 856. a. Their plea, that the knowledge of the true God has lasted among the Chinese, for a great many ages, and that the Divine honours paid to Confucius, were purely civil, may be supported by what Mr Hyde affirms concerning the Persians. V. 637. b. 638. a. Their Chamber of Meditations, what it is. II. 457. a. Say that it is lawful to kill the King, as being out of the Church, and not approved of by the Pope. ibid. Suspected of having had a hand in the assassination committed by Châtel. 456. a. b. 457. a. 459. b. The difference there is in the accounts of this assassination. 460. b. 461. a. b. Banished from France by an arrêt of the Parliament of Paris. 457. Spread about an advertisement in Latin and French against that arrêt. ibid. b. It is from their school that Assassins proceed. 459. b. The

- The hardships to which they reduce their Father William Criton. 577. a. b. Articles proposed to Lewis XIII, for their reformation. ibid. a. Joseph Hall bore a great hatred to them. III. 342. a. b. Their colleges rise every where. ibid. b. Fare best when they are most curled. ibid. b. A prophecy concerning them. ibid. An examination of what Salmasius said touching the edition of Anastasius, published by the Jesuits of Mayence. IV. 726. b. 727. a. b. Their disputes with the Protestants were never so violent, as during the first thirty years of the XVIIth century. 727. a. A conjecture upon one of the reasons which obliged the Parliament of Paris to involve them in the cause of Chastel and Guignard. III. 279. and b. 280. and a. b. What they answered when they were reproached with giving J. Guignard a place in their Martyrology. 277. a. b. Extenuate the outrageousness of his tenets. ibid. b. 278. a. b. Do not pretend to vindicate him as to his proposition about killing the King. ibid. Antimonarchical maxims are attributed especially to them. 279. b. 280. a. Four brothers who were Jesuits. I. 747.
- Jesuitess*, a society of certain women and maids who took that name. IV. 26. a. b. Abolished by the bull of Urban VIII. ibid. b.
- Jesus Christ*, according to Antoinette Bourignon, his human nature was produced by Adam. I. 102. b. 103. a. Whether his birth and his miracles could have been foretold by Astrology. 164. b. 165. a. II. 319. b. 320. a. b. Explication of his remaining three days and three nights in the bowels of the earth. I. 174. a. b. The Pagans drew a parallel between him and Apollonius Tyanæus. 380. b. They compared his miracles likewise with those of Apuleius. 392. a. b. The Carpocratians had his image, which they said was procured by Pilate. 472. a. Whether his birth imposed silence on the oracles of Paganism. 592. a. What authors have prophesied attempted to calculate his nativity. II. 319. b. 320. a. In what sense he is called the Word and the Image. 434. b. Arnobius says that he spoke but one language, which every one of his auditors took to be his own natural tongue. 517. a. b. The history of his life written in the Persian language, by the Jesuit Jerome Xavier. 663. b. Some have taught that he died both as to his human and divine nature. IV. 288. b. Whether he be our Mediator only as he is man. V. 228. b. 229. a. b. 230. b. His soul did not understand the numbers of Daniel. II. 122. a. b. A pretended letter of Lentulus, containing a portrait of Jesus Christ, is given as an authentic piece by J. Huarte. III. 528. Rufinus says that he was subject to the influences of the stars. IV. 940. a. b.
- Jews*. The Apoplexy of which the Emperor Leo IV, and Pope Paul II, died, was occasioned by their weight or coldness. IV. 512. a. b.
- Jews*, the fabulous accounts which they have published upon the story of Abimelech's distemper. I. 38. b. 39. a. Are obliged to the number of three hundred thousand, to depart out of the dominions of the Catholic King in one day. 41. b. Believe that Adam, Abraham, and David, have had the same soul, which will likewise be that of the Messiah. 46. Their fantastical opinion about Adam's creation. 102. a. b. Plutarch pretends that their religion, their feasts, their ceremonies were much the same with those practised in Greece to Bacchus. 115. a. Think that an husband ought not to cohabit with a woman after he has found her barren, for the space of ten years. 122. b. The people of Alexandria complain against them to Caligula. 374. and b. Are the only subjects who refuse to honour that Emperor as a God. ibid. There were some who gave them the same original as the Gymnosophists. 466. a. What proof of their courage those that followed Barcochebas were obliged to give. 648. a. Are disturbed on account of circumcising their children. 647. a. Their custom at the birth of a son or daughter. ibid. and b. The great slaughter of this people. 649. a. b. Their abhorrence for the fair of the turpentine-tree. 648. b. Are prohibited from returning to Jerusalem. ibid. And even from coming near it. ibid. And which is still more from entering into the country of Judea. ibid. Have their ears cut off, and are transported into Spain. ibid. What they say of Aristotle. II. 644. a. Their absurd whims concerning
- Elijah and Elifiah. 752, 753. and b. And concerning Ezekiel and his tomb. 879. and a. b. 880. and a. V. 544. b. 545. a. The invocation of the saints has been long since practised by them. II. 879. b. The Jews of the VIth Century who only quote traditions handed down by word of mouth, are no more to be believed, than the Jews of the XVIIth, in things which concern the Patriarchs and Prophets. 829. b. Are all ordered by Tiberius to depart from Rome, and why. III. 119. b. Forced to be baptized. 220. a. What synagogues the laws permit them to possess. ibid. Driven from Francfort by popular commotions. 387. Are falsely accused of having pricked an host with needles, in order to draw blood from it. 840. a. b. The disputes which they pretend Alexander determined in their favour, are chimeras. IV. 8. b. Why the Turks detest them above all other people in the world. 50. b. 51. a. Are made to wear the letter Thau. 309. b. Whether they believed the doctrine of a future state as an article of faith. V. 8. a. b. Had a Sadducee sometimes for their high-priest. 12. b. What a Rabbin has related concerning their ancient library. 544. b. 545. a. The History of the Jewish religion by J. Balmage. I. 672. a.
- Ignatius (St), Vedelius's notes upon his letters, what character they bear. V. 445. b.
- Ignatius (de Loyola) his conformity with St Augustin. IV. 1. a. b.
- Ignorance. What Hesiod says of it. I. 411. a. Is one of the impenetrable shields against the darts of the Pyrrhonists. IV. 654. a. Whether that which they call invincible will excuse. 874. a. b. 875. a. b. 829. a. b. 930. a. May do a great deal of mischief. V. 229. b. 230. a. Distinguished from error. 372. b. 373. c. Is the cause that Ruybroeck is looked upon as inspired. IV. 942. a. b.
- Ignorance (invincible) a Monk who excuses it. V. 25.
- Islands Cyclades*, Dicæarchus attacks them against all right and justice. II. 662.
- Iliad*, Andromache's dialogue with Hector, is one of the best passages in it. I. 333. b. Which however has too much simplicity. ibid. Myrieties contained in the two first letters of this Poem. 374. a. Observation upon the two Poems of the Iliad and the Odyssey. ibid. and b.
- Iliad* (Jesler) Pindarus Thebanus is the author of it. I. 81. b.
- Illyricus*, his omission in his Catalogus Testium Veritatis, made amends for by other compilers. III. 687. a. Would not have sacrificed a surplice for the sake of peace. IV. 185. b.
- Images*, the objects of devotion are represented by these in the air and shape which workmen please to give them. II. 729. a. b. III. 57. a. b. John du Tillot, Bishop of Meaux, inveighs with great force against the abuse of them. V. 356. a.
- Images of wax*, made use of to cause love or sickness. IV. 936. a. b. 937. a. b. 939. b. 940. a. b.
- Imma*, daughter to Charlemagne, her amours with the Secretary of the Emperor her father. II. 744. a. b. 745. a. b.
- Immensify*. The received opinion of the Immensity of God, productive of many empty and conceited notions. III. 100. a. b. 101. a. b.
- Immortality*, it is not the quantity of a man's works, that procures it. IV. 598. a. Increases misery. III. 643. b. Whether the Immortality of the soul can be proved by Aristotle's principles. V. 593. a. See Soul.
- Immutability*, the idea we should form of it. V. 219. a. b. 373.
- Impiety*; acts of impiety. I. 160. b. 161. a. 701. a. b. Impieties touching the miracles of Moses, and generally touching the whole Scripture. II. 156. a. Great piety and great impiety are equally uncommon. 451. b. Dicæarchus erects an altar to it, upon which he celebrates the Divine service. 662. The Fathers of the Church relate the impieties of Heretics. III. 135. b.
- Impious men* bely their courage, when they lie on their death-bed. II. 12. b. 13. a. 647. and b. 648. a. b.
- Imposition of hands*, burlesqued in the Acts of the Apostles in verse. II. 479. a. b.

Impossible :

- Impossible* whether all that is not, all that never was, and all that never shall be, is impossible. II. 495. b.
496. a. b.
- Impostors* (public) the punishing them severely would have a good effect. I. 790. a. b. The advantages which factious people make of Impostors. II. 721. a. b.
- Impotency* reckoned a very great misfortune. II. 315. a. b. A wife who concealed this infirmity in her husband, and comforted him under it. III. 187. a. b. How dishonourable it is for women to enter processes of impotency. IV. 799. a. b. &c.
- Impotent*, whether the devil can make people impotent, by doing what in French is vulgarly called nouer l'aiguillette. I. 38. b. 39. a. A French Physician pretends that there is daily experience of this, and injudiciously quotes Tacitus thereupon. IV. 385. a. b.
- Imprecation*: a singular effect of an imprecation. I. 560. a. b.
- Imprudence*: ill success should not be always attributed to imprudence. I. 365. b.
- Impunity* makes some people more fierce and insolent. II. 195. a. b.
- Impurity*, Diogenes the Cynic endeavoured to justify this vice. II. 669. b. 670. a. Its connexion with good cheer. 822. a. b. A method made use of at Rome to hinder its excess. V. 268. a. See Leudesi.
- Impurities*: there are some that ought never to be described under any pretence. V. 39. a. b. 40. a. b. 41. a. b.
- Impute*: a rule which those ought to follow who impute certain things to an author. I. 652. a.
- Inattention*: remark upon the effects of inattention to which even the greatest men are liable. II. 388. b. 389. a. b. 390. a. b. &c.
- Incarnation*, the first prelude to it. I. 102. a. Whether Aristotle had glimpses of it. 471. a. b. An argument ad hominem in favour of the incarnation against the Rabbins. IV. 94. a. b.
- Incantations* are more rare than forcerers. II. 243. b.
- Incivility*, whether the inserting of obscene things in a book deserves that name. V. 848, 849.
- Incomprehensibility* of things taught by Arcefilas more expressly than was ever done before. I. 410. b. How far pushed by the Academics. II. 325. a. b. 326. a. b. 327. a. A story which is told in opposition to this doctrine. III. 697. b. 698. a. It is not men of a mean capacity who give into this opinion. V. 587. b. A remark which may strengthen this opinion. 610. b. & seq. It is not a sufficient reason for rejecting a doctrine. 820, 821. See Pyrrhonists, Pyrrhonism.
- Incontinency* is the strongest pillar of the empire of gallantry. II. 602. a. Is a quality of constitution. IV. 332. a. See Chastity.
- Incontinent*: an example which is proposed to all incontinent persons. I. 686. b.
- Incredulous*: there are two sorts of incredulous people, with respect to the existence or the non-existence of a Deity. II. 648. a. b. The mysteries of the gospel being above reason, the objections which they make thereto cannot be answered. V. 815. Our confessing this gives them no manner of advantage. 818, 819, 820.
- Incubus's*, hypotheses concerning those spirits. II. 113. b. 114. a.
- Independants* are against the Church's having the power of Excommunication. I. 96. a.
- Index of the Inquisition of Rome*: the wrong judgment of its censors. IV. 719. b. Ordereth to expunge all praises given to Heretics. III. 438. b. 439. a. See Inquisition.
- Indexes* have been called the soul of books. I. 319. b. A thought on Indexes. 362. a. Should be composed by the authors themselves. ibid.
- Indians*, their inclination for wine. IV. 7. a. The Indian Hermits drive away all impure thoughts, by a cane which they hold in their hands. 126. a.
- Indies*, how far known before Ptolomy's time. IV. 808. a. b. 809. a.
- Indifference* in point of religion shocks more than a false worship, and why. I. 97. b.
- Indiscretion* of boasting to have received favours is never forgiven. I. 315. a.
- Indolence*: what Crantor said against the indolence which was a doctrine of the Stoics. II. 561. b. 562. a.
- Indulgences*, a stanza on that subject. I. 139. a. Their credit is very little lessened in the Romish Church. III. 87. a. How far the abuse of them was carried in the court of Rome. 766. b. Were the first thing which Luther attacked. IV. 772. a.
- Infallibility of the Church* cannot be maintained as to facts. I. 494. a.
- Infamy*: Magistrates ought to be extremely cautious in inflicting a note of infamy. IV. 500. b.
- Infant Baptism*: in what manner Casander proves the doctrine of Infant Baptism to be apostolical. I. 288. a.
- Infatuated Agents* are a necessary evil to a party. II. 708. a.
- Inferni* (gli), a book of Doni with this title, where the different conditions of life are represented. II. 688. b. 689. a.
- Infidels* less dreaded than the promoters of Orthodoxy. I. 199. a. b. Whether Christian Princes ought to make alliances with them for the good of their States. 407. a. b. Whether they ought to be converted by force as the Heretics are. III. 220. b. 221. a.
- Informers*, the only victory that an innocent and wise man should desire over them, is to escape whole and safe out of their hands. I. 777. a. Their character. ibid. Some of them will neither retract nor make good their accusation. II. 253. a. Compared to dogs, who for the sake of the public good are left to bark against every body. 372. a. b. Which makes the fate of mankind to be lamented. ibid. b. Take notice of the manner how people talk of news. II. 627. a. See Accusers.
- Ingratitude* chiefly appears in the behaviour of children towards their fathers. II. 439. b. Produced by services which cannot be acknowledged. 737. a. b.
- Injuries*: a treatise about the bearing of injuries, wrote by Donzellinus. II. 690. a. b. It was a rule of Bion's, that we should bear injuries and civilities with the same tranquillity. 15. a. Princes are extremely nice and punctilious on this head. 445. b. An injury that is despised, falls of itself. V. 746.
- Injurious* reflexions which occasioned the destruction of a town. IV. 278. a. b.
- Injustice*: it is usual for those who commit one to justify it by another. I. 718. a. Whether it be a means of prosperity. II. 165. a. b. Argued for by Carneades. 330. a. b. Dicaearchus erects an altar to it upon which he celebrates the Divine service. 662.
- Inlaudatus*, Grammatical remarks on that word. II. 234. a. b.
- Innocence* proved by the fiery trial. I. 405. Oppressed innocence sooner or later finds defenders. II. 783. No innocence can be proof against the choice of judges. III. 212. b. Is the most necessary qualification of an accuser. IV. 781. a.
- Innocent X*, the Duke of Guise said that he was a very great dissembler. II. 472. b.
- Innocent XI*, his ill humour against the court of France was sufficient to make him say that he did not appear sufficient to make him say that he did not appear prove of dragooning. II. 475. b. Feared the increase of the power of France more than he desired the progress of the Catholic religion. 758. b. His partiality against France has done infinite service to the Protestants. IV. 430.
- Innovations* are prejudicial to the public and academical tranquillity. I. 242. b. 243. a. People should be contented to oppose fundamental innovations. 243. a. There are some which last long, and some which do not. IV. 353. b. 354. a.
- Innovators* boast of doing nothing but in imitation of the Antients. III. 230. b. A terrible maxim against them. V. 315. b. They are sometimes necessary. I. 577. a. They affect to have devotees, and to make use of their intrigues. IV. 27. b.
- Inquisition* has been silent with respect to a book full of absurdities. I. 138. b. How people ought to behave towards this tribunal, whenever they pass a sentence like that which was passed by it upon Carranza. II. 337. a. b. Is a real abomination introduced into the holy places. ibid. b. Its unjust proceedings are sometimes condemned. 656. a. b. Hindered from being introduced into France. III. 506. b. 507. a. A certain author proves

I N D E X.

71

- proves the justice of this tribunal by scripture, and places the first institution of it in the terrestrial paradise. IV. 3. b. On what account chiefly it may be always turned into ridicule. 782. a. Its conduct is by no means uniform. V. 551. b. Condemns the book of the Taxo de la Chancellerie Romaine only as it is corrupted by the Heretics. I. 628. b. Brochant says that it is the abomination of desolation foretold by Daniel and St Paul. II. 145. a. b. See Index.
- Inquisitors*, of whatsoever religion they are, make all the cities where they grow powerful, enemies to learning. I. 147. The people will not suffer any recrimination to be used against them. 154. b. Their partial indulgence. ibid. It is a great triumph to escape out of their hands. 777. a. A reflexion of Mr Arnauld's on their behaviour with respect to certain books. II. 37. a. b. Whether indulgence should be used towards them for the sake of the public good. 372. a. b. Their immense power. III. 473. b. 474. a. Are often imposed upon with respect to such books as people have a mind to put out. V. 293. a. b. The quarrels which Valla had with them. 435. a. b. 436. a. b. Their villany and injustice 453. b. 454. a. b. Their Director by Nicolas Emeric, of which Francis Pegma published two editions. II. 749.
- Inscription*, a proud one. III. 237. b.
- Inscriptions*, the jealousy which they have occasioned sometimes. V. 552. b. 553. a. b.
- Insects*, their organs are infinitely more nice than those of men. II. 636. a.
- Inspiration*, whether it must be allowed with regard to the expressions in Scripture as well as the doctrines. I. 106. a. b. 107. a. b. Those persons who pretend to it are dangerous to a state. 647. b. 648. a. No coherency must be expected from one that ascribes every thing to inspiration. II. 112. Excessive pride is the general fault of those who pretend to it. 538. a. b. There is no great glory acquired by confuting them. III. 388. a. b. Ruysbroeck, by reason of his ignorance, was looked upon as one who wrote by inspiration. IV. 942.
- Instability*, an example of the instability of human things. I. 566. b.
- Institution* (Calvin's), the Epistle Dedicatory of that book is one of the three or four prefatory discourses that are admired the most. II. 261. b. An account of its different editions and corrections. 262. a. b. 263. a. b. For which Bolsec insults Calvin. 262. b. Compared with Martyr's Common-Places. V. 86. b. The extraordinary esteem which people have for it. ibid. 87. a. Abridged. ibid. A supplement to what has been said of its different editions. ibid. b. & seq. Variations that are found between them. 87. a. b. Marlorat makes Indexes of them. 88. a. It has been printed an infinite number of times. ibid. a. b. Faults of the author of the Essay on Learning, touching this Institution. ibid.
- Institutes of Justinian*, the beautiful order, and the symmetry of that work are deservedly admired. V. 87. b.
- Intellect*, its unity in all men taught by some Philosophers. I. 553. b. 554. a. b. 555. a. b. II. 411. a. b. 412. a. b. 565. b. 566. a. b. The absurdity of that doctrine. I. 554. b. 555. a. b. Which nevertheless could only be invented by great genius. ibid. a. Averrhoë's opinion on its unity maintained by Vernias and Augustin Niphus. IV. 377. and b. See Spirit.
- Intelligence*: Anaxagoras supposes an intelligence to be the first mover of all things. I. 299. a. b. 300. a. b.
- Intelligences* charged with different employs throughout the universe. II. 251. a.
- Interest of party*, is generally predominant over the love of truth. II. 24. a. b. The public interest is the law of Policy, and the law of State. 755. b.
- Interim*, by whom drawn up. I. 141. and b. It was neither satisfactory to the Protestants nor the Catholics. ibid. Courageously rejected by the Ministers bordering upon the Earldom of Hanaw. III. 875. A new interim. 672. and a. b. 673. a.
- Interpreters*, the Merchants of Rome kept a hundred and thirty of them in one of the towns of Colchis. II. 678.
- Interpreters of the Canon-law*, Ginius was no friend to them. II. 507.
- Intrigues*, an instance of some of the best contrived ones. II. 417. a.
- Inventives*, authors who have made them. V. 438. a. b.
- Invention*: two persons may pretend to the invention of the same thing, though the one is not assisted by the other. III. 62. b.
- Inventions*, it is agreeable to know their original and progress. IV. 879. a. b.
- Invocation of the dead* very much used among the Pagans. II. 716. b.
- Joan II*, Queen of Naples, the manner in which she discovers her love. II. 312. a. The fable of the mare may be applied to her. IV. 309. b.
- Joannes Januensis*, see Janua.
- Joconde*, the judgment of a good Critic upon two pieces which bear that name. I. 752. a. n. (31).
- John* (St) would not enter into the bath where an Arch-heretic was. II. 405. b. The beginning of his gospel cited by Amelius. I. 252.
- John the Faster*, Patriarch of Constantinople, his ambition gives rise to a very great quarrel betwixt the Bishop of Rome and him. III. 223. a.
- John XXII*, Pope; the taxes of the Romish Chancery began under his Pontificate. I. 629. b. Excommunicates Marilius of Padua. IV. 198.
- John XXIII*, Pope; his deposition proposed in a Council. V. 590.
- John without Land* succours his mother, who was besieged in Mirebeau, takes Prince Arthur prisoner, and murders him some time after. III. 797. a.
- John Casimir*, Duke of Saxony, erects a famous school at Coburg. III. 660.
- Joy*, a singular effect of that passion. II. 676. a. They who die of it, die suddenly. III. 766. a. Joys of this world, a pleasant thought of a Princess thereupon. V. 383. b. 384. a.
- Joyeuse* (Admiral de) gave an Abbey for a song. I. 428. n. (c).
- Jouville*, they have done us an injury in changing many of the old words in his book. IV. 428. a.
- Joke*: an observation on a Latin joke. II. 702. a.
- Joly* (Claudius), his reflexions on the life of Lewis XI are very judicious. III. 809. and b. 810. a. Seems to think that the Rexier des Guerres was composed by Lewis XI. ibid. and b.
- Jon* (William du) ennobled for his good services. III. 623. a.
- Jon* (Denys du) performs a bold action, for which he incurs the hatred of the Franciscans, and is, at last, massacred. III. 623. a. b.
- Jonas*, in what manner he remained three days and three nights in the whale's belly. I. 174. a.
- Jopoli*, a city in Calabria; Augustin Niphus was a native of that place, and not of Sessa. IV. 377. a.
- Jordan* (William) translates some of Ruysbroeck's books. IV. 942.
- Jornandes*, his history of the Goths translated into French. III. 581.
- Joseph* (the Patriarch), the place where it is said he was buried. I. 37. b.
- Joseph* (St) had the gift which they call in frigidation. II. 108. b. Has been made a martyr of a new kind. 338. b. 339. a. Refutation of some impious opinions vented thereupon. 339. a. b.
- Josephus*, a Jewish Historian, contradicts Moses. I. 39. a. b. Several Critics rise up against his Jewish Antiquities. 374. b. 375. a. Ascribes an answer to Samuel's mother quite different from what the Scripture ascribes to her. 342. b. Mr d'Andilli's translation of him. 487. b. Has suppressed a miracle in the book of Numbers. 2. b. Reasons like a Jew that seems to have forgot the elements of his religion. II. 248. Thinks that a story of Moses is not sufficiently circumstantiated. IV. 133. a. Censured for having compared the passage of Alexander with that of Moses. 608. b. 609. a. Says that God commanded Sarah to put Hagar in Abraham's bed. V. 51. a. What he relates concerning a quarrel between the Jews and Samaritans. 344. b. n. (10).
- Joram* (King), whether Elijah wrote a letter to him from heaven. II. 752. and b.
- Joubert* (Claudius) forgets himself when he fancies that he knew Camden at Padua. II. 284. b.

Joubertus

- Jaubertus* (Laurence) what he said concerning his learning. III. 582. b. Restores Canliac's Surgery. II. 399. b.
- Jovian* (Emperor) whether before him neither Emperor nor Consul gave up an inch of ground to the enemy. III. 317. b. The Christians endeavour to clear him, and the Heathens to condemn him with respect to the scandalous peace which he made. 585. b. 586. a.
- Jovius*, refuted in relation to the Magic of Agrippa. I. 150. b. 151. a. Condemns Savonarola with moderation enough. V. 62. a. See Paul Jovius.
- Journal*, it is necessary to consult a good one, in order to rank things according to their dates. IV. 211. b.
- Journal des Savans*, censured. I. 48. a. b. Has spoken of the treatise de Equales too hastily. III. 620. a. b. Who its authors are. IV. 505. b.
- Journal de Trevoux*, the remarks which is made in it concerning the analysis of quantities infinitely small. V. 620. b. 621. a. Cited. 596. a. n. (37). Et passim alibi.
- Journalists* cited in relation to a book of the life of the Holy Virgin. I. 136. a. b. 137. a.
- Journey*: a journey remarkable both for speed and slowness. II. 716. a. b.
- Iphigenia*, was not a virgin when offered in sacrifice to Diana. I. 84. a. Two cities of Cappadocia boasted to have her true knife. II. 530. b.
- Ireland*, what a certain person said after it's reduction. I. 366. a. b.
- Iron* (hot) in what manner it was made use of to find out the truth of an accusation. II. 767. a. Reflexion upon that custom. ibid. b.
- Irrregularity*, is sometimes a happy fault in an ingenious work. IV. 619. b. 620. a.
- Irrreligion*, its source. I. 639. a. Robs us of a thousand comforts. II. 786. a. b.
- Isaac* makes his wife pass for his sister, and why. I. 40. His trick found out. ibid. and a. St Austin justifies his behaviour. ibid. b.
- Isabel* of Bavaria, Queen of France, her ill reputation. II. 209. a. b.
- Isabella Villamarini*, Princess of Salerno, the love she bore her husband. II. 297. b.
- Isidore*, King of Persia, favourable to the Christians. I. 13. Persecutes them at last, and why. ibid. and a. Reflexion thereupon by the author of this Dictionary. ibid. b. 14. a. b.
- Islanders* calumniated by Blokenius. III. 580. a. b.
- Ishmael*, of what kind of people he was an emblem. I. 123. a. Conjectures upon the mocking, by which he offended Sarah. ibid. b. How old he was when banished by Abraham. ibid. 124. a. There is a difficulty attending what the Scripture says of him. ibid. There is a stone at Mecca which passes for his sepulchre. 125. b. It is said that a spring of water was produced under his feet, when he was dying with thirst. IV. 179. a.
- Ishmaelites*: what deity the antient Ishmaelites worshipped. I. 124. a.
- Isocrates* the reason he gave for not saying something when he was desired. I. 453. a. Never had a design of making a Panegyric on Buhris. II. 235. a. b. Servius's want of Exactness with respect to this. ibid. b.
- Israhelites*, stories which some Egyptian writers tell of them. IV. 679. and a. b.
- Issel*. Who it was that joined that river to the Rhine. II. 717. a.
- Issodon*, the superior of the Franciscans of that town, preaches impudently against the Queen of Navarre. III. 622. a. In what manner he was punished. ibid. The Catholics there commit a thousand violences against the Reformed. ibid. b. Its walls are ordered to be demolished, but Cipierre by his interest gets the decree changed. ibid.
- Italy*, was the Land of Promise, which the Destinies commanded Aeneas to go in search of. I. 316. Who was the first who restored the purity of the Greek tongue there. 434. a. The greatest part of the Monks in Italy think of nothing less than of God. II. 649. b. 650. a. When Leandro Alberti's description of it was published. IV. 165. b.
- Italians* sent into France by the Pope, their leudness. I. 675. a. b. Some of them have made themselves ridiculous by an affected way of making use only of such terms as are to be found in the best Latin authors. 741. a. b. 742. a. II. 68. b. Do not in the least degrade themselves by being merchants. IV. 791. b.
- Libanius*, his character. IV. 780. b. 781. a. b. Declared innocent in a conventicle. ibid. b.
- Jubilate*, what a Jubilate religious among the Monks is. I. 753. b. A Jubilate author. ibid. and 754. a.
- Jubilee*. It was Paul II, who reduced it to twenty-five years. IV. 511. Guy Patin-ridicules Jubilees. V. 751. b. 752. a. b.
- Judicium*, the letters of that word, which are all numeral, and make 1613, induced several Divines to think, that the last judgment would be in the year 1613. II. 124. a.
- Judith*, a woman who took it into her head to imitate her, is punished with death. IV. 723. a. b.
- Judge*: there is a vast number of people, who judge of their neighbour by themselves. I. 744. b. 745. a. b.
- Judge*: a Judge who fell asleep sometimes on the bench. I. 757. a.
- Judgment* (last) a great many make their wills, tho' they firmly believed that this was to happen in the same year. III. 780. b. Several Divines thought it would be in 1613, because they found that number in the word Judicium, all the letters of which are numeral. II. 124. a.
- Judgments* (rash) the two sources from whence they proceed. I. 550. b.
- Judges* are not all of the same humour. I. 61. b. Whatever pains a man takes in studying the Civil-Law, it will avail nothing against the rashness of a corrupt Judge. 224. Men of honour always decline the office, when they are excepted against by the parties accused. 489. b. How rigid judges were called. II. 347. a. b. Ought to be ministers of the law. III. 802. b. People have no great opinion of the integrity of such as are created by commissions. 212. b. IV. 142. a. b. Et. 241. a. b. Whether those whose sentences are unjust contrary to their intention, deserve excuse. 929, 930. and a. b. 931. a. Judges in point of wit, disagreed formerly as well as now. V. 360. a. b. 361. a. b. Learning displayed profusely in a plea, serves but to withdraw their attention, and hide the true state of the cause. II. 105. b. 106. a. b. Judges who are men of honour, exclude themselves when they are interested in a cause. III. 345. b. A Judge, that meeting with a sharp contest between Barolus and Baldus put in the margin of his book, a question for a friend. IV. 733. b.
- Julius* II. Pope, compared to Julius Cæsar. III. 615. a. b. An enemy of France. 814. By what artifices he saved himself after the French had won the victory at Ravenna. 812. a. b.
- Julius* III. Pope, summons Henry II, King of France to appear before God, who answers that he would appear there, but that the Pope would not appear. III. 405.
- Julia*, the origin of that family. II. 424. a. b.
- Julia*, wife of one Marc Antony, unhappy in husbands. I. 354. b. What she did to save her brother. ibid.
- Julia*, daughter of Augustus, her answer to those who were surprized, that her children should be like her husband. V. 78. b. Had like to have been drowned in a river. ibid. Was several years gone from Rome, and become the object of her father's indignation, before he banished Ovid. IV. 443. a. b. 444. a. b. 445. a. b.
- Julia*. Grand-daughter of Augustus, her exile, and that of Ovid happened much about the same time. IV. 444. a.
- Julian* the Apostate, endeavours to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, but is obliged to desist from the undertaking. I. 228.
- Julis*, a town of the isle of Cea, has been the native-country of many great men. III. 608.
- Julius* (Canus) what Seneca relates of him. II. 66. a.
- Junia*, Cicero's raillery in relation to her. II. 347. a. b. 348. a.
- Junianus Majus*, was the Artemidorus of his age. I. 47.
- Junius*, the praise which Joseph Hall bestows on him. III. 343. a. n. (20).

Juno,

- Juno*, her temple at Argos, wholly burnt. II. 498.
 What she did out of affection for Combabus. 535.
b. Juno Lacinia, the wonders of her temple. III. 640. a.
- Ivory*, whether it can be made of any thing besides Elephants teeth. V. 350. a.
- Jupiter*, which was the first, and which the last mortal whom he lay with. I. 206. b. What was his employment according to Æsop. II. 832. a. Stole away Ganymede to gratify his pederasty. III. 130. a. The Celtic Jupiter is the most antient of the Jupiters. 433. a. Where and how Jupiter calmed the transport of his passion. 630. a. b. Jupiter Hammon, why he had horns upon his head. ibid. b. 631. a. What Stratagem Jupiter used to make Juno return to him. 632. b. That which made his adulteries more inexcusable. 646. a. Whether he turned the whole rabble of the gods out of heaven. 739. b. How he acted in the case of benefits and rewards. IV. 355. a. b. 572. a. Most people than by the distribution of benefits. III. 651. a. b. IV. 572. a. Throws Saturn from Mount Niphates into Tartarus, orders that mountain to be called Caucasus, and fastens Prometheus to it. II. 82. b.
- Juret*, criticised by Father Sirmond, and defended in relation to Hildebert. III. 454. a. b.
- Jarvis*, his sentiments concerning the inspiration of the Prophets, criticised. I. 107. a. b. Difficulties to which he has reduced himself in his True System of the Church. 476. a. b. In his Preservative against a Change of Religion. ibid. b. 477. a. And in his Pastoral Letters. 477. a. b. Has very well refuted the Calumniators of Theodorus Beza. 546. n. (c). Changed his opinion concerning Penal Laws against Heretics. 566. b. 567. a. Why he changed it. ibid. Declamation of Father Tellier against him. 784. a. b. Supplies the Infidels with weapons by his manner of rejecting a certain miracle. II. 587. a. b. What he thinks of the sentiments of the Remonstrants, and of their condemnation by the Synod of Dort. III. 174. a. His Paralogism touching the authority of Councils, for the decision of controversies. IV. 65. a. Dispute between him and Mr Maimbourg, concerning the pretended martyrdom of Heretics. 108. b. 109. a. b. 110. a. b. What he thinks of those who give the title of Mother of God to the Holy Virgin. 351. a. Is involved in a thousand difficulties, relating to sin and the Precidence of God. 518. a. b. Ridicules in a very smart manner, those who write chimerical things concerning relics. V. 252. b. Ascribes to the Fathers a sentiment as impious as that of Spinoza. 588. b. n. (165). His prophetic calculations refuted. II. 124. b. Finds miracles every where. 552. a. May cry out as long as he will, Princes will not stir an inch in the matter. ibid. b. Criticised touching the time when persecution was hottest. IV. 158. a. b. &c. Touching the manuscripts, and the editions of Martinus Polonus. 709. a. b. His doctrine concerning the love of our neighbour, (V. 642. a. b. & seq.) is one of the loosest maxims of the Jesuits. 645. a. n. (51). His answer to the accusation that was brought against it. ibid. b. 646. a. b. Commends his own great feats. 643. a. Favoured by the Walloon Synods. ibid. b. The Walloon Consistory grants him every thing. 644. a. His letters to the Duke of Montausier, and how they became public. 645. b. 646. a. A choleric, passionate, and dangerous enemy. ibid. His policy. 648. a. Chimerical conspiracies of which he accuses his adversaries, and which he does not fail to make his advantage of. ibid. a. b. The hypothesis of Augustin and Calvin concerning Predestination, is to him an insupportable burden, and yet he sticks to it. 822. A libel of his under this title, The Judgment of the Public, &c. concerning the Dictionary of Mr Bayle. 797. to 809. Part of his character. 800. to 804. Character of his books. 802, 803. He passed his judgment on the Critical Dictionary, without having read it. 805. His malice to the Bookellers. 808.
- Justice*. Whether in war it gives reason to hope for success. I. 280. a. The severity of the laws sometimes transgresses the bounds of justice. 313. a. b. IV. 502. a. Enjoins all things which become proper to the times. I. 616. b. 617. a. b. Whether it is a real being, and not a fantom. II. 164. b.
165. a. How Carneades argued against it. 330. a. b. IV. 752. a.
- Justified*: Bucer's judgment of this thesis, that we are justified by faith alone. II. 172. a. b. 173. a.
- Justin Martyr*, an apology for him, with relation to Aristotle's death. I. 473. a. b. 474. a. b.
- Justin* is an Historian of little judgment. I. 510. a. Vindicated from the accusations of Freinshemius. 763. a. b. Is guilty of an Anachronism, with regard to the famous battle of Cnidus, and the time when the Athenians began to recover their liberty. II. 547. b. 548. a. b. &c.
- Justinian* compared to an ass, and why. III. 429. b. 430. a.
- Juvenal* a passage of his satires explained. I. 191. a. Another. 768. a. b. His satires more apt to put one out of conceit with leudness, than the most chaste discourses against it. V. 487.
- Juvenal quarks*, observations concerning them. V. 340. a. b.
- Ixion*, for what reason and in what manner punished by Jupiter. III. 636. b. 637. a.

K.

- Kalendar. In what it has most need to be reformed. III. 739. b. 740. a. Reformed. V. 247. a. b.
- Kamea*, what the Jews mean by that word. III. 126. a.
- Karmatians*, a sect which having risen in Arabia, laid waste Mecca, and profaned its temple. I. 48, 49. Intend to raise scruples in mens minds. 49. and b.
- Kabavus*, the signification of that word. IV. 182. b. 183. a.
- Kata-py-wor*, ought not to be preferred before Ka-ra-py-wor, in a passage of Nicander. I. 116. a. b.
- Key*, the power of them never falls to the petticoat in the Church. I. 442. b. Those of St Peter thrown into the Tyber. III. 610. a. b.
- Kempis* (Thomas à) his imitation of JESUS CHRIST translated into Arabic, and by whom. III. 171. a.
- Kill*: whether it be lawful for a man to let himself to hire, to kill those who have done him no wrong. II. 196. a. In how many cases a celebrated author pretends that people may kill themselves innocently. V. 14. a.
- Kingdom divided against itself, &c.* How far that maxim of JESUS CHRIST is true. IV. 271. a.
- Kingdoms*, those which fall to the distaff are subject to several inconveniences. IV. 309. a. V. 519. b. It generally happens that a kingdom which acquires great glory abroad, is exhausted and miserable at home. 656.
- Kings*, a great many have assumed the title of the great King. I. 513. a. b. 514. a. b. The pride of eastern monarchs was not so well flattered with the title of King of Kings, as with that of the great King. 514. b. Their very enemies have had a veneration for them. 273. a. Their authority very little regarded sometimes in France. 720. a. b. A people that could not be without them. II. 303. b. 304. a. The reason we do not see them oftener dethroned, is, because the people have not been solicited to revolt by intrigues well enough managed. 608. a. The services which they cannot acknowledge commonly make them ungrateful. 736. b. The facility and goodness of Kings is more prejudicial to their kingdoms than rigour and austerity. III. 403. b. 404. a. 409. a. b. A King whose condition was very miserable. IV. 276, 277. a. b. It is hard to judge of their conduct. 328. b. See Sovereigns. It is more difficult for a King who has brothers and children to govern his family, than to govern his kingdom. 558. a. b. People change their principles concerning the right of Kings. V. 740. A practice which has been observed for a long time towards those who assist at a siege. III. 718. a.
- Kircher*. A contest between him, and Father Maignan. IV. 61. b. 62. a. b.
- Kiss*: in some countries it was supposed that the first kiss a maid received from her galant, was that of her betrothing. IV. 87. b. The Romans had a custom of kissing their kinswomen, to know whether

- ther they had drunk wine. 756. a. b. 757. a.
The power which Socrates ascribed to a kiss. 796.
b. 797. a. b. When, and on what occasions, it is allowed to kiss other peoples wives, and maidens.
ibid. Parallel between the custom of kissing and dancing. V. 24. b. 25. a. b.
Knight (William) publishes Joseph Hall's Mundus alter & idem. III. 345. a.
Knight: by what means, and at what time the Roman Knights were admitted to the Senatorial dignity.
II. 712. b. Their order dishonoured two manner of ways. III. 696. b. A Knight who confers the title upon another. 282. a. An Italian author did not acknowledge any out of the Romish communion. V. 388.
Knobius (Christopher) praises the King of Denmark for having thrown the book of Concord into the fire. III. 391. a. b.
Know: the manner in which we know things is very obscure. I. 555. a. b. Whether it be likely that any Philosopher could be so extravagant as to maintain, that he knew not whether any thing existed.
IV. 206. a. b.
Knowledge: it is a crime to have more knowledge than the people. I. 307. b. Knowledge puffeth up, but there is another talent which puffs up yet more. 479. b. The bounds of human knowledge.
III. 582. and b. It rendered people suspected at the court of Rome. II. 187. and b. 188. a. Is the principal characteristic and privilege of the gods.
V. 587. b. 588. a.
Knox accused of incontinency in the dispute concerning the government of women. III. 670. a. b.
Koizig censured for referring his readers to books which he had not seen himself. I. 547. b. Has made three men of one. II. 243. b. n. (13).
Censured in relation to Patricius. IV. 507. a. and Pereira. 546. a. Censured touching Rozarius, and his native country. 911. a. b. Blamed. I. 603.
a. n. (i). Thinks oftentimes that a book is composed the year in which it is printed, or some translation of it. IV. 919. a. b.
Konigsberg, when its academy was erected. I. 223.
Koribolt (Christian), his book de tribus Impostoribus magnis. V. 208. b.
Koribolt (Sebastian) quoted. V. 206. a. n. (66). 216.
a. n. (140).
Kúe, a Pagan author has given that name to God.
II. 833. a.
- L.
- L Abbadis, a schismatic preacher, and followed as if he had been another apostle. I. 4. b. By what spirit he was led, according to Antoinette Bourignon. II. 111. a. b. A story which is told of him. IV. 87. a. Asserts that God will and can deceive. 877. a.
L'abbé (Father), his Pharus Gallie antiquæ almost ruined. I. 11. a. b. He exclaims against Rivetus.
21. a. b. Censured touching Ammonius. 269. a.
b. A passage of Zanchius related by him. V. 602.
a. n. (38). Pusses Marelius in an unmerciful manner, touching the curtailed edition of Anastasius, with which the Jesuits are reproached. IV. 727.
a. b. A singular answer which is made to his objections by D. Francus. ibid. n. (23).
Laberius, reflexion upon the reason, which, according to him, moved Democritus to blind himself.
II. 641. b. 642. a.
Labienus, his books condemned to be burnt. II. 355.
b. Resolves to die that he may not survive the productions of his wit. ibid.
Labyrinths, four buildings of that kind. III. 750. b.
Labyrinth of the Free-will. IV. 390. b. 391. a.
Labyrinth of love, a new French translation of that book. II. 37. b.
Labourer (le), a passage of that writer criticized. I.
711. b. Censured in relation to Dolet. II. 684. a.
b. Has not given an impartial account of the French Ambassador in Poland. III. 264. a. What he says of the impertinencies of Genealogists. IV.
650. a. b. 651. a. Reflexion of his upon some preachers. 722. a. Says something very remarkable concerning Poltro's conspiracy. V. 186. b.
187. a. Inveighs sharply against those who assume the name of Lands that their family does no longer possess. 187. a. b.
Lacedæmon, its Kings descended from Aristodemus. I.
130. a. The veneration which its enemies had for them. 273. a. b. The courage of the women of Lacedæmon. II. 522. b. 523. a. The custom that was observed there with respect to their feasts. 574.
b. The reason why the women and girls of that city were so immodest. III. 962. a. b. 963. a.
In what manner disobedient children were punished there. 965. b. &c. In what terms its decree for the deification of Alexander was conceived. IV.
405. a.
Lacedæmonians took away a crown for trifling reasons.
I. 128. a. b. Were the best husbands in the world.
134. b. Their dialect was harsh. 205. b. Who was the only man of their country who had two wives at once. 312. When they began to conquer the Tageates. ibid. and a. b. and why. ibid. Pretended to be beholden to Apollo for their glory and prosperity, and yet joined in a confederacy with those who plundered his temple. IV. 622. a. Had liberty to marry their sisters by the mothers, but not their sisters by the father. V. 49. b.
Lacquey: it is not without example that a lacquey has become a distinguished author. IV. 173. a. b.
Laetantius produces a testimony in proof of the worship, which was still paid to Apollonius, in the beginning of the IVth century. I. 381. b. What he says of Apollonius Tyanæus, and of Apuleius.
394. a. b. In what manner he pretends to destroy all Philosophy. 411. a. b. 412. a. And particularly Acatalepsy. 411. b. Pretends to have demonstrated that there is no science among men, and confesses this with relation to Physics. 412. a. His answer to Carneades in the behalf of justice. II.
330. a. b. Upbraids the Pagans with paying infamous worship to a prostitute. III. 53. and a. b.
Makes use of a fallacious syllogism of Cicero's against Dicaearchus. II. 658. b. Is mistaken as to an objection which he makes against the Heathens.
III. 53. a. Rallies them upon the greatest of the gods at last ceasing to beget children. 431. b.
How he answered Hierocles, touching the slanders which he had published against the Christian religion. 444. a. b. 445. a. Does not seem to have understood the meaning of Aristippus in these words, Habeo & non habeo. 701. a. Makes bad objections to the system of atoms. 789. a. b. 790. a.
Had no reason to charge Lucretius with contradic-ting himself. 928. b. 929. a. His answer to Epicurus concerning the evil which happens in this world is weak and full of errors. IV. 513. b. 514. a.
His opinion about the soul of beasts. 903. b. n. (28).
What he thinks of Cicero's book de Consolatione. V.
411. b. 412. a. Finds fault with the thought which is in the beginning of it. ibid. Laughs at Xenophanes for believing that the moon is inhabited. 576. a. How he endeavoured to convince the Pagans that the mother of Jesus Christ was a virgin.
772. b.
Ladies, when they fall in love with their inferiors, they are obliged to make all the advances. I. 315.
a. It is uncommon for great ladies, who do not marry a second time, to live without giving occasion to censure their conduct. 358. a. The poetical deification of a lady. 398. a. b. 399. a. The transcendent merit of another. 781. a. b. 782. a. b.
The Roman ladies dedicate all their jewels in order to make a vessel of gold, which the Senate had resolved to send to Delphos. II. 290. a. The honour that was allowed them in consideration of this.
ibid. One of the most dangerous principles wherewith ladies can be prepossessed, is, that there are conjunctures which permit them to neglect the outside of their honour. 381. b. A Spanish proverb concerning them. 515. a. Explication of that proverb. ibid. The young ones do not commonly make the greatest noise in the courts of Princes.
632. a. Whether they entertain those well, who make them taste the sweets of love. ibid. When the custom of their going to court was introduced, and the mischiefs arising therefrom. III. 93. a. b.
Corruption which they brought into the court of France. ibid. Our modern ladies are not of the same temper with Dido. 141. a. b. Are the plagues of a court, when they intrude into state-intrigues.
304. b. 305. a. See Women. What kind of affront gives them the most sensible pain. 405. b.
406.

466. a. Are addicted to all the fortune-telling superstitious with which the citizens wives are infatuated. IV. 200. b. 201. a. A scandalous custom that was practised by the Roman ladies. V. 130. a. b. Immodest ladies turn devout women at last; and the effect which this produces. 533. b. 534. a.
- Ladeder*, an Engineer that betrayed the Governour of Landau. III. 721. a. b.
- Laelius*, his chastity. IV. 745. b. 746. a.
- Laërtius* (Diogenes) not very exact in his reasonings and narrations. II. 777. b. 778. a.
- Latet* (John) censured. II. 17. n. (b). IV. 803. a.
- Layette* (a Drawer) taken for a man. IV. 2. a.
- Laymen* disguised like Priests, and sent to confess criminals. II. 459. b. 460. a. Whether it ought to be believed that recourse was had to this artifice in the process against J. Chafel. 460. b. Have no business with things appertaining to the altar. V. 62. a.
- Lais*, a famous Courtesan, was a model for the finest Painters to copy after. I. 367. b. The answer Apelles gave in relation to her. ibid. In what manner she used Diogenes. II. 670. a. Her favours to Diogenes the Cynic. ibid. Whether Apelles got her maidenhead. III. 702. b. 703. a.
- Lake*, whose water bore up men that could not swim. III. 158. a.
- Lallemand* (John) borrows a good deal from Rattler, in his Latin version of Sophocles. IV. 848, 849.
- Lamb* (Pascal), when it was slain according to Lewis de Leon. III. 772. b.
- Lambert* (St) murdered, by whom, and for what reason. I. 233. and a. b.
- Lambinus* corrects a passage of Plutarch unnecessarily. I. 129. b. Had no very nice taste upon the subject of modesty. III. 920. b. Did not understand a passage of Pausanias concerning Sappho. V. 48. a.
- Lame man in the Acts of the Apostles*, his cure, and what followed after it, burlesqued in the Acts of the Apostles in rhyme. II. 479. b.
- Lamy* (William) accused of Heresy because he disputed against the motion of the heavens. II. 29. b. In a lecture of Anatomy, speaking of the virginity of those whom his auditors should marry, he fortifies them against all events. 370. a. Cited. I. 311. a. n. (200). Examination of a notion of his about the Epicurean hypothesis. IV. 438. a. Gives an account of two signs by which one may know whether a woman has had any children. 503. a.
- Lampagia*, the wife of Aimon, King of Saragossa, whether she was the daughter of Eudo, Duke of Aquitaine. IV. 282. a. b. 283. a. b.
- Lampridius*, his judicious observation upon the duty of an Historian with respect to popular opinions. II. 770. b.
- Lamus*, King of the Lestrygons, built the city called Formiae. III. 786. and b.
- Lancaster* (the Duke of) suspected to be guilty of some sinister design. V. 554. a. b. Whether he was superstitious. 555. a. b.
- Lance*, which became a tree. I. 274. a. The iron of the lance that pierced the body of our Saviour sent to Rome. III. 566. and a. b. V. 469. and a. b. 470. a. b.
- Lancelot* (Mr), his remark upon the edition of Abelard's works. I. 249. a. b. n. (17). 651. n. (c). 740. b. n. (15). Memoir concerning William Bigot, communicated by him. II. 7. b. 8. a. b. n. (15). Informs the author of a memoir concerning Antony Cornelius. 556. b. Memoir concerning Simon Morinus communicated by him. IV. 269. b. 270. a. b. n. (13). Concerning Francis Hotman. V. 417. b. n. (2). Concerning James Sanfon. 43. a. n. (2).
- Langius* explains a passage of Cicero wrong. I. 80. a.
- Langres*, the King's council opposeth the establishment of a Protestant Church there. II. 694. a.
- Language*, whenever the old is made use of now-a-days it is by way of pleasantry. I. 63. a. b. Is impoverished by being too much changed. III. 208. b. IV. 743. a. b. Nothing ought to be altered in that of the old French writers. IV. 428. The old ought not to be altered in the least when ancient works are published or republished. II. 838. V O L. V.
- and b.* The zeal of several Princes for the language of their country. I. 543. b. II. 516. a. b. 517. a. b. 518. a. Judgment of several languages. II. 436. b. There is not one which is not more or less barren. IV. 842. a. The judgment which Cicero passes on those who despise their own language. I. 60. a. b.
- Language* (unknown), it is not true that the Fathers of the Church wrote the impieties and obscenities of the ancient Heretics in an unknown language. III. 136. a. b.
- Language* (Latin), authors who are fond of its oldest phrases. I. 62. b. 63. a. b. 741. a. b. 742. a. Who was the Vaugelas of it. III. 319. b. Whether those who speak it easily, speak it likewise politely. IV. 408. a. b. Greater liberty was taken in the use of the words of this language than there is in the French. II. 140. b. It is difficult to write very clearly in Latin. I. 644. b. II. 681. b. Plutarch affirms that there were few people in his time that did not speak it. 517. a. From whence derived. III. 309.
- Language* (French) puzzles us when the usual order of the words is altered. I. 602. b. II. 134. a. b. Has been a long time in vogue amongst foreigners. 228. a. b. Is very much esteemed. 436. a. b. Its advantage over the Greek. 628. b.
- Language* (Gothic) is the mother of all the other Teutonic languages. III. 628. a. b. 629. a.
- Language* (vulgar), whether it ought to be used in works of learning. I. 741. b.
- Languages* (dead) lose a great deal of their force and grace in a translation. I. 216. b. Are obscure, and why. 602. b.
- Languages* (living), their inconstancy. III. 208. a. b. 209. a. b.
- Lanfus* (Thomas) declaims on the bad effects of travelling. III. 345. b.
- Lanuvium*, its inhabitants made Roman citizens. III. 639. b.
- Laodice* puts Danaë to death. III. 779. b.
- Laodicea*, daughter of Priam, falls in love with Acanthus, the son of Theseus, and finds means of enjoying him. I. 52. and b. 53. a.
- Laomedon* refuses to recompense Neptune, and is punished for it. III. 432. b.
- Lepithe*, four modern authors affirm that Phlegyas was their King. IV. 626.
- Larebonius* demonstrates, in his Yanua Cæterum referrata, the faults of the new system of the Church. IV. 363. b. Had he thought of Mr Saurin's reflection, he would have charged his adversary home. 414. b. 415. a.
- Lafus* (John), Minister of the Flemish Church at London, is banished from thence. V. 550. a.
- Latin*, the want of that tongue hinders Bourfault from being Sub-preceptor to the Dauphin. II. 115. The Spaniards are generally too negligent when they write in Latin: an example of it. III. 774. a. b.
- Latin* (antient), Victorinus of Feltre was one of its first restorers. IV. 408.
- Latomus* compared the Christian Church to a bear's cub. V. 294. a.
- Lavardin*, a noble family of Vendomois. III. 455. b.
- Lavement*, significations of that word. III. 136. b. n. (57). Formerly signified only gargles. ibid. b. Ridiculous delicacy of Garasse about it. ibid.
- Laudice* poisons five of her sons. II. 305. a. 308. a.
- Launoi* (John de), clamour of the Provençals against him. I. 362. Some mistakes of that learned man. II. 9. a. b. He did not understand Greek. ibid. b. The unsuccessfulness of his labours for crying down false devotion. III. 742. b. 743. a. b. 744. a. Is very much to blame for having bestowed so many encomiums upon a prelate who had made the Amende honorable. IV. 917. and a. b. n. (a). He, and some other writers who oppose ill-grounded traditions, displease many, and do credit to their Church. 739, 740.
- Laurea*, Cardinal. III. 390. b.
- Lausanne*, the Synod held there makes regulations with which Calvin refuses to comply. II. 264. b.
- Law*: there were but three cities in all the Roman empire, which had schools of law. I. 771. a. b. Who was the first that renewed the profession of the Roman - Roman law, interrupted ever since the invasion of the Barbarians. III. 593. 594. The Civil-Law has been debated sometimes. II. 846. b.

- Law of Lamgo*, Princesses of the royal blood of Portugal are excluded from the crown by virtue of that law. IV. 762. b.
- Law* (Salique) is founded on good reasons. IV. 406. a. Whether it was instituted by Pharamond. III. 336. a. b. Those kingdoms where it is not of force, are subject to great disturbances. V. 519. b.
- Law* (unwritten) who it was that taught it the Jews. I. 173. b. 174. a.
- Lawyers*, their qualifications described in verse. II. 309. a. b. 310. a. Write down at length robberies which they neither approve nor practise. III. 135. b.
- Laws*, there are none which fustious persons will not evade to come at their ends. I. 128. a. b. Compared to bread and eggs. 223. a. And to the maxims of Physicians in their mutability. 616. b. Exceed the bounds of justice sometimes. 313. a. b. Were the spring and origin of moral good and evil, according to some Philosophers. 416. Their power. 446. a. b. There was a very odd one at Babylon. 597. a. b. There are three sorts of men, who make almost no use of the laws they prescribe to others. II. 38. a. b. When, by whom, and with what design that called Lex Agraria was proposed. 344. a. b. That called Lex Tabellaria, what the design of it was, and by whom proposed. 345. a. n. (6). The laws by permitting some particular things, do not free from blame those that commit them. 501. b. 502. a. b. 503. a. b. 504. a. What pretence was made use of at Rome, to abrogate such as were disliked. 713. b. The benefit of laws should not be stopped under pretence of some inconveniences. IV. 500. b. 501. a. 637. a. b. Laws are overturned for a little time, in order to make them last a very long time. 881. b. Are oftentimes not executed, because of the greatness of the evil. V. 17. b. A preamble makes them invidious: they should not dispute but command. 833.
- Laws* (Penal) in matters of conscience, are the Ratio Ultima of Divines. I. 285. a. b. 286. a. Whether the Church never made use of them against Heretics. 476. b. 477. a. Enacted against the Papists in England. III. 345. Odious conclusions drawn from them. 501.
- Laws* (sumptuary) how they were hindered from passing. III. 492.
- Laws of the Union of the soul and the body*, diversities which they occasion in men. II. 451. b. 452. a. b.
- Lead*, Philetas put some to his shoes, lest the wind should carry him away. IV. 616. a.
- League*, who was called it's Potillion. I. 718. a. Violence of the preachers of the League. II. 95. 101. a. b. What served as a pretence for it. III. 407. b. 408. a. That which the Deputy of the League was ordered to represent to the Pope. 411. b. 412. a. b. 413. a. The crime of James Clement, was the crime of the whole League. 412. b. 413. a. Put it into Cardinal de Bourbon's head to set up for the lawful successor to the crown of France. 520. a. b. Who were its Advocate-Generals. ibid. Who was called its Lacquey. IV. 243. a.
- Leaguers in France*, call the apology for the King of Navarre an infamous libel. I. 739. a. b. In the time of Henry IV, obtain more preferments than his old servants. II. 443. b. Make the Duke of Mayence their head. III. 297. a. b.
- Leah*, whether she committed Adultery the first time that Jacob knew her, and whether Jacob did not. IV. 540. a.
- Learned*: a person may be learned, tho' he cannot give an immediate answer to a great many questions. II. 374. b. n. (57). Reflexion upon the posterity of learned men. III. 155. a. b. Sometimes deny things the most easy to be known. I. 76. a. People through policy may affect not to pass for learned men. 353. a. b. Learned men, poor or unfortunate. 600. a. b. II. 365. b. 366. a. 617. b. 686. a. b. III. 50. b. 862. a. IV. 17. a. b. 294. b. 295. a. V. 400. a. b. 401. a. b. 402. a. b. 403. a. b. 589. and a. b. It is the misfortune of those who make themselves eminent, that sooner or later they will be publicly reproached with the least faults of their youth. I. 615. b. One that was famous while he was a beardless boy. 664. b. They ought to print books. II. 96. a. b. A person is not the more fit to negotiate nice affairs, because he is one of the most learned of his age. 188. b. Some of them are niggard of their learning. 287. a. It is a common thing enough for those who are born in some village, to pretend themselves natives of the next neighbouring city. 367. b. No persons are more to be feared by them, than great lords who love learning. 374. b. Some of them will not confess, that they are indebted to their censors for a little information. 503. b. One whose only daughter is reduced to a miserable condition. 707. b. 708. a. Which of them may be compared to rough diamonds. 646. a. Few of the learned will expose themselves to rash judgments. 708. a. They never ought to have a curiosity for the town news. III. 254. b. Marks of a studious disposition in some of them. 322. a. b. Learned men disappointed in their hopes of gratifications. 328. a. b. In their eulogies and epitaphs, it is generally affirmed, that they lived well with their wives, but this is not to be depended upon. 437. a. Women may fall in love with them upon account of their learning, without being in love with learning itself. 460. b. What value they sometimes set upon their productions. 658. a. It is a great misfortune for them to have to do with the intendants of the Finances. ibid. and b. There are learned men who know every thing but what they ought to know best. 882. a. Most of them are only fit to cultivate the lands, which have been already tilled. IV. 104. b. Why some learned men decline the speaking of Latin. 409. a. b. Too many trifling circumstances are inserted in the journals of their lives. 493. b. Who are the authors of the Journal of the Learned. 505. b. Learned men dishonoured by the impurities of their wives or their daughters. V. 240. b. 241. a. Hunt after remote things, and neglect that which they have as it were under their very noses. 734. What sort of writings ought to be consulted in order to find the particulars of their lives. II. 8. b. To excel both in business and learning, is a very rare talent. 314. b. Those who write the lives of learned men, never fail to praise their wives for conjugal affection. I. 796. a. Arrogance is ill-becoming them. II. 50. a. Their mercenary spirit. III. 339. b. 340. a. b. It is a great happiness for them to be free from ambition and avarice. IV. 187. b. See Authors and Writers.
- Learning*, whether it be in a declining condition. I. 220. b. 221. a. b. The character of a braggadocio in learning. 373. a. b. The decay of learning. IV. 209. a. b. Some men would be glad that the key of learning should not be imparted to the people. 629. b. A thing that must needs create a contempt for it. 859. a. Learning cannot dispel the darkness of Idolatry. V. 77. b. 78. a. Complaints against it. 229. b. Accused of having a bad influence on religion. 286. and a. b. France seems to have too great an aversion for every thing that looks like learning. 428. a. b. Too much learning displayed at the bar, only serves to withdraw the judges attention. II. 106. b.
- Leerr*. The school there becomes more famous than that of Norden, and why. II. 768.
- Legate*. The ignorance of the Legate, who condemned Abelard. I. 760. b. A Doctor's rallery upon it. ibid.
- Legendaries*, their false zeal has stuffed the History of the saints with fabulous stories. III. 708. b. The judgment which Melchior Canus gave about them. IV. 554. b. Ascribe extraordinary actions sometimes to one saint, sometimes to another. II. 770. b. Ought to follow the example of Lampridius in what regards popular opinions. ibid.
- Legends*. The origin of the false Legends of martyrs. V. 432. a. b. 433. a. b.
- Leger* (John) reproaches Quichenon with having abjured the Protestant religion. III. 275. b. n. (5). Justifies his uncle Antony Leger. ibid.
- Legislators* order and forbid the same things according to times and seasons. I. 616. b. Are more worthy of admiration than the greatest conquerors. IV. 669. b. Intended the good of the public, when they made it be believed, that they conversed with the deity. V. 69. b. A thought of

- of Machiavel's concerning that which makes them succeed or miscarry. 73. b.
- Lehman* (Christopher) observes that there are abundance of lies in William Eysengrein's Centenarii XVI, against Flavius Illyricus. II. 750. a. b.
- Leibniz*. Is a very extraordinary man. IV. 535. a. It is surprising that he writes so good French as he does. ibid. Whatever fine insights he has given us into the souls of beasts, his Hypothesis cannot well be preferred to that of Des Cartes. 909. b. 910. a. b. 911. a. Observations upon his reflexions. 914. a. b. as far as 916. a. b. Recurring upon his answers. ibid. His letter concerning the divining wand. I. 8. b. 9. a.
- Leicester* (Earl of) forms a faction in Holland, and aspires to the sovereignty. II. 687. b. 688. a.
- Leyden*, the judgment which its Divines gave. I. 242. and b. 243. a. When its university was founded. III. 241. See University. The Curators of that university make a decree that is criticized. III. 358. a. b. When the college of Divinity there was erected. 574. A present of rarities made to the university of Leyden. V. 561. and b.
- Leipzig*, its university at variance about the Philosophy of Ramus. II. 656. The great Gustavus calls an assembly at Leipzig, of Lutherans and Calvinists, in order to endeavour at an accommodation. III. 476. a. The Journal of Leipzig, or Acta Eruditorum Lipsiensia, its praise. I. 493. a. Quoted. V. 202. a. n. (25). Et passim alibi.
- Lela*, a name which is commonly given to the great ladies of Africa. III. 17. a. It is also the title of honour which the Mahometans gave to the blessed Virgin. ibid.
- Lemnos*. A massacre of all the men of that island, and the cause of it. III. 465. and a.
- Lent*, a thing which the Clergymen that preach during that time, are often reproached with. IV. 616. A supposition that would shorten it a little. V. 777. Does not begin at Milan till four days after Ashwednesday. 778. b.
- Lentulus*, a pretended letter of that Proconsul's containing a portrait of Jesus Christ, given as an authentic piece by John Huarte. III. 528.
- Leo Juda*, what Thuanus meant by those words. I. 802. b.
- Leo the Hebrew*, what he says of the two sexes of Adam. II. 856. a. b. 857. a.
- Leo I.* (Pope) confutes an opinion which had been approved by the Church in St Augustin. IV. 782. b.
- Leo IV and Benedictus III.* The She-Pope cannot be placed between these two Popes, the one of which was elected immediately after the death of the other. IV. 726. a. b. 738. a.
- Leo X.* Whether it be true that he published a threatening monitory against the Elector of Saxony. III. 272. b. By what means people got into his favour. 327. a. He was sometimes present at a Comedy. IV. 11. a. Was the first that threatened those with excommunication, who read a prohibited book. 13. b. His bull against such as affirmed that there was but one soul in all men. V. 214. b. 215. a.
- Leo Isauricus*, abuses the credulity of the Calif of the Saracens by a remarkable trick. II. 586. b. 587. a.
- Leontium*, a Courtesan, her letter to Lamia is a forged piece. II. 781. b. 782. a. Was at worst the concubine of Metrodorus. 782. a.
- Leontius* suffered martyrdom in Vespasian's reign. III. 316. b.
- Leopoldsdorf* (Jerome Beck of) brings the Turkish Annals from Constantinople. III. 774. b.
- Leotyrides*, the Lacedæmonians exclude him from the crown with great injustice. I. 128. a. b.
- Lepanto*, Rafario receives an order from the Doge of Venice, to make an oration upon that victory. IV. 848. and a. b. Zarlinu composes airs which are sung at the rejoicings made for it. V. 602.
- Lepreus*, a great eater. III. 427. b. 428. a.
- Lerida* (the Bishop of) makes a clamour against the congregation of the Index, on account of a Spanish Catechism. II. 337. b.
- Lerma* (the Duke of) Paul V, in favour of him, departs from the custom of not sending the red hat to the Cardinals newly elected. I. 604. b.
- Lebia* is the same with Clodia, the wife of Metellus Celer. IV. 202. a. b.
- Lescalopier* (Father) alleges a fact which is nothing to the purpose, and reasons against himself, whilst he is reasoning against Diogenes. III. 357. b. What he means by the sacred disease. 789. a. n. (10). His remark upon God's Incomprehensibility. V. 144. a. n. (42).
- Lesfiguières*, by what intrigues he endeavoured to deprive the Protestant assemblies of a good head. II. 433. b.
- Lesna*, a town, burnt by the Poles, and why. II. 539. b.
- Letter* (Pastoral) suppressed. V. 748. b.
- Letters*, the antiquity of their usage among the Assyrians. I. 595. b. 596. a. The changing of one single letter has dishonoured the memory of a great man. 611. b. 612. a. The suppression of two by an error of the print has robbed an author of four years glory. 633. a. A treatise of their proportions by Jeffery Tori. V. 388. The capital letters of the Greek, by whom brought again into use. III. 732.
- Letters*: too great a correspondence by letters, overpowers the learned. I. 625. b. Difference between those that are wrote to a person's self, and those that are wrote to others concerning him. 330. b. IV. 276. b. V. 566. b. Letters that pass between friends, ought to be kept in inviolable secrecy. III. 553. a. 844. b. The slavery which those are under, who have the reputation of writing fine letters. IV. 707. b. Even the Pagans detested the practice of publishing of what people wrote to one another in confidence. V. 797. It was not usual in England before the year 1613, to publish discourses in form of letters. III. 344. An author that inserts letters in a book, which are not of his own writing, leaves room for the authors of those letters to arrogate the merit of the whole performance to themselves. II. 688, 689.
- Letters* (men of) a reflexion upon their faults. IV. 859. a. b. A discourse on the marriage of men of letters by Claudius Badiel. I. 603. a. b. 604. a. b.
- Letters* (Historical) quoted. V. 753. a. n. (28). Et passim alibi.
- Letters* (Provincial) divers particulars concerning that book. IV. 489. b. 490. a. b.
- Lettres (the Belles)* charged with causing a great deal of confusion. V. 286. b. Their revival in Italy. III. 258. a. b. Their decay. IV. 209. a. b. The restoration of them opened the way for the Reformation. V. 286. b.
- Leucas*, people were cured of the passion of love, by leaping from the top of its promontory. III. 787. b. 788. a. Names of those that took the leap. ibid. Its promontory was called the Lover's leap. V. 47. a.
- Leucophyllus*, a plant which hinders women from committing Adultery. IV. 609. Its effect upon drunken people. 610. a. Its virtue more remarkable than that of the Agnus Castus. ibid. b.
- Leve* (Antony de) whether he had a correspondence with Agrippa. I. 151. a. b. From whence he took money to pay his soldiers. IV. 456. b.
- Levis*, the house of that name is one of the most noble in all France. IV. 585. a.
- Leviathan*, what the design of that book is. III. 469. a. b.
- Levites*, why they were so called, according to Plutarch. I. 115. a.
- Leudasi*, whether it prevails more in hot countries than cold. II. 820. a. b. 821. a. b. Et c. The toleration granted at Rome for this sin, compared with that granted in other countries for drunkenness. 820. b. 821. a. The way to banish it. III. 186. a. b. 814. a. b. V. 98. b. 99. a. b. A Queen recovers by her leudness, a crown which she could not preserve by her courage. II. 523. See Incontinency.
- Louis VII*, King of France, his scruples of conscience. III. 797. b. 798. a. Dispossesses himself entirely of the territories of his divorced Queen. V. 518. a.
- Louis IX*, King of France, the strange servitude to which he submits himself, in order to please the Queen his mother. II. 382. b. 383. a. The oath which it seems they would have required from

- from him. III. 92. a. n. (43). And which he refuses to take. 98. b.
- Lewis XI*, King of France, his inclinations always opposite to those of Charles, Duke of Burgundy. II. 215. a. b. Would not marry his son to the heiress of Burgundy. 221. a. b. 222. a. Had less courage than policy. 221. b. 222. a. His little pad carried him and all his court. 131. b. Let many years pass, before he re-imbursed the sums which were advanced for the funeral of Charles VII. 464. a. A very good thought of his. 737. a. b. Is afraid lest the English should repent of their having made peace. 740. a. Threatens the Parliament of Paris. V. 443. a. b. Is not the first who made it a capital crime to conceal a conspiracy. IV. 346.
- Lewis XII*, King of France, a generous sentiment of his. I. 421. b. III. 896. b. Kills himself by caring for his Queen too much. 88. a. A witty saying of this Prince's. 814. b. For what reason he saw the forces of England, Switzerland, and Spain against him. 613. b. 614. a. Is present at a lecture of Civil-Law, and embraces the Professor. IV. 67. a. His history wrote by John d'Auton, and printed by Theodore Godfrey. I. 589.
- Lewis XIII*, King of France, exhorts the Catholic Princes of Germany to forsake the Emperor. II. 134. b. 135. a. b. His conduct towards the Queen, his mother. 400. a. b. 401. a. b. Who it was that undertook to take away the barrenness of the Queen, his wife. 401. b. And to reconcile him with her. ibid. III. 816. a. b. His servitude under the Marshal d'Ancre. II. 542. a. b. Declares that he did not mean to comprehend the Protestants in the oath made at his coronation, of employing his sword for the extirpation of Heresies. III. 209. b. Is very much afraid of the Devil. 212. a. b. Confusions to which the kingdom was exposed under his minority. 301. a. A witty saying of his. 823. a. b. The history of him promised to us. IV. 257. b. A false prediction concerning the day of his death. 260. b. Has a fall, and will not let it be told to his Astrologer. ibid. Respects his mistress, and is jealous of her at the same time. V. 84. b. Capriata bestows so much praise on his conduct that he has been copied by a Frenchman. II. 311. a.
- Lewis XIV*, makes himself protector of the Heretics at the capitulation of Landau. III. 721. b.
- Lewis of Bavaria*, Bzovius razes him out of the catalogue of Emperors. II. 238. He, and Frederic Barbarossa: an apology for those Emperors by Hungerus. III. 534. a. b. Marfilus of Padua writes an apology for him. IV. 198. and a. b. Persecuted by three Popes. ibid. b.
- Liar*: the sophism called the Liar, is a mere childish subtilty. IV. 616. b. 617. a. b.
- Liars*, their ordinary fate. I. 198. a. b.
- Libanus*, a mount where Venus had a temple. II. 4. b.
- Libels* (defamatory), it is a favour to believe writers of them even upon their oath. I. 343. a. An advice to those that write libels. ibid. b. 344. a. What was said concerning those of Aretin. 436. a. Augustus was the first that ordered information to be taken against this kind of writings. II. 355. a. b. 356. a. And who involved them under the crimes of high-treason. V. 743. U seq. For what cause. 744, 745. Tiberius continues this innovation of Augustus. ibid. Why it is unlawful to publish them. II. 389. a. b. They do a great deal of mischief. III. 290. b. 291. a. Most of them are composed by persons very little known, and of bad characters. 291. a. It is of great use to display the impudence of those that write them, and the credulity of those that read them. V. 103. a. A thing which the authors of them do not consider. 459. a. See Slanders. Those of some private persons disowned. 738, 739. Dissertation concerning defamatory libels. 743. as far as 765. Should never go unpunished. 746, 747. The answer which should be made to those that write an apology for them. 747. All Legislators have agreed in punishing them severely. 758. The Council of Trent ascribes the punishment of them to the tribunal of the Church. 762. Whether they be the causes of sedition and war. 763, 764. Remarks against those that spread them about, or approve them. 764, 765. It is ordinary for all factions to produce libels. III. 517. b.
- Liberality*; singular effects of liberality. I. 412. b. 413. a. III. 317. b. 318. a. Should be practised towards our enemies. I. 559. a.
- Liberty*: there are some who love not liberty, but the person of him who declares for it. II. 167. a. The liberty of indifference is not an essential attribute of creatures. IV. 907. a. b. 908. a. b. 909. a. b.
- Liberty* (human), see Free-will.
- Liberties of the Gallican Church*, the history of that book. IV. 98. b. 99. a. b. 100. a. b. Receive a terrible blow. II. 125. a. b. All that was done for supporting them under Innocent XI, overturned in 1693. ibid.
- Libertines*, in the affair of religion, are of two kinds. II. 648. a. b. Those who write against them should be very careful not to afford them any subject for laughter. III. 132. a. A reflexion on the complaints of some persons, against those who represent the objections of the Libertines with all their force. V. 537. a. b. See Mockers in point of Religion.
- Library*: by whom the library of the college of Navarre was built. I. 164. a. Reflexion on the fate of some libraries. 319. a. b. 320. a. A speaking library; who was called so. II. 646. a. A library erected by Augustus in one of the temples of Rome. III. 8. a. A library that had as many books as there are stars in the firmament. 110. b. A fault which the overseers of public libraries are guilty of. 950. b. Some very noble libraries. IV. 555. a. b.
- Libreria del Doni*, how it is divided, and what it contains, according to Teiffier. II. 689. a. b.
- Librarii*, the signification of that word. V. 798.
- Lycæus*, miracles which are related concerning that mount. IV. 205. a. b.
- Lycæum*, Aristotle's school, its doctrines will always triumph over all others. I. 469. a. It is taught in Persia, and in the dominions of the Great Mogul. ibid. b.
- Lycettus* (Franciscus) treats Niphus with good manners. IV. 380. b.
- Lycians* loved to wear long hair. IV. 174. a.
- Lycophron*, his Cassandra is very obscure. IV. 598. a. Different readings of a passage in him. I. 538. b.
- Liebaux*, his work on the diseases of women is not a translation of that work of Marinello's, which has the same title. IV. 148. a. b. Accused of plagiarism by Lazarus Pe. ibid.
- Liebler* (George) translates a homily of Martin Eysengrein, and writes notes upon it in order to refute it. II. 749. a. b.
- Lige*, a town, treated cruelly. II. 216. b. 217. a.
- Lies*: there is no lie, how absurd so ever, but will be handed down from book to book, and from age to age. II. 296. a. There are some lies which make people angry, and others which make them laugh. 181. a. b. Whether it be permitted to tell a lie. V. 748. and a. b. How they are perpetuated. ibid. U seq.
- Life*, reasonings of an uncommon nature upon the shortness of it. I. 511. a. b. Philosophical sentiments about long life. II. 185. b. The principle of Christians, touching the chief end of life is only a principle in Theory. 200. b. A few years of life remaining, are not worth the making a false step. 384. Was a state of penance and punishment for a sin committed before men came into the world, according to some Philosophers. 561. a. b. 562. a. b. IV. 441. b. V. 412. a. b. Uc. Democritus laughed at human life. II. 642. a. Whether the good things of life surpass the evil. 832. a. b. IV. 844. a. b. V. 414. b. 423. b. 424. a. b. 576. a. b. 577. a. The limits of its duration, according to Hesiod. III. 348. b. 349. a. The immoderate desire which Lewis XI, King of France, had to prolong his life. 803. b. 804. a. 806. b. 807. a. b. 808. a. Life is short and miserable. ibid. Few wise men would chuse to begin the race of life afresh. V. 423. b. 424. a. Life does not consist in living, but in enjoying health. III. 342. a. Persons who delighted so much in retirement as to say, that during the whole of their life before, they had by no means lived. II. 430. and b.

Life

- Life to come*, what the Japanese believe about it. III. 550. a. b. According to Lucas Brugensis, the Jews had the doctrine of it from the Pagans. V. 8. a. b.
- Light of nature*: Divines will always be worried in a dispute that is carried on upon no other principles than those of the light of nature. V. 815. The mysteries of the gospel neither can nor ought to be subjected to its dictates. 816. 829. It is easy to reconcile the moral precepts of JESUS CHRIST with it. 815. n. (2).
- Likely*: Agathon's aphorism concerning what is likely. I. 126. a. b.
- Lilly*: a story that is told of a lilly which Charles V had planted. II. 444. b. 445. a.
- Limbo* of children, is the porch of hell. IV. 501. a. b. Virgil owned it. ibid. b. 502. a.
- Limbourg*, to whom it belongs. II. 223. a.
- Lindanus* created a great many sects. I. 790. a. b.
- Lindenbruch* was enraged against Wouwer. V. 565. b. 566. a.
- Lionne*, by what means he mounts to the chiefest places in the government. IV. 807. a. b. 808. a.
- Lions*, whether they are without marrow. I. 75. b. 76. a. The History of the Lion of Androcles is known only by the relation of Apion. 375. a. Notwithstanding what Tertullian says, lions are more than once fathers. 448. a. b. Who was the first among the Romans that yoked lions in his chariot. III. 959. b. In Africa some of them were nailed to a cross, in order to frighten others. IV. 908. b.
- Lippus* (Justus), advice which he gives to young men. I. 61. a. And to Badius. 678. a. b. 680. b. His judgment of Paul Emilius's History of France. II. 763. a. b. What is thought to be one of the principal reasons of his having turned Papist. III. 673. b. Is ill-used in a book, and answers nothing. 838. a. b. Is said to have composed books to convince the world that he was not lukewarm and indifferent in religion, as many suspected he was. 842. a. Addresses verses to the planet Venus in behalf of his garden. 922. b. Writes a letter full of malice against Holland. IV. 795. a. Approves of Roulliard's Capitulary concerning the validity of a marriage. 804. a. b. 805. a. His mistakes with regard to Tacitus. V. 281. b. 282. a. b. His declaration touching his reading of Petronius. 485. b. Approves of travelling, and has given very good instructions concerning it. III. 345. b.
- Lyre*, the Embassadors of the Getae presented themselves playing upon the lyre. I. 83. a.
- Lysander*, his character. I. 128. a. b. Wrests the sense of an oracle. ibid. b.
- Lyserus* conceals himself under the fictitious name of Theophilus Alethens. III. 973.
- Lysimachus*, the son of a daughter of Aristides, got his living by interpreting of dreams. I. 521. a.
- Lysimachus* puts two Princes to death for destroying their mother. II. 676. b.
- Lysimachus* fights with a lion, and receives several wounds. III. 713. a. b.
- Lisle*, the siege of that town. III. 718. a. b.
- Lisola* (Baron) affirms, that the States of the empire are obliged to defend the circle of Burgundy. II. 223. and b.
- Lysitrus*, his commentary upon the praise of Folly is disliked by a great many, and why. II. 810. a. b.
- Litanies*, the expressions which indiscreet zealots had insensibly introduced into them, condemned by Belarmin. I. 728. b.
- Live*: to live a quiet life is all we should aspire at. II. 200. a. b.
- Lives*, those who write them should write the lives of great criminals. V. 519. a. b.
- Lives of learned men*, where we are to seek for the particulars of them. II. 8. b.
- Livia* (Empress) carried her complaisance to Augustus too far. I. 332. a.
- Livia*, daughter of Nero Claudius Drusus, her History. II. 718. a. b.
- Livilla*, her death. I. 358. b. 359. a.
- Livius* (Titus), see Titus Livius.
- Lizet* (Peter) is Advocate-General in the Parliament of Paris. II. 429.
- Lloyd* ascribes to the Scholiast of Apollonius, a great many things concerning the island of Taphos, which are not to be found in him. V. 307. a.
- VOL. V.
- Locke*, his answer to those who blamed him for having said, that natural reason does not prove the immortality of the soul. IV. 592. b. 593. a. Wherein he makes the difference between men and beasts to consist. 912. b. 913. a. Cited. V. 616. b.
- Loerians*, how they appease Minerva. II. 340. b. In what manner they expiate the crime of Ajax. ibid. 341. a. b.
- Locusts*: the water-locusts at Minturnæ are as large as those upon the coasts of Africa. I. 372. b. A pleasant story concerning this. ibid.
- Loeffnius* makes collections of the feditious things that are to be found in the writings of the Jesuits. III. 656. b.
- Logic* is a great help to the other sciences. I. 163. a. b. IV. 189. a. b. It would be of great use to criticize on the false Logic of authors. I. 394. b. 395. a. Logic compared to Penelope by Chrysippus. II. 495. a.
- Logicians*, a good Logician is scarcer than is imagined. II. 655. b. The Irish and Spanish Logicians make distinctions that are too obscure and abstracted. V. 645. b.
- Loisel* resigns the canonry of Notre Dame at Paris, to Claudius Joly. III. 577.
- Lombard* (Peter), the first who was made Doctor of Divinity, in the university of Paris. III. 594. How much Stancarus esteemed him. V. 227. b. 228. a.
- Londel* (Father du), his Faſti criticized. V. 755. a. b. The usefulness of his Chronological Tables. IV. 211. b.
- Longiano* (Faufto da), his criticism upon Quevara's Marcus Aurelius, is good and learned. III. 270. b. He promises the life of that Prince, composed from the testimony of the ancient Historians. ibid. The studies to which he applies himself. ibid.
- Longinus*, his judgment of some Philosophers. I. 255. a. Had an exquisite judgment and penetration. IV. 690. a. b. What he says of Theopompus. V. 328. b. A passage where his good taste does not appear. 360. a. b.
- Longitude*, a great many have believed that they had discovered it. IV. 262. b. 263. a.
- Longolius*, his oration concerning the praise of the French, compared with the Romans. V. 417. He praises Peter Turel in it. ibid.
- Looking-glass* was one of the principal parts of Otho's equipage of war. I. 392. a. Fables concerning looking-glasses. IV. 672. a. b. &c. A story concerning one in which Cardinal Mazarin saw every thing that passed in Portugal. 676. b. The fashion which women had of wearing them over their bellies. II. 400. a. b.
- Loofe sheets*, it is their fate to be thrown aside among the rubbish of libraries. V. 800.
- Lopez* (Dominicus), a fictitious name which Faustus Socinus assumed, when he published his treatise de Autoritate S. Scripturae. V. 180. b.
- Loredana* (Leonard), Navagiero makes his Funeral Oration. IV. 315.
- Loredano*, his work of the life of Adam. II. 857. b. 858. a. b. Censured. V. 432. a. b.
- Lorenzo* (John) writes libels against Alexander VI, in Greek, his brother translates them into Latin, and is thrown into the Tyber. IV. 89. b. 90. a. b.
- Lorrain* approves the revolt of subjects, and the attempts of the court of Rome against the temporalities of Princes. I. 642. b.
- Lorrain* (Charles, Cardinal of), what has been said of him. I. 121. b. 704. a. b. What Brantome says of him. III. 287. a. 874. b. Glories in being hated by the Huguenots. 290. a. A ridiculous description of this Cardinal's tribulations. V. 29. b. 30. a. His behaviour with respect to J. du Tillet. 353. b. 354. a. b.
- Lot*: a Painter in Prussia having read in Luther's translation of the Bible, what Lot did to his daughters, behaved in the same manner to his own. IV. 723. a.
- Latharius* allows the Stellingi to profess Paganism, and turns Monk to do penance for it. V. 233. a. b. 234. a. b.
- Lots*: the book of the Acts of the Apostles in rhyme supposes that the drawing of lots was made use of in the election of St Matthias. II. 478. a.

- Loudun* (la Cordonniere de), a libel against Cardinal Richelieu. III. 212. a.
- Loudun*: all the devils-craft of the nuns of Loudun confounded by Ogillet. III. 212. b.
- Louvain*, who founded the college of three languages in that university. II. 236. a. and b. And who was the first that taught the Hebrew tongue there. ibid. b.
- Love*, its origin according to Plato. I. 102. b. Who was the first that introduced the custom of singing love-songs in company. 205. When love adventures began to be brought upon the stage. 313. The pursuits of ambition, secure women against the follies of love, better than they do men. 523. a. A lively description of love. II. 1. b. 2. a. b. 3. a. Reigns in the most icy climates. 80. a. Is the cause of the blackest treacheries. 333. a. Of all declarations of love, none costs a Queen so dear as a verbal one. 312. a. Heroic love, what is called so. 318. a. Love of women, why people stumble much more in that regard, than in all the other duties of Christianity. 382. a. And why this holds true with respect to Princes, much more than to private persons. ibid. How excessive soever the jealousy of men may be, yet it is not so copious in inventions as the love of women. 533. a. The work of love detested by Democritus. 638. b. The pleasure of love has been called a little epilepsy. 644. a. b. III. 81. a. b. 82. a. A man who has always his pen and books in his hand cannot find time to devote himself to it. II. 814. a. b. 815. a. The extent of its empire. 822. b. 823. a. b. One of its caprices. 857. a. b. What is its great mover. III. 13. b. 14. a. b. The Heathen Poets philosophized upon nothing so profoundly as upon love. 28. a. b. Its rage and brutality. 56. a. b. 57. a. An instance of its triumph and power. 165. b. 166. a. Commonly leaves honour in possession of all its rights. 383. a. People were cured of this passion by leaping from the rock of Leucas. 787. b. 788. a. b. Names of those that took the leap. ibid. The difference between a poetical love and a real one. IV. 82. a. b. V. 420. b. 421. a. b. There is no need of any other witchcraft to make people guilty of a thousand disorders. IV. 454. b. Creeps in every where. 635. b. Whether all would go to ruin in its empire if women were to attack, and men to stand upon the defensive. V. 31. b. 32. a. b. Love is a divine fury, which produces the most violent Enthusiasm. 45. b. The evils which this passion draws after it. 110. a. Guido Cavalcante's song on terrestrial love, has been commented on by several learned men. II. 398. b. 399. a. b. An explication of the doctrine of Cavalcante, touching the nature of love, by Marfilus Ficinus. 399. b. A very singular character of that of A. Niphus. IV. 378. b. 379. a. A book of Parthenius, concerning this passion. 482. The distemper of love sometimes ends in madness, or a consumption. ibid. a. What a Spanish author said of virtuous love. V. 225. b.
- Love* (self): a refinement upon self-love. I. 134. a. Reflexion upon self-love. 460. a. b. Makes people despise riches sometimes. ibid.
- Love of our neighbour*. A Portuguese Monk preaches that we are bound to love all men, of whatsoever religion, sect, or nation, they be, even the Castilians. V. 319.
- Lovers* ought to make use of the key of the heart to come at the enjoyment of their mistresses. I. 454. a. b. Their impertinent gallantries. III. 867. b. The History of two married persons, who were always called the two lovers. 386. a. b. A lover who by his amorous embraces cured his mistress that was infected with the Plague. 3. a. b.
- Low-Countries* lost by the jealousies, and other hidden passions of Philip II. I. 588. a. A project of peace which is proposed to them. III. 120. a. b. 121. a. Have furnished a theatre of war for two ages. 806. a.
- Lubbet* brings fifty heads of accusation against one of his Colleagues before the Synod of Dort. IV. 75. a. b. A great enemy to innovations. 474. a.
- Lubeck*, the school there decays, and why. III. 663. b.
- Lubin* (Father) his complaints against the gentlemen of the French academy. V. 234. b. And against the Dutch. ibid. 235. a.
- Lucan* affirms in a profane manner, that the Gods are only angry with the unfortunate. II. 418. b. For what reason he imagined that in Greece and Italy, the Deity was better known than at Mar-seilles. 678. a. b. His mistake in this respect. ibid. Why he joined with the conspirators against Nero. IV. 597. a.
- Lucar* (Cyril of) a great many of his letters were deposited in Rivetus's hands. V. 560. b.
- Lucian*, the answer which he puts into the mouth of a Courtesan. I. 54. b. 55. a. What he affirms to have seen at Byblos. 116. a. What he says of the thunder that was darted at Anaxagoras. 307. b. 308. a. Censured for a blunder, in relation to the picture of Calumny, which is attributed to Apelles. 367. b. 368. a. b. Let a man turn himself all ways imaginable, he will never avoid the satirical strokes of such a man as Lucian. II. 117. b. Does not shew much judgment on the subject of Sthenobea and Phædra. 535. a. Tells a pretty story concerning Democritus. 638. a. The character which he gives of that Philosopher. 639. b. 640. a. Tho' he ridicules false gods, he deserves notwithstanding to be detested. IV. 584. b. A dialogue which has been accounted one of his pieces. V. 446. b.
- Lucilius*, a Satiric Poet did not get satisfaction of the Comedian who had offended him, by naming him on the stage. I. 61. b. Did not desire that his readers should be altogether ignorant, or very learned men. IV. 593. a.
- Lucretius*, one of the arguments which he uses against the doctrine of the Homœomerics. I. 297. a. b. Was not aware of an objection, which would have destroyed the very foundation of that hypothesis. ibid. b. Refutes an answer of Anaxagoras tolerably well. 303. b. His sentence, that men pull off the mask, at the point of death, is not always true. III. 288. b. n. (26). What he says about seeing a shipwreck. IV. 34. b. n. (93).
- Lucullus* courts a lady of pleasure, in order to obtain an employment. II. 426. a. b.
- Lucumon*, from what preface his wife assured him of good fortune. V. 287. a. b.
- Lude* (Count de) what kind of shots he shot upon the government. III. 265. a.
- Ludolphus* (Job) acquired a wonderful knowledge of Ethiopia. III. 527. a.
- Lusfen* (Herman) a Physician of Rotterdam, his letter upon the sympathetic virtue. I. 9. b. n. (76).
- Lugob*, the Provost de l'Hôtel's lieutenant, disguised as a priest, and sent to confess John Chastel, plays his part ill. II. 459. b. 460. a. b.
- Lusignan* (Brother Stephen of) rallied upon his extraordinary learning. I. 53. a.
- Luffon* (Bishop of), see Cardinal de Richelieu. He writes a letter to Marshal d'Ancre in very submissive terms. III. 209. a. b.
- Lust*: whether courage and lust flow from the same principle in the constitution. III. 414. a. b. 415. a. b.
- Luther*. His reputation was every body's concern in Saxony. I. 140. a. b. Looked upon as a Hero by some great Geniuses of the Romish communion. 149. b. Accuses Aleander of being a Jew. 215. a. b. Called those Divines Anaxagorists, who find every thing in every text of Scripture. 304. a. Disapproves of the rebellion of the Anabaptists. 284. a. b. 285. a. What he reproaches the Divines of Cologne, and those of Louvain, with. 470. b. Reflexions upon what some people affect to say, that Luther married a very handsome Nun. II. 72. a. b. 73. a. Facts relating to his marriage. 73. b. 74. a. b. 75. a. b. 76. a. b. 77. a. b. A resolution is taken of answering him in a vigorous manner, to make him more moderate for the future. 195. a. b. 196. a. His translation of the Bible. 705. a. In what disposition he was, when he saw himself put to the ban of the empire. III. 272. b. The efficacy of his preaching foretold about thirty years before it happened. 456. a. b. Accused by Cochleus of having published prefaces that were injurious to the Scripture. 942. a. Whether it became him to dis-vert himself with jests and banter. 954. a. He disperses the schools of Magic in Spain and Germany. V. 385. b. His conferences with Vergerius. 452. a. b. Favoured by the enormity of abuses. II. 126. a. A book intitled, Luther with from

- seven beads*, in which Cochleus relates all his impurities. III. 136. a. b. Composes a preface to Fr. Lambert's book de Minoritarum regula. 709. b. Silvester Prierias succeeds very ill in writing against him. IV. 772. a. Controversial writings between that Monk and him. ibid. and b. Reflexion upon what Mr Claudé has said concerning his conference with the Devil. V. 73. a. b.
- Lutheranism*: what made Castellán suspected of Lutheranism. II. 372. b. Who was called its sword and shield. III. 218. b. Its preservation amidst the schisms which distracted it. IV. 271. a. b. When, and how introduced, and established in Dortmund. II. 121. a. b. Introduced into Carinthia, Carniola, and the territories of the Grand Seigneur by the Slavonian translations of Truberus. V. 405.
- Lutherans*, a great number of them refuse to communicate with the Church of Ireland. I. 718. a. b. The history of their eleventh schism. III. 442. a. b. Meet at Leipzig with the Calvinists, by order of the great Gustavus, to endeavour at an accommodation. 476. a. What gave rise to the thirteenth schism which happened among them. 478. a. b. What was the cause of their fourteenth schism. 535. b. The opinion which the rigid Lutherans have of Calvinism. 841. a. Treat the Calvinists, that were banished out of England, very ill. V. 550. b. Join with the Catholics to resist the Calvinists. II. 121. Their doctrine concerning the Eucharist, seemed to Bucer to attribute too much to the Real Presence. 177. a. The disturbance which their book of concord produces, and how it is treated by the King of Denmark, and by Queen Elizabeth. III. 390. a. 391. a. b.
- Luxury*, by what Gradations it crept in among the Romans. II. 710. a. When it is at the height, they treat what is said of the ancient frugality as fabulous. ibid. Pope Innocent XI attempts to reform it. III. 569. a. b. An author wishes that all those women who addit themselves to luxury were called whores. II. 400. b. People are readier to give it over at the commandment of the King, than that of God. ibid.
- Laz*, the incorruptibility of that bone, according to the Jews, and its virtue towards the resurrection of the body. I. 649. b. 650. a. b.
- Lazara*, the winning of that battle very much controverted by the writers of both sides. III. 719. b. n. (24).
- M.
- M That letter's being ill printed, occasions a great error. II. 42. a. b.
- Mailillon* (Father) his indignation at seeing a famous man buried without an epitaph. II. 277. b. 278. a. b. A curious fact which he has related to us, and which had been cut off from a manuscript. 633. a. b. Censured for praising Episcopius. 795. a. b. There is an untruth concerning the Turks in the History of the Holy War published by him. IV. 41. a.
- Macarius*, four of his Homilies translated by Daniel d'Ange. I. 562. a.
- Macerata*, at what time its academy was founded. V. 167. b.
- Macbiavel* cited. III. 798. b. What he says of Peter and Jerome Riario. V. 163. a. b. A thought of his concerning that which makes Legislators succeed or miscarry. 73. b.
- Macrinus* sends Caracalla's ashes to Julia, and writes a very obliging letter to her. III. 606. b. But at last orders her to depart from Antioch. ibid.
- Macrobius* confuses over all such romances as the Golden Ass, to nurlcs. I. 395. a. Confounds the places of the Knights with those of the Senators. III. 695. b. 696. a. b. What judgment ought to be made of the stories which he relates. IV. 769. b.
- Madness*. The greatest wits have all a mixture of madness. II. 321. a. As likewise madness has sometimes a mixture of great wit. ibid. It is wisdom to feign it on some occasions. V. 373. b.
- Madmen*, persons who have feigned themselves to be so. I. 422. b. They have a privilege to sin with impunity. II. 254. a.
- Mænas*, what argument he made use of to persuade Augustus to keep the empire in his own hands. IV. 564. a.
- Mænius* punishes his freedman severely, for having killed his daughter. 797. a.
- Maestricht* subdued in the year. 1673. IV. 211. b.
- Maffew* (the Jesuit) repeated his Breviary in Greek, for what reason. IV. 409. a. b.
- Magabitti*, Cardinal Mazarin's nephew, besieges la Motte. IV. 278.
- Magdeburg*, whether the sacking of Magdeburg was foretold by a Poet. III. 877. b. 878. a. b. 879. a. A book published under the name of the inhabitants of this town. V. 736.
- Magdalenes* (the convent of) designed for receiving debauched women, who should be reclaimed. IV. 888. a. b.
- Magi* of Persia, the impostures which they used, to engage their King to destroy Christianity. I. 13. a. b.
- Magia Diabolica*, Elich maintains a public dispute, and writes a book upon that subject. II. 750.
- Magic*. Persons that have been accused of it. I. 145. a. 182. a. b. 384. b. 385. a. b. 392. b. 393. a. b. 598. and a. b. II. 51. b. III. 211. 231. b. 232. a. b. 233. a. IV. 369. a. b. 370. a. 533. b. 534. a. V. 100. Whether books of Magic be necessary. I. 182. b. Who are those that have touched upon natural and lawful Magic. 192. Their was a time when Magic required that beautiful youths should be sacrificed. 347. b. 348. a. Who was the inventor of it, and how it was transmitted from the old world to the new. II. 431. a. b. 432. a. n. (15). Illustrious names are prefixed to books, especially to such as treat of Magic. 640. b. A good many Christians laugh at it, and yet continue to own the Divinity of the Scriptures. V. 12. b. Called Art Atracia, and why. I. 538. a. See Witchcraft.
- Magicians*: whether a man's poverty may be used as an argument to prove that he is a Magician. I. 152. a. b. Their accusers fall into contradictions sometimes. 385. b. 386. a. Are very guilty of romancing. II. 639. a. b. Attack one another's reputations. 641. a. b. Whether they can be accused without any danger, and when this may be done. III. 211. b. 212. a. Whether the stories which are told of them be true or chimerical. V. 100. What difference there is between them and forcerers. 385. b.
- Magistrates*: the Magistrate has a right to punish fornication. I. 222. a. b. 223. a. Illustrious Magistrates, and good Catholics called Heretics, in the Bibliotheque of the society of the Jesuits. 220. a. Make several edicts against the Anabaptists. 285. a. b. 286. a. Whether they ought to punish Heretics. 789. a. b. Their readiness in letting themselves be led away by cabals. II. 141. a. b. There is no better way to gain the applause of the mob than to declaim against them. 357. a. Mankind could not possibly subsist without them. III. 671. a. Ought to be extremely cautious in inflicting a note of infamy. IV. 500. b. and why. ibid. Those who maintain that men ought to be punished by the Magistrate for their opinions, fall into a thousand contradictions. 782. a. When authors have recourse to them, to get their adversaries writings suppressed, it is a plain sign that they are convinced of having the worst in the dispute. V. 343. a.
- Magni* (Valerian) his Judicium de Acatolicorum & Catholicorum regula credendi. V. 741. a. b.
- Mabomet* of glorious memory, whether a Christian can speak of that impostor in such honourable terms. II. 760. A treaty of peace between him and the Christians. IV. 38. b. Was not of a base extraction. 176. b. Subdues Mecca. 177. b. 178. a. Could neither read nor write. 177. b. Commands his followers to go in pilgrimage to Mecca. 178. a. b. Prophecies upon his death-bed, and not at all like a false prophet. 349. b. Lewis de Leon applies the predictions of the apostles concerning Antichrist to him. III. 772. b. Some hold him to be Antichrist, and appropriate to him the number 666, in the Revelations. 733. A book intitled, the Jés of Mabomet demolished. I. 326.

Mabomet

- Mahomet II. His letter to Pope Pius II. I. 54. b. Reproached with illegitimacy. 338.
- Mahometans, their religion suffers a great calamity. I. 49. a. Cannot think it possible that a man of their sectaries call themselves men of truth. 52. a. Whether it be true that their women have no hopes of entering into Paradise. IV. 34. b. 35. a. b. Are greatly alarmed by a certain prediction. 43. a. b. 44. a. b. 45. a. Leave legacies to an unknown Prophet, who is to come and deliver the world from the tyranny of Antichrist. 123. a.
- Mahometism honours the assumption of virgins as well as the Romish Church does. III. 17. b. Must be destroyed very soon, according to the prophecies of a great many persons. IV. 43. a. b. 44. a. b. 45. a. Through what motives these prophecies were published. 44. b. 45. a. There is some reason to wonder that it should be so little advantageous to the female sex. 48. b. The influence which that sex had upon its foundation. ibid.
- Maid: the advantages of a maid above a widow. I. 393. a. b. Old maids are pleased with telling that they have been courted for marriage. II. 109. b. The Greeks and Romans called a married woman, or one that had children, by that name. 140. b. Whether maids should be allowed to marry very young. III. 965. b. The Romans would not suffer them to be present at feasts. 966. a. b. Signs by which one may know whether a woman that passes for a maid has had any children. IV. 52. a. b. 53. a. b. c. See Ladies. A maid, when she is deflowered, is like palled wine that has lost its value. III. 112. a. What Agur says about a maid. II. 369. b.
- Maid of honour to a Queen, is a function very difficult to execute. III. 832.
- Maid of Orleans, her history. III. 336. a. b. 337. a.
- Mayenne (Duke of) makes himself the strongest in the council of the League. III. 297. a. b.
- Mayer (John Frederic), Professor of Divinity, his Disertation upon Catherine Bore. II. 76. a. b. 77. a. Cited. I. 730. a. n. (37). 732. a.
- Maimbourg, a great falsity of his. I. 709. b. Censured on what he says concerning Beza. 795. a. n. (80). Anachronisms of this author. II. 17. a. His violence against the Calvinists in relation to Cayet. 244. b. Is guilty of a great fault, in point of Chronology, concerning Gregory the Great. III. 219. a. Animadverts upon a fault of Peter du Moulin concerning the same Pope. ibid. and b. His character. 224. b. Confutes a falsity of Davila's, in relation to the Duke of Guise, that was murdered at the castle of Blois. 292. b. 293. a. An exceptionable witness in whatever concerns the Protestants. 397. a. Censured injudiciously by the author of the News from the Republic of Letters, in relation to the hatred which the ladies bore Henry III. 405. b. 406. a. Stuffs in an episode upon the affair of the Regale, in his history of Lutheranism. 454. b. 455. a. Censured in relation to John Sigismund. 533. b. Is mistaken in a notable fact concerning Luther's burial. 947. a. Falls into the same contradiction with Paul Jovius, whom he transcribes, concerning the Atheism of Mahomet II. IV. 52. b. Censured in relation to the mischiefs which the Greeks suffered under Mahomet II. 55. a. b. Has not acquitted himself like a faithful Historian, with regard to Joan I, Queen of Naples. 304. a. b. Is by no means exact in what he says of Ochinus. 388. b. Criticized in relation to those among the Calvinists that were accused of having betrayed their cause. 924. b. And in relation to Lelius Socinus. V. 167. b. A passage of his History of Calvinism examined. 474. a. b. 475. a. b. Censured and defended, touching the manuscripts and the editions of Martinus Polonus. IV. 709. a. b.
- Maimonides (Moses) shews himself too nice in rejecting the proofs of the unity of God alledged by the sect of the speakers. V. 828.
- Maine (la Croix du), Daurat's opinion of his works. II. 617. b.
- Mainferme (Father de la), a She-Pope would find her apology in that which he has made for the founder of Fontevraud. III. 63. a.
- Major (John) writes verses against the Divines of Wittenberg, for which he is expelled the university. III. 972. b.
- Majorca (James, Infant of), his wife causes his head to be struck off for adultery. IV. 302. a. b.
- Maire de Belges (John le) quoted. III. 609. a. b. 645. a. IV. 156. a. b. Teaches Marot the elision of the e feminine. ibid. b. 163. b.
- Maitland (John), Chancellor of Scotland, hinders the Bishop of Dublin from succeeding in his negotiation for the marriage of James VI, with the Infanta of Spain. II. 577. William Criton endeavours to engage Robert Bruce to kill him, but cannot bring it about. ibid.
- Malatesta (Paula), a lady of learning. III. 185. a.
- Maldonat censured for the wrong he does the Calvinists in saying that their principles lead to Atheism. V. 440. a. b. 441. a. b. 445. a. Sent to Metz to make profelytes. IV. 921.
- Malefactors, there is not an Atheist to be found among so many who pass through the hangman's hands. V. 813.
- Malherbe, a mistake of his imitated by Sarrazin, and corrected in the latter by Menage. I. 80. b. 81. a. Expresses himself like one who is well satisfied that Achilles had but one preceptor. 78. b. Introduces the god of the Seine cursing Marfial d'Ancres. II. 543. a. Never praised, nor hardly esteemed any body. III. 855. a. A blunt expression of his concerning a book of Meziriac's. IV. 208. a. b. Would have been offended at some verses where Boileau mentions him. 596. b. On what account he was most inconsolable. 82. b. V. 384. a. His epitaph. 402. b.
- Mallebranche, his doctrine that our ideas are distinct from our understanding, and that we see all things in God, is an antient one. I. 255. It is Democritus's doctrine unfolded and mended. II. 642. b. He establishes a principle of which Chrysippus had given the first draught. 496. b. 497. a. Refutes those who deny the creation. 789. b. What he says of the existence of bodies. V. 614. a. b.
- Malo, a Minister, refuses to administer the sacrament to the lady of Montpensier. III. 864. b. And why. ibid.
- Mamaca, an imaginary castle into which it is said the Kings of the Merovingian race retired through slothfulness. II. 744. a.
- Mamiliani, there were two faints of that name, according to Marafcia. IV. 98.
- Man: the Pagans owned that man was composed of two parts, each of which re-unites itself to its principle. I. 275. a. b. The opinion of some Philosophers concerning the formation of the first men. 416. a. b. II. 411. a. b. 412. a. b. III. 649. a. b. 650. a. b. 651. a. It is the nature of man to run into extremes. I. 527. a. In what manner he may be defined. II. 126. a. Men sold very cheap. 303. b. How diversified by the laws of the union of soul and body. 451. b. 452. a. b. They give their neighbours false reasons for their conduct, reserving the true ones to themselves. 726. b. Man is an undisciplinable animal. 832. b. To how high a degree men are wicked. III. 469. a. Their passions render the finest systems of politics useless. ibid. By what method a man may become a god. IV. 572. b. Man is like a little republic, that changes its Magistrates often. 657. b. His state and condition is one of the most incomprehensible mysteries. 187. a. 468. a. b. His deplorable condition. V. 230. a. 287. a. Suffers a perpetual conflict within himself. IV. 440. a. b. 441. a. Whether he be less perfect than the plants, as to the manner of producing his like. V. 4. a. b. Nothing is more mortifying than to consider that one is a man. 145. a. b. 146. a. His prerogatives described by Socrates. 583. b. 584. a. Great men do not like to speak of their mean extraction. I. 256. a. b. Their memory fails them very often. 369. b. The stars of some men have power to immortalize a story, however improbable it be. II. 7. a. Men deserve satire more than women. V. 426. b. 427. a. The two handles by which man is moved, are the fear of punishment, and the desire of reward. 812.
- Mancionus (Jerom), Cesar Borgia orders his tongue to be cut out for his satirical strokes. IV. 90. b.
- Mandeville, the account of his travels is fabulous. I. 46. b. 471. b.

Manducation

- Manducation* (oral), J. Poinet does not allow of it, though he allows of the word Transubstantiation. IV. 693. a. b.
- Manducis*, what use the Romans made of that word. I. 63. b.
- Manes* fled alive, and why. IV. 90. b. 91. a.
- Mania*, a goddess to whom children were sacrificed. II. 163. b. Her effigy hung up at the doors of the house to avert dangers. ibid. Prefixed at births. ibid.
- Manichei* revive one of the principal tenets of Zoroaster. I. 444. Become powerful under the name of Paulicians. IV. 512. Are grievously persecuted. ibid. Their Heresy spreads itself into all the parts of Europe. ibid. They cannot easily be refuted, except by reasons à posteriori. 512, 513. and a. An explanation, as to what the author had said concerning them. V. 815. to 829. Their objections are unanswerable, so long as they are discussed only at the bar of reason. 815. Why the author has not refuted them. 825. People cannot but abhor their hypothesis: it goes upon a supposition which is repugnant to our most distinct ideas. ibid. 829. Their doctrine is destructive of all religions. 827. Reasonings against their tenets. ibid. and 828, 829. Objections of Simplicius. 826, 827.
- Manicheism* arose from the contrariety of passions which toils and pull men sometimes one way, sometimes another. III. 261. a. People have been surprized to find it said, that they could raise puzzling objections. IV. 187. a.
- Manilius* degraded. IV. 755. a. 757. a.
- Manlike*, proofs of their bad taste. III. 433. a. b. 434. a.
- Manlius* expelled from the Senate by Cato, and for what reason. I. 40. b.
- Manlius*, how he believed that the gods assist us. V. 373. a.
- Manners*, whether they change with our fortunes. IV. 571. a. b.
- Manfield* (Count), how delivered from the trouble of a most unlucky marriage. III. 696. a. b.
- Manfur*, whether he is the same with Mefue. II. 587. b.
- Mante*: the conference of Mante between Perron and Berault. I. 756.
- Mantineans*, what sort of laws they had, and who it was that framed them. II. 654. b. 655. a.
- Manius*, by whom founded. IV. 98. b.
- Manneville* put for Esmandreville. II. 828. b.
- Manuanns*, his poem intitled Alphonius, what it is. V. 157. b.
- Manutius* (Aldus), an inscription which he caused to be put upon the door of his study. V. 521. b. Censured touching the cause of Ovid's disgrace. IV. 443. b. 444. a. And touching the time of his death. 447. a.
- Manutius* (Paulus), refutation of his opinion concerning the meaning of this phrase, Querre conditiones. III. 116. b. 117. a. b. Is under a mistake when he says that Atius and his daughter were not of Aricia. IV. 397. a. Troubles which his daughter brought upon him. V. 241. a.
- Manuscripts* are the sport of fortune. I. 525. a. IV. 833. b. People alter the reading of manuscripts, according to the model of their own understandings. I. 543. b. Some ancient ones do not contain all that is to be found in others, and yet no blanks have been left in them. II. 572. b. Catalogue of those of the Emperor's library at Vienna. III. 707. b. Application of Peraxylus in the search of them. IV. 544. Consideration on the causes of their difference. 710. a. b. &c. Are corrupted by additions and subtractions. 710. a. Want of sincerity does not always occasion their difference; several innocent causes may contribute towards it. 711. b. A rule whereby to judge whether they are altered from motives of interest. ibid.
- Manuscripts of the Scriptures* altered and corrupted by the Heretics. III. 733.
- Mar*, the signification of that word. I. 51. b.
- Marais* (Mr), extrañs communicated by him to the author, concerning the affront which the Queen of Navarre received. IV. 341. a. b.
- Marble*, a dispute betwixt Arnauld and Jurieu, whether it may be worshipped. III. 100. b. 101. a. b.
- Marca*, the judgment which has been passed on him with regard to one of his books. IV. 100. b.
- V O L. V.
- Marcellus* (Claudius-Marcus) his untimely death, Virgil's reflexion thereupon. III. 921. b. His elogy, and the consequence inferred from it. ibid.
- Marcellus*, by his venerable presence hinders the common people from killing the Heretic Manes. IV. 111. a.
- Marcellus Ficinus* sends an account of himself from the other world. II. 65. b. 66. a.
- Marcion*, neither he nor his followers did well understand the strength and weakness of the orthodox. IV. 113. a.
- Marcus Aurelius* (Emperor), the spurious life of that Prince by Guevara. II. 770. a. III. 270. a. b. Fausto da Longiano writes a criticism upon it. ibid. b. And promises a life of M. Aurelius, composed from the testimony of the ancient Historians. ibid.
- Mare Historiarum*, or the sea of histories, a work under that title composed by John Columna. II. 529. a. b. Called by mistake Mater Historiarum, and the mother of histories. ibid. a. Divers things have been inserted into it, and the economy of it has been changed. ibid. b.
- Marefol*, for what things he was indebted to the profession of Phylis. IV. 504. b. 505. a.
- Mares*, their excessive lust. V. 768. Some ladies pass a whole night in watching a mare. 773. Mares that took wind, and which people believed to be with foal. 771. a. b. 772. a. b.
- Marefus* (Samuel), his method of teaching, and his authority. I. 242. Prolegomena of his dispute against Daillé. II. 583. a. b. 584. a. b. His Hydra Socinianismi expugnata. V. 505. b. &c. Blames the English for their indulgence to the Socinians. 506. b.
- Mareft* (John des) a visionary, his tricks to draw another visionary into a snare. IV. 268. a. b. 269. a.
- Margaret of Anjou*, Queen of England, falls into the hands of a company of highway-men. II. 131. a.
- Margaret de Valois*, Queen of Navarre, sister to Francis I, intercedes for a Franciscan who had preached against her. III. 623. a. Transformed into a Fury in a comedy. IV. 318. b. Her Heptameron. 321. b. 322. a. b. Her Heroism. 323. a. b.
- Margaret*, sister to Henry II, and wife to the Duke of Savoy, was a learned woman, and loved learned men. III. 200. b. Suspected to have imbibed the new opinions. 397. b. 398. a. Suspected likewise to have feigned herself with child. 398. a. She bubbles the court of France very advantageously for her husband the Duke of Savoy. ibid. and b. Every body murmurs at it. ibid. b.
- Margaret de Valois*, Queen of Navarre, sister to Charles IX, was very averse to the marrying Henry IV, by reason of the difference of religion. IV. 333. b. Her temper. 334. a. b. Common fame makes her loved criminally by two of her brothers. 335. a. b. Almost did the office of a midwife to her husband's mistresses. 336. a. The counter-artifice which she employed against Catherine de Medicis. III. 419. b. Her gallanting humour. IV. 339. b. 340. a. b.
- Margaret*, daughter to the Emperor Maximilian, who was her actual husband. III. 323. a.
- Marianna*, a tragedy which cost a Player his life. V. 400. a.
- Marianus Scotus*, what he says of the She-Pope. IV. 725, 726, 727, 728. Many think that he is the first who spoke of the She-Pope; others maintain he said nothing about her. 727. b. 728. a. From what manuscript the edition of Marianus was printed. ibid.
- Mary Stuart*, Queen of Scotland, how we ought to judge of the fautes that were wrote against her. II. 181. a. That which encourages historical Pyrrhonism in relation to her adventures. 282. a. b. Buchanan publishes a book concerning her leudness. V. 857.
- Mary of Burgundy* had a desire to be married to the Dauphin of France. III. 805. a. Dies of a fall from her horse at hunting. II. 222. b.
- Mary de Medicis*, Queen of France, scruples raised in the mind of Lewis XIII, with relation to the hardships exercised towards that Princess. II. 400. a. b. Those who formed factions with her were altogether inexcusable. IV. 143. b. Answer which the causes to be published. 256. a.

- Mary Magdalene*, whether she be the same with Mary the sister of Lazarus, and the woman who was a sinner. III. 47. b. 48. a.
- Marindal*, Marshal Turenne is defeated there. IV. 917. b.
- Marigni* gives testimonies very favourable to the Prince of Condé's virtue. II. 137. b. The infidelity which he attributes to a governor of the Low-Countries, with respect to the ladies. V. 421. b.
- Marillac*, Keeper of the Seals, second Cardinal Beaulieu in opposing Cardinal Richelieu's design of humbling the House of Austria. I. 786. a.
- Marillac* (Marshal de) whether he was put to death for any other cause, than his having displeased Cardinal Richelieu. III. 818. a. b. IV. 141. a. b. 142. a. b. 143. a. b. &c.
- Marini* (Chevalier) his thought concerning the spots in the moon. I. 113. b.
- Marius* (Hieronymus Vicentius) the fictitious name that Massarius gives himself, and which Placcius has not mentioned. IV. 173. a.
- Marlorat* makes Indexes for Calvin's Institution. V. 88. a.
- Marolles* (the Abbé de) translates Ovid's Poem against His into French, and accompanies it with notes. IV. 452. b. Dedicates this translation to James Pinon, and a long passage in praise of that man. 651. a. b.
- Mars* declares that he had learned in Italy never to speak of God. IV. 154. a. b. Whether the Protestants ought to be reproached with the public use of his version, supposing he had been punished for his adulteries. 154. b. 155. a. What Cayet says of him is not probable. 154. b. His false prophecy. II. 29. b. 30. a.
- Marpurg*: when the university of Marburg was founded. III. 709. b. n. (10). And when opened. 148. b.
- Marry*: whether a wife man ought to marry. I. 633. b. Formerly people were prohibited to marry after a certain age. 120. a. Those who marry a second time excluded from the ministry by the canons. II. 174. b.
- Marriage* joined with continency. I. 34. a. What is its principal character. ibid. and b. Formerly the Legislators prohibited it to women of fifty, and men of sixty years of age. 120. a. Its efficacy. 223. a. b. 446. a. b. What it is a remedy for. 390. b. 391. a. Gives an opportunity of making experiments. 549. b. 550. a. Sentiments of Socrates, Diogenes, and Euripides, concerning marriage. 549. a. b. Reflexion upon the beauty and riches, or the ugliness and poverty of the woman that one designs to marry. 549. b. 550. a. b. A false dilemma against marriage. II. 13. b. 14. a. Whether it is forbidden to make choice of a handsome wife. 72. a. b. 73. a. Whether it was a recommendation among the party, at the beginning of the Reformation. 174. b. 175. a. III. 13. a. b. 14. a. b. Is a necessary troublesome state. II. 384. a. Speech of Metellus to recommend marriage. ibid. The Athenian laws allowed a man to marry his sister by the father, and forbid him his sister by the mother, the Lacedæmonian laws permitted the latter, and prohibited the former. 503. a. b. 504. a. b. Several extravagant fancies concerning the marriage of Adam and Eve. 853. a. b. Delusion of Heretics that professed to abstain from it. III. 63. b. The Theory of it is well known before a woman be marriageable. 187. a. Whether it is convenient and proper for Philosophers. 382. b. The Divinity that presided over it, according to the Poets. 641. a. b. A custom relating to it which was observed among some nations. 773. a. b. Strange superstition of the Roman ladies, in seeking after omens for marriage. IV. 200. b. 201. a. Is sometimes to irksome, that a man to free himself from it would go to the end of the world. 313. b. Clandestine marriages should be declared void. 636. a. b. 637. a. The Canon-Law countenances the abuses of marriage. 748. a. b. Those who marry a poor wife to be quiet at home, do not obtain their ends. 753. a. Reflexion on its consequences. 844. a. b. Reflexion on St Paul's words, wherein he seems to command the Bishops to marry. 856. b. 857. a. Could not be contracted between brother's and sisters by adoption.
- V. 49. b. Scandalous customs which were observed in relation to it. 129. b. 130. a. b. 131. a. b. What are the inconveniences of marriage. 425. a. b. 426. a. b. Whether it be a good remedy against incontinence. 426. a. It is dangerous to men of learning. 604. a. Edict of Henry II, concerning clandestine marriages. IV. 636. a. b. Is the most difficult of all things to determine with judgment. I. 603. a. The impatience of youth hurries us into it without reflexion. ibid. It is necessary to begin with earnest prayer, when we deliberate upon a point so nice and hazardous. ibid. b. William Bigot promises a treatise to prove the necessity of marriage. ibid. a. A discourse on the marriage of men of learning, by Claudius Badiet. ibid. a. b. This discourse full of good instructions. ibid. b. And translated into French by Guy de la Gard. 604. a. b. A common argument, that marriage divers too much from study. III. 344. a. It does not deaden the spirits nor slacken the hands. ibid. There ought to be marriage-makers in a well ordered commonwealth. 529. b. Leontium wrote a book against Theophrastus, because he had published several good things relating to marriage. 779. Fine pieces on the subject of marriage, must displease a Courtisan. ibid. b. The answer which some ladies made to those that proposed a second marriage to them. III. 189. a. 191. a. b. 192. a. Those who gave their daughters in marriage, demanded a wedding-present from their sons-in-law. IV. 180. b.
- Marriages*: the primitive Christians declared strongly against second marriages. I. 533. a. b. That which St Jerome said against them. III. 192. a. They have been subject formerly, and are still to canonical penalties. ibid. b. Sentences against second marriages. IV. 747. a.
- Married*. The first woman in Peloponnesus that was married a second time. III. 194. The advantage of those that are ill-married. II. 14. a. Whether those who are not married study better, and write more good books than those that are. V. 524. b. &c.
- Marrow*, vin. whether lions have any. I. 76. a. b. It is in the marrow, that the specific parts of the animal are contained. ibid. b.
- Mars* was the Patron of the countries which the Alains inhabited. I. 177. b. In what action the Romans pretended that this god had fought victoriously for them. III. 1. b.
- Marjaglia*, the success of that battle is not doubtful, Marshal de Catinat gained it. IV. 211. a.
- Marquises*. A poisoning liquor was kept there for those who wanted to kill themselves. V. 628. a. b. The people of Marfeilles could not but know what Narbonne was. I. 11. b. They rejoiced at Cæsar's having ordered a sacred wood to be cut down, thinking that so great an impiety would not remain unpunished. II. 418. b. A profane thought of Lucan's with regard to this. ibid. They were inspired with greater reverence and fear for their unknown deities, than for those whom they fancied they knew. 678. a. They are questioned concerning Britain. I. 10. a. IV. 677. a. b.
- Marsus* (Octavius) a wretched Roman Senator. II. 680. b. 681. a.
- Martean* (Peter) observation concerning the books printed by that chimerical Printer. II. 441. b.
- Martel* (Charles) and his son Pepin found it a very hard matter to subdue the Duke of Aquitaine. I. 16. a. The suspicion of having invited the Saracens into France, should fall upon him rather than upon this Duke. ibid. and b. It has been publicly affirmed that he was damned. III. 707. b.
- Martel*, Professor of Divinity at Montauban. II. 518.
- Martia* goes to Cato, after Hortensius's death, to whom Cato had lent her, and intreats him to take her again. III. 495. b.
- Martia*, punished with the utmost rigour, for having violated her veital vow. III. 830. a. b.
- Martial* supposes a false fact in relation to Catullus. II. 395. b. 396. a. Justly laughs at the behaviour of Cato with regard to the Floral Games. III. 54. a. n. (9). A Venetian Gentleman burns his works in a solemn manner, as a sacrifice to the Manes of Catullus. IV. 433. a. Martial's wish in relation to a wife. 793. a. Who was the first that

- that took it into his head, to clear him of his obscenities. V. 136. a. b. Navagiero had a great aversion against him. IV. 315.
- Martin* (John) a famous Physician. I. 171. 172.
- Martin* (St) refuses to communicate with some Bishops, and why. IV. 781. and b. He yields to it at last, and why. ibid.
- Martin* (Bernardin) author of several books on Physic, also wrote a relation of his travels. V.
442. b.
- Martyr* (Peter) conforms himself for some time to Bucer's ambiguous way of speaking, concerning the Eucharist, but at last leaves it. II. 177. b.
178. a. His account concerning Caraccioli, different from that of Beza. 313. b. Invited into England to assist in the Reformation. IV. 381. b.
His Common-places compared with Calvin's Institution. V. 86. b.
- Martyrdom* is a doubtful sign that truth is on the side of that religion, which it is suffered for. IV. 108.
b. 109. a. b. 110. a. b. &c.
- Martyrology*, there are some Anabaptists in that of Geneva. I. 287. b.
- Martyrs*, many pious frauds are handed about concerning their death. I. 780. a. There is one who was a Comedian. IV. 487. b. n. (37). The origin of the false legends of martyrs. V. 432. a. b. &c.
Disorders which happened in their churches, whilst the Faithful were assembled there. 472. a. Acts of the Protestant martyrs published by Claudius Ba-duel. I. 603. Savonarola has been looked upon as one. V. 66. b. 67. a. Whether he deserves that title. 69. a. b. Some Protestants give it him.
ibid. The public records ought to be carefully consulted before such and such a person, is declared to be a martyr. 70. a. b. & seq.
- Martius* goes from the burial of his son to the Senate. I. 683. a.
- Mascati*. The advantage which its inhabitants have over the other Mahometans. IV. 48. a. b.
- Masi*, called the public error, and by whom. II.
252. b. Whether those who have no faith in it may be present at it, as at a Comedy. IV. 391. a.
It is the Lord's Supper disguised, which has turned a Nun. ibid. What Stuppanus thought of it.
V. 247. a. b. A book intitled the Anatomy of the Masi. 461. a. b.
- Massacre* of St Bartholomew. See Bartholomew.
- Masso* (Papyrius) ill translated by le Laboureur. V.
592. b.
- Mathematicians* are not commonly well versed in the knowledge of matters of fact. III. 461. a. They are not very devout. IV. 487. b.
- Mathematics*: persons that learned Mathematics without any one's reading lectures to them in that science. IV. 61. a. b. 63. b. Have their defect as well as other sciences. V. 621. a. Their object.
622. a. b.
- Matbias* (Corvinus) King of Hungary, invited all sorts of learned men to come to him without excepting the Magicians. II. 68. a. Roughly treated by Bonfinius. 67. b. 68. a.
- Matilda* (Countess) her liberality to the Popes. III.
593. a.
- Matignon* puts a garrison into Bazas, and some other places near Nerac, where the King of Navarre resided. IV. 341. a.
- Matrimonial duty*, precepts concerning it. I. 504. a.
b. 505. a. b. II. 80. b. 81. a. 447. b. Whether it was superseded and suspended in the ark. 431.
a. b.
- Matrons* (sworn) curious attestations made by them, in obedience to an order of the judges. III. 581.
a. b. 582. a.
- Matter*, a comparison of its three dimensions with the Trinity. I. 29. b. What Philosopher supposed first that an intelligence put it into motion. 299. a. b.
Those who maintain it to be increased, are very much puzzled. 300. a. III. 447. a. b. Is uncapa-ble of thinking. II. 661. b. 662. a. b. III. 649.
a. b. 650. a. b. 651. a. 790. b. 791. a. b. IV.
718. a. b. 719. a. b. All the Philosophers of antiquity believed it to be increased. II. 786. b. V.
218. a. Upon the supposition of its eternal existence, natural Philosophers cannot admit of a providence, without reasoning worse than those that deny it. II. 786. b. 787. a. Aristotle acknowledges the supposition of its eternal motion to be absurd. 787. b. Had a real defect, according to
- the Platonics, which was an obstacle to God's project. 788. a. b. Had likewise, according to the same Platonics, a soul before the formation of the world. 792. b. If it is self-existent, we cannot well conceive that God either could or should give it motion. IV. 436. b. And if it moved itself independently of God, there is no need for employing him in the construction of the world. 437. a.
Whether physical evils be an unavoidable effect of the disposition of matter. 525. a. b. Whether one can comprehend that it is eternal and distinct from God, and that it was created out of nothing. V.
211. b. 212. a. b. In what sense divisible in inf-initum. 609. a. b. Absurdity of this opinion. 611.
b. Its existence cannot be proved by any good demonstration. 614. a. b. 615. a.
- Matthias* (St) the apostle, his election burlesqued in the Acts of the Apostles in rhyme. II. 478. a. b.
479. a. b.
- Matthieu* (Peter) his reflexions upon the holy Scripture, in relation to the conference of Ratisbon. III.
536. a.
- Matthias*, it is believed that Faustus de Longiano had translated Dioctrides before him. III.
861.
- Mauvoix*, his French French version of Sanderus's History of the Schism of England, is a very polite one, and has undergone three editions. V.
43. a.
- Maurice*, Emperor of Constantinople, is delivered to Phocas. III. 222. a. b.
- Maurice*, Landgrave of Hesse, makes verses in honour of the youth, who took the degree of Bachelor.
II. 818. a. What healths he drank with other Princes. ibid. and b.
- Mausoleum*, was one of the seven wonders of the world.
I. 524. and a.
- Mausiac* censures Dalechamp justly upon the translation of a passage of Athenæus. II. 558. a. 563. b.
- Maximilian* I, deceived by Pope Leo X. III. 540.
a. Fights a duel. IV. 184. a.
- Maxims* clash with each other no less than errors and truth. I. 784. b. II. 27. b. A collection of some. IV. 778. a. b.
- Maxims of state*. Their appurtenances. I. 682. a.
- Maximus* is defeated by Theodosius, and killed by the soldiers at Aquileia. IV. 781. b.
- Maximus Tyrius*, what he relates concerning Achilles, and the place where he resided. I. 85. a. His explication of the origin of evil. IV. 525.
a. b.
- Maxarins* (the Duchefs of) an expression in her memoirs imitated, and properly applied. II. 692.
a. b.
- Maxarins* (Cardinal) desires to be acquainted with Amyraut. I. 264. a. b. One of his maxims. 619.
b. Justified as to the accusation of having made an auction of books in the palace d'Estree. IV. 172.
a. b. Used to spin out the execution of his promises to a great length of time. 417. a. His readiness to forgive an injury. 808. a. Why he did not answer all the letters which were wrote to him.
V. 94. b. 95. a. Would not be complimented with a false genealogy. 469. a. b. Causes Father Caussin to be banished into Britany. II.
403. There was not one story which people did not believe, when it defamed him. IV.
511. a.
- Meaux* (the Bishop of) seems to have transcribed a passage of Mr Daille, and made it the principle of one of his books. II. 583. a. V. 294. a. See Bosquet. A passage of his examined. II. 708. a. b.
A reflexion of his. III. 390. b. Upon the prodigal son. V. 534. b. Takes a great deal of pains to set forth the alterations of the Lutheran confession. II. 122. b.
- Mecca*, who began to build its temple. I. 46. a. And who profaned and laid it waste. 48. 49. Upon what model the Oratory of the temple of Mecca was built. 46. a. A stone which hung in the air there. 49. 124. b. 125. a. b.
- Mechanics*, a surprizing effect of that science. I. 474.
a. b.
- Mechlinius* was a disciple of Albertus Magnus. IV.
940. b. His opinion concerning the deluge. ibid.
941. a. b.
- Medals*, there are authors who forge false ones. III.
195. b. Medals which have two faces upon the same neck, what they signify. V. 314. a.

Mide

- Mede* (Joseph), a Visionary: his prophetic calculations seem inspired to Jurieu. II. 124. b. 125. a.
- Medea*, what she did with her children. II. 874. a.
- The enchantment which she used in order to make people young again. IV. 533. a. b. 534. a.
- Mediana*, how a priest of that village behaved himself in the sedition that was raised in Castille. IV. 457. a. b.
- Mediators* sometimes hurt the parties which they endeavour to reconcile. I. 578. a. b.
- Medicus* (Cardinal John de) diverted himself with the feuds of the learned. I. 202. a. Was but fifteen years of age when he was named to the Cardinalate. II. 97. a. By what accident he was chosen Pope. III. 761. and a. b.
- Medicus* (Cardinal Julian de), a conspiracy is formed against him. IV. 11. b.
- Medicus* (Lorenzo de) filled with confusion and despair, how, and for what. IV. 232. b. 233. a. His library. III. 729. a. b. 730. a. He, and his brother Julian attacked by assassins in a church, in the middle of divine service. V. 157. a. b. J. Savonarola sent for to prepare him for death. 57.
- Medicus* (Peter de), what he did to make his equipage appear the more magnificent. III. 151. b. Contrives a plot against the government. IV. 346. and a. b. Persons that were executed for being concerned in it. ibid. a. b. Driven out of Florence. V. 59. a.
- Medicus* (Alexander de), Duke of Florence, assassinated. V. 251. b. 252. a. And when. IV. 379.
- Medicus* (Catherine de) cured of her barrenness, and how. III. 24. and a. Her husband's liberality in rewarding this cure. ibid. Causes the Duke of Alençon, and the King of Navarre to be kept at Vincennes, and why. III. 416. b. 417. a. Did not punish the debauchery of her maids of honour, but the want of art to conceal it. 832. a. b. 833. a. Was very near being a Calvinist. V. 186. a. b. Bore with fatires. 760, 761. Despised injurious reflections. IV. 278. b. Introduces the first Rucellai into France. 410. Frightened with a sermon of de Menot's. V. 298. a. Banishes the lady de Mortemart for having given her advice. ibid.
- Medicus* (Mary de), during the four years of her Regency, she never killed, not so much as once, the King, her son. IV. 544. b. Distrusted by her son. III. 816. a. Jealous of her authority. IV. 143. b. Rinuccini, a gentleman of Florence, in love with her. 878. a.
- Medina* (Michael) suspected for having defended Ferrus. III. 43. b. 44. a. Retrenches several things from the writings of that Franciscan. 44. a. b.
- Megabyzus* reproved for having talked of a thing which he did not understand. I. 367. a.
- Magrin* (St), by whom assassinated, and why. III. 296. a. b.
- Melchiorius*, his collections concerning tyranny. IV. 564. a. n. (26).
- Meynier*, the Jesuit, an harangue which he was thought to be the author of. II. 877. a. b. Accuses the gentlemen of Port-Royal of holding intelligence with Geneva. V. 16. b.
- Melac*, whether he had a dog that was a familiar spirit. I. 151. a. Suspected of dealing with the Devil. III. 718. b. A witty answer which he made in relation to this. ibid. His behaviour at the siege of Landau. 720. a. b. 721. a. b.
- Melampus*, how he acquired the gift of understanding the language of birds. II. 340. a. IV. 182. a. V. 381. b.
- Melanchthon*, whether it became him to divert himself with jests and banters. III. 954. a. Was of a peaceable disposition. IV. 185. b. 186. a. b. 187. a. b. 188. a. b. 189. a. b. Determines to retire into Palestine. 188. b. His opinion concerning Grace, was contrary to that of Luther and Calvin. V. 151. a. b. 152. a. b. Wished to die. 250. b. Prints the Confession of Augsburg in Latin and German, and varies from the original. II. 122. a. The long friendship between him and Simon Grynaeus. III. 255. Pezelius publishes some extracts of his works, in which he puts the objections and answers in a very good method, and interlards some short observations. IV. 606. b.
- Melanopus*, an Athenian, suffered himself to be gained over to Callistratus by money, and said to the people, that he submitted to him for the good of the public. II. 259, 260.
- Melissus* could not have answered the objections of Zoroaster against those who acknowledged but one principle of all things. IV. 519. a. Argument which he made use of against the existence of motion. V. 615. b. 616. a. b.
- Melchiorites*, an imaginary sect. IV. 193.
- Melchites*, a name which the Eutyrians gave the Catholics, and for what reason. IV. 349. b.
- Mellerstat*, a celebrated Physician to Frederic, Elector of Saxony. V. 562. a. b.
- Melos*, all the people of that island had the reputation of being Atheists, and why. II. 653. a. b.
- Melvil* quoted. V. 273. a.
- Melus*, Amyot was mortified at that city. I. 256. b. Some Prelates and Doctors assemble there to prepare the instructions of those who were to be deputed to the Council of Trent. II. 372. Varillas referred in relation to this assembly. 375. b. 376. a. b.
- Memoirs* of Mr L. C. D. R. published in the year 1687; their author censured. II. 136. a. V. 84. a.
- Memory*: the surprizing memory of Alcander. I. 215. a. That of hearers is to be dreaded by Lawyers who contradict themselves. 352. a. Men of the greatest memory often forget what others remember commonly enough: an instance of this. 551. a. Examples of a great many, who for want of memory were at a stand. II. 191. a. b. People whose memory was much decayed in the last years of their life. 624. b. Persons of a prodigious memory. I. 215. a. II. 22. a. b. 23. a. 265. a. b. 645. b. 646. a. 747. b. 748. a. 769. b. III. 60. a. 491. b. IV. 196. b. 197. a. b. 198. a. 248. a. 289. a. b. 290. a. V. 140. b. Is the first thing that dies in a learned man. IV. 196. b. 197. a. May create us enemies. 248. a. Local memory, to whom the invention of it is ascribed. V. 140. b.
- Men of Letters*, see Authors, Writers, Letters.
- Menage* has made a false observation on Malherbe's Poems. I. 78. b. Justly censures Malherbe for the ambiguity of an expression. 80. b. His genealogy. 168. b. Knew how to make the most of his reading. 441. a. b. Thinks it strange to see a preacher in the pulpit with a hat on his head. II. 93. b. Forms a criticism upon Horace that is very well grounded. 139. and b. Accuses Mr Baillet wrongfully in relation to Daurat's age. 621. a. Quoted as to the proofs produced against Robert d'Arbriffelles. III. 66. b. 67. a. Did not know all the Ecclesiastics who have written love-verses, and of whom he has published a list. 106. and a. b. Says it is false that Father Sirmond ever repented the publishing a letter of Geoffroy of Vendôme to Robert d'Arbriffelles. 66. b. Censures Vossius in relation to the Poet Hermesianax. 779. a. Sounds the alarm against Montmaur. IV. 246. a. 251. a. Excuses himself for having composed a satirical piece. 248. b. Judgment concerning some of his Poems. 250. b. 251. a. Censures Marilius Ficinus with great reason, in relation to Prodicus. 782. b. Bestows two chapters to prove, that Poets, after they have sworn to write no more, do still write on. II. 83. b.
- Menagiana*, those who published it forgot a good jest. I. 605. a. A witty saying in that book. II. 534. b. 535. a. Elogy of that work, and of those who published it. IV. 195. a. b. That collection cited in relation to a congress. 803. a. n. (43). Cited again. V. 112. a. n. (1), (2). What is related there of one Blunet. 381. a. n. (8). A fault in the Continuation of that work. 739, 740. A good many things are miserably confounded there. ibid.
- Menestrier* (Father) cited. III. 302. b. n. (37). IV. 134. a. n. (8). ibid. b. n. (11). V. 269. a. n. (1).
- Menot*, a celebrated Physician, expresses himself in very obscure terms, in his treatise de Sterilitate. III. 920. a. Character of his dissertation upon the Furor Uterinus. V. 799.
- Mennonites*, see Anabaptists.
- Menot*, one of his sermons frightens Catherine de Medicis, and makes her cry. V. 298. a.
- Mentz* receives a French garrison; and the French lose it after a long siege. IV. 211. b. Destroyed by the Pope. V. 541. a.
- Mercerus* understood nothing but Hebrew books. IV. 842. b.

Mercure

- Mercurius Galant*, ignorance of the author of that book. III. 718. b. 719. a.
- Mercurius Swifti*, a book wrote by Frederic Spanheim. II. 551. a. A passage of it concerning the pretended miracles which happened during the siege of Constance. ibid. b.
- Mercurius Historique Et Politique*, its author has acted like an honest man, and ought to be imitated. V. 84. a. b.
- Mercury*, a description of his rod, and its virtues. I. 4. b. 5. a. Gets a woman with child. II. 652. a. b. His memory slips him in a surprizing manner. IV. 542. b.
- Mercurialis* cited. III. 782. b. 783. a.
- Mere* (the Chevalier de), observation upon one of his letters. V. 621. a. b. Cited. III. 374. a. n. (150). 376. b. n. (172).
- Merit* is very often prejudicial to those who aspire to great offices. I. 354. a. 733. b. II. 436. a. Examples of extraordinary merit. I. 580. a. b. 581. a. b. 781. a. b. 782. a. b. The being superior to another in merit, does not make one superior likewise in reputation. 459. a. b.
- Merklinus*, an error of that author's in Lindenius renovatus, touching Myrepsus. IV. 764. b.
- Messias*, according to the Jews, he ought to discern by the smell, whether a person accused be innocent or guilty. I. 650. Whether he is not yet come under the principal characters which the Prophets attribute to him. II. 175. b. A collection of passages which shew, that the ancient Jewish Church believed his Divinity. IV. 880. a. What Laurentius Valla said of him. V. 437. a.
- Messina*, whether it be true that the holy Virgin wrote to the inhabitants of that town. III. 563. a.
- Messias*, his treatise concerning our communion with JESUS CHRIST, translated into Italian by Vincent Paravicin. IV. 471.
- Mesur*, whether he be the same with Mausur. II. 587. b. When, where, and under what name his books were printed. ibid.
- Metamorphosis*, Ovid threw that book into the fire; but there were some copies of it in private hands. IV. 447. b. 448. a.
- Metaphors*: whether there is nothing real in metaphors. II. 434. b.
- Metaphorists*, a chimerical sect. II. 434. b.
- Metapontines*, their sacrifices were esteemed to belong in common to Apollo and Aristeas. I. 459. a.
- Metals* and minerals, how formed in the earth. V. 117. b. 118. a. b.
- Metempsychosis*, some Jews believed it. I. 46. n. (7). Different from that of Pythagoras. 52. a. Is at the bottom the same thing with Spinozism. 52. a. b. Destroys hell. IV. 669. a. Pythagoras learned it of the Egyptians. 674. a.
- Metiharna*, wife of Cinyras, and mother of Adonis. IV. 641.
- Metibodius*, his revelation is a mere invention. I. 23. a.
- Methods*: divers methods of converting Heretics. IV. 373. b. 374. a. b.
- Matx* deprived of its liberty by Henry II. II. 445. b. The King permits the demolishing of its temple. 525. The jurisdiction of the Judges, which were called the Thirteen, is suppressed there. III. 33. a.
- Maurfius* confounds two Pygmalions together. IV. 642. a.
- Mazeral* criticized in relation to the siege of Aiguillon. I. 162. b. 163. a. Judgment of the first and second edition of his abridgment. 319. b. Conduct altogether unworthy of this famous Historian. 794. b. 795. a. Is often mistaken in Christian names. II. 828. b. Rejects, as a mere story, the reason which is alledged why Charles V was not stopped in France. 841. a. His observation upon a quality that recommends us to the fair sex. III. 296. b. 415. b. Is mistaken about Munuza and Abderama. IV. 284. b. Criticized in relation to Joan II, Queen of Naples. 307. a. Perhaps it will be wondered some time hereafter how he came to be so much esteemed. 319. b. His mistake in relation to the Baron du Pont, and the suit of impotency which he had upon his hands. 482. b. 799. a. Censured in relation to the Ducheis of Valentinois. 699. a. b. Injudiciously blamed for obscenity. V. 841. Did not mind politeness of stile. ibid. n. (24).
- Mexiriac* answers weakly to an objection which he raises himself, concerning the praises which Homer bestows upon Penelope. IV. 543. b. Conduct of the author in quoting passages from his writings. V. 805.
- Michael* (Captain), Arquebuser to Charles IX, his behaviour towards the President de la Place. IV. 682. a.
- Mycellus* dies Professor of Greek at Basil, in 1558. V. 589.
- Midwives*, why called Sages-Femmes in French. V. 46. b. A midwife hanged at Paris for having made several women suffer abortion. IV. 498. b. 499. a.
- Migoniti*, a name given to Venus, and why. III. 368. b. A temple built to Venus under that name. ibid.
- Milan* (the Duke of) shut up in an iron cage, without having so much as the comfort of being able to read or write. III. 814. a.
- Milanese* abandoned by the French. III. 611. b.
- Milanese* look upon the Cardinals of the assembly of Pifa with aversion. III. 761. a. Ruin their design of setting themselves at liberty. V. 128. a.
- Milefians* enter into one of the mouths of the Nile, make a descent, and build a wall there. IV. 342. a.
- Miletus*, strange madness of the virgins of that town. I. 19. b.
- Milichius* cited. V. 630. b. n. (12). 783. n. (waw).
- Millenarians* have no other aim than to stir up the people. II. 539. a. Whether their doctrine is conducive to this. IV. 122. b. 123. a. Lose nothing of their credit though they deceive the people a hundred times. II. 539. a.
- Millennium*: Cerinthus's doctrine touching the Millennium. II. 405. a. b. When the reign of the Millennium ought to begin, according to Comenius. 539. a. b.
- Milliaus*, his description of Moses's song. IV. 134. a. b.
- Milo* vexed at losing the strength of his arms. I. 82. a. b.
- Milton*, his toleration-principles. IV. 223. a. b. Excludes the Papists from the benefit of it. ibid. b.
- Mimes*, what they were designed for. III. 695. b.
- Mind* liable to epidemical dilempers as well as the body. I. 19. a. And to strange extravagances. 103. a. III. 315. a. Its inequalities and caprices. II. 210. b. 211. a. b. A particular turn of mind. 317. a. b. 318. b. 319. a. The mind undergoes the same vicissitudes with the body. IV. 689. a. It is not in our power to calm it. 811. a. b. Some heavy minds unfold by little and little. II. 500. b. Whether by denying that Free-thinkers have any strength in their turn of mind, they might be brought to acknowledge it. 452. b.
- Minerva*, the virtue of her rod. I. 5. a. Who educated her. 178. a. How she took revenge upon a woman. 200. Cotys pretends to marry her. II. 557. a. b. Gives advices unworthy of a goddess, to Penelope. IV. 543. b. Miraculous image of this goddess. I. 6. a. b.
- Ministers*, several of them, recommended only by the credit of their eloquence or learning, have married to great advantage. I. 503. a. b. Taken to task whenever they took upon themselves the title of Pastors. 544. a. b. II. 39. b. 40. a. b. In what case it is permitted them to go to war. 433. a. They could not be beloved by their churches, and please the court of France at the same time. ibid. They looked upon all proposals of disputes or conferences, that were made to them in France, as a snare. 520. b. The Missionaries did sooner vex a Minister of great parts and learning, than one of less note. III. 36. a. A passage which has been strained to make the world believe that the Protestants despise them. IV. 288. b. 289. a. Ministers accused of going about a deceitful project. 923. b. 924. a. What qualities Ministers of the Gospel ought to have. I. 241. b. 242. a. b. 321. a. b. II. 200. b. 201. a. b. Nothing can blacken them more than a proud and vindictive spirit. IV. 272. a. b. When those of France began to read the Fathers. I. 756. A book where it is maintained that they have a call to bear arms. ibid. a. b. Are always in the wrong to meddle with politics, but chiefly in a state which is divided into factions. V. 61.

V O L. V.

11 G

Ministers

- Ministers of State*, whatever intrinsic greatness they may have, it is an advantage for them to live at one time rather than at another. II. 414. a. b. Their duty. III. 513. b. 514. a. When they are hated by the people, it is scarce ever believed that those whom they punish are guilty. IV. 20. b.
- Ministry of the Gospel*, they who devote themselves to it stand in need of all their time. I. 321. a.
- Minutius Felix*, what he says of the nature of God. V. 146. a.
- Miracles*, credulity multiplies them, and their multiplication destroys them. I. 87. a. b. The Romish Church has behaved in this respect just like the Pagans. ibid. A mere relation of some miracles makes their falsity evident. 245. The Pagans compared those of JESUS CHRIST with those of Apollonius and Apuleius. 380. b. 382. a. 394. and a. b. A miracle of humility opposed against all the miracles of Lessius. 607. b. What Montagne says of some miracles. II. 149. a. b. A false miracle refuted by an argument which holds as good against the true miracles of Moses and JESUS CHRIST. 587. a. b. One half of the world laughs at the other on this head. IV. 49. a. b. Whether those of the ancient law were produced upon occasion of the will of a creature. 609. b. What we ought to understand by them, and if they are possible. V. 215. b. 216. a. Those which are supposed to have happened during the siege of Constance. II. 551. a. Criticized upon by the author of the Swiss Mercury. ibid. and b. In all religions, people are strangely inclined to think themselves favoured by them. 552. a. There are some Ministers who see a miracle in all events, and who find one every where. ibid. Are an object of faith, and consequently an obscure object. ibid. b. How the Fathers of the Church proved the miracles of the Scripture against the Pagans. III. 578. a. b. 579. a.
- Myrsus* (Nicolas), his antidotary. IV. 764. a. b. Confounded with Nicolas Alexandrinus by Merklinus. ibid.
- Myron*, what he did to obtain favours from a Courtesan which had been already refused to him. III. 705. b. 706. a. b.
- Myrrha*, some say she made use of the artifice of Lot's daughters, in order to lie with her father. I. 113.
- Myrtle* forbid at the feast of the good goddesses. II. 237. a. b.
- Misfortunes*, whether there be any in human life that are not occasioned by imprudence. V. 366. a. b. 367. a. b. 368. a. b. 369. a. b. 370. a. b. 371. a. b. 372. a. b. 373. a. b. That which ought to be ascribed to imprudence is called by this name, and ascribed to fortune. 372. a.
- Misura*, the dogs do not enter into the mosques, nor into the churches of that city. III. 430. b. 431. a.
- Missionaries*, the great length which they go in their knavery. II. 585. a. b. From whence they draw their sharpest invectives against the Protestants. III. 218. a.
- Mysteries*, the greatest part of allegorical mysteries ought to be unknown to the world. I. 40. b. Mysteries exposed to the raileries of profane men, by the impertinence of some Divines. II. 338. b. 339. a. b. Whether the answers of a Divine about mysteries may be as clear as the objections of a Philosopher. 456. b. The explication of them increases their obscurity. 588. b. The Pagans would not suffer them to be divulged. III. 216. b. Whether the rejection of them be a good way to get a great many followers. V. 172. a. What the Pagans said of them. 173. a. Above, or even contrary to, reason. 815. Ought not to be submitted to the rules of natural reason. 816. 829. There would be no more mysteries if reason could solve the difficulties of them. ibid. The Fathers of the Church did not examine them by the principles of Logic and Metaphysics. 817. n. (17). The Catholics and Protestants equally reject reason, in their controversies concerning them. 817, 818. The explanations of mysteries have rather perplexed than cleared them. 819. Neither Heresy nor Heathenism can draw any advantage from the unanswerableness of their objections against mysteries. 825.
- Mysteries* (dramatical), the life of JESUS CHRIST acted and represented by mysteries and personages at Poitiers. II. 104. The mystery of the Acts of the Apostles, and of the Apocalypse printed and acted at Paris. 477. a. b. &c. Full of gross inventions, and expressed after a low manner, they were suffered upon the stage, at the same time that the people were forbidden to read the Bible. ibid. b. 478. a. Devils are very often introduced in them. 478. a. b. 479. a. b. Origin of this kind of theatrical pieces. 480. b. 481. a. b. Italy had public theatres for the representation of these mysteries about the middle of the XVIth century. 481. a. b.
- Mythics* took their unitive way from the Platonists. IV. 690. b. There is no doctrine for which they are so much exclaimed against as for that of consenting to their own eternal damnation. 943. a.
- Mistress*: a lover excuses the imperfections of his mistress. I. 77. a. The address and arts of a mistress between thirty and forty will secure her empire far better than the artless beauty of a girl of fifteen. II. 256. a. b. A lady who would think it a scandal to be a private gentleman's mistress, will glory to be the mistress of a King or Emperor. I. 586. a. Those who marry the mistresses they have dishonoured are nevertheless subject to satire. II. 503. a. Marks of bravery in a lover are very acceptable to a mistress. III. 296. b. 297. a. 415. a. b. The quality of mistress is more grateful than that of wife. 385. a. b. A great many are loved merely for their name and quality. IV. 201. a. b.
- Mythology*: in what manner facts borrowed from the Pagan Mythology ought to be confuted. I. 75. b. 76. a. Is very uncertain. 160. a. b. IV. 180. b. 533. a. b. 534. a. The principal difference betwixt it and our modern romances. III. 465. b.
- Mythological observations*, the author's reasons for those which he has made. V. 805.
- Mythologists*, their most common faults. III. 348. a. b. &c. Their varying from one another. 364. b. 365. a.
- Mithra*, how honoured by the ancient Persians. V. 637. a. b.
- Mithridates*, his treachery. II. 305. b. 306. a.
- Misère* (Francis) gives us the best edition of Marot's works. IV. 163. b. 164. a.
- Mockery*, what that of Ishmael was. I. 123. b. 124. a.
- Mockers* find some subject of ridicule in every thing. II. 117. b.
- Mockers in point of Religion*, a serious refutation does not near so much harm as their jests do. II. 12. b. When they fall sick, they run into another extreme. ibid. 13. a.
- Moderate measures* ordinarily displease both parties. III. 506. b. 507. a.
- Moderns*, a reflexion upon the parallel between the Antients and the Moderns. II. 553. a. b. The difference between them and the Antients, with regard to comedies. IV. 743. a. b.
- Modes* have their ebbing and flowing. II. 544. a.
- Modes*, what the Philosophers understood by that word. V. 221. a.
- Modesty*, a virtue rarely to be found among men of great abilities. I. 717. a. b. Is of no use to the making of one's fortune in the world. III. 624. b. When it is once turned out of doors it seldom returns again. II. 110. a. There is a kind of modesty, which, carried to excess, deserves our admiration. 222. b. Icarus erects a statue to it, and why. IV. 538. a. b. 539. a.
- Modifications* (inconsistent) require distinct subjects. V. 209. a. b.
- Moien de parvenir*, the title of a book cited. III. 386. a. n. (74). IV. 574. a. n. (100).
- Mogis* (Etienne le) goes out of France with leave from the court. II. 42. a. His remarks concerning Scaliger and Salmatius. III. 603. b. 604. a.
- Mole* (la), his crime and punishment. IV. 935. a. b. 936. a. b. &c. His answers when he was put to the rack. 939. b. 940. a. By whom his head was buried. V. 526. a. b.
- Molier*, author of Polixena, assassinated. I. 548. n. (2).
- Molier* preferred to Plautus for his fine turns. I. 283. a. b. His own genius could easily furnish him with incidents. IV. 234. b. 235. a. Cited. V. 485. b. n. (18).

Molinism

- Molinism* opposed by three sorts of people, who, though unwilling to own it, are at the bottom of the same mind. III. 548. a.
- Molinism*, the abjuration which a Monk who was guilty of it was obliged to make. III. 853. a. b. Its conformity with carnal Origenism. IV. 420. b. 421. a.
- Mollerus*, his reflexion against those who make their enemies suspected of Atheism. III. 671. b.
- Monarchy*, the weak side of that form of government. II. 211. a. b. Which a mixed monarchy cannot help. ibid. To be preferred before Democratical government in certain cases. 165. b. 166. a. Compared with a Republic, as to disorders and confusions which may happen. III. 467. a. b. 468. a. Whether it be the public interest that parliaments should have a great deal of authority in a monarchy. 512. b. 513. a. b.
- Monarchy* (French) on the brink of ruin, by the fault of the Princes of the blood. II. 462. b. 463. a. The Queens there preserve almost always the foreign heart which they bring with them. 542. Which has very near overthrown it a great many times. ibid.
- Monarchy of women*, there was a dispute concerning it in the XVIth century. III. 670. a. b.
- Monarchs*, contradictory doctrines concerning their authority. II. 51. b. 52. a. b. Are subject to a furious jealousy towards those of their own blood. 717. a. b. Whether it be a good thing that the power should be divided between them and the great Lords. III. 301. a. b. 302. a. Inconveniences in writing the History of Monarchs lately dead. 334. b. 335. a. Their ill qualities are sometimes compensated with others. 801. b. 802. a. Their passions do not always turn with the wind of their interest. 805. b. When a Monarch is hated by the people, it is scarce ever believed that those whom he punishes are guilty. IV. 20. b. How Monarchs ought to behave themselves, with respect to the punishments which they inflict, and the favours which they distribute. 354. b. 355. a. 573. b. See Princes and Kings.
- Monasteries*, their strange corruption in the XVth century. II. 276. a. b. 277. a.
- Moncaeus* in his travels, names an hundred persons who taught him receipts and secrets for cures. I. 78. b. Cited. 104. a. n. (40). Finds out the cheat of the superior of the Ursulines of Loudun. III. 213. b. 214. a. The idea which he had of God. 471. a.
- Money* compared with pitch. III. 596. a. An unlawful means of getting it. V. 163. b. 164. a. b. A piece of money changed into a serpent, which wreathes itself about a gentleman's neck, and why. III. 487. a. b.
- Monsieur* (Antony) causes Marafia's book concerning the two St Mamilians to be printed. IV. 98. a. b.
- Monks*, what Pliny said of the Essenians is every day applied to them. I. 34. b. There have been some Monks who wore nothing but a girdle, and who made themselves inflexible to women. 112. a. b. The Monks of the XVIth century were ignorant and voluptuous, and would not suffer that any one should study polite literature. 149. b. The habit of a Monk does not alter the inclinations of him that wears it. 345. b. The false zeal of the Monks was the first cause of fabulous traditions. II. 94. a. b. A Monk of St Sabas at Jerusalem, orders one of his disciples to keep a perpetual silence. 587, 588. How he punished him for not observing that order. 588. Good offices which they mutually do one another. III. 87. a. b. Persuade their Devotees to whatever they have a mind. 331. a. Parallel betwixt those of the East and those of the West. 549. a. They have no privileges by virtue of which they ought to refuse to acknowledge the jurisdiction of Bishops. 739. a. What must be done in order to obtain testimonials of a good life from them. 797. a. There is no example of any converted Monk, who continued a bachelor for want of finding a woman whom he might marry. IV. 393. b. Consult the chronicles of their orders with very little judgment. 394. b. Some of their impostures. 393. b. 394. a. b. It does not belong to them to put their hand to the helm of government. V. 61. b. 62. a. b. The life which they led in the convent of St Sulpice at Belley, and the difficulties which the Bishop of that city met with, in endeavouring to make them reform it. I. 737. b. 738. n. b. 739. a. b. There have been Monks who have passed whole nights with women, in order to get a complete victory over their concupiscence. III. 66. a. b.
- Monkey*, what Cardinal was called by that name, and for what reason. III. 616. a.
- Monks*, sometimes smother their young ones with caresses. I. 113. b. A fable of a monkey. IV. 600. a. b.
- Montard* the Historian, a passage which he had been forced to suppress, is restored. III. 413. a. b.
- Montuc*, Marshal of France, compared with Des-Adrets. I. 711. a. b. His impudent sayings concerning the Queen of Navarre. IV. 327. b. 328. a. Makes a great slaughter at Mont de Marfan. 328. b. 329. a. Quoted. III. 415. b.
- Montuc*, Bishop of Valence, what means he made use of in his negotiations with the Poles about the election of the Duke of Anjou. IV. 839. a.
- Monmouth* (Duke of) There were people in England who maintained that he was not taken. II. 721. b.
- Mons* (Father) confessor of the Duchesse of Savoy. II. 401. a.
- Mons* (the version of) censured by Mallet. III. 576. a. b.
- Monsters*, there are five which ought to be prosecuted to the utmost. IV. 669. b.
- Montaigne* (Michael de) cited in relation to Mahomet II. I. 54. b. Cited again in relation to du Bellai's memoirs. 722. a. Cited again. II. 366. a. 677. b. 737. b. 823. a. III. 81. b. V. 368. a. His reflexion upon the education of children. I. 80. a. His judgment on an elegy given to Aretia. 436. a. A good observation of this writer's against false miracles. II. 149. a. b. Had an intimate affection for Charron. 448. a. b. What he says of the ill effect of disputing. 848. b. What he thinks of women who marry old men. III. 64. b. How he ridicules the Catholics, in relation to certain maxims that change according to the times. 521. b. Did not well know the origin of an adventure which he takes from Plato. 633. and b. 634. a. Had naturally an aversion for a lie. IV. 778. b. n. (42). What he says of kindness of civility. 797. b. And of the power which the soul has to put itself alternately in opposite situations. V. 272. b. Laughs at those who called the epistles of Guevara golden ones. III. 270. b. In what manner the faculty of Divines in France dealt with his essays. V. 810. Dedicated to Cardinal Richelieu, and kept in all libraries. 798. There is not near so much licentiousness in this Dictionary, as there is in his Essays, either with regard to Scepticism or obscenities. ibid.
- Montaigne* (John de la) translates two books of Sir Humphrey Lynden, intitled the Sure Way, and the Wrong Way. III. 971. and a. b.
- Montalto* (Cardinal de) said that he would never despise a man in a cassock and little band. I. 361. His letter to the council of the holy Union. II. 459. a.
- Montalto*, a famous Jew, resolves to make an open profession of Judaism at Paris. III. 125. a.
- Montargis*. The Protestants find harbour there. III. 30. a. b. But however are obliged to leave it. ibid.
- Montausier* (the Marquis of) his elegy in two verses. I. 397. b. Wants to know from whom Balzac had what he says of Penelope. IV. 543. b. 544. a. Has a great affection for Bourfaix, and recommends him for Sub-Preceptor to the Dauphin. II. 115. How his letters to Jurieu, and that minister's letters to him, came to be published. V. 645. b. 646. a.
- Montausier* (Mr de) compared with A. M. Aquaviva. I. 397. b.
- Montbelliard*, the conference which was held there proceeded from political reasons more than from any thing else. I. 792. a.
- Montbriffe*, the soldiers of the garrison there thrown down headlong. I. 709. a.
- Montecuculi* (Sebastian) poisons the eldest son of Rancie I. II. 94. b.
- Montecuculi* disappoints all the designs of Mr de Turenne. V. 191. b. What he brought about by the taking of only one town. ibid.
- Monte-Major* cited. I. 354. a.

Monteney

- Montney* (Matthew de) a great and experienced Magician. III. 126. a.
- Montferrat*, two wars carried on there. II. 311. a. Its miserable condition in the year 1551. &c. V. 440. a. b.
- Montgomery* recovers the dominions of the Queen of Navarre. IV. 327. b. An article of the capitulation which he made was not observed. 328. b. 329. a. b. Passionate verses made on his punishment, by John des Caurres. II. 399.
- Montjoy* (William) a great friend of Erasmus's. III. 456. a.
- Montmaur* worse treated by Feramus, than by any other who wrote against him. IV. 246. b. 247. a. People were not able to make head against him with their tongue. 248. a. His good and bad qualities. 250. b. 251. a. b. 252. a. b.
- Montmor*, or rather Mommor, an epigram which he made on a Poet. V. 410. a. b.
- Montmorenci*, from whom that family is descended. I. 341. a.
- Montmorenci* (Anne de) Constable, his want of abilities, and the mischief he did to France. III. 395. a. b. 396. a. b. His conduct with regard to the Dukes de Valentinois, very much blamed by Thuanus. IV. 699. a. Was of opinion that learning made men effeminate, and gave rise to Heresies. V. 354. a.
- Montmorenci* (Francis de) solicits a dispensation of marriage at the Court of Rome. IV. 631. a. b. 632. a. b. His unfair dealing. 634. a. b. 635. a. b. Is crossed by the House of Guise. 637. b.
- Montmorenci* (Henry de) Constable, his wife hearkens to propositions of marriage while he is alive. III. 184. b.
- Montmorenci* (the Duke of) desires unusual honours for his wife. III. 210. a. Beheaded at Toulouse for treason. 817. a. b. To how high a degree he was beloved. ibid. Whether his judges could have done otherwise than condemned him. 819. a. b.
- Montmorisme*, that which is called so. IV. 246. b.
- Montpellier* is one of the principal cities of France, in which the Roman law was read publicly. I. 68. a. b. Its university obliges du Laurens to pass through all his exercises again, in order to take his Doctor's Degree a second time, before he is admitted. III. 745. a. This Physician founds a Physic garden there, where he places this inscription, Argos esto non Briareus. ibid. and b.
- Montpensier* (the Duke of) in what manner he used his prisoners. I. 592. a. b. Causes a conference of Doctors and Ministers to be held, in order to reclaim his eldest daughter. III. 864. b. His daughter Charlotte escapes into Germany, where she abjures Popery. 864. He uses the Protestants with the utmost severity. 865. Believes that the Dukes of Bouillon would renounce Calvinism, provided she would hear Dr. Vigor. IV. 920. b. 921. a.
- Montpensier* (the Dukes of) the true cause of her hatred to Henry III. II. 257. b. It was said that she was in love with her nephew the Duke of Guise. III. 299. a.
- Monuments* (public) particular care ought to be taken not to let Printers falsify them. II. 698. b. There are abundance of ridiculous stories which people endeavour to prove by them. III. 165. a. b.
- Moon*, a thought of the Chevalier Marini, concerning the spots that are seen in it. I. 113. b. The women of that region lay eggs, from whence are bred men fifteen times bigger than those who inhabit the earth. III. 369. b. Whether it be true that people can read in it what is written on a looking-glass. IV. 672. b. Whether it be inhabited. V. 576. a.
- Moors*, a prodigious number of them are converted by the sermons of John Andreas. I. 326.
- Mopius*: Ammianus Marcellinus confounds one Mopius with another. IV. 253. a.
- Moral*: combination of Moral and Physical things. II. 16. a.
- Morale Pratique*: whether Mr Arnauld be the author of the second volume of the Morale Pratique. I. 493. b.
- Moralis Diabolica*, the title of a book, which the author was obliged to alter. III. 122.
- Moralists* ought to be very reserved in their reflexions on the sickness and death of illustrious persons. I. 88. a. b. Ought not to regulate their opinions by the practice of the Civil-Law, in points concerning the relaxation of manners. III. 944. b. Extremes into which the too rigid ones fall. V. 797, 798.
- Morality*, maxims which overthrow it. I. 35. b. 36. a. b. Abominable morality publicly taught among Christians. III. 54. a. b. It is a blot on the person who is the first that introduces a relaxation in the practice of morality. 194. In what manner people ought to study it, in order to know it aright. 894. b. It is necessary that all men should be taught a morality, which admits of the direction of a good conscience, acknowledged by the Heathens themselves. I. 35. b.
- Morals*: Silvester Prierias carries the relaxation of morals too far. IV. 772. and b. 773. a. We must not judge of a man's morals by his writings. 595. They are not at all concerned in the obsequies which the author relates. V. 846. Whether ours be more chaste than those of our Ancestors. 855. &c.
- More* (Sir Thomas) his verses against an Astrologer who was a cuckold. V. 322. a. b. Favours which he grants to Gryneus, at the recommendation of Erasmus. III. 255. a. b.
- Moré* (Frederic) revises and augments P. Bellier's translation of Philo's works. IV. 623.
- Morellus* was of the cabal which wanted to change the discipline of the Church. V. 738.
- Moret* (the Countess de) a distich on the loss of her sight. I. 206. b. n. (17). On what condition she marries the Count de Cely-Sancy. III. 266. a. b.
- Morgues* (Matthew de) what opinion a fine wit had of him. IV. 257. b. Was very unfit to write the History of Cardinal Richelieu. 258. a. b.
- Morbos*, his words are not rightly understood in an extract that is given of his book. IV. 795. b.
- Morgard* (Leon) an Almanack-maker, condemned to the Gallies on account of his predictions. III. 955. b.
- Mornac*: the leaps of Mornac. I. 709. b.
- Mornai* (Du Pleffis) cited. II. 594. b. Refutes in a solid manner the answer of Coeffeteau, in relation to Gregory VII. III. 232. a. His letter to Montague. IV. 338. b. Cruelly used in a satire. V. 93. a. The wrong which d'Aubigny does him 733.
- Morocco* (the King of) admires a petition which was presented to him by the Ambassador of the United Provinces. III. 171. a. Shews himself particularly well pleased with the present which Erpenius sent him. ibid.
- Mortemar*, see Rochebouart.
- Morus* (Alexander) a witty saying of that Minister's. II. 520. b. n. (30). A passage of his against the Universalists, and particularly Amyraldus and Spanhemius. V. 822, 823. Quoted. 786. n. (1).
- Mosibus*, whether he was the inventor of atoms. III. 788. a.
- Moskovy* (the Czar of) in what manner the choice of the maid, whom he is to marry, is made. III. 117. b.
- Moses*, what the Poets have feigned of a great many rods, was all borrowed from the History of his rod. I. 5. a. Accused of overthrowing the religion of to nature. 96. a. What wood he made use of to sweeten the bitter waters. 105. a. Some assert that he was master of the profoundest secrets of Chymistry. 2. a. It is ridiculous to penetrate beyond the deluge, without the assistance of this Hyeronian. II. 854. b. A parallel betwixt him and Hercules. III. 432. b. In what manner his mother was chosen to be his nurse, by the daughter of Pharaoh. IV. 133. a. Stories which some Egyptian Historians relate of him. 679. According to Machiavel, in order to give force to his laws, he was obliged to put to death a vast number of men, who opposed him in it. V. 73. b. n. 1.
- Moïse le Vayer*. See Vayer.
- Mother*, one who hindered her son and her daughter-in-law, from performing the conjugal duty. II. 382. b. 383. a. A mother, who never suckles, breeds the more readily. IV. 449. b.

Motion:

- Motion*: objections against motion. I. 82. b. V. 608. b. 609. a. b. 610. a. b. 613. a. b. To which Aristotle makes an insufficient answer. 610. a. b. Cannot be produced but by creation. I. 304. b. 305. a. If God was not the first and the only principle of it, there would be no need for supposing that his interposition was necessary in the construction of the world. IV. 436. a. b. 437. a. b. 438. a. b. 439. a. b. Reflexion upon the consequences of its eternity, or of its beginning, with respect to the existence of God. V. 594. a. Whether its eternity be the only thing that can prove the existence of a mover distinct from matter. ibid. a. b. 595. a. b. There has not been a right definition of it as yet. 610. a. b. Reflexions upon the incomprehensibility of motion. 614. a. b. A proof from the impossibility of a vacuum, that there is no real motion. 617. a. b.
- Motive*: those who despise riches are more commendable than those who are covetous, tho' they act from the same motive. I. 460. a. b. Motives singular and refined against giving charities. II. 110. a. b. 112. a. b.
- Motte-Aignon* declares that he could not endure to have his books made for him. I. 624. b. Elogy of this author. IV. 279. a. b.
- Moulin* (Peter du) his conference with Cayet. II. 244. b. 245. a.
- Moulin* (Peter du), the son, cited. V. 426. a. b. (72).
- Moulin* (Lewis du) what he affirmed concerning the History of Camden. II. 280. b. 281. a. Causes a letter of Dury's, to Peter du Moulin his father, to be printed. 732.
- Mountain* dug quite through, by the orders of Francis I, to open a passage into Italy. III. 97. b. 98. a. b. Mount Genevre more convenient. 98. a.
- Musti* the fate of the Sultans depends upon him. IV. 425. b. 426. a. b.
- Mugwort*, whence that herb had the name of Artemisia. I. 523. a.
- Mules* which were not barren. II. 302. A mule kept by the Athenians at the public expence. III. 701. b.
- Mulhausen*, a Jesuit, insults David Parvus. II. 173. b. a. (14).
- Mulieres non esse homines*, a dissertation which raises a terrible outcry. I. 88. a. b. 89. a. b.
- Mulus* killed by Nestor. IV. 585.
- Muncherus* (Philip) publishes a Poem of Marcus Mufurus. IV. 295. a.
- Mundus alter & idem*, an allegorical book of Joseph Hall's: the Court of Rome is not spared in it. III. 345. a. b. Mr Naudé's opinion concerning it. ibid. b.
- Munus*, his birth, and by whom he was brought up. I. 52. a. b. Is made known to his father. ibid. a. His death. ibid. b.
- Munster*: facts relating to the peace of Munster. II. 472. a. b. Its Canons pique themselves upon their nobility, and skill in war. V. 13. a. A school founded in that city about the end of the XVth century. II. 242. A school and library established in that city. III. 724. This school serves Germany as a nursery of literature. ibid.
- Munus Adventitium*, what that book contains. IV. 122. a. b.
- Munusca*, a Moorish General, revolts against the Saracens, who had trusted Cerdagne to him. II. 850. Is reduced to the necessity of killing himself. I. 14.
- Muretus* makes Scaliger believe that a copy of verses, which he had composed himself, were composed by Trabeas. V. 394. a. b. 395. a. His invective against Sueton. 264. b. 265. a. A trick which he puts upon Scaliger. 394. a. b. 395. a. b. 396. a. b. His funeral oration by Bencius, who was his scholar. I. 747. b. Dedicates his Latin version of Aristotle's Rhetoric to Bencius. ibid.
- Murtola*, how he revenged himself upon the Chevalier Marini, for a satire which he wrote against him. III. 464. b.
- Musæus* (John) a Lutheran professor, why he took upon him to refute an Atheist. III. 671. a. b.
- Musarium*, the answer which Lucian puts into the mouth of that Courtesan. I. 54. b. 55. a. V O L. V.
- Misfortunes*, their courage enervated by the Germans and Livonians. II. 42. b.
- Musculus* his books are no longer read by any body. II. 286. b.
- Muses* sometimes procure large pensions for those who engage in their service. I. 329. b. 330. a. The men of learning in the city of Alexandria met in their temple. 534. b. The service of the Muses is in many things like the service of the ladies. II. 620. a. Ought to inspire their votaries with a true generosity. III. 340. a. Great warriors and the Muses stand in need of one another. 434. a. b. To whom they owe their birth. 652. a. Let out for hire. V. 148. a. b. 751, 752. Naturally tailors, but most of all so in adversity. IV. 449.
- Mushrooms*: four persons die by eating mushrooms. II. 868. b.
- Musæ*, who it was that invented its six notes. I. 433. And from whence they were taken. ibid. Its surprising effects. III. 197. a. b. The passion which Nero had for it. V. 466. a. b. Rinuccini, or Cavele-ri, looked upon as the inventors of Theatrical pieces set to music. IV. 878. a. b. 879. a. b.
- Musicians*, what a Musician said one day to Philip. I. 448. b. Are lucky fellows. IV. 398. b.
- Musso* was called the Chrysolome of the Italians. IV. 290. b. Looked upon as the right arm of the Council of Trent. ibid. 291. a. b.
- Mustapha*, Emperor of the Turks, how raised to the throne. IV. 425. a. b. And why deposed. ibid. b. and 426. a. b.

N.

- Narden* sacked by the Spaniards. III. 498.
- Nagelius*, a visionary who foretold surprising revolutions. V. 237. a. b.
- Naked*: there have been Solitaries who went naked. I. 112. a. Why the impudence of going naked is so often put in practice again among Christians. V. 415. a.
- Nakedness*: opinion of some Solitaries about nakedness. I. 112. a. A sort of nakedness of some women. II. 593. a. 645. a. A horror for nakedness even in a picture, inlaid into the female sex by all civilized nations. III. 963. b. 964. a. The curiosity of women to view nakedness in the original. 964. a. Scandalous customs with respect to nakedness. V. 129. b. 130. a. b.
- Name*: what Altingius says of the name Tetragramma. I. 244. b. 245. a.
- Names*: the Kings of certain countries affected all to take the same name. I. 40. a. The least mistake in proper names, is enough to lead the reader into an error. 108. a. The smallest change of the letters in proper names, multiplies writers without reason. III. 534. Milantia said, that if names were to be sold, the finest ought to be bought. I. 325. Names untractable with respect to rhyming. 620. a. b. Unfit for Poetry. II. 866. a. b. A plain name may prejudice an author. I. 622. a. b. A name changed through vanity. II. 367. a. b. The custom which people formerly had of taking a name to themselves. I. 170. a. b. 171. a. And of changing it. ibid. and IV. 477. There are some names which ought to be changed. III. 202. b. 203. a. b. And there are some which seem to have an influence upon the manners of the persons that bear them. 604. b. Prohibition of changing names. IV. 853. b. 854. a. b. Ought to be made use of in a free manner, according to the Stoics. 706. b. The French authors disfigure proper names. III. 722. a. b. 723. a.
- Nangis* (William de) inserts all the chronicle of Sigebert into his own. IV. 728. b. 729. a. b.
- Nani* (Chevalier) judges of the manners of the Hollanders, by the manners of the Italians. III. 821. a. b. 822. a.
- Nannius* (Peter) Justus Velsius gives lectures for him in the college of the three languages at Louvain. V. 450.

11 H

Nantes

- Nantes* (edit of), who it was that drew it up. II. 433. and b. What Cardinal Mazarin said concerning this edit. I. 264. b. See Edict.
- Napkin* were about the left arm, was the signal taken by the assassins at St Bartholomew. IV. 682. a.
- Naples* (Joan II, of that name, Queen of), by what services people obtained great employments from her. II. 312. How she discovered her passion one day. ibid. a.
- Napht*, (Ladislau, King of) dies of poison which he received in the bosom of pleasure. IV. 308. a.
- Napht*, who first began to practise Printing there. IV. 71. a. An attempt to set up the Inquisition there occasions troubles. 387. a. b. What was called the Portion there. 466. b. 467. a. Fables concerning that city. V. 489. a. b. 490. a. b. Some Libertines have appeared there. IV. 719. a. b.
- Narni* (Father), who is the author of the translation of his sermons. II. 90. and a.
- Nassau* (Maurice of) had great skill in Mathematics. V. 236.
- Nations*, there are some that one would take for brute beasts. I. 177. b. Their boundaries have been often altered. 537. Free nations are easily accustomed to slavery, provided it have not that name. II. 420. a. In what all nations are alike. III. 172. b.
- Natural Philosophers* did not admit of an intelligent Being for the first mover before Anaxagoras. I. 301. b. 302. a. b. 303. a. The reason of it. 302. b. 303. a.
- Natural Philosophy*, it would be ridiculous to pretend to confute, from the principles thereof, the fables of Antiquity. I. 76. a. An event which is explained thereby cannot be the preface of a future contingent. IV. 565. a. b. See Physics.
- Nature* observes no laws. I. 313. b. Where she strongly inclines to any one thing, the Monk's habit never cures a man of it. 345. b. Corrupt nature, when she cannot plunge men into pleasures, frequently makes it up by other faults. III. 223. a. The effects of nature cannot be prefaces of future contingents, unless they be appointed for that end by a particular intelligent Being. IV. 565. a. b. 566. a. b. Her secrets are impenetrable. 653. b. She sought not to be forced by study. III. 342. a.
- Navagiero*, or Nangier, dies of the spotted fever at Blois. IV. 316. He follows Bartholomew d'Alviano to the wars, and makes his Funeral Oration. 315.
- Navailles* (the Duke of), his behaviour to the Deputies of the Imperial towns of Alsace. III. 717. a. b.
- Navarre* (the King of) had law-suits and a Council in three of the Parliaments of France. III. 37. b. See Henry IV.
- Navarre* (Margaret, Queen of), how far her novels are to be condemned. V. 837.
- Navarre* (Jane, Queen of) calumniated and ill defended. II. 224. a. b. 225. a.
- Navarre* (Margaret, Queen of), spouse to Henry IV, charms the Embassadors of Poland with her beauty. IV. 40. b. Loved Mathematics. V. 297. a. See Margaret.
- Navarre* opens a way through a mountain for the French army to pass into Italy. III. 98. a. b.
- Naudi*, it does not appear that he ever believed the tales of Sorcerers and Magicians. II. 243. b. Quoted. 432. b. V. 755. a. (u u u). What he relates touching the exaltation of Pope Hadrian VI. III. 324. b. Censured on the head of Alexander's deification. IV. 405. b. 406. a. Who was his favourite author. 465. He censures highly the conduct of Savonarola. V. 60. b. 61. a. b.
- Navicula stultorum mulierum*: a book improperly ascribed to Badius by Valerius Andreas. I. 602. b.
- Navis Narragonie* or Stultorum of Sebastian Brandt. I. 602. b.
- Nazianzen* (Gregory of), the opinion which he entertains of Councils. IV. 348. a. See Gregory.
- Nearchus*, tyrant of Elea; the different sentiments of authors touching what happened to him with Zeno. V. 606. a. b. 607. a. b.
- Necklace* fatal to all that wore it. II. 257. a. b. By whom it was made, and of what matter. ibid. a. The fatal effects of that which Menelaus conferred in the temple of Delphes. III. 372. b. 373. a.
- Nectanebus*, when driven out of his kingdom. IV. 404. a.
- Newman Games* were games instituted in honour in Archemorus. I. 446.
- Nemesis*, why called Adrastus. I. 118. and b.
- Nemours* (the Duke of), a Prince of an admirable talent to win men over to his side. I. 710. b. He leaves France, and for what reason. III. 141. Is recalled and serves against those of the Reformed Religion. ibid. In what manner he was rewarded for it by the court of Rome. ibid.
- Nepenthes*, what it was. III. 373. a. b. 374. a.
- Nephelococgia*, or The Cloud of Cuckolds, a comedy wrote by Father le Loyer, where there are abundance of coarse expressions. III. 882. a. 883. b. It is full of invention and spirit. ibid. a.
- Nepos*, what it signifies in good Latin. I. 632. b. III. 194. a. It may have the same signification in Italian as in good Latin. 258. b.
- Nepotism*; there are times when the greater and the lesser Nepotism are not both in vogue at once. I. 343. When it gathered all its force. IV. 430. a. b.
- Nero*, several persons have falsely taken that name. I. 513. a. b. The last dying words of those whom that Prince had put to death, by whom composed. III. 9. a. b. He did not himself compose the Funeral Oration of Claudius, which he recited. 317. a. For what reason wife men connived at his disorders. IV. 398. b. Whether the four verses, beginning with Torva Mimalensis, are of his composition. 596. a. b. 597. a. b. His passion for Music. V. 466. a. b. He bore libels somewhat patiently. 745, 746.
- Nervus*, his reign worse than that of Domitian, and for what reason. III. 109. a. A very solid apophthegm of which he made a good use. ibid. He dies a little after he had adopted Trajan, Pliny's rebellion upon that head. 431. b. a. (67).
- Nesler*, what the size of his cup was. III. 205. b. 206. a. He kills Melius. IV. 585.
- Nestorianism*, the Seur de Moni believes that it is only a verbal Heresy. I. 105. a. b. IV. 356. a.
- Nevenor* (the Count of), the pleasant manner in which he obliged the superior of a convent to give him satisfaction. III. 473. a. b.
- Nevers* (the Duke of) is reproached with affecting to signalize himself at the King his master's cost. III. 398. b. Who was the first Duke of Nevers. 518. a.
- Newcastle* (la) affirms that Grotius had begun to mold his work anew in Holland. III. 248. b.
- Newcastle*; Marot was page to one Nicolas de Neufville. IV. 162. b. He dedicates the temple of Cupid to him. ibid.
- Newbaufel* yielded to the Turks by a treaty. III. 793. a. b.
- Newilly* (Stephen de), after being possessed of the President de la Place's office, strives in vain to hinder his being restored to it again. IV. 682. a. Made President au Mortier by the Duke of Mayenne. ibid.
- Neutrality*; the inconveniences that attend it during the civil wars either of church or state. II. 799. b. The Imperial towns of Alsace cannot observe it. III. 717. b. 718. a. It does not hinder an Historian's favouring one party more than another. II. 310. a. b. 311. a. b. 312. a. b.
- New Abfalom*, &c. to whom that libel is ascribed. V. 731. a. b.
- Newburg*, what motives induced a Prince of that family to change his religion. IV. 854. a. b.
- News*; a false piece of news, believed for three days, is capable of destroying a state, or of saving it. II. 216. b. V. 749. a. b. There are people who know all the news of a town, except what diabolically know their own family. III. 381. b. 382. a. Commends their own bidding at an auction. 414. a. It is a vice to know too much news. V. 820.
- News-writers* are not to be credited. I. 15. b. IV. 51. a. 179. b. Do not stand in need of being exhorted to acknowledge the goodness of God. III. 3. a. Magnify things. IV. 536. b. V. 493. b. Ought to remember a sentence of Agathon. I. 127. Carry on a kind of war with their Arma Arserina. V. 750. a. b. The artifice they make use of to inspire people with a pleasing credulity. III. 718.

718. b. 719. a. b. 720. a. The perplexities into which their infincerity throws them. 719. a. b. The siege of important places will always be a troublesome rock for them. 719. b. 720. a. b. 721. a. b. Their prepossession and partiality. IV. 737. b.
- Nicarate*, a Courtesan; illustrious for her birth and learning. V. 239. a.
- Nice*; the moderation of the Council of Nice, with respect to Arius. I. 475. a.
- Nicéphorus* is a fabulous and injudicious writer. III. 572. b.
- Nicias*, the fright he was in on account of an eclipse of the moon. IV. 566. a.
- Nicodemites* do sometimes more harm than an open enemy. II. 48. b.
- Nicolas*, Bishop of Mirra, gives Arias a box on the ear in the Council of Nice. II. a. n. (15).
- Nicolas Tolentin*, the particular devotion which Philip de Bergamo had for him. I. 769.
- Nicolle* makes use of all the same objections as the meanest missionaries. III. 945. a. Why he only answered one part of a book of Mr Jurien. IV. 535. a. b. His objections lead to Pyrrhonism. ibid. It is not true that the author has blackened him as having wrote certain doctrines which he did not believe. V. 804.
- Niem* (Thierry de), what he adds to the story of Pope Joan. IV. 729.
- Niger* (Pescennius), what he said to an Orator who presented himself before him to speak a panegyric in his praise. III. 335. a.
- Nymphs*, there were some that surpassed for length of life all other mortal natures. III. 348. b. 349. a. b.
- Ninus*, which was the last of his victories. V. 630. a.
- Niphates*, a mountain where Saturn took refuge, and from whence he was thrown into Tartarus. II. 82. b. Jupiter orders it to be called Caucasus, in honour of a shepherd of that name whom Saturn had killed there. ibid.
- Niphus* was of a very amorous complexion. I. 390. b. Is censured for the want of judgment. ibid. And for contradicting himself. ibid. He writes against Pomponatus. IV. 715. a.
- Nisus*, the Synod of that place gives all manner of explications to the Church of Zurich. II. 196.
- Noah*, by what means he could know that it was Cham who had discovered his nakedness. II. 431. b. What was the injury which he received from Cham, according to Mr Vonder Harde. 432. b.
- Nobilitas Famula*, how these words are to be understood in Latin elegies. I. 250. a.
- Nobilis* and Plæbeius were not inconsistent words in ancient Rome. III. 490. a.
- Nobility*, an invective against those who value themselves upon it. I. 360. b. It is generally more easy to prove that of the father, than that of the grandfather or great grandfather. 750. a. An oration of Philo, on true nobility, translated by Daniel d'Auge. 562. a.
- Noble* (he) confounds all in his romance of Zakima, or Pure Love. III. 166. b. 167. a. b.
- Noble families* generally give chimerical accounts of their first founders. IV. 888. a. b.
- Noël le Compté* blamed. I. 402. b.
- Noyon*, the Canons of that place make a solemn procession to thank God for Calvin's death. I. 783. b. n. (8). II. 265. a.
- Numerus*, the History of the Adulterers, which was wanting in his Paraphrase, has been supplied by Father Abvum. I. 47. a.
- Nomus* or Nomus (Duard), particulars touching that man. V. 319. b.
- Non-toleration*, in affairs of religion, the Lutherans exercised it against Altingius. I. 240. b. 241. a. The advantage that accrues from it is small, in comparison of the evils which it produces. 789. a. b. Condemned. III. 675. a. 676. a. b. 677. a. b. In what case it ought to be allowed. IV. 522. a. b. c.
- Non-toleration* (the Advocates for), the inconveniences which they expose themselves to. I. 13. b. 14. a. b. They resemble Cæsar, who could bear no master, and then Pompey, who could suffer no partner. ibid. a. They would have been very glad that Jesus Christ had allowed them to follow Elijah's example as a precedent. II. 750. a. b.
- Their unjust extravagancy. IV. 337. d. See Lawus (Penal) in matters of conscience. Being reduced to a non-plus, they have recourse to unfair means, in order to render their adversaries odious. V. 28. a. b. Their principle overthrows all the rules of natural equity. III. 238. a.
- Noradin*, his daughter falls in love with a Prince of Westphalia, makes her escape with him, and becomes his second wife. III. 166. b.
- Norden*, why its school was surpassed by that of Leer. II. 768.
- Notables* assembled at Fontainebleau. IV. 138.
- Notary*, in the XIVth century a Notary's place was not reckoned unfit for a gentleman. III. 747.
- Notis*, or Scholia, added to a book in order to confute it. II. 749. d.
- Not long since*, we ought never to make use of that phrase, without setting down the year in which we thus express ourselves. IV. 165. b.
- Novara* (John of), General of the Augustines. I. 769. b.
- Novella*, why John Andreas calls one of his Commentaries by that name. I. 325. a.
- Novella*, daughter to a Professor of Civil-Law read lectures for her father. I. 325. a. She hid her face while she was in the chair. ibid. Which may occasion a diverting problem. ibid.
- Novelties*: as Princes are disposed, they rarely embrace the same novelties, when they hate one another. V. 652.
- Novius*: what a novice said one day to Charles V. II. 438. b.
- Nûs*, why Anaxagoras was so called. I. 297. b. 298. a.
- Nanus Pompeius* forbade all lewd women to enter into the temple of Juno. III. 639. b. Refrained maids to the decency of their sex better than Lycargus. 962. b. Whether he introduced the community of women. 965. a. He would not have the Deity to be represented by any images. IV. 675. a.
- Number* (Golden), who is the author of that cycle. III. 254. a.
- Numerius* says that Arcusilas fixed himself in the Pyrrhonian inconstancy. I. 408. a. And abuses him very much. ibid. He has nevertheless said very advantageous things of him. 412. b.
- Nuns*, whose disorders Pope Sixtus IV. endeavoured to correct. II. 97. a. For what sum they obtained absolution from fornication. I. 628. a. The direction of Nuns by Monks is held in abhorrence at Rome, for reasons which experience sufficiently evince. 785. a. Monks who maintain that the Pope cannot give the direction of Nuns to any but Monks of the same order. ibid. b. A Bishop was obliged to nip their digs in order to examine their virginity. III. 344. b. 345. a. The singular answer of a Nun to the Bishop of Belley, and his reply. I. 738. b.
- Nuns*, whether they may be allowed to hear a lecture of Anatomy, on those parts which serve for generation. I. 109. a. They ought to be divided into two classes according to some Fathers. III. 61. b. What condition those who have had to do with Nuns are in after their death. IV. 125. a.

O.

OAK of Mantre, what has been said of it. I. 46. b.

Oaths, one of a singular form. I. 70. b. Whether the oaths of dying persons ought to be taken for proofs. II. 55. b. 57. b. They ought to be made without equivocations. 871. b. 872. a. The Magistrates of Athens exempt Xenocrates from an oath. V. 570. a. An author who had sworn never to have any thing to do with Bookellers, breaks his oath, and compares himself in this to women in the pains of child-birth. II. 82. a. b.

Obedience; how persons may be saved in two distinct kinds of obedience. I. 179. a. b.

Obedience (Passive) strongly defended. I. 264. b. 265. a.

Objections, it were to be wished that we had a general rule to distinguish those which proceed only from flesh and blood. I. 708. b. Complaints were made that Bellarmine proposed those of the Heretics better than he confuted them. 730. b. The answers of

- of a Divine cannot be so clear as the objections of a Philosopher. II. 456. b. An objection founded upon very distinct notions remains alike victorious, whether no answer is made to it, or such an answer as no body can understand. V. 815.
- Obliged*; there are few men who can love those to whom they are too much obliged. IV. 22. b.
- Obscenities*, whether it be not allowable to relate them. II. 684. a. b. 685. a. V. 132. b. 133. a. b. 264. b. &c. An apology for those which are to be found in some parts of this Dictionary. III. 460. a. b. IV. 803. b. 804. a. b. 805. a. b. 806. a. b. Necessity obliges a man to speak of them sometimes, but decency requires him to speak of them with circumspection. III. 135. b. 136. a. b. The Fathers of the Church have related those of the ancient Heretics. ibid. The greatest part of the Poets succeed best when they turn their Poetry this way. IV. 156. b. Obscenities writ by a wife and virtuous Queen. 322. a. b. A preferential against those of the ancient Poets. V. 99. b. La Mothe le Vayer makes an apology for those which he had diffused through his works. 420. a. b. &c. Accords is reproached with them, and justifies himself. I. 65. a. b. Grofs obscenities are less dangerous than such as are delicate. ibid. b. V. 845. to 848. Give one a disgust at the pleasure with women. I. 65. b. Garaffe censured for quoting them, and how he defended himself. III. 135. b. 136. a. b. There are obscenities in the Examen des Esprits of John Huarte, and in the translation which Chappius has made of it. 528. Naudé endeavours to excuse those of Niphus. IV. 380. a. b. The boundless liberty which many authors have taken in this respect. ibid. An explanation touching those made use of by the author. V. 837. to 858. The different ways they are made use of in books. 837. General remarks on those which are to be met with in books. ibid. and 838. &c. Obscene writings do not distinguish between honest and dishonest men. 838. Honest authors who have writ of such. 807. 837. 839. Two parties with respect to these authors. 838. Remarks upon those which are to be found in this Dictionary. 840. 841. &c. What method the Inquisition uses in prosecutions, where obscenities have a place. 848. a. b. It is impossible to exclude them absolutely. 850. Examples of those which are in the Bible. 851. and a. b. &c. And in profane Historians. 852, 853. And in the Fathers of the Church. ibid. Whether they shock modesty the less for being writ in Latin. 854, 855. The author's apology is to be found in divers parts of his work immediately after those which he relates. 858. Whether our modern Poets are less guilty this way than the ancient Poets were. 388. a. b.
- Obsequens* (Julius), a prodigy which he relates. V. 269. a. b.
- Obstinate men*, what is their fate when they fall into grofs mistakes. IV. 80. b.
- Ocean* (Northern), who was the first Roman General that embarked upon it. II. 715.
- Ochin*: some of his books translated by John Pointet. IV. 693.
- Ocrifia*; how she was got with child, and of whom she was brought to bed. V. 288. a.
- Ollavius* swears that he had not consummated his marriage with Fulvia's daughter. III. 112. a.
- Ollavius* of Minutius Felix; that book has been ascribed to Arnobius. I. 502. a.
- Odes*; a law-suit carried on about some odes that were stolen. IV. 895. a.
- Odium Theologicum*: that passion finds Heresies wherever it pleases. I. 605. b. One of its most cunning touches. 644. b.
- Oecolampadius*, his advice to Farel. III. 10. a. b. He did not trouble himself about the honour that is to be gained by the public exercises in universities. IV. 400.
- Oenomaus* reproaches Apollo for acknowledging Archilochus as a son of the Muses. I. 427. a.
- Officers*: history of the great officers of the kingdom of France by John le Feron. III. 27. a.
- Offices*; merit, credit, power, are often great obstacles in a man's way to them. I. 354. a. b. 733. a. b. II. 436. a. It is better to renounce them, than to obtain and exercise them at the expence of one's conscience. I. 224. a. b. 540. a. 587. a. The mercenary spirit of those who possess them. III. 339. b. 340. a. b. 341. a. b.
- Ogier* (the Prior) censures Father Garaffe. I. 798. a. II. 190. a. b. One of his funeral orations quoted. IV. 40. b.
- Ogier* (Charles) what he says about the incontinence of the people of the North. II. 821. b. The relation of his voyage to Denmark and Sweden is curious. V. 503. b. That relation quoted. IV. 247. a. b. 928. a. n. (1).
- Old age*; there are few people who find it so agreeable as Erasmus did. II. 814. a. It finds comfort in reading. IV. 630. a. b. Some of the inconveniences that attend it. V. 147. b. 148. a.
- Old men* never incline to die. I. 121. b. 122. a. Marry as much for the benefit of their neighbours as for their own. II. 618. b. Their bed is contagious to a young woman. III. 869. a. The imprudence of those who marry. IV. 88. a. b. A law which ordered them to be thrown headlong from a precipice. V. 347.
- Older*: few people like to be accounted older than they are. V. 333. b.
- Olympias*, what she said to a pretty lady that Philip was in love with. I. 392. b.
- Olivæ*, a treaty of peace carried on there. III. 901.
- Olivarez* (the Duke d') favours the amours of Philip IV. I. 589. b. Compared with the Cardinal de Richelieu. V. 373. b.
- Olive-trees*: how and upon what occasion Minerva produced an olive-tree. I. 445.
- Olivier*, Chancellor of France, said that the French resembled apes. III. 515. a. A funeral oration on that Chancellor by Daniel d'Angé. I. 562. a.
- Olivier* (Antony) Bishop of Lombes, brother to the Chancellor. I. 562.
- Olusne* (Madam d') her amours afforded matter to the authors of the XVIIth century. IV. 202. b.
- Omissions*; there are some which are unpardonable crimes in an Historian. II. 759. b. Pure omission, several Philosophers maintain that it is never free. V. 372. b.
- On*, why certain French writers generally denote themselves by that word. IV. 492. a. b.
- Onofreus* was much esteemed by Alexander, followed him in his wars, and had great posts bestowed upon him. II. 669. b.
- Opera*; the first essay of Opera's. II. 557. b. Who was the first author of them. V. 269. a. b. In the XVth and XVIth centuries the Opera's were the psalms and the pious devotions of the Church. II. 481. b. Rinuccini, or Cavaleri, looked upon as the inventors of them. IV. 878. and a. b. 879. and a.
- Opiniators*, what sort of people they are. IV. 362. b. 363. a.
- Opinions*, their diversity very often occasioned by mistakes. I. 284. a. b. It is by opinion alone that we judge of all things in this world. III. 57. b. The infatuation of men, in favour of the opinions commonly received. II. 141. b.
- Oppidum*; that word is equivocal, and signifies sometimes a borough, sometimes a town. I. 747. a.
- Oracles* of Paganism, several of them were consulted upon the same points. I. 132. a. And the greatest of the gods did not preserve his superiority in this respect. ibid. The difference between soothsayers that foretold things after the manner of an Oracle, and other soothsayers. 276. b. Plutarch observes that all those of Boeotia were ceased. ibid. 277. a. That of Amphiaras was very much revered. 276. a. b. 277. a. Whether they ceased upon the planting of Christianity. 281. a. Whether one ought to acknowledge any diabolical operation in them. 594. a. b. They did nothing gratis. II. 258. a. They were full of balderdash. III. 783. a. b. An oracle silenced. V. 386. Oracles that were consulted among the Pagans. 350. b. 351. a. b.
- Orations* (Funeral) when and upon what occasion the honour of them was granted to the Roman ladies by the Senate. II. 290. a.
- Orange*, the cruelties that were exercised in that town preceded the leaps of Mornac and Montbrison. I. 709.

- I. 709. b. The horrible cruelties that were committed there, when Serbellone took it by Assault. V. 120. a. b.
- Orange* (William I, Prince of), Brantome improperly alleges the apology of that Prince with respect to Philip II, and his ingratitude towards his father. II. 441. a. b. Goes to Strasbourg to sell all his plate and moveables there. V. 82. b. 83. a. Twice assassinated. II. 458. a. 459. a. n. (27). How he was treated by Richard Hall. III. 345. a. b.
- Orange* (Frederic Henry, Prince of) how he stood affected to Cardinal Richelieu. III. 821. a. The Princess, his wife, being displeased with Cardinal Mazarin, labours to procure a separate peace with Holland. II. 153. a.
- Oratory* (the fathers of the) cried down at Mons and Liege. IV. 350. a. b. The founder of that order in France. I. 785.
- Orators*, whether they should affect to pass for learned men. I. 353. a. b. They are not much concerned whether the facts they advance be true or not. II. 166. b. 167. a. Were rare in Cappadocia. 309. b. They make no scruple of extenuating or amplifying things according to the interest of their cause, to which they make whatever they can subservient. 343. b. 502. b. Are often guilty of falsifications. 406. b. Have great influence in causing a war to be begun or continued. 547. b. Are not subjected to such narrow rules as Historians are. 548. a. An Orator who made a strange pother to satisfy the desire he had to harangue. III. 151. a. b. Their art depends almost wholly upon action. IV. 567. b. The definition of an Orator. 581. b. 863. a. They are easily bribed with money. III. 355. Their tongue can do a great deal of mischief in a commonwealth. ibid. It is a kind of a miracle, when two famous Orators live together as good friends. 492. b. 493. a. b. They are always ready to declare for the party that is uppermost. 647. a. Those who are vehement, excite storms for nothing. IV. 479. a. b.
- Orbomenians*: two nations so called. IV. 626. b.
- Order*; it is very consistent with order that some things should be done out of order. I. 126. a.
- Order of the Holy Ghost*, who drew up the office of that order. I. 258. b.
- Orders* (Holy), who were those that might be admitted into them according to the ancient canons. III. 221. a. b.
- Orders of Knighthood*, a treatise on their origin and institution by Peter de Beloy. I. 740. b.
- Orestes*, the length of his tomb and bones. I. 312. b. 313. a. The founder of the city of Adrianople, to which he gave his name. 331. a. b.
- Organization*, whether the general laws of motion are sufficient for it. V. 114. b. 115. a.
- Oricovius* confesses that he had married a wife while he was a priest, but not that he had broke with the Church of Rome. V. 232. b. 233. a.
- Origen*, his opinion touching the hidden works of the Prophet Elias, rejected by St Jerome. II. 751. b. 752. a. What he answered to the Manichees concerning the origin of evil. IV. 112. b. 113. a. 416. a. b. 417. a. b. 418. a. b. 419. a. b. 420. a. b. 421. a. b. 422. a. Had a grain of Spinozism. 421. b. Whether it be proper to put him in the hands of all the world. 422. b. He and the other Fathers looked upon the question concerning the origin of evil, as one of the most perplexing. 524. b. He chose his proofs ill to maintain the virginity of the Mother of Jesus Christ. V. 772. b. His answer to Celsus, who laughed at the faith of the Christians. 816, 817. Nemesis espoused some of his errors. IV. 346.
- Origenism*; there were two sorts of it, the one carnal and the other spiritual. IV. 421. a.
- Original pieces*, the confusion that those fall into who do not consult them. II. 229. a. b.
- Original*; whatever helps to shew the original and progress of things, deserves to be taken notice of. II. 99. b.
- Orleans*, the strange disorders of the priests that were in that diocese. II. 373. a. b. Who was the first that settled the German library there. III. 158.
- Orleans* (Lewis of France, Duke of) assassinated in Paris by his uncle the Duke of Burgundy. III. 810. a.
- Orleans* (Lewis d') the Advocate of the League, VOL. V.
- what he makes the English Catholics say. III. 521. b. 522. a.
- Orleans* (Father d') much more reasonable than Sanders. II. 57. a. b. Quoted. 736. b. n. (25), (28). 737. n. (g). a. n. (31), (32). 738. n. (b), (i), (k), (l), (o), (p), (r), (s). a. b. n. (42), (43), (45). What he says of a late repentance. V. 556. b.
- Oropus* was a long time a matter of dispute between the Athenians and the Thebans. I. 274. b. Its inhabitants were the first who deified Amphiarus. 276. a. b. Pillaged by the Athenians. II. 329. b.
- Orpheus* torn in pieces by the women of Thrace, and for what reason. I. 115. a. b.
- Orthodox*, every orthodox person ought not to engage himself in disputes. I. 564. a. Nothing makes a man so much out of conceit with being so, as to see himself persecuted by other orthodox men. V. 513. a. In what sense the Orthodox seem to admit of two first principles. IV. 520, 521.
- Orthodoxy*, the great inconveniences to which those people expose themselves who make use of the secular arm to establish it. I. 14. b. The Promoters of it are sometimes more to be feared than Infidels. 199. a. Three things, none of which can be a mark of Orthodoxy. 287. a. Whether it be a right maxim that provided Orthodoxy triumphs, it matters not by what means, or how. II. 451. a. b. There is a Philosophical Orthodoxy and a Theological one. 662. a. b. By what means it is preferred against the attempts of Heresy. III. 902. a. b.
- Orthography*, how necessary it is to observe it exactly. II. 838. and b. The ancient Orthography ought to be preferred in the first or following editions of old books. IV. 427. and a. b. 428. and a.
- Orthography* (French) Laurence Joubertus was the first that innovated in it. III. 582.
- Orix*, one of the Pope's Penitentiaries sent to Ferrara on purpose to convert the Dukes. III. 31. a.
- Ojanna*, a saint who is held in great veneration at Mantua. III. 32. b.
- Olander*, what he taught concerning the mediation of Jesus Christ. V. 230. b. 231. a.
- Ofris*, where his tomb was. I. 37. There was no Music employed in the sacrifices that were offered to him. ibid. a. b. They sacrificed all the red-haired people, that they could find to his ghost. II. 233.
- Oforius* (Jerome) takes John Metel, his friend, and Antony Augustin for interlocutors in his dialogues de Gloria. IV. 200.
- Oforius* writes the life of Jerome Oforius, his uncle. IV. 426.
- Offat* (Cardinal d') prevailed with the Jesuits to side with him in the affair of Martha Brolier, who pretended to be possessed by the devil. IV. 883. a. b.
- Ostenation*, few learned men keep themselves free from it. II. 338. a. b.
- Ostracism*, who was the inventor it. I. 73. 74. Why that punishment was inflicted. II. 501. b. 502. a.
- Otho*, the Roman Emperor, his looking-glass was one of the principal parts of his equipage of war. I. 392. a. Overcome by Vitellius. V. 262. a. b. The inequality of his life. 273. b. A maxim which he quoted at his death. 628. b.
- Otho I*, Emperor, died in the year 973. II. 90. b.
- Otho III*, Emperor, loved pilgrimages. II. 58. a. b.
- Otho IV*, Emperor, was charmed with the chaste answer of a girl. III. 258. a. IV. 87. b.
- Ottoman*: the word Ottoman does not strike the common people so much as that of Turk; Jurieu's artifice in the use he makes of these words. V. 803.
- Ottoman Emperors*, nothing can be more precarious than their authority, although it seems to have the surest foundation. IV. 426. a. b. A history of them in medals promised. V. 223. n. (c).
- Overcome*; there are captains who know how to overcome, but not how to make use of their victory. II. 413. a. b. 414. a.
- Ovid* quoted with respect to Alcmena's lying-in. I. 207. b. Was a master Painter in the affair of love. II. 1, 2. Does not sufficiently observe the rules of probability in speaking of Oenone. IV. 401. a. What he says of Ceneus and of Hippodamia. I. 537. a. b. 538. a. Censured concerning Pygmalion, whom he is not careful to prevent his readers from taking for a meer statuary. IV. 641. a. b.

a. b. What he says of the prostitution of the women of Cyprus. ibid. b. 642. a.
Our lady of Hall and of Zibem, judgment which Joseph Hall forms of them, as well as of their Histories wrote by Lipsius. III. 846. b. 847.
a. b.
Oxenstern (Axel) made Great Chancellor of Sweden by Gustavus Adolphus. V. 654. One of the ablest men that ever appeared in Europe. ibid.
Oxford, who was the first professor of History in that university. II. 283. The title of Master of Arts is conferred there on those who have run through a course of seven years. 278. a. The foundation of its college. V. 554. b.
Oil, who invented the secret of making it. I. 455. a.
Offers sent to Trajan into Parthia. I. 371.

P.

P*Adia* is obliged to submit to the Republic of Venice. V. 590.
Pacti, his great merit. I. 787. a. b.
Paganism is founded on notions of the Deity as false as Atheism. I. 132. a. The Philosophers and not the Priests writ in favour of it. 255. b. Whether it be a less evil than Atheism. 382. a. Who was the cause of its oracles being put to silence. 594. a. Its priests feared nothing so much as the eyes of the incredulous and curious. ibid. and b. It preserved a monstrous alliance between the worship of the gods and the most filthy passions. 597. a. b. Was formed upon the witty conceits of some Poets. 65. a. b. III. 642. a. b. 652. b. 653. a. b. Nothing worse concerted than its system. II. 339. a. Wherein it made part of its Divine service consist. 531. b. Who were the Pharisees of it. 780, 781. Arnobius gives it a home thrust. III. 647. a. The venality of its oracles. IV. 405. a. Its religious ceremonies were rather appointed to avert misfortunes, than to draw down favours from Heaven. 572. a. Its priests heartily received the offerings of Courtisans. 869. a. b.
Pagans understood the nature of virtue thoroughly. I. 278. b. 279. a. b. What several have believed concerning the salvation of Pagans. 471. b. They reasoned very inconsequentially on the reality of virtue. II. 164. b. 165. a. Their doctrine with respect to guardian angels. II. 249. b. 250. a. Reflections upon their system of a multitude of gods. ibid. a. b. They could answer the objections of the Manichees better than the Christians. 251. a. b. IV. 519. a. b. 520. a. b. 521. a. b. The greatest part of them lived as the Christians do, who have faith without charity. II. 418. b. 419. a. b. Their distinction between the known and unknown gods, resembled very much the distinction that was made in the schools of Aristotle, between occult and manifest qualities. 677. b. Their gods were so ridiculous, that a man might laugh at them without being an Atheist. 872. b. The contradiction that appeared in their conduct, with respect to these same deities. 873. a. They have been justly reproached, on account of the utmost villany of the greatest of their gods. III. 130. a. They are afraid lest Christianity should be publicly tolerated, and for what reason. 320. b. 321. a. b. One of the effects of their prepossession. 578. a. b. 579. a. It may be said to their honour, that several of them were wiser and purer than their gods. 649. a. Those who pretended to the purest Orthodoxy, were at bottom no better than Atheists. 654. a. b. They could not throw the blame upon the Poets of those abominations, which were published of their gods. 653. a. b. They have been more easy to be converted than the Turks. IV. 41. a. The notions which the ancient Pagans had of the Deity, agree with sound Theology. 572. b. The Pagans committed as great a sin, in plundering the temple of Apollo, as the Jews would have done, in plundering the temple of Solomon. 622. b. 623. a. They can boast, as well as Christians, of having had Kings who cured distempers. 664. b. 665. a. Must have taught the Jews the doctrine of a life to come, according to the Hypothesis of Lucas Brugensis. V. 8. a. b. Took advantage of those passages of Scripture, which seem to ascribe some imperfection to God. 13. b. Their opinion about the statues of the gods. 239. b. It does not appear that they asked the gods to forgive their sins, when they were at the point of death. 628. b.

Page, the bold action of a page. I. 712. a.
Page (--- le) minister at Dieppe, and afterwards at Rotterdam; author of the book intitled, L'Impiété des Communions forcées, dies in the year 1701. IV. 243. a. n. (2).
Pain; the dispute between the Stoics and Peripatetics about the nature of it, a meer dispute of words. III. 423. a. One may feel pain, without having ever felt pleasure. IV. 514. a. b.
Painters, whose pictures deceived men and beasts, are not the more excellent on that account. I. 369. a. b. V. 624. b. 625. a. b. Who made the goddesses like their mistresses. III. 57. a.
Palace (English) a house near the Vatican, why so called. III. 322. b.
Paladins, the fables that are writ of them, have been introduced into religion. I. 166.
Palatine (the Elector) restored to his dominions by the treaty of Munster. III. 247. a. Promises a retreat to the Socinians in the town of Mannheim. 903. Causes the acts relating to the affair of the Landgrave of Hesse, to be published, on account of the need in which he himself stands of them. 943. b. 944. a. b.
Palatinate, where the Ecclesiastical History of that country is to be found. I. 241. a. The revolution which happened there upon the death of Frederic III. V. 521.
Palavicin (Cardinal) a thought which he borrows from Aristotle. I. 126. b. 127. a. What he acknowledges with respect to the decisions of the council of Trent. 704. a. A disappointment that happens to him. II. 473. a. b. Much less prudent in refusing Father Paul, than Baronius, in refusing the Centuriators of Magdeburg. 643. b. He did not know that President Ferrier had changed his religion. III. 38. b. Several of his maxims censured in the New Gospel. 326. b. He pitied the Popes, when they had no other assistance, besides that of the Holy Ghost. V. 826.
Palestine, some Monks there had abandoned the cloaths and sentiments of men, I. 112. a. There is a mountain of gold promised there to the Christians, when they shall have conquered the Turks. V. 95. a.
Palingenius (Helias) a name which John Pincier borrowed. IV. 647. a.
Palladium, by whom made, and of what materials. I. 6.
Pamphlets; small Pamphlets, however good they be, are easily dissipated. IV. 652. a.
Pan punished by Venus, for giving the prize of beauty to another. I. 74. a. His birth. IV. 541. a. b. 542. a. Whole son he was, and how he comes to have goat's feet. ibid. b.
Panæti, a great Philosopher of the sect of the Stoics. III. 7.
Pancretus, the base complaisance of that Poet for Hadrian, and the reward which he received for it. I. 348. a.
Pandects: first book of the Pandects neglected by the Doctors. I. 477. a. Contains the finest laws of nature, and of Moral and Civil Philosophy. ibid.
Panegyrics, an easy way of composing one. II. 819. b. A multitude of them only serves to disguise Histories. III. 708. b.
Panegyrist; extravagant Panegyrist do more harm than good to those whom they praise. I. 469. a. Are too apt to make use of great words. 646. b. 647. a. b. Disguise what is disadvantageous to the memory of their heroes. 690. a. Those who praised the murderers of Kings, rewarded by the Spaniards. II. 103. a. b. Panegyrist who praise wicked things, Ilocrates not one of their number. 235. a. b. The modern Panegyrist carry their ideas farther than the Antients did. 715. a. Are very apt to contradict themselves. IV. 495. a. Love to exceed one another. 589. a. See Encomium. Panegyrist are much more ingenious than the Princes whom they praise, in heightening every thing that may tend to their honour. IV. 608. a. We ought not to imagine that the discourses of a Panegyrist, should influence either his conversation, or the Moral and Historical books he writes. V. 331. a. b.

Panglossia,

- Pangloss*, Balzac expresses some contempt for a book which had that title. IV. 531. b.
- Pannonius* (Johannes), his verses concerning the search which the Popes were obliged to undergo before their election. IV. 730. b. And upon the bastard daughter of Paul II. 510. a.
- Panopæia*, the author of that book, and the subject it treats of. II. 536, 537.
- Panstratia*, a book of Chamier's, how called by the author of the Bibliothèque de Dauphiné. II. 434. a. b.
- Pantaloon* corrects his error with respect to Bibliander's death. I. 803. b.
- Pantomimes*, when introduced upon the stage. I. 676. a. Zosimus places the introduction of the dances of the Pantomimes, among the causes of the destruction of the Roman empire. ibid. They were great provocatives to lust. 676, 677. It was under Augustus that these dances came to perfection. IV. 646. b. How the Antients have represented the manual language of the Pantomimes. 647. a. b.
- Papacy*, how difficult it is to exercise it. III. 564. b.
- Papebroch* has struck several faints out of the Kalendar. II. 740. a. Quoted. III. 330. a. 441. b. V. 467. a.
- Papers* torn in pieces and thrown into the sea, preserved by a very singular accident. II. 577. a.
- Paper-wars* are sometimes violent and of a long continuance. I. 322. b.
- Paphnuceius* converts a woman of pleasure. V. 321. b.
- Papists* formerly joined with the Turks and Pagans in the public prayers of the Protestants. IV. 199. b. Their divisions. III. 343. b. n. (30).
- Pappas*, Professor at Strasburg, what he asked of God for the Protestants of France, and for all the persecuted churches. V. 258. a.
- Paracelsus*, his notion about our first parents. I. 103. b.
- Paraclete*, how that word ought to be pronounced. IV. 470. a. b. 471. a. b.
- Paradise*, the great men of Rome distribute the places thereof for money. II. 713. b. It is pretended that Machiavel said in one of his works, that he had rather be sent to hell after his death, than go to Paradise. IV. 15. b. Whether that which Mahomet promised, was one of the causes that drew so many followers to him. 30. b. 31. a. b. What has been said concerning the occupations of Paradise. III. 895. a. What town was called the Paradise of Germany. II. 816. a.
- Paradise of Seneca*, a kind of union which may be so called. II. 119. a.
- Paradise Lost*, an English Poem which is greatly esteemed. IV. 219. a. b.
- Parasite*, one that runs after a good bit. II. 469. b. 470. a. The most famous Parasite of his time. IV. 246. a. b. 247. a. b. 248. a. b. 252. a. b. What is the compass and polar-star of a Parasite. ibid. b.
- Parcament*, the invention of it. IV. 555. a.
- Parcailhan* (Segur) undertakes a deputation to the Protestant Princes, and the cause of that deputation. II. 143. a.
- Parides* (Father), why it was suspected that he had no real design to confute Des Cartes. IV. 902. b.
- Pardon*; people do not so easily pardon reflecting words as injurious actions. V. 364. b. 365. a.
- Parent* (Francis), his Majesty's Greek Professor in the university of Paris. I. 562.
- Parvus* (Daniel) his Modesta Historia Profana is a work of Altingius. I. 241. a. The Devil expresses all his malice in that author's Calvinus Oribedokus. III. 539. a. b.
- Pareus* (David) insulted by the Jesuit Mulhufinus. II. 173. b. n. (14).
- Paris* was very effeminate. III. 297. a. His judgment concerning the beauty of the three goddesses. 644. a. b. He grows jealous of Corythus and kills him. IV. 401. b. 402. a.
- Paris*, the Comedian, was killed by Domitian's orders. II. 684. a.
- Paris*, what is said of that city in the Saint-Evremondiana. IV. 439. b. How far the corruption of it goes with respect to the women. 498. b. 499. a. b. cf. seq. It is nevertheless thought to be less impure than the greatest part of the capital cities in the West. 500. a. The fabulous siege of it by the giant Ilausus. 738. b.
- Parishes*; every parish should be summoned to produce the proofs of its devotions. IV. 556. a.
- Parisiens*, what judgment they pass upon books that are composed by an author who never went out of his province. IV. 458. a. The sedition which they carried on in the year 1648. 488. b.
- Parliament of Paris*; the order which that Parliament made against the Chymists. I. 469. b. And concerning the theses which attacked Aristotle's doctrine. ibid. An act which was purloined from its records. III. 297. b. 298. a. Refuses to register the edict of January. 509. b. 510. a. 512. b. In what stile Charles IX harangues it. I. 256. a. III. 512. b. Severely mortified. 825. a. b. Makes a very remarkable decree with respect to commissions. IV. 241. b. Remonstrances which it makes to Lewis XI. V. 443. a. b. A conjecture upon the reasons which moved that Parliament to involve the Jesuits in Chastel's affair. III. 279. b. 280. a. b. Its conduct justified in that respect. ibid. In what manner it treated Francis Surgier, a seditious preacher. V. 273. and a. b. 274. and a. b.
- Parliament of Bourdeaux*, Chancellor Hospital gives that Parliament a smart reprimand. III. 512. a. b.
- Parliaments* have too much grandeur for the trifling causes which are decided therein. II. 724. b. Parliaments of France, their stiffness is sometimes prejudicial to the state. III. 825. a. b. V. 443. b. Ought never to differ from the King in affairs of state. 444. a. b. Whether the interest of the kingdom requires that they should have more power than at present they enjoy in France. III. 512. b. 513. a. b. They have been long excluded from a share in the sovereignty. 825. b. 826. a.
- Parma* (the Duke of) endeavours to amuse Queen Elizabeth with secret proposals of peace. II. 662. a.
- Parmenides*, his opinion about the universe. V. 575. b. What his system was. 587. a.
- Parrhasius* quoted. III. 248. b. n. (91), (92). An examination of what is advanced there that an Origenist can reduce a Manichee to silence, in discouraging upon the origin of evil. IV. 416. a. b. 421. a. b.
- Perry* (William) being convicted of having designed to kill the Queen, is punished with death. II. 576. a. b.
- Partians*, a piece of conduct which shews, that they deserved the name of Barbarians, that the Greeks and Romans gave them. V. 273. a. Besiege Antioch, raise the siege, and their General is killed. II. 348. Fought as they fled. III. 521. b.
- Party*; it is difficult to preserve the affection and esteem of two contrary parties. I. 538. a. b. If any one fairly represents all the force of the opposite party's arguments, he draws down reproaches upon himself. 730. a. b. II. 456. b. 487. b. Whether a man ought to set the arguments of the opposite party in a weak light. ibid. 488. a. b. Whether it does service to a party to employ, in its defence, all sorts of reasons, good or bad. 708. a. Each party makes false steps which reciprocally serves to ballance and support the other. III. 954. b. The same things appear to us true or false, according as they favour our own or the opposite party. IV. 733. b. 734. a. b. 735. a. b. 736. a. b. 737. a. b. A strange effect of the spirit of party. 711. b. Party at all times determines the fate of dramatical performances. I. 867. a. b. Its ordinary artifices. 774. a. b.
- Partial*, oftentimes people accuse an Historian of being partial for no other reason but because they are remarkably so themselves. II. 310. a. b.
- Parties*, those which are termed causales expose people to great illusions. V. 184. b.
- Particular persons* are no more exempt from divisions than communities. III. 343. b.
- Particularism*, a great dispute raised on that subject. I. 261. a. b.
- Partridge*, a story that is told of the partridge. II. 725. a.

Paris

- Parts* (James des), Nicolas Præpositus steals from his Dispenfatory. IV. 764. a. b. Particulars which concern him. ibid. and n. (1), (2).
- Pascal*, the happy turn which he had naturally for the Mathematics. IV. 61. a. What the Abbot du Mas says of him. 491. a. One of his apologists would perhaps be puzzled by several remarks in the history of the five propositions. 492. a. Why, after having confessed himself in a disemper, he delayed communicating. 537. b. n. (24). What he esteemed most in Mr Des Cartes's Philosophy. 548. b. He despised Mathematics even before he gave himself up to devotion. V. 621. a.
- Paschalius* quoted. I. 577. b.
- Pasquier* censured for several considerable blunders. I. 25. b. Did not at all understand a passage of Abelard. ibid. A quarrel that was commenced with him. 670. a. b. Quoted. 792. b. n. (58). III. 399. b. n. (52), (53). 411. a. n. (82), (83), (84), (85), (86). V. 405. a. b. n. (a), (1), (2). 443. b. n. (4), (5), (6). Censured for the manner after which he tries to excuse Dante, with respect to the word Butcher. II. 296. b. He does not reason justly in the application he makes of a general thesis to Pyrrhus and Cæsar, to Pope Leo and Pope Nicolas. 414. a. His sons revenge his quarrel on a Jesuit who had traduced him. III. 132. b. 133. a. His judgment concerning those who have writ upon the Civil-Law. 201. b. He ridicules a man who was soon after canonized. 896. b. What account he gives of the Jesuits. 897. b. Is guilty of an anachronism which is censured by Garasse, and but ill defended by his sons. 908. b. 909. a. A passage of his plea against the Jesuits confuted. IV. 80. a. b. 81. a. b. 82. a. Censured by Garasse with respect to the word Paraclete. 470. b. 471. a. b. What he says of clandestine marriages, and of rapes. 636. a. b. 637. a. b. What he answers in defence of Mercerus who was accused of being a caballing man. 842. b. He disapproves of Tabourot's making additions to his Miscellany. I. 64. a. b. The judgment which he passes on le Feron's books of Heraldry. III. 27. a. b.
- Passage*: a remarkable passage left out in a second edition, but preserved by Usher. II. 94. a. b. The fate of passages which people copy from the first modern writer that comes in their way. 334. b. A curious passage of a manuscript left out in the printed edition. 633. a. b. One ought to distrust such as are cited by halves. V. 350. a.
- Passew* (the treaty of) gave full liberty of conscience to all the States of the empire. V. 672.
- Passtilaine* (John de), Bishop of Belley: Lewis XIII grants him the ancient privileges of his diocese. I. 737.
- Paster*, what the Paster of Catullus signifies in Martial. II. 396. a.
- Passeratius*, what he says against a certain faction of Grammarian Antiquarians. IV. 830. b. And against those who contemned Ovid. 432. b. 433. a.
- Passions* resemble animals which seek their food. II. 3. a. Cover themselves with a specious pretext. 30. a. b. Whoever designs to cure them must take a proper time for it. 564. b. Their first motions are not voluntary. 676. a. Their usefulness after sin. 855. a. b. They make us suppress circumstances which we do not like. III. 304. a. The greatest part of them, as well as their effects, are involuntary, and reason is too weak to destroy them. 376. a. IV. 440. b. 441. a. b. 442. a. b. 857. b. There is almost as much necessity for being above the passions to come to the knowledge of some kind of truths, as to act virtuously. 323. b. If they were once rooted up people would find no difficulty in the practice of virtue. 441. a. b. 442. a. b. Beasts are not capable of them, according to the opinion of the Stoics. 552. b. 553. a. b. 554. a. b.
- Pastor Fido* has produced bad effects. III. 259. b. 260. a. b. 261. a.
- Pastorals* (Tragi-Comic), pieces invented contrary to the rules of ancient Poetry. III. 259. a.
- Pastorals*, a romance upon the amours of Daphnis and Chloe, what are the faults of it. III. 866. a. b.
- Pastors*, wicked Pastors abuse their authority to bring about their own ends. III. 772. b. Good Christians are persuaded that they ought to hide their faults. V. 648. a. See Ministers.
- Pastoureaux*, the name of certain Fanatics; people did not at first discover their pernicious errors. II. 383. a. The most judicious reflexion of an Historian, upon that head. ibid.
- Patience*; examples of an extraordinary patience. I. 559. a. II. 674. a. IV. 487. b. 488. a. A patience which went beyond the necessary bounds. I. 734. b. 735. a. b.
- Patin* (Guy) his Cynical Liberty. I. 171. b. His mistake touching certain verses of Pasquier. 792. b. Quoted. II. 138. a. b. 268. a. n. (101). 650. a. n. (23), (24), (25). IV. 89. a. n. (8). His judgment with respect to Calvin's wit and learning. II. 268. a. We are obliged to him for the publication of that Reformer's life writ by Papyrius Masso. ibid. a. b. In what manner he speaks of Mr Tardieu and his wife. III. 40. b. 41. a. The necessity of rectifying his letters by notes. 266. a. A confutation of what he has said of Thuanus's death. 827. a. b. His invective against Joseph du Chesne. II. 468. b. Censured for a particular he relates of Augustin Niphus's Life. IV. 380.
- Patin* (Charles) the cause of his disgrace. IV. 505. b. 506. a. b.
- Patriarch* of Constantiaople, strangled during the session of the Council of Florence. I. 266.
- Patricius* is an equivocal word. IV. 638. b.
- Patrimony*: there were Philosophers that renounced their patrimonies before the preaching of the Gospel. I. 294. a. b. The contempt of one's patrimony, is a more valuable possession than the patrimony itself. 390. b. The laws of Aldera put a mark of infamy upon those who had spent it. II. 635. a. b.
- Pattins*, women that wore very large ones. II. 599. a. b.
- Pavia*: the battle of Pavia foretold to the Queen-Regent by Turrel, according to Paradin. V. 417.
- Pavia* (the Cardinal di) obliged to sign briefs which he had not seen. IV. 511. a. b.
- Pavin* (St) a famous Libertine, whose conversion has been put among the moral impossibilities. II. 650. a. b.
- Paul* (St) whether he pretended that a husband had power to dispose of his wife's body, in favour of another man. I. 91. b. Accused of straining his expressions. 106. a. b. 107. a. b. Compared to a great sea which swells by the impetuosity of the wind. 109. b. And treated with great inreverence by the Italians. ibid. 110. a. b. How Bembo treated his epistles. 743. a. He stood in need of a strong check and severe mortification, lest the excellency of the revelations that were communicated to him, should have puffed him up with pride. V. 367. b. Simon Simonius affirmed that he could propose objections, which that apostle would not have been able to answer. 150. b. 151. a. He acknowledges that his doctrine is obscure, and that he knows it but imperfectly. 816. Gets out of the difficulties of Predestination, no otherwise than by asserting the absolute power of God over his creatures. 821. This Apostle's aim, when he forbids us to name any thing that is filthy. 857, 858.
- Paul* (Father) his extream joy in beholding Mr Sommerdyk at Venice. I. 3. a. His jest upon one of the sessions of the Council of Trent. 469. b. More imbued with the Protestant than the Catholic faith. 717. a. His friendship for Mr Daillé. II. 580. b. 581. a. Criticized by Palavicini with respect to the letters, which the Council of Trent was to dispatch. III. 51. a. b. A thought of his concerning the circumstances which favoured the reformation. 948. a. A strange maxim of this great man. V. 14. a. His narrative of the interview, which Vergerius had with Luther. 452. a. b. And of the former's assisting at the assembly of Worms. 453. a. b. It is said that he made great use of Vergerius's libels. 456. a. b. His History of the Council of Trent, translated into Latin by Adam Newton. IV. 360. Considerations which hinder him from confuting the Squittino della Liberta Peneta. V. 449. a. b.
- Paul Jovius*, takes too much pleasure in collecting together popular traditions. II. 878. a. Quoted im- pertinently on the subject of Hadrian VI. III. 327. b. 328. a. Censured by Nonnius with respect to the pillars of Hercules. 431. a. His faults with respect to the book intitled, Obscurorum Virorum Epistole.

- Epistola*. 474. b. 475. a. Censured for the characters he gives Ajaxetus and Alamannus. IV. 11. b. Blamed for his negligence, on the subject of Alphonso, King of Naples. IV. 311. b. 312. a.
- Paul II* (Pope) treats a company of learned men cruelly, and for what reason. II. 877. Turns all the abbreviators out of their places. IV. 683. They present a petition to him, but he returns a very rough answer. 684. and a. In what sense he condemned the word Academy. 685. a. b. Laments the rigour of the law which binds priests to celibacy. 411. a. b.
- Paul III* (Pope) his indignation against the whole order of the Capuchins. IV. 388. b. What Alciatus says of him. III. 590. b. 591. a. Accused of Magic, and of holding intimate conversation with Magicians. II. 499. a. b.
- Paul IV* (Pope) refuses a dispensation of marriage from a regard to the private interest of his family. IV. 632. b. 633. a. b. The acknowledgment which he made. ibid. b. 634. a.
- Paul V* (Pope) in favour of the Duke of Lerma, departs from the custom of not sending the hat to Cardinals newly elected. I. 604. b.
- Paula Malatesta*, a very eminent lady. III. 185. a. b.
- Paulina* wore in her dress and on her head, jewels to the value of four millions of Crowns. III. 861. b.
- Paulus Samosatenus* protected by Zenobia. V. 604.
- Pausanias* assassinates Philip, King of Macedonia. IV. 404. a. What were the consequences of that assassination. ibid.
- Pausanias*, a passage of that author misunderstood by Romulus Amasæus. II. 826. a.
- Pe* (Lazarus) translates Marinello's book on the difficulties of women, and accuses Liebaud of Plagiarism. IV. 148. a. b.
- Peace*; there are circumstances, in which each of the Princes, that conclude a peace, incur a general blame. II. 740. a. A punishment which in ancient times was imprecated on those who should violate a treaty of peace. 742. a. Is easily concluded, when both parties find themselves under a necessity of ending the war. III. 90. a. They break the peace, not who first make war, but who fraudulently carry on secret practices. II. 104. a. b. The proper time for a Prince to make peace, is the time of his enemy's ill-fortune. V. 661.
- Peacocks*, who was the first among the Romans, that introduced the custom of eating peacocks in entertainments. III. 492. Those birds were extremely valued by the ancient Greeks. IV. 569. b. s. (44).
- Pedant*, his character. I. 373. a. b. 376. a. b.
- Pedraffy*, in ancient times, that sort of love was not branded with infamy. I. 292. The Heathen gods reproached with it. II. 482. a. b. 483. a.
- Peers of France*, whether the creation of them should be ascribed to Charlemagne. III. 336. a. b.
- Pegna* (Francis) publishes two editions of the Directory of the Inquisitors. II. 749.
- Peyrat* reproaches the Lutherans with suppressing all the copies they could find of a certain Missal. III. 558. b. 559. a. The reasons which he alleges to ground that reproach upon, are not solid. ibid. a. b.
- Pelagians*, severe decrees against them. I. 229. a. b. 230. a. Nothing can be more acceptable to them, than to say, that the fear of the false gods, was able to induce men to repent. V. 812.
- Pelagius II* (Pope), sends to Constantinople to demand succours against the Lombards. III. 219.
- Pelagi* carry off the Athenian women. III. 754. b. 755. a.
- Pelson*, the height of that mountain. II. 659. a. b.
- Pelisson*, a reflexion upon four verses of his making. II. 420. b. What he says of the difficulty there is in composing with an easy air. III. 262. a. b. His reflexion upon the injustice of those who condemn the occupations of others. IV. 843. a. While he was at Toulouse, he formed the plan of a club of wits. V. 394. a.
- Pellout* (Cardinal) an unlucky thing that happened to him with respect to an harangue which he had prepared. V. 778.
- Peloponnesus*, the expedition in which the Heraclidæ
V O L. V.
- retook it, precedes the Historical time. I. 241. a. Whether all the cities thereof were maritime cities. 657. a. b.
- Peloponnesian war*, the cause of it was not known. IV. 570. b. 571. a.
- Pelopi*, the wonderful qualities that are ascribed to one of his ribs. V. 289. a.
- Pen*, one that had lasted forty years. I. 231. b. 232. a. A pen dipt in good sense. 469. a. Pens consecrated to the Holy Virgin. 617. b. III. 841. b. There is nothing so execrable, which mercenary pens will not attempt to justify. II. 100. and b. 101. and a. b. The great effects of the pen. I. 720. b.
- Pen of gold*: a witty jest of Henry IV, upon an Historian who boasted that he had a pen of gold. III. 339. b.
- Pen* by way of bravado, said to be made with a sword. I. 548.
- Penance*: an example of a rude penance. I. 96. a. b.
- Penates* (Dii) children were sacrificed to them. II. 163. b.
- Penelope* governs herself much more prudently than Helen. III. 367. b.
- Penetration*: several people make themselves ridiculous by their affecting too great a penetration. IV. 687. a. b.
- Penitence* put off to death-bed, as well as extreme unction. I. 701. b. Is liable to be suspected. V. 556. b. A remarkable abuse of this sacrament, and the complaints that were made of it. II. 459. b. 460. a. b.
- Penitentiaries*, their complaints to the first President of Paris. IV. 499. a.
- Pennafort*, General of the Dominicans, causes it to be decreed in a chapter held at Toledo, that they should apply themselves to the study of Hebrew and Arabic. IV. 167. Is desirous of purging Spain from Judaism and Mahometism. ibid.
- Pennetier* (Henry) an apostate Minister. III. 735. b.
- Pensioners*: State-Pensioners do not enjoy their pensions without care and trouble. III. 176. a. b.
- Pensions* assigned on the revenues of the Church. I. 751. a. b. Whether large pensions procure esteem to men and their productions. III. 340. a. b.
- People*; their folly. I. 154. b. Often punished for the faults of Princes. 158. b. 159. a. II. 340. a. b. 341. a. b. Have a ridiculous fondness for every thing which they find established. I. 349. Would be formidable to the Clergy, in case they had a sufficient capacity to demand of them an account of their doctrine. 564. b. 565. a. Demand nothing but bread and public shews. 573. b. 574. a. Stand in need of being nourished with a blind and artificial hatred to the enemies of the state. 681. b. 682. a. Their rights strongly maintained by Bodin. II. 46. b. 47. a. b. 48. a. They sometimes do justice to oppressed innocence. 337. a. There are certain things in which they love to be deceived. 539. a. When they are mutinous, there is no possibility of making them hearken to reason. 542. a. There is no stress to be laid on their fidelity. 608. a. They will remain quiet, if not agitated by some external force. 741. a. b. Their capricious and uneven disposition. III. 452. a. b. 467. a. b. 468. a. IV. 603. a. b. They are fated to suffer for the follies of many others. III. 530. b. How far their weakness goes, when they are prepossessed and imposed upon by persecutors. 626. and a. Their ordinary disposition, with respect to treaties of peace, and to war. V. 104. a. b. The people likened to coquets. III. 798. a. b. Are more tender of their private interest than of the fundamental laws of the State. IV. 603. b. The rights of the people have fair sides, they have likewise ugly ones. V. 749. What a Cardinal said of the people. 748, 749. They easily believe what flatters them. 749. a. b.
- Pepin*, whether he divorced Plectrude and married Alpaide. III. 707. b. 708. a.
- Perafa*, the priestesses of that place boasted of being able to walk on burning coals without hurt. II. 531. a.
- Pereaus* (Charles) is mistaken with respect to Cardinal Berulle. I. 786. b. His judgment concerning Homer and his dialogue between Hector and Andromache. 333. b. He is obliged to suppress some elegies. 498. a. b. Laughs at a place of the 11 K
Iliad

- Iliad*. II. 481. a. b. His lines upon the disadvantage our lawyers lie under, compared with those of antiquity. 724. b. As yet there has been no answer made to his parallel. IV. 741. b.
- Perhaps*: it is a very common fault to change into an affirmation what an author has only delivered with a perhaps. IV. 381.
- Pericles* afflicted Anaxagoras with his riches. I. 295. b. The suspicion of irreligion is fastened upon him. 307. a. The answer he made when he suffered an old woman's remedy to hang about his neck. II. 649. b. Being thrown upon the ground in wrestling, he persuaded the spectators that he did not really fall. III. 390. b. IV. 567. b. An offer which he makes to the Athenians. V. 552. b.
- Perimede*, according to the Scholiast on Theocritus, is the same with Agamede. IV. 585.
- Peripatetic* (John) causes the History of Theodoric by Cochlæus to be reprinted with additions and notes. II. 523. a.
- Periods*: two periods bordering upon one another, and beginning with the same word easily escape the transcribers. IV. 711. b. There are half-periods, which may be taken out of a book, and still leave a tolerable sense behind. ibid.
- Peripatetic Philosophy*, why it finds so many protectors. I. 472. b. Could not prove the immortality of the soul. IV. 717. a. b. & seq.
- Peripatetics*, reflexions upon their substantial forms. II. 251. a.
- Perjury* unpunished changed a superstitious man into an Atheist. II. 652. b. 653. a.
- Perpetuity of the Faith*, who is the author of that book. I. 493. a. b.
- Perron* (Cardinal du) always had his works twice printed. I. 318. b. What he thought of Bellarmine's controversial books. 730. a. b. His excuse to a Princess before whom he was obliged to speak sitting. II. 422. b. Particulars concerning him. IV. 240. a. b. His invidious reflexion upon the Protestants. III. 42. b. He gives Mrs de Gournai a most satirical rub. 206. b. 207. a. He had notwithstanding a regard for her. ibid. a. b. Disputes with Michael Berault in the conference of Mantes. I. 756.
- Persecution for religion's sake*, how unjust it is. I. 240. b. 241. a. A fine passage of St Augustin against persecution. 287. b. 288. a. Whether in time of persecution it be not necessary to make outward profession of the truth. 663. a. b. Persecution sharpens the wit, and makes a man wonderfully clear-sighted in discovering the mystical sense. III. 772. b. See Non-tolerance in affairs of religion.
- Persecutors of religion*, their cunning. II. 30. a. b. The finest maxims of Christian morality, when alleged by them, become trifling. III. 289. a. b. The conformity between Pagan and Christian persecutors. 446. a. b. An instance of their peridy. 623. b. 624. a. Their different conduct according to the difference of times. IV. 815. a. b. They are very much puzzled how to justify their conduct, especially when they themselves complain of the persecutions that they have suffered. V. 22. b. 23. a. According to Jurieu we fulfil the command that enjoins us to love our neighbours, when we with spiritual felicity to them. 648. b.
- Persepolis*, who was the cause of its destruction. V. 320. a. b.
- Perſia*, the Christians are persecuted there. I. 13. a. b. The artifices made use of by the Magi in that country to destroy the Christian religion. ibid. The epithet that was given to the King of Persia. I. 130. b. 514. a. b. II. 513. b. n. (11). What the Kings of Persia did for their language. III. 172. a. n. (14). The women there are handsome. IV. 35. b. What notion the learned men in that country have of the Supreme Being. V. 201. a. b.
- Perſians*, whence so called, and what was the origin of their first Kings. I. 72. a. b. They are indebted to Zoroaster for their Philosophy. 444. What was the happiness that they expected from their principal deity. ibid. They very much esteemed those who could bear a great deal of wine. II. 598. a. They believe that Mahomet Mahadi is not dead, and that he is one day to reunite all men in the same belief. IV. 125. a. Their ancient religion. V. 635. a. b. 636. a. b.
- Pesla* (Dominic de) a Jacobine, hanged with Savonarola, and for what reason. V. 64.
- Petavius* (Father) why he refused to answer a Minister. II. 578. a. Has contradicted himself in representing the doctrine of the three first centuries. IV. 601. b. 602. a.
- Peter* (Saint); a visionary pretends that he was the Janus, the Æneas, the Romulus, of whom the Sibyl spoke. III. 529. a. b.
- Peters* (Father) a satire against him. I. 344. a.
- Petition of the Dictionaries*, Menage suppressed that petition. I. 620. a. Quoted. III. 208. a. b.
- Petitions*: an infinite number of petitions of the Protestants of France, have been printed without ever being presented to the King. I. 532. a. b. The qualities with which they must be accompanied, if the petitioners would obtain any thing at court. III. 341. a. b.
- Petra Sancta* (Sylveſter à) a Jesuit, his notes upon a letter of du Moulin to Balzac, &c. IV. 280. a. b.
- Petrarch* was not born when Guido Cavalcante died. II. 399. He may pass for Cæsar's Scholar, and steals some thoughts from him. 508.
- Petronilla*. Abbess of the order of Fontevraud, sometimes accompanied Robert d'Arbriffel in his travels. III. 64. a. b.
- Petronius* less dangerous with all his gross obscenities, than he is in the nice drefs of Count de Rabutin. V. 847.
- Peucer*, what he says concerning the death of Paul II. examined. IV. 510. a. b. 511. a.
- Phalaris*, the letters which bear his name are a supposititious work. I. 5. a. V. 607. a. On what conditions he was willing to abdicate. IV. 563. b. The advice which he gave Stesichorus. V. 149. b. His bull. 358. b. At what time he lived. 607. a.
- Phalerum* was the port of the Athenians before the Piræus was built. II. 832. b.
- Phantoms*, there were some that haunted a house. I. 225. Another appears to Brutus. II. 350. a. b. May occasion a mortal distemper. 715. b. 716. a. Whether it be not possible that a man may believe, when awake, that he sees one. III. 741. a. b. A story concerning them. IV. 725. b. Whether Spinoza had reason to deny that there were any. V. 215. a. b. See Spirits.
- Pharamond*; whether he instituted the Salic Law. III. 336. a. b. We have but little certainty that there ever was such a man in the world. 338. a.
- Pharisees* were less honest men than the Sadducees. V. 11. a. b.
- Pharus*; A cunning device of him that built it. V. 553. b.
- Pharſalia* torn in pieces by some young men. IV. 623. b.
- Phœvrius*, the railery which he made use of against a young man that was a great lover of old-fashioned words. IV. 830. a.
- Pharſua*, the feigned name of a maid of honour to the Princess of Salerno whom Augustin Niphus was in love with. IV. 380. b.
- Pherecydes* died of a pedicular distemper. I. 211. b.
- Pheros* was in love with a servant maid. II. 140. a.
- Phidias*, his master-piece. III. 756. a. Under what pretence, and with what view he drew the ladies to his house. IV. 569. b.
- Philemon*, killed by the Phlegians, while he strove to defend the temple of Delphos. IV. 626. a.
- Philopbus*, the advice which he gives to Laurence Valla. V. 435. a.
- Philistinus*; the History of him. IV. 554. b. 555. a.
- Philip*, King of Macedonia, the dream which he had after marrying Olympia, differently expounded by his Diviners. I. 448. a. b. Whether one has reason to surmise, that he had read the holy Scriptures. ibid. He is praised as a great drinker. II. 598. a. A joke of demosthenes on that head. ibid. An author undertakes to write his History for the use of the United Provinces. 768. a. By whom killed, and for what. IV. 404. a.
- Philip*, another King of Macedonia, an Ode writ against him. I. 191. How he defended himself against Alcæus. ibid. a.
- Philip*, the Consul has a great violence committed upon him. II. 711. b. 712. a.

- Philip*, the Emperor, whether he was a Christian. I. 593. a. b.
- Philip* I. King of France excommunicated in the councils of Autun and Clermont, and for what reason. III. 62. a.
- Philip de Valois*, King of France, confirms a knight-hood conferred on another person by a knight. III. 282. a.
- Philip of Burgundy*, natural son to Philip the Good, was not very chaste. III. 148. a. b.
- Philip* II, King of Spain, his jealousy and his mysterious politics did him harm sometimes. I. 588. a. What people thought of him after he had caused Constantius Pontius to be burned in effigy. II. 336. b. Upon what consideration, after having thus tarnished his father's memory, he would not however suffer him to be indicted as a Heretic. ibid. His answer to Cardinal de Granville touching the retirement of Charles. V. 439. a. His ingratitude towards his father. ibid. b. He causes his father's scourge to be brought to him, and gives it to his son. ibid. Makes a dishonourable peace. III. 419. b. 420. a. b. Aspires to the Imperial crown. II. 223. Conquers Portugal from D. Antonio. V. 319.
- Philip* III, King of Spain, censured as a lazy Prince. IV. 127. a. Renounces all his rights to the hereditary countries of the house of Austria, situated in Germany. V. 673.
- Philip* IV, King of Spain falls in love with an actress. I. 589. b.
- Philisburg* is left in the possession of France by the treaty of Munster. III. 720. a.
- Philistines* must have been terrible folks in love-matters. I. 40. b. Had nevertheless a great regard for marriage. ibid.
- Phylarchus*, the original of his quarrel with Balzac. III. 204. and a.
- Philo* would discover mysteries which we ought not to pry into. I. 122. b. His embassy to Caligula. 374. b. He condemns three sorts of legislators with respect to marriage. II. 504. b. His oration on true nobility translated by Daniel d'Auge. I. 562. a.
- Philologists* are easily provoked, and difficultly appeased. IV. 476. a. b. V. 92. a. b.
- Philosophers*: the ancient Philosophers had tenets for the vulgar, and tenets for disciples initiated into their mysteries. I. 472. b.
- Philosophers* (Heathen) were not impious men. I. 255. b. Were the only writers whom the Christians had to oppose. ibid. Some of them parted with all their worldly goods. 294. a. b. 295. a. b. The ancient Philosophers went back as far as the Chaos, and the first origin of all things. 302. b. Complain that every thing is involved in darkness. 305. b. Who was the first Philosopher that published books. 309. b. It is an axiom with the schoolmen that a Philosopher ought not to have recourse to God in order to explain the effects of nature. 310. a. Are not qualified to judge of the machine of the world. ibid. b. 311. a. Whether the Philosophers who used all their industry to come at the knowledge of the true God, and to honour him religiously, had that faith by which the just live. 323. b. The true description of a perfect Philosopher. 383. b. Among their disciples, there was always one that was his master's favourite. 408. a. The antients have left the History of the Philosophers in a wretched state. 415. b. 416. a. A Philosopher by practice and not by profession. 464. a. They should dip their pen in good sense. 469. a. It has been said that there is nothing so absurd but has been maintained by some Philosophers. II. 31. b. Antiquity had two sorts of Philosophers; some were like the advocates, and others like those who report a cause. 487. b. Their History has been intermixed with as many prodigious adventures as that of the knights errant. 637. Nothing was more worthy a Philosopher, fully persuaded of the existence of the true God, than to laugh at the superstitions of the Pagans. 670. a. Philosophers and Rhetoricians expelled from Rome. III. 6. a. There are several things which the laws tolerate in the people, and which would not be allowed in a Philosopher. 312. b. 313. a. b. Bore the punishment of the folly of the priests. 642. b. The difficulty they have in explaining the conduct of providence. 919. a. b.
- The ancient Philosophers believed the souls of men to be material, as well as those of beasts. IV. 548. b. 549. a. b. 550. a. Some of them made no distinction between thought and sensation. ibid. b. The people would not suffer them to treat of natural causes. 566. b. Philosophers who were of no particular sect. 860. a. Philosophers always accused of irreligion. V. 286. a. b. Undertake to give an account of their doctrine to all the world. 815, 816. St Paul does not challenge them to a disputation, on the contrary he exhorts believers to stand well on their guard against Philosophy. 816. Their disputes looked upon by the Fathers as great obstacles to faith. ibid.
- Philosophers* (Indian) the austerities of some among them. II. 115. a. b. 116. a. b.
- Philosophy* will destroy both errors and truths, if she be allowed to have her full scope. I. 97. a. II. 848. a. b. III. 459. a. b. 460. a. b. In what sense it ought, and ought not, to have recourse to God in order to explain the effects of nature. I. 310. b. 311. a. By what means Lactantius pretends to destroy all Philosophy. 411. a. b. 412. a. And particularly that of the Academics. 411. b. Who was the first that brought it over to Athens. 414. a. b. et c. Philosophy and Divinity are not well agreed upon their proper boundaries. 472. b. Philosophy can carry a man no farther than to make him confess at last that he is only assured of one thing, viz. that he knows nothing. II. 202. a. Whether Divinity can subsist without it. ibid. b. Its disputes resemble that about the oyster. 485. b. 486. a. Strabo says it could not lead us to faith. 832. a. It has been sometimes debased. 845. b. 846. a. Whether a doctrine that is false in Philosophy can be true in Divinity. III. 479. a. 951. a. b. 952. a. b. See Reason. The Peripatetic Philosophy is only fit to foment the divisions of the Divines. 558. a. Whether Theology ought to be subjected to it. IV. 419. b. Philosophy is at a stand in answering the objections of the Manichees, with respect to their two principles. 522. a. It is a remedy for impiety and superstition. V. 287. b. Is disfigured by the vain subtleties of the schoolmen. 339. a. b. It is essential to the truths of the Gospel, not to be consistent with Philosophy. 815.
- Philosophy* (Civil and Political) a book of Politics by Arrerac. I. 505. a. b. Judgment which is passed upon it. ibid. b.
- Philosophy* (Soldier's) a work of Audiguier's. I. 548. a.
- Philosophy* (Occult) the History of that book. I. 154. a. And the key to it. ibid. and 155. a. b. 156. a.
- Philosophize*: it is impossible to philosophize justly without the evidence of ideas. I. 470. b. One ought to observe a just medium in it. II. 847. a. b. 848. a. b. The natural consequences which a disputing and dialectician spirit produces. 848. a. b. 849. a.
- Philtre* prepared for one person and taken by another. III. 876. and a.
- Phineas*, whether he be still living in the terrestrial paradise. II. 750. a. Kills a Midianitish woman whom he surprized in the act of fornication. V. 133. a.
- Physic*, its success depends on the blessing of Heaven. III. 664. b. The Faculty of Physic at Paris were formerly very moderate in the practice of drawing blood. II. 99. a. They oppose the practice of frequent bleeding introduced by Botai. ibid. b.
- Physical*: a Physical receipt. II. 197. a. b. 198. a. b.
- Physical*: combination of moral and Physical things. II. 16. a.
- Physicians* ought to profit by the sentence of Agatho. I. 127. a. An oath which they take upon receiving their degree. 399. b. What are the privileges of their profession. ibid. a. Formerly exercised the Apothecaries trade. 465. a. A Physician who laid a surprizing wager. 526. 527. and a. In what manner the common people made use of Physicians formerly. III. 23. a. n. (5). Their constant practice in the XVIIth century was to bleed in the opposite side to where the pleurisy was. II. 141. A civil war raised among the Physicians of Portugal to support that practice. ibid. a. The Emperor's inclination to favour it, if

- if it had not been for the death of Charles III, Duke of Savoy. ibid. b. Who was the first Physician that ever came to Rome. 353. a. The practice of the Paris Physicians is to bleed very much. 696. a. b. They had formerly a public library in their schools. III. 497. The Physicians formerly were wont to ascribe much to the influence of the stars, in discoursing upon distempers. 621. b. A multitude of Physicians kill the patient. 318. b. Banished from Rome. IV. 752. a. b. Whether those whose remedies prove mortal, notwithstanding their honesty and learning, deserve to be punished. 931. a. b. It is an infamous thing in a Physician to make himself work. II. 259. b. 260. a. b. The three qualities of a good Physician. III. 487, 488. Reflections upon the question whether they have good or bad fortune. 488. a.
- Physicians* who wrote in verse: a list of them published by Bartholinus. III. 351. b.
- Physic*; it is thought Alcmaeon was the first who wrote upon that science. I. 210. Lactantius confesses that with respect to Physics, there is no science. 412. a. What is the source of the defect in Aristotle's Physics. 470. a. b.
- Phocas*, his usurpation and cruelties. III. 222. a. b. The praises which the Pope bestows upon him. ibid. b.
- Phocæans* seize upon the temple of Delphos, to enable them to make war with the Thebans. IV. 621. and a. b. Éc. They are supported in that war by the Athenians and Lacedæmonians. ibid.
- Phocion*, what he said to the officers that attended him when a fellow spit in his face. I. 460. b. His integrity. III. 355.
- Phœaciens* led a voluptuous life. I. 201. b.
- Phœbas*, King of the Phlegians, his cruelty: he is conquered by Apollo. IV. 626. a. Divers persons of that name. ibid. a. b.
- Φορτικώτης*, ill rendered by the word impertunus. II. 12. a.
- Photius*, what he relates concerning a man, whose name was Oe. I. 101. a. He makes Josephus say things, which he has not said concerning Antipater. 349. a. b. 350. a. His translator has not entered into his thought, with respect to the chaste loves of Theagenes and Chariclea. III. 379. a. b. Who first published his Bibliotheca. 478. a.
- Phrases*; young scholars take more notice of ill phrases, and barbarous expressions, to divert themselves, than of such as are polite. II. 555. a. b.
- Phrygians* adored a plain stone for the mother of the gods. I. 124. b.
- Phryne*, a Courtesan, makes an offer to the Thebans. V. 553. a. b. Could not triumph over the chastity of Xenocrates. 568. a. b.
- Pianesse* (the Marquis de) obliges Guichenon to insert in his works whatever he thinks fit. III. 275. b.
- Pibrac*, his speech ill received in the Council of Trent. I. 235. Was in love with Margaret de Valois, the Queen of Navarre. III. 419. b. IV. 340. b. 341. a. Extracts of a speech which he made to Henry III, to justify the King of Navarre's conduct. III. 341. a. b.
- Picardy*, all put to fire and sword there. II. 217. a.
- Picighione*: the castle where Francis I. was shut up after the battle of Pavia, before he was carried into Spain. III. 97. b.
- Picinin* massacred by the order of Ferdinand, King of Naples, and with the consent of Paul II. IV. 509.
- Pictor* (Fabius) his negligence, with respect to Tanquil and two of the Tarquins, censured by Dionysius Halicarnassensis. V. 290. a.
- Picture*: Agestilaus II, by his last will, forbade his picture to be drawn. I. 130. What people conjecture to have been his reason for it. ibid. Other persons that would not suffer their pictures to be drawn. II. 191. a. V. 97. b. 98. a. 449. b. 450. a. b.
- Pictures of Adam and Eve*, two verses writ in praise of it. II. 728. a.
- Picus* (Johannes) Count of Mirandola, is reproved for having entertained a favourable opinion of Origen's salvation. IV. 412. a. b. 413. a. Ruffianus tries to imitate him, and renews several of his propositions. 940. a. b. He dies, notwithstanding the contrary prediction of Savonarola. V. 61. a.
- Picus* (Johannes Franciscus) writes the life of Savonarola, and is extremely warm in his defence. V. 66. a. 67. a. Divers extracts of that life, diffused through the whole article of SAVONAROLA. Father Quetif publishes it in the year 1674, and Dr Bates cautions it to be reprinted. ibid.
- Pieté*; it does not belong to a profane person, to compose works of piety. I. 439. a. b. Great piety and great impiety are equally uncommon. II. 451. b. To labour at bringing about a coalition of religions, is an undertaking that requires a great deal of piety. I. 689. a. b.
- Piety* (liberal) the artifices which the Clergy make use of, in order to raise it. I. 738. b. 739. a. b.
- Pignas*, how far he carried his seditious fury against Henry III. III. 293. b. 294. a.
- Piginius* falls upon the Council of Constantinople, and for what reason. IV. 350. a. Whether he was orthodox on the article of justification. 638. b. 639. a. b. 640. b. 641. a. b.
- Pignoral*, France was happy in possessing that place, at the time of the alliance which the Duke of Savoy entered into with the house of Austria, Éc. in the year 1690. III. 407. a. Besieged by the allies, who were not able to take it, and whose bombardment did no great mischief to it. IV. 211. a.
- Pylades*, he and Bathyllus were inventors of a new manner of representing all sorts of Dramatic pieces in dances. I. 676. a. b. An answer which he made to Augustus. 677. b.
- Pilate*, the sentence that is ascribed to him, found at Aquila. II. 556. A book in which they have taken a great deal of pains to prove that the said sentence is fictitious. ibid.
- Pylatus* (Leontius) what he was. II. 34. a. b.
- Pilgrims* gave occasion to the devout representations that were exhibited on the stage, in the XVth and XVIth centuries. II. 480. b. 481. a. b.
- Pillar*: the pillar of fire which went before the Israelites, had nothing in common with the fire which Timoleon saw in a dream. V. 364. a. b.
- Pin*, Secretary to the King of Navarre, how he treated the Catholics. IV. 336. b.
- Pin* (Lewis Ellis du) the judgment which that Doctor passes on the miracles related by St Gregory. III. 226. a. b. His dispute with the Abbot Antelmi, touching some of St Prosper's writings, that were ascribed to Pope Leo. 760. b. His recantations. IV. 356. a. Some people were offended with Mr du Pin, for publishing in French, a new Bibliothèque of Ecclesiastical writers. 457. b. Censured for some obscure expressions, which he makes use of in speaking of Hœrschelius and Persons. 599. a. He believes that the story of Pope Joan has been added to the chronicle of Martin Polonus. 709. a.
- Pinczovia* was looked upon as the Athens of Poland. IV. 825. b. Two reformations in that city. V. 233. b.
- Pindarus Thebanus* is the author of the lesser Iliad. I. 81. b.
- Pine*: a pine-tree adored by the Esthonians, a people of Livonia. IV. 928. a. b.
- Pineda*, a Spanish Jesuit, his scandalous reflexion upon Job. III. 573. a.
- Pinedo* censured for his explication of a proverb. I. 17. a. b.
- Pinet* (Antony du) makes two Roman gentlemen of two sorts of marble. IV. 651. b. Censured. V. 135. a. b. His edition of the taxes of the Roman Chancery, is different from the others. I. 628. a. The author's conjecture on that head. ibid. b.
- Pinianns*, a promise is extorted from him, but he does not keep it. I. 229.
- Piracy* (Literary) is not in all things like to that of Privateers. II. 773. b.
- Piræus*, when built. II. 832. b.
- Pyramid*: a pyramid or pillar, raised to perpetuate the memory of the parricide, attempted on the person of Henry IV, by John Chastel. II. 457. b.
- Pyramidi*, the principal one was built before the reign of Amasis. IV. 869. a.
- Pyrenean peace* was concluded without the Pope's intervention. II. 474. a.

Pint

I N D E X.

- Pier* (Father) it is easier to perceive that his book intitled, Apologie des Casuistes, contains dangerous doctrines, than to answer the objections contained therein. III. 894. b.
- Pyrrho*, it has been objected that his article in this Dictionary, contains Libertine principles; the author's answer. V. 830. to 836.
- Pyrrhonism* is sometimes poorly attacked, and as poorly defended. I. 462. a. b. Prevails in most disputes. II. 27. b. Pyrrhonian objections. III. 416. a. b. 424. a. b. What is sufficient to make one give into it. IV. 188. a. b. 189. a. The advantages it draws from the New Philosophy, and from Divinity. 653. b. 654. a. b. 655. a. b. Whether it be a good means to make us submit to the authority of faith. 655. b. 656. a. What seems to have given birth to it. V. 586. b. Seneca relates all the degrees of it. 607. b. 608. a. See Incomprehensibility of all things.
- Pyrrhonism* (Historical) observations that might strengthen it. I. 118. a. b. II. 260. a. III. 485. a. b. V. 608. a. In what case it is the wisest course. II. 829. a. b. An abuse that favours it. V. 753. Battles are more subject to it than sieges. III. 719. b. Why we are so often obliged to adopt it. IV. 562. b. 563. a. b. 564. a. b.
- Pyrrhonists* are exposed to the raillery and insults of banterers. I. 410. a. Had a theory favourable to virtue. 413. b. Took advantage of an invention of Chrysippus. II. 495. a. An example which they make use of. 630. a. b. Democritus supplied them with all that they said against the testimony of the senses. 642. People have always endeavoured to turn them into ridicule. III. 698. b. Favoured by those who demonstrate a vacuum. 793. a. b. Sometimes forgot themselves in the exercise of their doctrines. IV. 657. b. 658. a. Under pretence of confuting only the arguments of the Dogmatists, they actually undermined the doctrine of the existence of a God. 935. b. An explanation concerning what the author has said of them. V. 830. to 836. Their character. 830. Divines ought not to be ashamed of refusing to enter the lists with them. ibid. The author's answer to those who ask what need there was to set forth their difficulties. 833. to 836.
- Pyrrhus*, what he said upon his viewing the Roman army. I. 511. b. Compared to those gamesters, to whom chance gives a fair game, but who know not how to make use of it. II. 414. a. Besieges Lacedæmon without success. 522. His Physician makes an offer to the Romans of poisoning him: the different accounts which authors give of that affair. III. 2. a. b. How many battles were fought between that Prince and the Romans. ibid. b. The chimerical foundation of his hopes. IV. 662. a. b.
- Pisa*: the Council of Pisa sends Cardinal Cajetan's book to the Faculty of Divinity of Paris, to be confuted by them. I. 232. That Council declared to be a pretended Council by Lewis XII. III. 611. a. b.
- Pisaurum*: the Colony of Pisaurum was not settled till four years after that of Bologna. I. 62. a.
- Piscopia Cornara* (Helina) studied to tread in the steps of Minerva. III. 662. b.
- Pisqueton*. See Picigbitons.
- Pisibagoras* extorts a confession from Abaris by a trick. I. 4. b. His prophetic spirit, and his power to work miracles. 6. b. What he says of the transmutations, in which he had a share. IV. 580. b.
- Pytheas*, what he was. I. 10. b. IV. 676. a. b. to 678. b.
- Pytheas the Orator*, his quick repartee. IV. 678. b.
- Pythias*, a woman servant, the answer she made to Tigellinus. IV. 398. b.
- Pythois* had been a Friar Minimæ, and was professor of Philosophy at Sedan: he is the author of the Apocalypse de Meliton. V. 57. a. n. (2).
- Pythion* is commended at Athens for a murder which he had committed, but he ascribed all the glory of the action to a deity, pretending that he had been no more but the instrument. II. 558. a.
- Pittacus*, his moderation. I. 190. b.
- Pius II* (Pope) his letter to Mahomet. IV. 55. b. 56. a.
- Pius IV* (Pope) why he refused to terminate himself a dispute about Precedency. IV. 574. a. Of what family he was. V. 118. a.
- Pius V* (Pope) had a mind to signalize the beginning of his reign, by the punishment of some famous Heretics. IV. 463. n. (7). His brief touching children baptized by the Innovators. V. 27. a.
- Placcius* has only judged of the Rabelais Reformed, by its title; which has led him into a mistake. III. 133. b. 134. a. Was ignorant of several things, touching disguised names. IV. 832. b. 833. a.
- Place* (Président de la) censured with respect to John du Tillet's book of the King's Majority. V. 352. b. 353. a. b.
- Place* (John de la) approves of Laurence Joubertus's answer, with respect to the falling of Moses, Elias, and Jesus Christ. III. 582. b.
- Place* (Native) why that of great men who are meanly born, is uncertain. I. 570. a.
- Places* (important) their siege will always be a troublesome rock for the News-Writers. III. 719. b. The taking of them is not subject, like the gaining of battles, to Historical Pyrrhonism. ibid.
- Placcius*, his judgment upon Mr Nicolle's method. IV. 536. a. n. (13).
- Plagiar*, that term taken in an improper sense. II. 39. a. b. The faults which Plagiarists are commonly guilty of. 685. a. b. 686. a. b. The Plagiarist of a book who got a pension by it. V. 474. a. b.
- Plagiarism* in the affair of books, when is a person guilty of it, and when not? II. 168. b. 169. a. Observations upon the various ways of it. 773. b. 774. a. The justification of a person that was accused of Plagiarism, considered. IV. 375. b. 376. a. Plagiarism approved of by Strigelius. V. 250. b. The remarkable Plagiarism of Alcyonius. I. 202. b. Of Alstedius. 234. Of Daniel Pareus. 241. a. Of John Andreas, of Durandus. 326. b. Of Leonard Aretin. 435. Of Gerard Vossius. II. 276. A great law-suit about a theft of that kind. 682. a. b. Whether it be a sin, and if an honest man may be guilty of it. IV. 294. a. b.
- Plagus*, Philip de Bergamo believes that he was cured of it by the intercession of Nicolas Tollentin. I. 569.
- Player*: a Player punished for having mentioned Accius on the stage. I. 61. and b. The extravagance and luxury of another Player. II. 835. and a. b. to 836. The riches he left at his death. 836. To what pitch he suffered himself to be transported. ibid. b. Players may be buried in holy ground. I. 328. a. b. Have furnished a martyr to religion. IV. 487. b. n. (37).
- Plays*: what sort of men are most affected with the representation of Plays. I. 19. a. b. The Romans were very apt to apply particular sentiments of a Play to the present times. 60. b. Politian's verses against those who condemned the Plays that were acted in colleges. V. 752. b. 753. a.
- Planche* (Regnier de la) what sort of a man he was. IV. 699. b.
- Plane*: a plane-tree, from which every body desired to have plants. II. 876. a. b.
- Planets*: those persons confuted, who say that every planet is a god. V. 571. b. 572. a. b. 573. a.
- Platin* reproached with a piece of negligence. III. 779. b.
- Plants*, the secret of raising an appearance of them from their ashes. II. 467. a. b. 468. a.
- Planudis*, his gross ignorance in a point of Chronology. II. 829. b.
- Platina*, his mistake in speaking of the Councils of Soissons and Sens. I. 29. b. 30. a. Quoted. III. 223. b. n. (60). IV. 51. b. n. (22). What he adds to the story of the She-Pope. 729. 712. a. n. to Some pretend that the said story has been added to his book. 711. b. 712. a. That pretension sifted. ibid.
- Plato*, a very tender distich which he composed. I. 127. a. b. His doctrine confirmed by the beginning of St John's Gospel. 255. He alleges the doctrine of Anaxagoras as a symbol of the chaos. 304. a. Why he never cited Democritus. II. 643. b. He supposes that matter had a soul even before God had framed the world. 792. b. V. 634. a. b. 635. a. What he says of the licence which the Poets

- Poets take. III. 134. b. 634. a. b. Whether he admitted two principles collateral, eternal, and independant of one another. 447. a. b. His contempt for the dexterity of Amiceris. IV. 10. a. b. Quoted. 568. a. n. (29). His laws concerning the two sexes. 802. b. His judgment of Aristotle and Xenocrates. V. 568. He is in the wrong to accuse Zeno of having been Parmenides's Minion. 605. a. For which he is censured by Athenæus. ibid. a. b. His sentiments touching Palamedes. ibid. b. 606. a. He admitted two souls of the world. 634. b. 635. a. Demosthenes quits his academy to attach himself to Callistratus. II. 259. His Republic translated and reduced to a more distinct order by John Sozomenes. V. 193.
- Platonists*, the agreement between that sect and the Aristotelians. I. 268. a. b. Ascribed to good Genii what people now a days only ascribe to bad ones. 390. a. Said that there was in matter a real defect, which was an obstacle to God's project. II. 788. a. b. Their hypothesis about the origin of evil. IV. 524. b. 525. a. b. &c.
- Plantus*, an unluckly alternative for him. I. 207. a. Quoted. V. 577. a. n. (54).
- Pleadings*: there are some which, without counting the Greek and Latin verses, have almost as much Latin as French in them. II. 104. b. 105. and a. b. When too much learning is mixed with them, it can only serve to withdraw the judge's attention. 106. b.
- Pleasure*: one may feel pleasure without having ever felt pain. IV. 514. a. b. Pleasures of the senses, whether they can be spiritual. II. 781. a. b.
- Plebeians*, in what year of Rome they obtained to be admitted to the Consular dignity. I. 343.
- Plebeius* and Nobilis were not inconsistent words in ancient Rome. III. 490. a.
- Pleiad* imagined by Ronfard. II. 619. a. b. Who are the persons that were comprehended in it. ibid.
- Plex* (du) his recantation touching Antony Arnauld the Advocate. I. 484. b. 485. a. He is ill rewarded for having been so partial to the Jesuits. ibid. What he has published concerning the wife of Henry IV. V. 530. a. b. Vindicated in that point against those who censured him. ibid. b. & seq. Censured with respect to what John Chastel replied to his judges. II. 460. b. 461. and a. b.
- Plenipotentiary*, one at the age of ninety-five years is a much rarer thing than a man of a hundred years of age. II. 464. b.
- Plessis Mornay* (du) writes to Father Paul, and recommends his grand-children and their governour to him. II. 580. b. 581. a. He meets with a very cold reception at the court of England, and for what reason. 754. a. b. Quoted. III. 231. b. n. (30). 232. a. n. (32). & alibi passim. Reflexions on one of his Epistles Dedicatory. II. 126. b. 127. a. b. Censured, and ill defended by Rivet. ibid. Looked upon as an incendiary. ibid. Deputed by the King of Navarre to Henry III. IV. 341. a. Held intelligence with all the Protestant world. 727. a. The weak confutations of his book on the Eucharist cause it to be esteemed. V. 179. b. His extracts from Mutius touching the Celibacy of Priests. IV. 296. a. b. 297. a.
- Plessis Pralin* (du) for what enterprize he was made a Marshal of France. IV. 919.
- Pliny*, quoted. I. 306. a. n. (138). II. 253. n. (a). 254. b. n. (4). V. 579. b. n. (73). & passim alibi. Only glanced upon the subjects which he treated of. I. 212. A passage in him corrupted. 595. b. 596. a. b. Hermolaus Barbarus corrects near five thousand passages of that author. 633. and b. 634. a. b. The place of his birth. 637. a. What he calls Magical romancing. II. 639. a. b. Ought not to have believed that Democritus was the author of several works that went under his name. ibid. b. In what manner he speaks of the Astronomers. III. 462. a. b. What he relates concerning Apelles. 836. b. And concerning the cause of Sappho's love for Phaon. V. 47. a. He seems to condemn those who write annals. 133. a. Censured with respect to the time in which he places Zeuxis. 622. b. Several of his faults in a few words. 781, 782. Six books of him translated into French by Peter de Changy. II. 435. a. The summary of his first sixteen books by the same de Changy. ibid.
- Pliny the Younger* has almost exhausted in his panegyric all the ideas of the perfection of a Prince. II. 819. b. 820. a. Very possibly he may have gone beyond the truth in some things which we find there. IV. 691. a. b. Was one of the greatest wits, and one of the worthiest men of his age. V. 840. His justification with respect to some loose verses which he had writ. ibid. Quoted. I. 121. b. n. (10).
- Plutarch* relates two ridiculous facts. I. 54. b. Applies facts sometimes one way and sometimes another. 83. a. The reason he assigns for the Jews abstaining from swine's flesh. 115. a. Makes a reflexion that is both impious and contradictory. 300. a. Contradicts himself touching the death of Cæsius. II. 349. a. Is no good guide in Chronology. 506. b. Quoted. 414. a. n. (14). 785. b. n. (148). 786. a. n. (150), (151). He ascribes to a King of Libya things which only concern Dejotarus. 630. a. Made the same History serve several ends. 869. a. b. His judgment concerning the Poets. III. 135. a. How he came to understand the Latin Historians. 195. b. He did not understand a passage in Livy concerning Camillus and Juno. 638. a. b. Wherein he contradicts Aristotle, while he is speaking of the laws of Lacedæmon. 967. b. 968. a. Full of sophisms. ibid. His paralogism with respect to Sylla, and the reason for which he had divorced Cælia. IV. 201. b. 202. a. He pretends that it would be better to say that Jupiter wants power, than to say that he wants goodness. 519. b. Solidly confutes the paradox of the stories concerning the usefulness of vice. ibid. 520. a. b. He was of opinion that beasts do reason. 550. a. b. That passage examined where he says positively, that, in the opinion of Diogenes, beasts had no sense. ibid. a. 552. b. 553. a. He defends the vulgar opinion concerning prelates in a specious manner. 565. a. b. His reflexion on the difficulty of finding out the truth in History. 570. b. 571. a. He ascribes only a bountiful providence to God. ibid. b. 572. a. But his opinion in this respect was not the most common. ibid. He accuses Herodotus of impiety. 574. b. 575. a. b. &c. Plutarch censured, with respect to certain monuments that were to be seen in the temple of Sancus. V. 288. b. 289. a. What idea he gives of Zeno's Logic. 605. b. James Pinon procures an edition of his works translated by Amyot. IV. 651.
- Plutarch* (French) who had that name given him. V. 419. a. And for what reason. ibid.
- Pocock*, it is hard that we cannot depend upon him as a sure guide in the eastern learning. I. 49. b. What he relates concerning the black stone which the Saracens honoured. 124. b.
- Poem*, one rewarded with a bag of money which the author had much ado to carry upon his shoulders. I. 329. b. Poems in which there was wanting but one syllable. 330. a. A Poem must be very good when it is ascribed to an excellent Poet. II. 572. b. A Poem for which the author received no more than half the price that was agreed upon. V. 140. a.
- Poems* (French) the Booksellers are very ready, to make collections of such as had the good fortune to please separately, but they are not so with respect to Latin Poems. IV. 652. a. b.
- Poet* (Heteroclit) to Monsieur only brother to his Majesty, who styled himself so. IV. 357. a.
- Poeta Regius*, who was honoured with such a title. II. 618. a.
- Poetry*, contrary to the acquisition of riches. II. 33. a. b. A new kind of Poetry which has been added to the antient. I. 752. b. Whether its only aim should be to divert us. II. 377. a. b. The judgment that Daffouci made of the most impertinent Poetry. 603. b. 604. a. It has introduced a thousand impieties. III. 134. a. b. 135. a. b. Impieties expressed in Poetry are as criminal as those which are expressed in prose. ibid. The antient Pagan Poetry burnt at the instigation of the Priests. IV. 345. b.

Poetry

- Poetry* (genteel) who was looked upon as the father of that kind of Poetry. I. 205. a. b. Its profane licence. 752. a. Was not in Augustus's time an enemy to all gross ideas. V. 768.
- Poetry* (Iambic) by whom invented. I. 427. and b. Poetry (Italian) is greatly obliged to Cavalcante. II. 399. a. Lyric Poetry receives a grace from Cinus. 508. Enriched by the inventions of Rinuccini. IV. 878. a. b. 879 a. b.
- Poetry* (Epic) Homer did not keep up the majesty of it. I. 79. b.
- Poets*: the ancient Poets adjusted their Chronology very ill. I. 80. a. They ought to quit betimes the service of Apollo. I. 120. a. b. II. 620. a. b. Formerly carried their fictions very far on the stage. I. 158. b. A Poet who furnishes a singular example. 329. b. 330. a. All those who are lovers of Poetry are not Poets. 375. b. They every where find flowers to crown Princes with. 516. b. Whether they formerly recited their verses in a hired house. 535. a. b. The poverty of their trade. ibid. b. Their are several of them who have a two-handed pen. 653. a. They very often exaggerate their necessities. II. 9. a. b. The affection which they have for their works. 232. b. The liberties which they take in them. 234. b. 235. a. Give themselves a great jurisdiction over time. 388. b. Their fondness for their own productions. 395. a. They are not fit authors to prove a fact. 502. b. They give themselves the liberty to touch upon great mysteries under too bold metaphors. 543. How Charles IX treated the Poets. 617. b. A French Poet who prepared sonnets for books that were to come out. 620. b. n. (58). A court Poet does not avoid fabulous hyperboles, but when he does not want them. 715. a. A Poet whose verses did a signal service to soldiers that had been overcome. 866. b. 867. a. They ought never to set up for Prophets. III. 29. b. 30. a. Gambara lays a heavy yoke upon them. 128. They produce bad effects in France. IV. 322. b. They are easily put in a passion. 323. a. Are always ready to declare for the party that is uppermost. III. 647. a. Their fictions were transplanted into the Pagan system of Divinity. 642. a. b. 652. b. 653. a. b. Whence it comes that they appear to be so much inflamed with love in their verses. 876. b. 877. a. b. Poets that are natural Philosophers have a greater liberty than others, to speak of natural things. 920. a. b. What judgment we are to form of their mistresses. IV. 82. a. b. 83. a. They have always taken the liberty of praising themselves. 86. a. b. The greatest part of them never succeed better than when they lay aside all modesty. 156. b. The ostentation of learning has often drawn impertinent things from them. 181. a. Make no scruple of anachronisms. 183. b. They sometimes boast of their good fortune in love intrigues, which are only fictions of their brain. 332. a. Poets that hit upon making the same verses. 822. a. b. Can write passionate verses, without being in love with the person that is the subject of them. 894. a. It often falls out that their second thoughts are not so good as the first. 896. b. 897. a. The ancient Poets were not ashamed of praising their own wives. V. 76. b. A preservative against their obscenities. 98. b. 99. a. b. It is a common thing to jest upon their poverty. 400. a. b. &c. What it is that reduced several of them to poverty. 402. b. 403. a. Whether such whole verses are not chaste, ought to be looked upon as leud persons. 420. a. b. &c. There are no authors more subject to forget that they promised to print no more. II. 83. a. La Fontaine's verses on that subject. ibid. a. b. Two chapters of Menage on the same subject. ibid. b. Good Poets reserve the most exquisite strokes for the fifth act of their tragedies. III. 720. b. The vicious liberty which they take to write obscene verses. V. 840. and n. (16).
- Poets* (Christian): there are some, who, though they are banished for their religion, do not not cease their leud courses. IV. 448.
- Poets* (Greek and Latin) the reading of them necessary towards forming the refined taste of a complete Poet. II. 399. a. b.
- Poets* (Latin) there were some famous ones in Germany before Conrad Celtes. III. 724. b. 725. a.
- Poets* (Italian) there once reigned a great licentiousness among them. IV. 235. a. b. 236. a.
- Poggius* (John) writes a book upon the false predictions of Savonarola. V. 61. a. b.
- Poggius* (Florentinus) one of his facetious stories. I. 324. b. 325. a. Lashes on all sides in his dialogue against hypocrites. II. 275. a. b. Gives an account of John Huf's punishment. 277. b.
- Poet* (Chancellor) the cause of his disgrace. II. 841. a. Accused of having basely offered incense to Fortune. 761. A severe satire against him. ibid.
- Point*: some have pretended to shew that it is not possible to find the fixed point, which determines precisely the nature of every thing. II. 493. a.
- Pointing*: the false pointing of a passage has given occasion to its being said that Aristotle was a Jew. I. 466. b. A person cannot be too exact in it. II. 703. a. b.
- Points*: whether the points of the Tetragramma are proper to that name. I. 244. b. 245. a. b.
- Poires*, what he has writ on the dispute about the eternity of the world. V. 596. a. b. Quoted. IV. 910. a. b. n. (82), (83), (84), (85), (86).
- Poissy*, See Conference of Poissy.
- Poitiers* besieged by the Protestants. II. 300. a.
- Poitiers* (Diana of) the chief of a faction opposite to that of the Dukes of Etampes. III. 401. a. See Diana of Poitiers.
- Poitiers* (Apology of the Bishop of) who is the author of that piece, and how it was called. V. 13. a. b.
- Pol* (St) killed by the Duke of Guise. III. 299. and a. b.
- Poland* erected into a kingdom. II. 58. and b. Intrigues formed to place the crown of Poland on the head of the Duke of Longueville. I. 171. a. b. Those who began the work of the reformation there, made a strange false step in opposing the marriage of Sigismund Augustus. III. 847. a. b.
- Poland* (the Queen of) takes upon her to elect a successor in the King's life-time. III. 852. a. She gives two thousand crowns towards the charge of publishing a book of Astrology. IV. 265. a. b.
- Polemo*, his conversion. V. 570. a. b.
- Polyander*, Professor of Divinity at Leyden, was the most moderate adversary that the Arminians had. I. 654. a. b.
- Polyanthea*, the History of that work. III. 725. a. b.
- Polybius*, what he relates of Prusias. IV. 556. a. b. The judgment which Casaubon passes on Perot's translation of that author. 585. b. 586. a. What he says of the duty of an Historian. V. 359. b. Peraxylus publishes an edition of him. IV. 545. b.
- Policy* makes use of the most ridiculous pretences. I. 54. a. b. Frequently occasions the breach of promise. 419. b. It is oftentimes the truest policy to pay one's court to persons in disgrace. 422. a. Every thing is sacrificed to it. II. 103. a. b. The policy of Princes, has something that is capricious, when it consists in debauching each other's subjects. 360. b. It requires sometimes that persons should declare themselves betimes enemies to the strongest party. III. 569. a.
- Polycrates* caules Smerdias to be shaved. I. 292. a.
- Polygamy*: there is a spiritual Polygamy which churchmen fall into. I. 56. a. Polygamy allowed by a Pope. III. 166. a. Made a capital crime by Henry II. 404. b. 405. a. b. The nations which practice it, have a frightful idea of the Christian doctrine in this point. IV. 57. a. b.
- Polygamia Triumphatrix*, how the author of that book explained these words, increase and multiply. III. 709. a. b. It was condemned, and the author banished from Denmark. 973.
- Polygamites* never formed a sect. IV. 392. b. 393. a.
- Polyneetes*, by his fall Amphiarus obtains the victory. I. 446. a.
- Politian*, his retrograde Latin verse. II. 248. a. A thing which John Lascaris reproaches him with. IV. 705. b. How his vanity was checked. V. 165. a. Quoted. 265. b. 266. a. n. (29).

Politian's

- Politens* very much neglected. V. 540. a.
Politicians have a language peculiar to themselves. V. 753. a.
Politics: a disorder unavoidable in Politics. II. 224.
b. Why the finest systems of Politics fail in practice. III. 469. a. How defined by some body. V. 751. b. &c.
Politics of the Clergy of France, a character of that book. I. 490. a. b.
Polixena took care to spread her gown about her feet, that she might fall decently. II. 56. a.
Pollio (Afinius) his judgment of Cæsar's Commentaries. II. 417. b. By pleading well he acquired the facility of pleading, and by pleading often, he rendered himself the less capable of pleading well. IV. 408. a. b.
Polanus (Martin) enlarges upon the story of Pope Joan. IV. 728, 729. Takes his materials from the Otia Imperialia of Gervase of Tilbury. 738. b. 739. a. b. Remarks upon the editions and enlargements of his Chronicle. 708. a. b. The manuscripts of his Chronicle very different: some of them contain the story of the She-Pope, others not, the testimony of celebrated authors on that head. ibid. b. to 712. a. b.
Pompey, it was thought that he would not have made a good use of the victory, in case he had obtained it. II. 167. b. From a desire to spare blood-shed, he lost an opportunity of putting an end to the war. 416. a. It has been observed that he did not begin to be unfortunate, till such time as he defended the best cause. 565. a. What Flora said of him. III. 56. The women were fond of him. 57. Marc Antony orders his goods to be sold by inch of candle. 119. a. He knew nothing of his wife's intrigues, tho' they were publicly talked of. 382. a. What he did in order to aggrandize himself. IV. 281. a. He was not very happy in his marriages. ibid. b. Flies to Egypt for refuge. 282. a. b. His ability, as a General, was eclipsed in the battle of Pharsalia. V. 372. a. b. Cæsar said that he had acquired the surname of Great, for having vanquished some people, that knew nothing of war. 180. a. b.
Pompeia placed Cæsar in the same category, wherein he had put so many other husbands. II. 424. b.
Pomponiacus treats Augustin Niphus, with a great deal of respect and good manners. IV. 380. b.
Pompona, Anne of Austria liked the fruit which came from that place. I. 487. b.
Pomponius Latius, impeached at Rome, for changing the names of young men. IV. 685. a.
Ponceau (James) causes the works of James Des Parts to be printed. IV. 484. a.
Poneth, what he preached at Paris against a new fraternity. III. 410. a.
Poneropolis, a city which a King of Macedonia caused to be built. II. 248. a.
Pons (the Bishop of St) esteemed by the Protestants, and for what reason. IV. 243. a.
Pons (Antony de) Count de Marennès, the change that appeared in him, after the death of his first wife. IV. 480. a. b. His family deemed as ancient as that of Aest. ibid. b.
Pontanus (Jovian) the story that he tells of a Spanish Monk. II. 386. b. 387. a. b. What he says of Fortune. V. 371. b. 372. a. Verses which he made upon a lady that shewed her breast. 421. b. 422. a.
Pontbieu, who is the author of the Genealogical History of its Counts. I. 11.
Pontifical, Gratius is sorry at its being made public. III. 217. a.
Pontifs, who enjoyed a very great power among the Heathens. II. 531. a. b.
Pontius (Constantius) his conviction gave ground for some suspicions relating to Charles V. II. 336. b. Whether he was that Emperor's confessor. ibid. His death. ibid. Facts that concern him. 440. b. 441. a.
Pontius (Herennius) what he declared in relation to the conduct of his son. I. 732. a.
Poor; Michael Savonarola took no fee for prescribing to them. V. 57.
Pope Joan, the book which Blondel published concerning her, gave offence. II. 24. a. b. Matters of fact concerning that book. ibid. 25. a. b. Mr Spanheim writ a book, to re-establish Pope Joan. 25. a.
Veres in old French about her. III. 77. a. b. 78. a. b. John des Caurres, a Roman Catholic author, tells the story of Pope Joan, without the least doubt of the truth of it. II. 400. A little part of the controversy concerning that woman. 530. b. The Protestants now-a-days write books to maintain the story of Pope Joan. IV. 732. This Controversy has been thought an affair of the utmost consequence, but when all is done, it is a trifle. 733. Conjectures about the origin of the said story. 738, 739. It was forged by Priests and Monks in the breast of Popery. 728. b. 736. a. b. 737. a. 709. a. b. And adopted by a vast many others. 709. a. b. &c. The story of Pope Joan, according to the most circumstantial account that is given of it. 730. a. b. 731. a. b. Protestant authors who maintained the truth of it, after Florimond de Remond's book, and that of Father Labbe, came out. 732. a. b. 733. a. b. Protestant authors who have not believed it. 733. a. b. Whether the said adventure, reflects ignominy on the Church of Rome. 736. a. b. The most ancient author that has mentioned it, is posterior by two hundred years, and inconsistent with the cotemporary authors. 738. a. b. It was a proper story for all sorts of authors. ibid. b. The Protestants are accused of obstinacy, with respect to it. 739. b. 740. a. b. It is to be found in the Chronicle of Martin Polonus; although some learned men do not believe that part of the Chronicle to be his. 708. and b. 709. a. b. & seq. Peter du Moulin did not believe the story of Pope Joan. 280. and a. b. Its partizans reckon Radulphus Flaviacensis among their evidences. 824. a. b.
Popeliniere (la) draws a bad parallel. II. 764. a. b. Had like to have been crushed to pieces, for some things which he had related. IV. 862. b. Quoted. V. 496. a. b. a. (38). Promises to publish the memoirs of Villegaignon's life, and does not do it. 478. b.
Popery has repaired one of its breaches in France. II. 125. a. b. The conduct of the Romish Clergy, contributed much to its destruction. V. 482. a. A digression against those who have so often foretold its fall in vain. II. 122. a. b. 123. a. b. 124. a. b. 125. a. b. 126. a. b. 127. a. b. No body imagined that it would fall by its own craziness. 123. a. b. It has not been weakened in the last ten years of the XVIIth century. 125. b. The intrigues and plots of the Jesuit William Criton, to re-establish it in Great Britain. 576. Joseph Hall was very zealous against it. III. 342. a. b. Two authors both alike foolish, wrote the one upon the destruction of Popery, and the other upon the destruction of the Protestants. V. 237. a. b. 238. a. b.
Popes; how persons may be saved, that obey two different Popes. I. 179. a. b. Privileges which their flatterers ascribe to them. 231. a. b. An instance of great submission to their censures. 606. a. b. It is an article of the Roman faith, that the Pope may depose sovereigns. 656. a. b. The medium which Bellarmin chose, with respect to the Pope's power over the temporalities of Kings, pleased no party. 731. b. 732. a. Whether it be necessary that a Pope should be scrupulous and devout. 732. b. 733. a. The interval of time between the death of one Pope, and the election of another, produces a thousand disorders. II. 238. b. 239. a. They concur with the Princes, in extending the Latin tongue. 517. a. Ought not to oppose the Emperors with temporal arms. 588. a. Nor usurp a power over the temporalities of Kings. 594. a. b. As sovereign Princes, they follow the principles of the religion of a sovereign. 758. b. The authority which they have acquired in Rome, is much more surprising than that of its ancient Emperors. III. 228. a. b. Who it was that freed them from a servile dependence on the Emperors. ibid. b. Whether the establishment of their executive power, must have been a difficult undertaking. ibid. 234. a. b. 235. a. b. 236. a. b. To be a good Pope, it is not enough to have all the virtues of a good Clergyman. 326. b. The corruption of morals that appeared in the persons of some Popes. 328, 329. What glory they may promise themselves, if they set up to reform abuses. 330. b. Who was the first Pope that gloried in having bastards. 565. a. They can do nothing against

- against the Canons of Councils. 741. a. The custom of kissing their hand, changed into that of kissing their feet. 760. a. The acknowledgment which a Pope made. IV. 633. b. 634. a. When a person may lawfully exhort the Princes who are not Catholics, to make war upon the Pope. II. 127. b. Their authority restored to its first splendor. 125. a. b. Verses upon the search, which they were formerly obliged to undergo, before their election. IV. 730. b.
- Popes and Cardinals* accused of making a jest of the Christian religion. II. 274. b. 275. a. b. Priests of the Pope's palace, make a jest of it likewise. ibid.
- Peppæa*, Nero kills her by a kick on the belly. II. 256. a.
- Populace*: to what lengths the populace, when in a mutiny, are capable of carrying their fury. III. 39. b. 40. a.
- Porcian* (the Prince of) what he desired of his wife, not long before he died. III. 296. a.
- Porphyry*, his prepossession. I. 268. a. Upon what it was grounded. 269. a. He speaks only of Ammonius's Philosophical doctrine. ibid. a. b. Whether he believed that beasts were no more than Automata. IV. 553. a. Having resolved to kill himself, his master dissuaded him from it. 690. a. He believed that beasts had the faculty of reasoning and speaking. 911. b. What he says of Theopompus. V. 332. a. b. He accuses the Christians of forging several books. 638. b.
- Portail* (Mr) Advocate-General in the Parliament of Paris, marries Mr Rose's daughter. IV. 917. b.
- Portico*: there went a proverb, that without Chrysippus, there would be no Portico. II. 492. a.
- Port-Royal*, Historical facts relating to that monastery. I. 485. b. 486. a. b. Whether the children of quality, of twelve or thirteen years of age, were suffered there to read the Socinian books. 492. b. What arguments the gentlemen of Port-Royal made use of to persuade Mr de Turenne, to change his religion. II. 518. a. b. 519. a. They had once schools, but those have been suppressed. IV. 364. a. b. Accused of having intelligence with Geneva, by Father Meynier the Jesuit. V. 16. b. Reflexions on the Controversy between the gentlemen of Port-Royal and Mounfier Claude, about the Devil's conference with Luther. 73. a. b.
- Portugal* (Sebastian, King of) upon the persuasion of the Jesuits hazards a battle with the Moors, who were three times stronger than he. III. 871. b.
- Portugal* (the Infanta, daughter to Dom Pedro, King of) dies a maid in the year 1690. IV. 762. Her marriage with the Duke of Savoy, had been concluded upon, reasonings which that occasioned, and a confutation on that head pointed out. ibid.
- Portus* (Francis) his answer to Peter Charpentier, contains many particulars that are greatly to the shame of the latter. II. 447. b.
- Potidonius*, we must not rely on his testimony, as to what concerns the invention of the Atomical system. III. 788. a. b. What honours he had paid to him by Pompey. IV. 67. a.
- Possessed persons*, who neither understand Greek nor Latin. II. 148. b. 149. a. An observation upon the knowledge of tongues, that is ascribed to them. III. 211. a. b.
- Possuin*, an anachronism which that author is guilty of. I. 651. a. He gets a book, which he had never read, to be condemned by the inquisition. IV. 13. b. 14. a. Sets up for a Converter in the valleys of Piedmont. III. 944. a. b. Sometimes judged of books which he had never read. V. 68. b. Censured. I. 769. a.
- Possible*: whether a thing that never was, nor ever shall be, is possible. I. 759. a. 760. b. 761. a. II. 495. b. 496. a. b.
- Possel*, a learned man, and a fool. III. 883.
- Posthumous*: a model proposed to those who publish posthumous books. IV. 594.
- Positi*, who settled them in France. III. 801.
- Poverty* obliges several persons to cultivate learning. V. 589. a. b.
- Powers* (Jeremiah de) a Walloon minister, quoted. I. 1. a. n. (3). III. 330. a. n. (92). IV. 158. a. b. n. (82), (83), (84). 159. a. b. n. (85), (86), (87), (89), (91), (92), (93). 160. a. n. (94), (95). V O L. V.
- Power*: the Civil and Ecclesiastical power, stand in need of each other. I. 244. a. V. 514. b.
- Power* (Regal) Althusius quoted as one that had spoken disrespectfully of it. I. 237. b.
- Powerful*: the benefit of mankind requires that no Prince should become too powerful. V. 670.
- Powers* (Ecclesiastical) designed by the Watchmen of the city, in the Song of Solomon, an explanation occasioned by the author's imprisonment. III. 772. a. b.
- Poxed*: who is the Patron of such as are poxed in the Church of Rome. III. 573. a.
- Pragmatic Sanction*, the abuses under it, were not fewer than they have been since the Concordate. IV. 766. a. b.
- Pray*: it was the custom of the Eastern people, to turn their faces towards one particular point of the heavens when they prayed. IV. 176. a.
- Prayers* are opposed by counter-prayers. I. 161. a. The doctrine of the Peripatetics, concerning prayers and sacrifices. 468. a. The prayers of the slothful are unacceptable to God. II. 691. a. There are difficulties to be examined touching their efficacy. V. 181. a. b. A person should begin with them, when he is deliberating upon such a dangerous point as that of matrimony. I. 603. b.
- Praise*: the desire of praising people, occasions many faults. III. 489. a.
- Praise* is seldom the only end of those, who are not satisfied with the testimony of their own consciences. I. 279. a. Extravagant praises do more hurt than honour to a person. 601. a. b. It is not an easy matter to renounce praise. II. 298. a. b. 299. a. A person cannot be said to be worthy of praise, when he only abstains from doing a perfidious action. 437. b. We should delay bestowing praises on people till they are dead. IV. 431. b. The praises that are bestowed on people, are not always in a just proportion to their merit. II. 515. b.
- Praeficius* (Luke) behaves handsomely to Augustin Niphus. IV. 380. b.
- Prateolus* censured in point of Chronology. I. 90. a. b. Ascribes an extravagant doctrine to the Anabaptists. 290. a. b. He put in his alphabet a great many sects that never existed. 790. a. Trumps up an imaginary sect of Melchiorites. IV. 193.
- Pratum Spirituale*, its visions. IV. 415. b. 416. a.
- Preach*: a singular manner of preaching. II. 287. b. Formerly it required a prodigious deal of learning to preach very ill, and now a man needs but little to preach well. 105. b.
- Preacher*: the ignorance of a Preacher. I. 101. a. Another is mortified at being told that he hired the patience of his hearers. II. 287. b. Another produces surprizing effects. 299. a. b. 374. b. 375. a. One that was prodigiously followed. 544. a. A Preacher, who upon an extraordinary occasion, preached seven times in one day. 695. b. One who coughed exactly at such and such a period. III. 18. a. One who composed in Latin, the sermons he was to preach in French. 839. a. b. A turbulent and factious Preacher, does not deserve the name of Orator, and why. IV. 581. b. One that drinks in the pulpit. 725. a. Another whose way of preaching was somewhat comical. 722. b. Preachers have a great advantage over Lawyers. I. 61. b. Are to be feared. 89. b. They are very ill used. 654. a. Nothing more fatal to a State, than hot-headed Preachers. II. 95. a. b. 96. a. Preachers like much to see the churches full of hearers. 112. b. They get nothing by being obdurate against the torrent of the fashions. 544. b. 545. a. b. Whether one ought to take every thing they say in a literal sense. III. 895. b. 896. a. There are some of them who may be compared to the nightingale. IV. 290. b. Whether those that are famous should print their sermons. 315. b. Tycho Brahe wished that a good many of them were Mathematicians. 680. a. Preachers who can enter into the interest of the people, are to be feared. 722. a. The most famous Preachers, generally speaking, are not very profound Divines. 757. b. 758. a. b. There are some of them, who rather chuse to be banished, or not to preach at all, than to cut short their sermons. 759. b.
- Preachers* (seditious) France was full of them in the year 1594, and in the year 1595. II. 95. a. b. 96. a. 101. b. 102. a. A passage of Cardinal d'Ossat,

- d'Offat, and of his Commentator, on that head. III. 279. b. Supported by the people, they are capable of bringing about any revolution whatsoever. ibid. The adventure of one who had foretold the end of the world. V. 236. and a. b. 237. and a. b.
- Pre-Adamites*, some of their difficulties. II. 246. a. b. 247. a. b.
- Pre-Adamites*, who is the author of that book. IV. 529. a. And what happened to him and it. ibid. a. b. &c.
- Predetermination*; there is no Hypothesis, touching the doctrine of Predetermination, which removes all difficulties. I. 481. a. b. 482. a. The doctrine of St Augustin, of Janfenius, of Calvin, and of the Thomists, is entirely the same on that subject. 564. a. b. Bellarmine did not follow the doctrine of the Jesuits on that subject. 728. a. b. Bolsec inveighs against it. II. 59. a. b. The disputes about the consequences of Predetermination, had a being among the ancient Philosophers. 332. b. 333. a. Had the disputes which it occasions at this day, prevailed in the time of the Manichees, they would have given great advantages to them. IV. 517. a. b. 518. a. b. 519. a. Absolute Predetermination is not a fit subject to begin with, in preaching the Gospel to Infidels. 846. b. 847. a. One may err in that point, through a good motive. V. 153. a. b. 154. a. It is a scandal, that the disputes about Predetermination, should produce such an inveterate hatred. 154. a. St Paul has no other way to get rid of the difficulties that attend it, but by having recourse to the absolute power, which God has over his creatures. 821. It is one of the mysteries that bear hardest upon reason. 822. The disputes on that subject have only proceeded from this, that people have handled them, as if they could be reconciled with reason. ibid. and 823. Passages of Morus and Mr Peñet, touching the incomprehensibility of it. ibid. and 824. See Grace.
- Predictions*: what Poetical predictions resemble. I. 794. a. Astrological predictions, tho' in themselves they be no more than chimeras, do nevertheless produce real evils. II. 380. a. b. Philosophy is nonplussed by what is said of them. 392. a. b. Those who cry them up have too much neglected to guard against an incredulous reasoner. ibid. b. 393. a. A Dilemma against the authors of predictions. III. 232. a. b. The most chimerical have had some parts of them confirmed by the event. 481. b. What is the universal spirit of the makers of predictions. IV. 116. a. b. The answer that one of them made to an objection, started by the Queen of Poland. ibid. b. The weakness of the argument that is made use of to prove the certainty of them. 182. b. Reflexions on what is said of them. 369. b. 370. a. It would be of great use to keep a register of some predictions. 431. b. We ought not to be surprized, if several of those which have been made by false Prophets, come to pass. 899. a. Whether Savonarola's predictions were grounded upon his knowledge in Scripture and human reasoning, or on Divine revelation. V. 64. b. 65. a. b.
- Prefaces* and Epistles Dedicatory, ought never to be left out in the editions of books, cum Notis Variorum. I. 225. b. Should be dated with exactness. V. 256. a. There are falsehoods in prefaces, which ought not to pass for venial sins. I. 496. b. 497. a. It is a greater fault than is commonly believed, not to read them. II. 142. b. There is nothing more necessary to be consulted by the author of such a work as this. 8. b. Prefaces that are most admired. 261. b. They ought not to be left out in the new editions of books. I. 225. b. IV. 164. a. b. A piece of railery upon those who affirm in their prefaces, that they have been forced to publish their works. 173. b. 174. a. b. Pelisson's preface to the works of Sarasin, is a master-piece. 538. Excellent prefaces. ibid. n. (c).
- Prejudices*: things are praised or blamed, according to the different prejudices of men. I. 294. b. How difficult it is for a man to get the better of them in his search after truth. IV. 537. a. Their bad consequences. V. 153. a. b. 154. a. The strange effects of prejudice. IV. 46. a.
- Prejudices in religion*, their bad effects. I. 784. a. b.
- Prejudices*: who is the author of the book intitled, Lawful Prejudices against the Calvinists. I. 493. b.
- Prelates*: the advice that was given to a Prelate one day by his mistress. I. 743. b. At what time they began to frequent the Court, and the ill effects it produced. III. 93. b. Their residence in their Dioceses, has no manner of influence towards the reformation of manners and abuses. 591. b. They are often made a sacrifice to the Pope, in the quarrels that Princes have with him. 611. b.
- Premonstratensis*, the founder of that order, converts a great many Heretics. V. 292.
- Presages*, the vanity of them. II. 445. a. b. Reasons against the doctrine of Presages. 629. a. b. 630. a. Reflexions on what people commonly think of them. IV. 565. a. b.
- Prescience*: God's Prescience is no ways inconsistent with the liberty of the creature. I. 661. b.
- Prescription* is sometimes an invincible proof that a fact is false. II. 61. a.
- Presence* (Real): John Poinet admits a Real Presence, but he will have it to be no more than sacramental at the same time. IV. 693. b.
- Presents* ought to be made by the persons who love, and not by those who are loved. II. 508. a.
- Presi*: famous men that have been correctors of the prefs. II. 893. and a. b. III. 731. b. 732. a. IV. 295. a. 843, 844. The abuses of the prefs. V. 764.
- Prester John*, why the Emperors of the Abyssines have been called by that name. I. 36.
- Pretorship*, when that office was instituted in Rome. II. 290. a. Whether a Consul ever descended to that employment. 346. a. b. In what case this happened sometimes. ibid.
- Preuil* (St) whether he was put to death for no other reason, but because he had displeased Cardinal Richelieu. III. 818. a. b. 819. a.
- Priam*, wherein his happiness consisted, according to Tiberius. II. 719. a. Where, how, and by whom he was killed. IV. 659. a. b.
- Pride*, it may have some share in our most commendable actions. I. 460. a. b. It is the ordinary passion of those who are not addicted to pleasures. III. 223. a. Called the Sacred Disaffection. 789. a. It is the failing of most great wits. ibid.
- Prideaux*, Quoted. IV. 47. b. n. (267), (269), (270). 48. a. b. n. (271), (273), (274), (275). 176. a. b. n. (1), (2), (3), (4), (5), (6), (7). 177. a. b. n. (8), (9), (10). 178. a. b. n. (11), (13).
- Priest* (Sylvestre) confounded with Ferraricus. III. 32.
- Priester*, a village in Italy, where situated. IV. 772. n. (a).
- Priest*: a reflexion on the Jewish High-Priest not being allowed to marry unless with a virgin. I. 533. a. b.
- Priesthood*: what excluded people from the priesthood, even at the time when married persons were not excluded from it. I. 533. a. b.
- Priests* are the most terrible of all accusers. I. 468. a. According to Montagne, there is nothing more ridiculous than their square caps. II. 93. b. A Priest turns informer against an Abbot whom he was in love with. 277. a. There are a great many of them who go about, and offer themselves from door to door, to say Masses at a low rate. 373. a. b. What they opposed to Farel's eloquence. III. 11. a. b. The Priests of the North are more difficultly brought to undergo the yoke of Celibacy than those of the South. 229. a. There was a time when concubinage was not looked upon as shameful among them. 887. a. A Priest who beat Viret in such a violent manner that he was left for dead. V. 481. a. b. George Braun's oration against the Priests that kept concubines. II. 121.
- Priests* (Salian) what Quintilian said of them. IV. 161. b.
- Prince*, A reply that a Prince made. I. 130. b. A Prince cannot express any sort of a command more absolute than that of a request. 583. b. People pay dear sometimes for attacking a Prince by libels. II. 216. b. Their goodness contributes more than their wickedness towards dethroning them. I. 273. b. II. 100. a. b. 739. a. They are not acquainted with every thing that is contained in books dedicated

- cated to them. I. 338. People ought to be cautious how they behave to young Princes. 377. b. What we look upon as their unhappiness, is only a less evil. II. 220. a. We ought not to be surprised at their being less deserving than they should be. 256. b. 257. a. Their politics have something that is capricious, when it consists in debauching one another's subjects. 360. b. The necessity to which they are reduced of doing certain things is more the cause of their unhappiness than glory. 416. b. 417. a. They have no greater enemies than Flatterers, Poets, Panegyrist, Soothsayers, and Astrologers. 437. a. They neglect those whom they think themselves sure of, and labour chiefly to gain those whom they distrust. 443. a. b. III. 421. a. One word from them will have a greater influence towards reforming the fashions, than all the sermons in the world. II. 545. b. It is not sufficient to make our court to them in order to obtain something from them, if we do not likewise make our court to their favourites. 602. a. b. 603. a. They are served with more zeal than God, and are nevertheless very often the slaves of their slaves. ibid. The most part of great Princes are unfortunate in their own families. 607. b. 608. a. They play upon the Public. 675. b. They govern the people, but interest governs them. 754. b. 755. a. A man ought to wish for good Princes, and bear with those that are bad. 785. a. Their honour is very often sacrificed to the interest of a Minister. III. 59. b. Their persecuting edicts expose them to great inconveniences. 397. a. Their infidelity disapproved of by Henry the Great. 422. a. b. They seldom end their quarrels with the Pope, but to their own confusion. 611. a. b. They have few enemies whom they ought to look upon as inconsiderable. 715. b. They have had a power to make laws concerning the obstacles of marriage, and no body has taken it from them. 741. b. Whether it is proper that they should be scrupulous. 797. b. 798. a. Their interviews do more harm than good. 809. a. b. Their jealousies. 816. b. 817. a. n. (22). They cannot always govern their states with their beads in their hand. IV. 13. a. It may be said with respect to them that people generally forsake the setting sun, and shew respect to the rising sun. 21. a. b. Their edicts often contain honourable things which are nothing but lies. 147. b. There are Princes, who are much more at a loss than other men, what resolution to take when their wives are unchaste. 339. a. b. They ought never to expose their Majesty unguarded. 429. May share the cares of the government with a Minister. 494. b. 495. a. It is scarce possible to be sincere when we speak of those that are living, or of those whose sons do still reign. ibid. Good Princes take pleasure in distributing their favours themselves, and intrust their Ministers with the care of punishing people. 573. b. They make war upon one another, and are reconciled when they please. 698. a. See Kings. It is dangerous to advise them. 795. a. They should never offend any body with raileries. V. 278. a. b. 279. a. b. A book where there are some good things concerning the qualities which they ought to have. II. 403. Different authors who have writ for their instruction, and the different methods which they have taken. IV. 918. a. b. People rather chuse to commit a sin than to displease those who have it in their power to make or ruin their fortune. V. 811. We cannot form a certain judgment of them from the writings that are published against them in the heat of factions. III. 516. a. b. The attachment of their enemies to a new religion, is to them a strong argument of the falshood of it. V. 652. There are a great many occasions, when they have the disadvantage, without deserving to be blamed for it. 655.
- Princesses* are obliged to make the first advances in love to their inferiors. II. 312. a. b. Cannot conceal their age. IV. 333. a. Could never succeed in any intrigue of gallantry, if they had not their confidants. 335. a.
- Principalities* (Electorate) generally those who are raised to them are men of very aspiring minds. I. 364. a.
- Principle*: divers opinions concerning the principle of all things. II. 298. b. 299. a.
- Principles* to embrace one we must not wait till it be free from all difficulties. I. 241. b. Most persons alter their principles as they change their country and interests. 642. b. Men are little governed by their principles. IV. 39. b.
- Principles* (the doctrine of two) the one good, and the other bad: the origin of that doctrine IV. 517. a. b. 518. a. b. to 522. a. 571. b. 572. a. Empedocles was the first who supposed two principles. IV. 584. b. See Evils.
- Printers* (famous). I. 602. a. b. Their errors are sometimes of great consequence. 633. a. How they multiply writers. II. 541. b. Which may lead compilers into strange mistakes. ibid. The confusion that one of their blunders occasioned. 734. b. 735. a. b. Authors are greatly disturbed thereat. V. 582. b. They are not to be charged with all the faults that are to be met with in books. III. 661. a. b. Authors should not apply to a Printer the moment they are passed their childhood. IV. 164. b. 165. a.
- Printing*, when it was invented. I. 166. a. Was not used in Europe, till about the middle of the XVth century. 578. b. Illiterate persons judged incapable of exercising that art. 755. b. 335. b. 336. a. Tori contributed greatly to the bringing the Printing types to perfection. V. 388. A book which he writ on that subject. ibid.
- Prints*: authors ought not to put false prints into their books. II. 100. b.
- Prisolo* (Benjamin) what he says of the Princess of Condé. II. 137. b. 138. a. And of the lady de Guebriant. III. 265. a. b. 266. a. And of four court ladies. 265. b. 266. a.
- Priorato* (Galeazzo Gualdo) what he says with respect to the consequences of the victory of Avein. III. 829. b.
- Priscianensis* (Franciscus) published the first edition of Arnobius's works. I. 503. a.
- Priscillian* is put to death for his heresies. III. 758. a. b.
- Privileges to Books*, why the States of Holland grant them. V. 804. The privilege to this Dictionary was not granted, till after a long examination of the opposition which the Printers of Moreri made to it. ibid.
- Probity*, how Seneca the Father defines it. I. 185.
- Procefs*: A singular procefs raised about a pension left to a cat. IV. 918. b.
- Procession*: A procession made by Francis I, to expiate the wicked attempt of the Heretics. II. 191. a.
- Proclus*, whether he believed that beasts were no more than Automata. IV. 553. a. b.
- Procopius*, who first published his History in Greek. III. 478. a.
- Proculus*, his lasciviousness. III. 415. a.
- Prodicus* was the founder of the sect of the Adamites. I. 110. a. b. 111. b.
- Prodigies* multiplied through the facility of the Pagans. I. a. b. Frequently make more noise in remote countries than in those where it is pretended that they happened. III. 487. b.
- Πεσνεγγιας*, sacrifices which the Athenians offered in behalf of all the Greeks. I. 5. a. And for what. ibid.
- Profanation*: an horrible profanation of several holy things under Hadrian. I. 648. b. 649. a.
- Professions*: an important advice to those who exercise any particular profession. I. 337. a. A man ought to keep himself within the bounds of his profession. V. 367. b. The Germans learn but one. I. 64. b. The French apply themselves readily to several. ibid.
- Professors*, the meanness of some, and their sordid love for gain, which makes them run from one post to another. I. 56. a. b. 193. b. 195. a. b. II. 622. a. b. A professor who makes an extraordinary acknowledgment. I. 488. a. b. The professors of Philosophy in the universities of France do not explain Politics. II. 6. b. The death of one professor may restore peace to the societies. 29. b. There are some professors who reserve the solution of the greatest difficulties, for those who give them most money. 287. a. The greatest part of them have their writings under their eye, when they read a lecture. 722. a. What some of them put over the doors of their schools.

- schools. 861. a. Some of them permit their boarders to do what they please, and for what reason. III. 663. a. b. A book which contained nothing but the reproaches which two famous professors divulged one against another. IV. 122. a. Complaints against the multitude of professors. V. 229. b. 230. a.
- Prognostics*, the credulity with which people collect and apply them. III. 811. a.
- Prometheus*, how punished by Jupiter, and for what. III. 630. a. Fastened to mount Caucasus. II. 82. b.
- Promises*, which are often made, but very rarely kept. V. 659.
- Pronunciation*: a professor whose pronunciation was exceeding agreeable. IV. 477. a. The country pronunciation does prejudice to a man's eloquence. V. 183. and a. b.
- Proserpina*, women that Venus infligated to prostitute themselves, because they would not own her to be a goddess. IV. 642. a.
- Properties* of things, no reason can be given for them, but when these things have been made freely by a cause, that had some reasons and motives in producing them. II. 644. a. There are many natural properties which are ascribed to miraculous causes. III. 645. b. 646. a.
- Propertius* criticized. IV. 181. a.
- Prophecies*, those who explain them will never own themselves to have been in the wrong. I. 7. b. What excuse St Bernard made for his false prophecies. 774. b. Are trumped up for political ends. II. 387. a. b. An example of prophetic cheats. ibid. A specimen of the frauds which are committed by the help of prophecies. 444. a. b. The most chimerical may bring about great revolutions. 693. b. Prophecies have at all times been forged by those who had a mind to induce people to a revolt. III. 684. a. Braunbom's new discoveries on the explication of them. II. 122. To talk of accomplishing them is endeavouring to introduce slaughter and massacre every where. 127. b. Those who have the sovereign authority among the Protestants have no regard to the vain interpretations that are put upon them. ibid.
- Prophets*, the imperfection of their knowledge. I. 280. a. In the colleges of the Egyptian Priests, they were called prophets, who were in the nature of Deans or Superiors. 347. a. The illusions and evasions of the modern prophets. II. 692. b. The Princes who laugh at them most, do nevertheless make use of them with great success. 693. b. How they come to be so often misled. III. 436. b. A good touch-stone to know whether they be true prophets. IV. 36. a. b. Some people endeavour to vindicate the new prophets, at the expence of the old ones mentioned in the Scripture. 889. b. 890. a. Their end and design in balloting the numbers of the Apocalypse. II. 123. b. Are as bold as ever, when they find themselves contradicted by the event. 124. a. One of their artifices. V. 72. 73. Those who are not supported by the secular arm, are exposed to terrible changes of fortune. 73. and b.
- Propositions* that are condemned should be each of them particularized. I. 340. a. b. A reflexion on the indeterminate way of censuring them. ibid. and 607. a. The method of extracting them when there is a design to have a book censured. 606. a. b. Whether two contradictory propositions are sometimes true and sometimes false. 506. b. 507. a. Whether it follows that every proposition being either true or false, all things happen by the force of destiny. II. 790. b. 791. a.
- Prosperity*, whether it be a mark of the true church. IV. 31. b. 322. a. b. 33. a. b. 50. b. 51. a. b. 52. a. An instance of the vanity thereof. III. 815. b. 816. a. The inconstancy of mens reasonings with respect to adversity and prosperity. IV. 51. a. The false consequences that are drawn from prosperity and adversity. 55. a. b. 216. a. b.
- Protector* looked upon religion as a problematical thing. II. 652. b.
- Protection*, gratitude towards a Prince that affords it, renders a man unfit to write of those things in which that Prince is interested. III. 345. and a. b.
- Protestant*, a name given to Hugh Capet's son-in-law, and for what reason. I. 9.
- Protestants* Domestici; to enter into that body, it was necessary for a man to be of a good family. IV. 104.
- Protestant Religion*, there are some persons, who could wish that we had the History of the growth and progress of it, written neither by a Roman Catholic, nor by a Protestant. IV. 862. a. b.
- Protestants*; when and where their ruin was projected. I. 119. a. b. It has been said that after they had shaken off the Pope's yoke, they found that the yoke of the Secular Power is not easier. 214. They have always maintained, that there was no need of miracles to justify the Reformation. III. 737. b. An assembly of them is detected at Paris, in the year 1557, to the number of four hundred persons, seven of whom were burnt. I. 790. a. They obtain almost every thing they please, after the flight of Charles V, before Duke Maurice. II. 440. a. Those whom the Emperor had banished out of his dominions, were always in hopes of being restored. 691. b. Their affairs cannot fail to be in a happy situation, and why. 758. b. How useful the emulation of Charles V, and Francis I, proved to them. III. 94. a. b. The Duke of Orleans, Francis the first's second son, offers to allow them the free exercise of their religion. 96. a. b. Favoured by the Roman Catholic Princes. 94. a. b. 397. b. 403. a. b. Their design to form a kind of league against the enterprizes of the Jesuits. 504. a. They do not calumniate the Catholics, when they reproach them with the miracles that are to be found in their Legends. IV. 28. b. Their re-union is treated of. 286. b. Should leave off writing controversial books against one another. 680. a. b. 681. a. b. They very much mistrust the Jesuits that are willing to embrace their religion. 855. a. Informations against some of their meetings at Paris. 882. a. b. There was nothing captious in the clause of the confession, which they presented to the King at Poissy. V. 28. a. Why a Pope prognosticated that their religion would be of no long continuance. 172. a. Pensioned by the Cardinal of Lorraine. III. 874. b. Every one of them has received an order like that which Ehud received. II. 123. a. They become masters of several cities. ibid. Weakened and oppressed by the Catholics, during the last ten years of the XVIIth century. 125. b. When a man may lawfully exhort them to make war upon the Pope. 127. b. Those who have the sovereign authority among them, do not measure their conduct by the predictions of their writers. ibid. They still write books to maintain the story of Pope Joan. IV. 732. Have not understood the interest of their party, in relation to that story, which is of little moment to them. 739. Are not equitable in their behaviour to Blondel, whom they should have imitated. ibid. Their disputes with the Jesuits were never so violent, as during the first thirty years of the XVIIth century. 727. a. Protestant authors, who maintained the story of Pope Joan, after Florimond de Remond's book, and that of Father Labbe came out. 732. a. b. 733. a. Protestant authors who have not believed it. 733. a. They speak very disadvantageously of Pope Paul II. 509. Did not add the story of Pope Joan, to the Chronicle of Martin Polonus. 709. a. Esteem Raynbroeck's works. 942. b. Their way of proceeding, with respect to the obscenities related by their own writers, or by the Papists. V. 857. Have declared for Savonarola, but they only considered him on his fair side. IV. 67. a. b. 68. a. b. Gave him the title of Martyr. 69. a. b. 70. a. b. Accused of a violent and seditious humour. 89. a. b. Two authors, both equally mad, write the one upon the ruin of the Protestant religion, the other upon the ruin of Popery. 562. and a. b. 563. and a. b. They make use of Windeck's maxims, as a handle to throw the blame of the wars in Germany, upon the Court of Vienna. 263, 264. a. b.
- Protoplast*, a Painter who was never satisfied with his own works. III. 836. b. V. 135. b.
- Provençals*, their clamours against Mr de Launoi, upon his attempting to cure them of some errors. I. 362.
- Provence*; Peter de Quiqueran, writes a book on the praises of that Province. IV. 818.

Proverb,

INDEX.

III

- Proverb*, the original of the Proverb Græcum est, non potest legi. I. 67. a.
- Providence*, the vanity of man makes him doubt of it. I. 24. a. The axiom of a modern author on Providence. 94. b. Is superior to all our designs however well concerted. 361. b. Whether a man may be virtuous, without fearing it. 541. II. 783. b. 784. a. People dispose of it a little too rashly. I. 776. a. And are too ready to search into its counsels. IV. 55. a. b. 73. a. Whether the Providence that made the world, made also the diseases and vices to which men are liable. II. 496. b. 497. a. The Poets speak of it under too bold metaphors. 543. The prosperity of wicked men, never makes those question a Providence, who share in that prosperity, or who at least receive no damage from it. 652. b. The reasons which are drawn from the common course of Providence to prove it, are not good for all sorts of unbelievers. 655. b. It has been said that the punishment of some impious persons, was a sentence of abolution for Providence. 670. b. n. (93). We very often see those, who fancy themselves inspired, distrusting it. 691. a. b. Providence does not hear the prayers of the slothful. ibid. Whether such as deny it are not capable to live in society. 776. a. b. 777. a. b. In what respects it is easy for Providence to please every body. III. 2. b. 3. a. Its decrees break through all obstacles. 293. a. A complaint against it, on account of the prosperity of the wicked. 357. a. b. A sect which denies it, and goes even farther than Epicurus. 550. and a. b. How far Providence raises and depresses men, when it pleases. 747. The ill qualities of men, are at some seasons more proper than their good ones, to execute the decrees of Providence. 945. a. Whether it can be said that Providence overthrows worldly greatness and prosperity, to shew it is a power. IV. 575. a. b. 576. a. Is called in question, on account of the prosperity of wicked men. II. 670. b. n. (93). IV. 932. b. 933. a. b. 934. a. b. 935. a. b. Considered one way, it is of no great use to lead worldly people to virtue. V. 181. a. b. 182. a. How much the doctrine of Providence can contribute towards making us virtuous and happy men. 326. a. b. It sometimes blinds men. 373. a.
- Province*: on what the glory of a Province depends at certain times. I. 482. a. It is a sign that a man is of a mean extraction, when he bears the name of his Province. IV. 173. a. b.
- Provinces*, their boundaries have often been altered. I. 537.
- Provinces of the Low-Countries*, together with Franche Comté, formed the circle of Burgundy. II. 222. Charles V had a design to erect them into a kingdom, and give it the name of Regnum Lothinum. ibid. 223.
- Provinces* (United) who was their first Ambassador at the Court of France. I. 3. And what rank was given to their Ambassadors there, after that time. ibid. The affairs of the United Provinces went on better and better every day, from the time that a Visionary had threatened them with the vengeance of heaven. III. 690. b. They are the bulwark of the empire, the strongest support of the Netherlands, and the mediators and guarantees of peace. 851. b. Very ill treated in a speech, under the name of Herimannus Conrad. II. 550. See States General.
- Provincial* (letters to the) See Letters (Provincial).
- Provincials* (or country Squires) ridiculed by Moliere, and for what. I. 188. a. Are great fumbler. IV. 461. b.
- Prudence*, whether it allows us to resist violent spirits. I. 195. b. Human prudence is, properly speaking, the sport of the Providence of God. V. 678.
- Prudentius*, a short account of that Poet's life. IV. 786. b. 789. a.
- Prussia* erected into a kingdom. V. 194. a.
- Psalm* translated into French verse, to what tunes they were sung. I. 478. b. Facts concerning Marot's translation of them. IV. 157. a. b. 158. a. b. 159. a. b. 160. a. b. 161. a. b. And concerning Beza's translation. ibid. The church of Geneva, which was the first that made use of Marot's and Beza's version, was also the first that forsook it. 161. b. 162. a. Reckoned inferior or equal to Pindar. 704. b. 705. a. Sainte-Aldegonde's translation had the same fate with that of Conrart. V. 20. b. An
- alteration of taste, with respect to these spiritual songs. 446. a. b. Translated into Italian verse by Giulio Cesare Paschali. IV. 492.
- Psalm* and prose divisions of the Church: they were the Opera's of the XVth and XVIth centuries. II. 481. b.
- Psalter*, the Protestants reproached with an alteration which they had made in their's. IV. 164. a. b. When the Psalter of the Protestants was printed with a licence. ibid.
- Psammenius* weeps not for the misfortune of his children, but weeps for that of his friends. IV. 570. b. n. (52).
- Psammiticus* brings the whole kingdom of Egypt under subjection to himself. IV. 343. a.
- Pterelau*, observations on his cup. V. 307. b. 308. a.
- Ptolemy*, the intricacy and confusion of his system, with respect to the celestial spheres. II. 379. b. Who first published his Almagest in Greek. III. 255. b.
- Public* was imposed upon, long before the invention of the Gazette. I. 129. The ingratitude of the Public. 212. a. b. For the instruction of the Public, it is necessary to discover both the good, and the bad, of great men. 564. The capricious humour of the Public, with respect to the works of the learned. 625. b. II. 523. a. b. 524. a. Deserves respect. I. 668. b. Whether vices are sometimes more beneficial to the Public than virtues. III. 293. b. The mercenary spirit of those who serve the Public. 339. b. 340. a. b. 341. a. b. With what boldness people impose upon the Public. V. 643. a. A girl married at the public expence. I. 56.
- Publican*; the character of a Publican decrined in the Gospel, and profane authors. V. 465. a.
- Puer*; in good Latin authors, a person goes sometimes under that denomination, at twenty years of age. IV. 171. b.
- Puis* (Madame de) leaves a pension to her cat, and thereby occasions a remarkable law-suit. IV. 918. b.
- Pulmo Marinus*, what it is. IV. 677. b. 678. a.
- Pulpit*, formerly a prodigious deal of useless reading was displayed there. II. 105. b.
- Punish*: a whole people punished for the crime of a particular person. I. 158. b. 159. a. What Bion said with respect to the common observation, that Divine justice punishes the faults of the Fathers in their children. II. 12. b. The Pagans represented their gods under the idea of Beings, who punish one crime by inducing the offender to commit another. IV. 229. and b.
- Punishment*: consideration on the eternity of punishment. V. 175. b.
- Puns* are at present quite out of doors. II. 616. a.
- Purgatory*: what a banterer said of Francis I, with respect to Purgatory. II. 372. b. 373. a.
- Purists* have impoverished the French language too much. III. 208. a. b. 209. a. Their strange principles. V. 840, 841, 844, &c. Do not consult the interest of modesty in their affected expressions. 846. There have been some such in all ages. 851. The inconsistency of their conduct. 856, 857.
- Puritans*, whence so called. I. 256. a. b.
- Purum Putum*, the meaning of that expression. I. 227. a.
- Putianus* (Erycius) has written concerning the point of day. V. 779. Has expressed himself ill in speaking of those who go round the world eastward. 780. Confuted by Michalor, who forgets to object one thing to him. ibid.

Q

- Q A benefited man is deprived of his revenues, for his manner of pronouncing that letter. IV. 837. a. b.
- Qualities*: the effect of the proportions and disproportions, between the qualities of one and the same man. I. 698. a. b. The difference there is between manifest and occult qualities. II. 677. b.
- Qualities* (Corporeal) are not in the objects. IV. 654. a. b.

11 N

Quarters:

- Quarters*: an answer which has been made at different times, concerning the King's Quarters. III. 718. a. b.
- Queen of France*: a title given to Elizabeth, Queen of England; and Beza ridiculously charged with it as a crime. I. 800. a. b.
- Queens*, what they ought to do, in order to place their sex upon a good foot. III. 814. a. Considerations upon their unlawful amours. IV. 308. b. 309. a. A Queen that was nurse to her son. II. 382. a. b.
- Queens Dowagers* often raise cabals to the prejudice of their children. IV. 558. a.
- Queens of Spain*, that have been educated in France or Germany, fall into a kind of servitude. IV. 368. b.
- Queretanus* has a very bad character given him by Patin. IV. 58. a.
- Querle Infantum*, there are divers copies of that book in the libraries of Paris. II. 556. a. b.
- Quernus* promoted to the dignity of Poet Laureat, and solemnly crowned. III. 763. a.
- Question*: it is almost impossible to determine any question by verbal disputes. IV. 688. b.
- Question Royale Et sa Decision*: an explanation touching that book. V. 15. b. 16. a. b.
- Quaestorship*, persons that had been Consuls, did not decline that office, though it was a dignity inferior to that of a Praetor. II. 346. b.
- Quid pro quo*: nothing is more frequent among authors, than Quid pro quo's. I. 78. b.
- Quick* commended for his collection of the Synods of France. I. 671. b. n. (6).
- Quietism*, notions that come very near it. I. 155. a. b. Its conformity with spiritual Origenism. IV. 421. a. We find the seeds thereof in Plato. 690. b. Taught in the east as well as in the west. V. 202. b. 203. a. 302. a. b.
- Quietists*, a specimen of their visions. II. 118. a. b. 678. a. b. They pretend that their principles are as ancient as mythical Divinity. ibid. b. What they say of the falsity of the notions, under which the Deity is commonly represented, approved of by some Philosophers. ibid.
- Quinaus*, verses wrote upon him. V. 400. a. b.
- Quintilian*, the judgment that he passes on Pacuvius and Accius. I. 61. a. Has preserved a reflexion full of good sense. ibid. b. What he says of a professed accuser. II. 356. b. And of facility in writing. III. 262. b. And of a writing which the author is continually mending and new-molding. 837. a. n. (21). He censures those authors who can never be satisfied with themselves. IV. 85. b. n. (49).
- Quintin* (John) his judgment of the annals of Aquitain, by John Bouchet. II. 103. a. b. 104. a.
- Quintus Curtius* had a greater effect in curing a sick person, than Avicenna, and the other writers upon Physic. IV. 311. a. A translation of that author into the Turkish language promised. V. 223. b. n. (c).
- Quisterpius* blamed without reason by Mr Arnauld. III. 246. a.
- Quotation*: sometimes those who undertake the correction of a work, strike out certain things in one place, and leave elsewhere a quotation of the very same things. V. 276. b.
- Quotations*, reflexion on those that are falsified. III. 203. a. It would be a very useful thing to make a collection of false quotations. IV. 108. b. It is dangerous to trust them, when they have not been compared with the original. V. 255. b. The ridiculous practice of those who heaped quotations on quotations, and intermixed the sacred and profane. II. 105. b. 106. a.
- Quote*: people should stick religiously to the words of the authors whom they quote. I. 338. a. b. 610. a. V. 307. b. 308. a. It is a bad custom not to quote authors. I. 453. a. II. 324. b. Balzac's artifice in this point. 398. b. What a perfect exactness requires of us in quoting a book. 634. a. The impertinence of those who quote Plato and Aristotle, to prove a thought common to all ages and nations. IV. 209. b. n. (24). An advice to those who quote authors. 231. b. A reflexion upon a certain way of quoting. 376. a. Rules to be observed in quoting. 770. a. b. A wrong way of quoting authors. V. 325. b.
- Quoters* reduced to two classes. II. 778. b. 779. a. Whether they have more trouble in composing, than authors that do not quote. ibid.

R.

- RABBI: a famous Rabbi converted by a learned woman in a regular disputation. V. 298. b.
- Rabbins*, their idle stories with respect to Adam's lamenting the death of Abel, and abstaining from any carnal commerce with Eve. I. 23. a. How some of them explain the seventh verse of the 51st Psalm. II. 612. a. Their explication of that verse does not well agree with the doctrine of Original Sin. ibid. What they have imagined in order to explain the variations of nature. IV. 94. a. b. What they say about a small bone which is in the human body, and which they call Lux. I. 649. b. 650. a. b. IV. 376. b. 665. b. Thoughts of some Rabbins upon the souls of beasts. 904. b. 905. a. b. 906. a. b.
- Rabec* suffers martyrdom. V. 197. a. b.
- Rabelais*, what Girac says of him. IV. 542. b. The author was not much pleased with him: he is nevertheless read and esteemed by many people of honour and worth. V. 802.
- Rabelais Reformed*, what that book is, and by whom composed. III. 133. b. 134. a.
- Rabutin* (Bussi) quoted. I. 446. a. n. (2). V. 76. a. n. (8). What an Abbot wrote to him. III. 166. a. A Latin epigram writ against him. IV. 196. a. Facts that concern him. 753. b. &c. What he says about the contrariety of ingredients in the human composition. IV. 441. a. Whether he be author of the book intitled Amours du Palais Royal. V. 753. b. 754. a. An acknowledgment that he makes. 756. His Amours des Gauls more dangerous than the satire of Petronius. 847.
- Racan*, what thing about him he set the greatest value upon. V. 384. a.
- Rack*, the inconveniencies that attend the use of it. III. 238. b.
- Racovia*, when and upon what occasion the college which the Unitarians had erected there, was demolished. V. 168. a. 173. b. 174. a.
- Ragguagli di Parnasso*, who is the author of that book. II. 38.
- Ragotki* (Sigismond) what commission he received in the name of God. II. 691. b. His perplexity with regard to the war that he was solicited to make. 692. Revelations are published after that Prince's death, which supposed him still alive. ibid. a.
- Ragotki* (George) initiated into the mysteries of Drabicius, II. 693. a. b.
- Ragunau*, a satire against him. II. 604. a.
- Raileries* of persons that were burnt in effigy. II. 85. b. Cannot be good if they have no other foundation but lies. 527. a. III. 378. b. 379. a. 631. b. See Jefti. There are some raileries so ingenious that though a person be nettled at them, he has not a good pretence to complain. IV. 777. b.
- Raynaud* (Theophilus) concealing himself under the name of S. Emonerius, writes against John Barnes's treatise of equivocations. I. 660. a. Accused of having censured the Apostles creed. III. 144. a.
- Raynolds* (William) what is reported of him and his brother. V. 275. a. b.
- Ralph Higden*, a Benedictin Monk, confounded with Radulphus Flaviacensis. IV. 824. a. b.
- Ralph the Black*, otherwise called Radulphus Flaviacensis. IV. 824.
- Rambouillet-Houffe*, an encomium upon it. III. 177. a.
- Rambouillet* (Madam de) her virtue. IV. 83. a.
- Ramis* involved in Theological disputes. II. 696.
- Ramis* involved in. Flourishes in Switzerland. IV. 842. b.
- Ramists*, their disputes involved in the disputes of Divines. II. 696. a. b. 697. a. We justly laugh now-a-days at their quarrels with the Peripatetics. 697. a.
- Rampalle* (the Sieur de) what he tells us of a King of Lydia. IV. 563. a.
- Ramus*, an epigram writ against him. IV. 474. b. 475. a. He was one of the heads of the cabal which

- which endeavoured to change the form of church discipline. V. 738. His method greatly esteemed by William Adolphus Scribonius. 100.
- Rapes*: punished with death in France. IV. 636. b. Cannot be justified. ibid. 637. a. b. Reflexion upon the rapes of fair damiels in romances. III. 365. a. b. 366. a.
- Rapin* (Nicolas) Lieutenant of the short robe, his conversation with the Jesuit Guignard, as the latter was going to be executed. III. 276. b.
- Rapin* (Father) is of opinion that the XVIIth century is superior to the XVIth, in knowledge and ingenuity. I. 92. b. Censured for several errors touching the studies and different employments of Aristotle. 464. a. b. 465. a. b. He did not give himself the trouble of consulting originals. 472. a. A fine reflexion which he makes upon great men. 619. b. His error with respect to a passage of Plutarch where Epicurus is mentioned. II. 775. b. 776. a. Quoted. 849. a. b. n. (40), (42).
- Ratan*, a very malignant ulcer. I. 39. a.
- Ratibon*: the History of the conference of Ratibon. III. 535. b. 536. a. b. 537. a. Baillet's judgment upon what passed in that conference. 530. a. b.
- Ravallac*, whether he could have been induced by the doctrine of the Jesuits to assassinate Henry IV. IV. 128. b. 129. a. b. 130. a. What moved him to commit such a Parricide. 131. a.
- Ré*, the confounding of that ill with the ill of Ré, occasions an anachronism. V. 188. a.
- Readers* are seldom mortified when they do not understand an author, and why. I. 218. a. b. The most part of them are seldom sensible of an error in reasoning. 419. a. What sort of readers are most prone to criticize. III. 337. a. b. An author should wish for such as are neither ignorant nor very learned. 905. b. 906. a. Are sometimes more prejudiced than the author whom they accuse of partiality. II. 310. a. b. Are not candid enough. ibid. b. 311. a. There are some readers so warm that they tear out of their copies such things as are ignominious to their sect. IV. 711. b. Many of them do not compare one whole book to another whole book. V. 180. a. There are some who in the margin of their books write abusive reflexions, or give the authors the lie. 846.
- Reading*: one of the greatest uses that may be drawn from it, is to learn the weaknesses of the heart of man, and the ill effects of prejudices in point of religion. I. 784. b. Too profusely displayed towards the beginning of the XVIIth century. II. 105. b. 106. a. b. A passage of la Bruyere on that head. 105. b. A passage of Balzac on the same subject. ibid. 106. a. An advocate who pleaded thus, pleaded more for himself than for his Client. ibid. b. It could only serve to withdraw the Judge's attention. ibid.
- Real* (the Abbot de St) unjustly censured, with respect to the Squittino della Libertà Veneta. V. 449. a. b. Quoted. III. 808. a. b. n. (124), (125), (126), (127), (128), (129). IV. 657. a. n. (36). V. 366. a. b. n. (26), (27), (28).
- Reason* has different faces. I. 681. b. Whether the light of reason ought to be consulted. II. 111. b. The vanity and weakness of it. 799. a. b. IV. 95. b. 96. a. 323. a. b. 513. a. b. 514. a. b. 515. a. A reflexion upon its weaknesses. III. 459. b. It can only discover to us our ignorance and weakness, and the necessity of a revelation. IV. 96. a. It wages a continual war with the body and the senses. 440. a. Is not able to make us do what she makes us approve. 442. a. The Philosophers observed the slavery of reason, and suspected the cause that produced it; they were not ignorant that the power of reason is lost, and its light nevertheless preserved. 441. a. b. How deplorable its fate is. 514. b. 515. a. It is useful to humble it. 519. a. Its weakness should conduct us to the light of revelation. ibid. What Cotta says of it. 516. b. 517. a. Is a source of deception as well as the senses. 592. a. V. 441. a. b. It is not reason but faith that makes us Christians. IV. 591. b. 592. a. Whether evidence which is the Non plus ultra of reason can be what they call Criterion Veritatis. 654. b. V. 586. b. Whether by following the light of reason, and shaking off the yoke of tradition a person is led to Atheism. 441. a. b. See Philosophy. The best reasons lose their weight, when they are alledged by a person in miserable circumstances. IV. 852. b. 853. a. The mysteries of the Gospel are above it, or even contrary to it. V. 815. Divines will always have the worst in a dispute where they shall only appeal to the light of reason. ibid. It cannot furnish answers to its own objections, we must have recourse to the authority of God. ibid. The Catholics and Protestants agree to reject it in the controversies about the mysteries of religion. 817. Such Protestants as study to make more room for it in Divinity, are suspected of Socinianism. ibid. Its strange mistakes, when it treats of divine matters. 820. A person should renounce it, in order to receive faith. 834. The ludicrous way in which this reflexion has been expressed, and the authors confutation. ibid. Reason should be silent when the word of God speaks. 817. 830.
- Reasonings*, there are some which one may elude by turning them into a jest. I. 639. b. 640. a. b.
- Re-baptize*: whether children, baptized by a woman, should be re-baptized. I. 704. b.
- Rebellion*: the head of the rebellion, requires a greater submission than the true master. III. 299. b.
- Rebels*, whether they do all that they can, whereas those who fight for their Prince do no more than they ought. I. 711. a. b. Their artifices. 265. a. Their common protestation that they have no design against the King. II. 735. a.
- Rebenstock*, his Colloquia Menfalia, the History of that book. III. 938. b.
- Recollis*: Aloisio de Leon draws up their rules. III. 772.
- Recommend*: it is very dangerous to recommend as able person than one's self. II. 372. a.
- Reconciliation*, a feast which the Jews solemnize by the oblation of a cock and other ceremonies. III. 125. a. b.
- Red-bair'd People* sacrificed to the ghost of King Oflis. II. 233.
- Redi*, his book on the generation of insects, quoted. IV. 517. a. n. (38).
- Reform*: an attempt to reform abuses may sometimes have criminal motives. V. 459. b. 460. a.
- Reformation of the Church*, what it was that gave several persons a dislike to it. I. 139. a. b. And retarded the progress of it. 285. a. Persons who all their life-time made profession of the Catholic religion, though they wished for a reformation. 659. Baudouin writes a treatise of the means of attaining to a good reformation. 697. b. Cameron found many things in the Reformed Church, which wanted a farther reformation. II. 288. and a. b. A person may believe that the Church stands in need of reformation, without approving a certain manner of reforming it. 374. a. What judgment some passed upon it in the beginning. 799. a. b. 810. b. 811. a. b. Persons that were not far from it in their hearts, but who disapproved of the conduct of those that were establishing it. 799. a. It was supported by the emulation of Charles V, and Francis I. III. 94. a. b. The reformation which Queen Elizabeth established. II. 754. b. Attacked in Holland. III. 675. a. b. It could not have been undertaken at a more favourable time. 947. b. 948. a. b. 954. b. V. 482. a. b. Inconveniences that sprung up at its birth. IV. 46. and a. b. What faults Erasmus observed in the measures that were taken against it. III. 954. b. Melancthon did not approve all the manners of it. IV. 185. b. Favoured by Margaret de Valois Queen of Navarre. 317. b. 318. a. b. 319. a. b. 320. a. 321. a. b. And by Joan Queen of Navarre. 324. b. 325. a. b. 326. a. b. 327. a. b. &c. The progress it made by means of the King and Queen of Navarre. 325. b. 326. a. b. 327. a. b. The restoration of polite literature made way for the Reformation. V. 286. b. The project of reformation which was drawn up at Cologne. 557. a. b. 558. a. b.
- Reformation of Manners* is of a short continuance. IV. 353. b. 354. a.
- Reformed*: Thuanus calls them a suspicious people. I. 119. a. Some of them would have adopted the flanders that were published against Beza, if he had written against their party. 797. a. b. They had very near got the upper hand in France. III. 507. b. 508.

- b.* 508. a. b. Whether they behaved at that time in too ostentatious a manner. ibid. b. 509. a. To what they ascribed the perfection which they suffered under the reign of Henry II. IV. 698. b. The libel which George Boquet writ against them condemned to be burnt. II. 95. a. b. They laughed at Brocard's Prophetic visions. 144. b. Acknowledged Caraccioli as a Bishop, after he had publicly embraced their religion. 313. a. b. 314. a. b. An Arrêt of the Parliament of Paris, by which any one is permitted to kill them. 458. b. Censured with respect to an alteration made in their Psalter. IV. 164. a. b. Their affairs were not in a bad situation at the time of the conference of Poissy. ibid. a. Banished out of England, and cruelly persecuted in Germany. V. 550. b. They are very jealous in the point of a total submission to the mysteries of religion, and defend it zealously against the Socinians. 817. Accused of a violent and seditious humour. 89. a.
- Reformers*; they clamoured loudly against the Peripatetic Philosophy, and for what reason, according to Father Rapin. I. 472. b. 473. a. The keen style of two among them did them great service. II. 60. b. 61. a. A reproach cast upon them, as if they warred against Rome for the same reasons the Grecians did against Troy, for the sake of a woman. 266. b. The violent disposition of some of them has been looked upon as necessary. III. 11. a. The calumnies published against them are destitute of all probability. 935. a. b. 936. a. b. 937. a. b. 938. a. b. 939. b. 945. a. b. 946. a. b. 947. a. b. 948. a. b. 949. a. The fabulous impertinencies that were published against them. ibid. b.
- Refuge*, See Asylum.
- Refugees*, Abraham is their Patriarch. I. 44. a. They hoped that their re-admission would be made an article of the peace of Munster. II. 691. b.
- Refutation*: a flight refutation of a book does only serve the more to recommend it. V. 179. b.
- Refutations*: certain refutations have contributed to the increasing of Socinus's sect. V. 179. a. b. There is no refutation so pitiful as not to discover some defects in the book of an adversary. 180. a.
- Refute*: there are people who take a much greater pleasure in refuting what was advanced by others, than in laying down any thing certain of their own. I. 620. and b. The most frank and fair way of refuting an adversary's book. V. 505. b. 506. a.
- Regius*, his maxim, when the question is to speak of God exactly. IV. 876. b.
- Register to the Parliament of Paris*, that office was enjoyed by the Tillet family for above a century. V. 354. and b.
- Regius* Professor at Utrecht, brought into trouble for a Thesis concerning the union of the soul and body. III. 195. and a. b. 196. a. b.
- Regius* (Raphael) frequents Greek lectures at seventy years of age. IV. 292. a. b. 293. a.
- Regnier*, some of his verses. III. 517. b. 518. a. An examination of what he says, that every one is the author of his own fortune. V. 368. b. 369. a. b. &c. Quoted. 402. b. n. (26).
- Regnier Desmarais* (the Abbot) quoted. V. 582. b. n. (102).
- Regnum Leoninum*; Charles V. had a design to erect the provinces of the Low-Countries into a kingdom under that name. II. 222. 223.
- Regular*, his maxim ought to be followed in a special manner when the question is how Heretics are to be dealt with. I. 789. a. b.
- Reign*: it is not always sure to judge of the reign of a Prince by the first years of it. V. 655.
- Reign*: the desire of reigning stifles all sentiments of humanity. II. 381. and b. Why it is a difficult matter to reign well. I. 573. b.
- Reineccius* composes the elogy of James Horstius. III. 487.
- Relations*; whether such truths as may appear shocking to modesty should be suppressed in them. II. 30. a. b. 31. a. b. After what manner people flourish upon them. II. 405. b. 406. a. b. &c. The false relations that are given of public misfortunes serve as a foundation to Historians. 749. a. b.
- Relations in Prose*, it would be often necessary to give notice that they are set off with poetical fictions. I. 747. b.
- Relicks*, several Pagan cities boasted of having the same. II. 530. a. b. 531. a. What Pomponatius said of them. IV. 716. b. Certain relicks lost, and others substituted in their place. 826. a. b. 827. a. A collection of relicks that was made with great pains: the price of them falls after Luther's reformation. V. 457. b. 458. a. Calvin's advertisement concerning the general inventory that it would have been proper to make of them. II. 274. b. The destruction that was made of them in France. ibid.
- Religio Medici*, the religion of a Physician; a book which according to some might be intitled: The Physician of Religion. V. 835. Passages of that book. ibid. The author of it: what his notion was concerning the manner after which men propagate their species. 6. a.
- Religion* is so far from making the sovereigns masters of their subjects, that it gives their subjects a power over them. I. 13. a. It is not a mere human invention. ibid. Disputes in religion cause terrible disorders. 23. b. 24. a. Policy dares not commit the support of it to God only. 94. a. b. Indifference in the point of religion is a very odious thing. 97. b. It is the fate of all religions to be the worse for age. 223. a. b. Religion often serves for a pretence to accusers. 307. a. Mockers at religion are apt to mislead young persons. II. 12. b. Whether a man deserves praise for resisting temptations to change his religion. 27. a. b. It comes in every where, and even in the most fierce duels. 128. b. The ill custom of interesting religion in the disputes of the learned. 141. b. The goodness of a religion is not to be judged of by the good or bad success of a battle. 195. What Charron said of it. 453. b. 454. a. A piece of a parallel between different religions. 465. 466. It cannot be concluded whether a man has any religion or not, from his witty sayings either for or against it. 670. a. b. 671. a. It is a more common thing than people imagine, to be wholly ignorant in matters of religion. 677. b. 678. a. b. Revolutions in religion seldom happen, but when people at first ask for themselves a toleration which they refuse to others. III. 147. a. b. Religion is divided into factions, just as commonwealths are. 172. b. The inconveniences that attend the disputes which Divines raise about religion. 360. a. b. 361. a. Religion alone can furnish us with strong weapons against the Sophistry of the Cynics. 459. b. Many people leave their country for it, without renouncing their vices. 586. b. An inconvenience arising from the unity of religion. 642. b. Disputes about religion that were carried on in Holland. 675. a. b. 676. a. The maxims of a Latitudinarian on that head. ibid. b. 677. a. b. There are nations which have no religion at all. 781. a. b. Whether the great changes that happen sometimes in religion should be attributed to the constellations. 948. a. b. Controversies about religion make but few Sceptics. ibid. b. 949. a. Who those are, that ought carefully to consider the mischiefs which are produced by civil wars on account of religion. IV. 18. a. b. 19. a. In the affair of religion heaven has been represented as resembling the earth. 354. a. b. A man should never change his religion, unless he can be a gainer by the change. 375. a. b. It is more advantageous to believe than not to believe what it teaches. 489. a. n. (55). The disorder in which it leaves the hearts and minds of men, when it is false. 562. a. b. There is one which is called the religion of prudent men. 859. b. 860. a. False religion in some sort degrades a man to the condition of a brute beast. V. 77. b. There are some men whose religion is in their mind, and not in their heart, and there are others whose religion is in their heart, and not in their mind. 208. a. b. Persons accused of abtaining from the public exercises of religion. 257. and a. b. 258. a. The design of changing one's religion carries with it something astonishing, and even those who are fully resolved to execute it, can hardly bring themselves to do so. 539. a. How remarkably Lucius Junius Brutus mitigated an article of religion. II. 163. a. b. The United Provinces accused of taking no care of religion, but as far as it appears useful to them to aggrandize themselves. 550. a. b. We

- We ought not to affect subtilties in matters of religion. III. 343. b. Persons who have fled for their religion: nothing is more common, than to see them ringing the alarm against the sects. 758. Persons that have no religion, by what they are excited to a good moral life. V. 811. The end and substance of religion, is to imitate God. 812. Without the true religion, there is no true virtue. ibid. Reflexions upon the slanders that are published against those who change their religion. 225. a. b. 226. a. The extravagancies of romances have crept into religion. I. 166.
- Religion (the prevailing) has its state-tricks as well as temporal Princes. III. 948. a. b. A maxim against a man, who goes about to oppose it. V. 314. a. b.
- Religion of the Sovereign. See Sovereign.
- Religion (Natural) a false way of reasoning, may bring a man to deny it. I. 97. a. What it is. ibid. a. b.
- Religion (Christian) the Celsus's and Porphyry's would have attacked it with the weapons which Mary d'Agreda furnishes them with. I. 137. b. What Hierocles wrote against it. III. 444. a. b. 445. a. The Popes and Cardinals accused by Calvin, of making a jest of it. II. 274. b. 275. a. Erasmus quoted on that head. ibid. a. b. n. f. (189). There are good proofs of the truth of it, in Socinus's treatise de Autoritate S. Scripturæ. V. 180. b. Its principle. 830. Its discussions, disputes, and controversies cannot be carried to the Tribunal of Philosophy, but only to that of Revelation. ibid.
- Religion (Romish) the exercise of it is absolutely forbid in Bearn. IV. 327. a. b. See Church of Rome.
- Religion (Reformed) the testimony which a Libertine finds himself obliged to give to it. II. 649. b.
- Religion (Jewish): Bodin in his dialogue concerning religions, gives the advantage to the Jewish. II. 45. a.
- Religion (Mahometan) profaned. I. 49. a. How much larger the extent of it is, than that of the Christian religion. IV. 26. a.
- Religions: a treatise on the toleration of Religions by Mr de Beauval. I. 672. a. A work designed to effect the coalition of Religions. 689. a. b. In all Religions, people are strangely inclined to think themselves favoured by miracles. II. 552. a.
- Remedy: it is a remedy for some people to discharge their choler upon paper. I. 43. There are remedies which do more harm, than the disorders which they are designed to cure. IV. 578. a. A Physician who implored the blessing of God upon his remedies. III. 486. a. b.
- Remond (Florimond de) what he relates touching a project, to re-unite Sweden to the Church of Rome. III. 138. b. 139. a. Quoted with respect to the Psalms. IV. 157. a. b. n. (69), (70), (71), (72), (73). The answer that was made to him concerning the conformity of the tunes of some Psalms with those of ballads. 159. a. b. 160. a. Is the Purveyor-General of the Roman Catholic writers, who speak of the Reformers of the XVIIth century. 393. a. What he says of Brocardus. II. 144. a. b. 145. a. A gross blunder which Blondel reproaches him with. IV. 106. a. b. What he says with respect to what Beza had advanced, concerning the She-Pope, at the conference of Poissy. 736, 737. The Protestants were not confounded at his work concerning the She-Pope, they despised it. 732. a. b. & seq. The work is not bad, but too full of digressions and declamations. 733. b. Many ascribe it to the Jesuit Richeome. ibid. He unjustly accuses Heroldus, of having added the story of the She-Pope, to the Chronicle of Martin Polonius. 709. a.
- Remonstrants, their five articles are no fundamental Heresies. III. 174. a. Accused of having troubled the Church. 343. a. b.
- Renatus, King of Sicily, was a Painter. IV. 307. and b. 308. a.
- Renaudie (la) harangues his accomplices. III. 285. a. b. The causes of John Du Tillet's aversion for him. V. 353. and a. b. 354. a. b.
- Renaudot (the Abbot), reflexions upon his judgment concerning this Dictionary. V. 797. to 809. The characters of him, and of the judgment which he passes. 797, 798. There are falsities in that judgment: the reason for which the author does not V. Q. L. V.
- point them out. 804. What sorts of faults he imputes to the author. ibid. and 805.
- Rennes, the disorders of that diocese occasioned by the Clergy. III. 60.
- Renou (John de) his Antidistary quoted. I. 677. a. b. n. (1), (2). He pretends that there are certain words, which prevent a man's enjoying a woman. IV. 385. a. b. n. (2). Cites Tacitus ill. ibid. The censure which he passes upon Nicolas Præpositus. 764. a. b.
- Repentant maids: a house where persons are shut up, who very often are neither the one nor the other. II. 373. a.
- Reports: town reports are little consistent with truth. I. 243. a. Historians ought not to follow popular reports, when they agree not with authors. II. 770. b. A judicious observation of Lampridius upon that subject. ibid. Trusting too rashly to common reports, is the general fault of those who suffer persecution for their religion. V. 42.
- Reprisals necessary in war. I. 709. b. 710. a.
- Reprobation (absolute) why Arminius would needs insist upon it, in his dispute with Gomarus. III. 174. b.
- Republic of Rome, to what Cæsar had reduced it. II. 420. a.
- Republics become corrupt as they grow old. I. 223. a. b. Cannot endure a distinguished merit. II. 547. b. Have an advantage which kingdoms want. III. 420. b. Are liable to horrible confusions. 452. a. b. 467. a. b. 468. a. IV. 481. b. How it is possible to retain some shadow of liberty in them, after they have been reduced to a Monarchical form of government. 204. b. We ought not to be curious in a foreign Republic. V. 820. See Commonwealths.
- Reputation: a stratagem, to shew of what consequence a good reputation is. I. 432. b. A great reputation for integrity in a person, displeases many. 460. a. Its influence is of great efficacy, either in advancing or retarding events. 498. b. Is an incumbrance to men of letters. 626. b. It is difficult to have a great reputation, without being exposed to the lash of censorious tongues. V. 337. b. 338. a. b.
- Res, what was the signification of that word, among the Latins. III. 691. b. 692. a.
- Rescius (Stanislaus) publishes the works of Cardinal Hosius, and affirms that they had been printed thirty-two times. III. 501. b.
- Resentment: whenever a man conceives a resentment against a nation, he ought to abstain from writing its History. III. 345. b.
- Resident: the Resident of a Court, who quarrels with a person, and sends him a challenge. II. 408. a. b.
- Restitution: whether any pretence whatsoever, can excuse a man from making Restitution. I. 13. a.
- Resurrection: the Jews reckon that there is a small bone in us, out of which God will restore our bodies at the Resurrection. I. 649. b. 650. a. b. IV. 376. a. b. 665. b. The possibility of it taught by Chryppus. II. 496. b. It seems that Democritus promised a Resurrection to bodies buried in honey. 638. b. A singular notion concerning it. IV. 376. b. Believed by learned men among the Heathens. V. 332. a.
- Retreat: few persons know how to retreat in time. I. 120. a. Poets and Orators ought to be most careful of doing it. ibid. a. b. II. 620. a. b.
- Reuchlin, the History of his differences with Hochstratus. III. 473. b. 474. a.
- Revelation, without it, reason can avail us nothing, with respect to our getting over difficulties in point of religion. IV. 95. b. 96. a. The disputes of Christians should be carried to its tribunal only. V. 830. Accusations against the author, with respect to it, and his justification. 807.
- Revelation of St John, what we have seen concerning an explication of that book. I. 7. b. Those who promise the greatest successes, as if they were foretold there, are apt to be mistaken. 127. a. It would be difficult to find sureties to warrant the explications of it. 188. a. b. The needless labour of the Commentators upon it. ibid. Calvin's opinion concerning this book. II. 265. b. Some have believed that St John was not the author of it. 405. b. III. 595. a. The Commentators upon it

- lose nothing of their credit, though they have deceived people an hundred times. II. 539. a. The reason of it. ibid. The most chimerical explanations of it, may be of great use to stir up the people. 693. b. Sovereigns generally manage the interpreters of that book. III. 476. b. The judgment that we ought to pass upon those who vary in their explication of it, according to the different turn which affairs take. IV. 47. a. b. The whole story of it embroidered upon a garment. 430. There has always been people, who pretended to know the secrets of this book. 899. a. Those who pretend to explain it, would have Ministers of State neglect all their affairs, to hear them, or read their writings. V. 94. b. 95. a. The first Reformers did not understand it. II. 122. a. b. The design of those who ballot the numbers of it. 123. b. The ill success of the Commentators on it, does not restrain the temerity of others. 124. a. The explications of it are oil to the fire. 127. b. Put in French rhyme, and fitted for the stage. 477. a. b. &c.
- Revelations* (Divine); Savonarola pretends to partake in them. V. 57.
- Re-union* of the Lutherans and Calvinists, attempted in vain. II. 731. a. Dury said that only some ministers opposed that work. III. 34. b.
- Re-union of the Catholics and Protestants*, a book wrote for the bringing it about. III. 595. a. b.
- Re-union of the religions*, persons who have been full of that scheme. IV. 213. a. b. 214. a. b. 215. a. 231. a.
- Re-united*: the new re-united were scandalized at the weak and timorous censure that was passed upon the mystical city of Mary d'Agreda. I. 138. b. 139. a. b.
- Revolutions of State*, the greatest commonly proceed from a trifle. II. 711. b. Their principles and springs. 741. a. b. 742. a. b. The ordinary preparatives towards them. III. 138. b. 139. a. b. What is almost continually the chain of the greatest revolutions. IV. 281. a. The tricks that are employed to make them succeed. IV. 467. b. 468. a.
- Reward*: a man must seek the reward of a fine action in the action itself. I. 559. a. b. How an author ought to behave, in order to obtain rewards from the Public. III. 339. b. 340. a. b. 341. a. b.
- Rhadamanthus* marries Alcmena, who was transported for that end, to the fortunate islands. I. 208.
- Rhan* (George) his apology for the confession of Augsburg, published by Chytraeus. II. 122. b.
- Rhefuparis*, his perfidiousness. II. 559. a. b.
- Rhetoric* has rules that are little conformable to the laws of History, or to sincerity. II. 341. b. 342. a. Demosthenes quits Philosophy, to apply himself to Rhetoric. 259.
- Rhetorical*: a Rhetorical figure occasions the loss of a cause. I. 185. a. b.
- Rhetoricians*: who was reckoned the most famous Rhetorician of the XVIIth century. II. 499. An example of their Legerdemain. 678. a. b. Commentators should take notice of their artifices. 679. a. The Rhetoricians and Philosophers expelled from Rome. III. 5. 6.
- Rhimes*: a Dictionary of French Rhimes. I. 65. b. 66. a.
- Rhinfeld*: John de Wert taken prisoner at the battle of Rhinfield. V. 539.
- Rhodes*: an error in computing the weight of its Colossus. II. 390. a. Its form of government changed by the authority of Mausolus. III. 359. The History of the violences and debaucheries that were committed there afterwards. ibid. and a. b. 360. and a. b. Its Democracy changed into an Aristocracy, during the confederate war. IV. 174.
- Rhodiens* send Ambassadors to King Ptolemy. I. 71. a. Thought themselves so sure of defeating the Romans, that they had prepared chains for those they should take prisoners. II. 349. b. Their temples pillaged by Cassius. ibid.
- Rhodiginus* (Lewis Caelius) uses the labours of Erasmus with ingratitude. II. 813. a. b. Convicted of a falsity with respect to Euripides. 874. b. Commits a gross solecism. V. 624. a.
- Riario*: what has been said of Peter and Jerome Riario. V. 163. a. b.
- Riario* (Cardinal) assists Marfus in the revival of his Commentary on Tully's Offices. IV. 165. a.
- Ribadameira* retracted what he had said about the miracles of the founder of the order of the Jesuits. III. 889. a. b. 890. a. b.
- Ricaut*, his error touching the hopes of Mahometan women. III. 341. b. He misunderstood Busbequius with respect to the ignorance of the Turks, in point of Chronology. 572. b.
- Richard* (the Abbot) quoted. II. 589. a. b. n. (8), (9). III. 954. b. n. (173), (174), (175), (176), (178), (179). V. 542. b. n. (18). His answer to Jurieu, with respect to the taxes of the Romish Chancery. I. 629. b. The insufficiency of that answer. ibid.
- Richardus* (Stephanus) Nivernensis designed to have composed forty-two chapters upon Ovid's invective against Ibis. IV. 452. a.
- Richelieu* (Cardinal de) desires to confer with Amyraut. I. 261. a. Did not love to be asked. 418. b. Never forgave any one. 488. It is reported that he was continually reading the Argenis. 645. b. He paid an author well for his eulogy. 653. b. n. (3). It is surprizing that he should lay any stress on Bertelier's pretended act, with respect to Calvin. 783. b. 784. a. II. 62. a. And on Bolsec's calumnies against the said Calvin. 265. b. He makes use of some of the rhapsodies of Beza's calumniators. I. 800. and a. Required a great deal of complaisance from those who belonged to him. II. 134. b. Secret practices to expel him from the court. 401. a. b. His method. 518. a. What Lewis XIII said to him, after the Marshal d'Ancre's death. 542. b. His amours with Marion de Lorme. 647. a. His design to reconcile both religions, hindered by his death. III. 34. a. His friends and enemies lost battles, the latter with a view to hurt, and the former with a view to serve him. 59. b. The Ministers of Languedoc wait upon him, and tell him that they saw but little probability of effecting a re-union in matters of religion. 123. a. He was very liberal to the Muets. 176. a. The reproaches he casts upon the Protestants, with respect to the majesty of Kings, and the answers which have been made to these reproaches. 668. a. b. 669. a. Whether under his ministry people were put to death, whose only fault consisted in their misfortune to displease him. 818. a. b. 819. a. IV. 141. a. b. 142. a. b. 143. a. b. 144. a. His power lasted longer than his life. III. 827. and b. He was vastly hated. IV. 141. a. b. &c. Was of a delicate taste and haughty spirit. 85. a. How he employed himself, after he had spent some hours in settling affairs of state. 114. a. It was for the good and service of Lewis XIII, that his troops should be commanded by the friends of that Cardinal. 146. a. He was extremely affected by satires. III. 212. IV. 256. a. Was obliged to spread his snares every where. 257. a. The speech which Gueret puts in his mouth. ibid. b. Those who have had to do with that Cardinal, have left us wretched pictures of him. 258. b. All the misfortunes of Europe are imputed to him. 260. a. He makes use of Silvius's writings, for finding out the Philosopher's stone. 262. b. What he said to a Captain of the guards. V. 370. b. He would not allow any other cause of unhappiness than imprudence. 373. b. Procures a pension to a plagiarist Genealogist. 474. a. b. Opposed in his design of humbling the House of Austria, by Cardinal Berulle. I. 786. a. Charged with having poisoned that Cardinal. ibid. b. Mr le Vassor does not adopt this calumny. ibid. There was no story which people did not believe, when it defamed him. IV. 511. a.
- Richelieu* commits a mistake advantageous to his design. IV. 79. a. b. Quoted. III. 956. a. b. n. (18), (19). IV. 81. a. n. (51), 930. b. n. (8). Looked upon as the author of Florimond de Remond's book, intitled, L'Anti-Pape. 733. b. The Jesuits looked upon him as their best French writer. ibid. Disguises himself under the name of Francis de Montaigne, in his answer to the plea of Antony Arnauld. III. 278. b. n. (24). Divers extracts from his books touching the affair of John Guignard. 277. a. b. 278. a. b. 279. a.
- Richer*, John Boucher was one of his adversaries. II. 103.

Richerians,

- Richerians*, a chimerical sect. IV. 870. b. 871. a. b.
- Richer*, there were Philosophers who renounced them, before the doctrine of Jesus Christ. I. 294. a. b. See. Some despise them from a principle of self-love. 460. a. b. It requires a great deal of magnanimity to despise them. II. 269. b. It is much easier for us to renounce riches than praise. 298. b. They have sometimes been the cause of the persecution of great men. 351. b. 352. a. An answer of Simonides, wherein he said that riches were better than learning. V. 146. b. 147. a.
- Ride*: the only thing young Princes are intrusted in, is how to ride the great horse. II. 334.
- Ridiculous*: a person can never be ridiculous who follows only the common custom. II. 527. a. b.
- Riga*, the capital city of Livonia, besieged and taken by Gustavus Adolphus. V. 657, 658, 659.
- Right*: the only measure of right (or law) in states is the advantage they can get by it. I. 130. a. b. Some Philosophers did not admit a natural right. 416. What it is. II. 30. a. b. Whether there is a natural impression which enables all men to distinguish between right and wrong. III. 581. a. b. 604. a. b. Certain nations are ignorant of it. 781. a. b.
- Rigorism*, what it is. IV. 874. and a. b.
- Ring*: the reason why the Antients wore a ring on the finger next to the little finger of the left hand. I. 375. a. A ring sold at an auction had almost occasioned the ruin of the Roman Republic. II. 711. b.
- Ris* (Martin del) censured for several falsities touching Agrippa. I. 152. a. b. Quoted. V. 597. n. (a). and b. n. (2).
- Riolan* writes some books against Joseph du Chesne. II. 468.
- Ripeness*: when the regulation of the ripeness of girls and boys by inspection, was forbidden. IV. 802. b. See Maidenhead.
- Rise*: the Egyptians or Phœnicians used to say, that they who recovered from a great fit of sickness rose again out of the grave. I. 116. b.
- Rishius* (Edward) publishes Sanders's History of the English Schism, and adds a preface of his own to it. V. 41. b. 42. a. Dies at St Menchou in the year 1585. ibid.
- Riswick*: the treaty of Riswick advantageous to the Allies. III. 683. a.
- Ritual*, that of the Jews contains rare observances. I. 174. a. b.
- Rivierius*, Physician to Henry IV, treated as a mountebank by John de Renou. IV. 864.
- Rivers*: a river whose water makes those immortal who drink of it, but which is always covered with a dark night. II. 465. Rivers at this day may be very unlike what they were in antient times. V. 78. b.
- Rivus* (Andrew) harshly censured by Father Labbe. I. 21. a. b. His opinion about Abimelech's distemper. 38. b. 39. a. His reflexion against St Augustin for his loose morality. 91. b. It is surprizing that such a man as he should have been ignorant that Calvin was a father. II. 267. a. His judgment upon a work of Sedulius. III. 84. a. How he refutes Coëffeteau's answer to du Pleffis Mornai, with respect to the praises which Langius bestows on Luther. 723. b. He has not exactly traced Campan and Whitaker's dispute. 940. a. Is one of those who quote from the modern writers, without consulting the originals. V. 183. b. Was the depositary of several of the Patriarch Cyril's Letters. 560. b. An incident of his dispute with Grotius, where he cavils ridiculously. I. 235. a. b. 236. a. b. His defence of the two Epistles and Preface of Mr du Pleffis. II. 127. a. b. He does not bring him off in one particular. ibid. b. Endeavours to justify Robert Stephens. 173. a. b. Is mistaken with respect to the statue of Pope Joan. 530. b. Quoted, and censured, for what he says of Harchius. III. 352. b. n. (8). A partizan of the tradition of the She-Pope. IV. 280. b. The most curious man in the world about books of controversy. 727. a.
- Rivinus* makes his complaints to the magistrates against Reinefius. IV. 858. b. 859. a.
- Robbers*, two famous ones. V. 198. a. Physically speaking, they may deserve some esteem. IV. 843. a.
- Robert*, the King's Attorney at the Chatelet of Paris, his letter concerning James Aymar's wand. I. 8. a. b.
- Robert d'Arbrissel*; see Arbrissel.
- Robertwal* answers the objections of Des Cartes against a piece of Mr de Fermat. IV. 485. a.
- Rochebournart*, persons of note in that family. V. 298. and b.
- Rochebournart* (the Duke de la) his memoirs will ever be esteemed better than those of Caesar. II. 418. a.
- Rochelle*, its national Synod. II. 196. b. That city is not allowed to have any others pastors than such as are born there. 694. a. It is besieged by the Duke of Anjou. III. 178. a. The tumultuous resolutions of its assembly. IV. 212.
- Rochemaillet* took care to have the arrears of George Louët printed, from the manuscript which Antony Seguer had given him. III. 882.
- Rochester* (the Earl of), a famous Atheist, converted by Dr Gilbert Burnet; particulars that concern him. V. 820, 821. n. (35).
- Rochus* (John), General of the Augustins. I. 769. b.
- Rock of the accused*, who and what was so called. I. 167. II. 345. a.
- Rod*, that of Moses was the model of the Devil's apish tricks. I. 5. a.
- Rodon* (David de) taught certain sophisms only to those who paid him for it. IV. 783. b. n. (18).
- Rodriguez*; his book of Christian Perfection translated by d'Audiguer. I. 548. a.
- Rodriguez* (John), see Gabay Faro.
- Robault* describes the natural consequence of the method of philosophizing contracted in the schools. II. 848. b. 849. a. What he says of the Guisics. III. 298. b. 299. a. b.
- Roi* (Lewis le), Greek-Professor in the university of Paris, his death. I. 562.
- Royalty* is a very chargeable thing. IV. 755. a.
- Roy* (Eleonor de) dies of grief. III. 833. a.
- Roland*, where statues are erected to him. III. 256. b.
- Romance* of Theagenes and Chariclea, an original and plan for almost all other romances. III. 377. a. The author of it severely rallied. 378. a. b.
- Romances*, their extravagancies have crept into religion. I. 166. Reflexion upon the rapes of fair damsels in romances. III. 365. a. b. 366. a. b. IV. 636. b. 637. a. b. Wherein consists the chief difference between Mythological authors, and the writers of romances. III. 465. b. Those of the new fashion spoil the taste of young people. 552. a. b. IV. 365. b. 366. a. The authors of them very often shew a want of judgment in their fictions. III. 296. a. n. (32). The new romances make true history extremely obscure. IV. 366. a. How tender the author of a romance should be of his heroine's virtue. 114. b. The heroine of a romance, with a big-belly, or lying-in, is a strange image. III. 866. b. The writers of them are obliged to follow History, when they tell in a preface the foundation of their fictions. 166. b. Those of the Countess d'Aulnoi have been universally read. I. 569. b.
- Romans* were very apt to apply particular sentiments of a play to the present times. I. 60. b. Their first conquests compared with those they made afterwards. 163. a. b. They did not approve, that a superior magistrate should be accused by his Subaltern. 186. a. b. Are cruelly insulted by the Parthians. 515. Who were called the last Romans. II. 164. a. What person had this encomium given him, that he was called the last of the Romans. 347. The antient Romans had not laid down those polite rules in point of debauchery, which prevail now-a-days. 394. They shewed much less regard to those who gained battles, than to those who finished a war. 413. b. It was for that reason a part of their good policy to change their Generals often. ibid. Their ambition with respect to the propagation of their language. 516. a. b. 517. a. b. By what gradations they passed from frugality to luxury. 710. a. b. Would rather have chosen to lose their lives than their virility. III. 75. b. Were not very religious observers of treaties. 584. a. b. Allowed the honour of a triumph only to those who extended their frontiers. ibid. 586. a. Their policy to extend their conquests. ibid. Called Ravenous Wolves, by Telefinus, General

- General of the Samnites. 686. b. The ancient Romans were as ridiculous in point of Genealogy, as people are at present. 711. a. The difference between the ancient and modern Romans, and the occasion of that difference. IV. 50. b. To save Italy, the Romans carry the war into Africa. 193. a. They forbid the Poets to abuse their magistrates, and permitted them to ridicule their gods. 568. b. 569. a. When they attempted the abolition of certain nocturnal feasts. V. 336. b. Called forth the tutelary gods of the towns which they besieged, and which they expected to take. 185. a. b. Their cruelty to the Britons. 260. a. b. They had recourse to Venus Verticordia, that a stop might be put to the prevailing lewdness of the times. 268. a. b. Were more jealous of their honour, than of the honour of the gods. 761, 762.
- Rome*, the end of a war is sooner heard of there, than the beginning of it. I. 340. a. Who was the first Senator there that embraced the gospel. 341. a. Changed from a monarchy to a commonwealth. II. 161. Its first inhabitants had need of a monarch. 163. a. It could not be any longer without one, when Julius Cæsar was murdered. 165. b. Who was called her second founder. 289. Who first practised Physic there. 353. a. Who was the first of its Generals that embarked upon the northern ocean. 715. The limits of its empire shrink contrary to the preface of idolaters. III. 317. a. St Augustin's railery on that head. ibid. b. It submitted to the will of Cæsar at the very first. IV. 203. a. b. 204. a. The conformity between the foundation of Rome, and that of the universe. 424. b. A judgment concerning the most celebrated writers of ancient Rome. 778. b. 779. a. b. The statues of its deities in the beginning were made of base materials. 925. b. It had two names, the one known, and the other unknown. V. 184. a. b. 185. a. b. Was scarce known to the Greeks in Alexander's time. 329. b. Why the maids who married there, were followed by a person who carried a distaff and spindle, with wool and yarn upon them. 288. b. To what an excess they had carried the vice of Drunkenness there. 387. a. b.
- Rome* (Christian), who was the first Greek that taught Philosophy there. I. 443. a. b. The harshness of that court with respect to the Patriarch of Babylon. 105. The rewards wherewith the court of Rome pays the zeal of those who declare for her. 157. b. Those who had been courageous enough to exclaim against the usurpations of that court overthrown. II. 125. a. b. The strange corruption of its Popes and Cardinals described by an unsuspected author. 370. b. 371. a. That court is no less concerned than others to preserve the balance of power between all the powers of Europe, whether Catholic or Protestant. 758. b. 759. a. Its avarice and impurity. III. 76. a. b. The monarchy of the Popes there is more to be wondered at than that of the Cæsars was. 228. a. b. We may apply to New Rome what Virgil observes concerning the Old. 235. b. That city alarmed at a bull that was going to be published against Sodomites. 327. a. b. A very smart letter writ against the court of Rome. 455. a. A description of that city in verse. ibid. The mode, with respect to women, has very much changed there. 458. a. The court of Rome has as much to fear from certain Catholic Princes, as from the Protestant ones. 568. b. Rome, notwithstanding the residence of its Bishops, is more corrupt than other cities. 591. b. Rome sacked by the troops of Charles V. 615. a. The court of Rome maintains its rights with greater policy than the court of France. 742. a. A consternation caused at Rome by the victory of Ravenna. 812. a. The partizans of the court of Rome alarmed at the volume of the liberties of the Gallican Church. IV. 98. b. 99. a. b. 100. a. That city presents a woman with the privilege of its freedom, on account of her rare qualities. 237. a. b. 238. a. b. To what the yearly income which the Pope draws from the Courtizans there, amounts. V. 162. b. Its acquisitions in the Indies, by the vast number of Christians that were in that country. 267. a. b. With what violence its inhabitants discovered their partiality for the Emperor or France. II. 310. b. n. (5). No peace with Rome, a treatise of Joseph Hall under that title. III. 342. b.
- Romish Divinity*, Cardinal Bellarmine reckons up two hundred and thirty-seven contrarieties of doctrine among them. III. 343. b.
- Rommelin* (James de) takes Simonetta, a gentleman of Milan, prisoner, and afterwards gets the better of him in a duel. V. 139.
- Romarin*, the edict of that name. III. 506. a. b.
- Romulus*, laws which he established for divine service, according to Dionysius Halicarnassæus. III. 914. b. 915. a. His retrograde horoscope. V. 295. a. b.
- Rondel* (du), the author of this Dictionary proposes a point of Chronology for him to clear up. II. 15. a. What is his profession, and what his works are. 782. b. He deserves the praises of all the Journalists. ibid. Two observations that he makes examined. III. 914. b. 915. a. b. 916. a. b. He sends a memoir touching the souls of beasts to the author of this Dictionary. IV. 547. a. b. n. (20). His objection against the necessity of believing a providence, in order to embrace virtue and shun vice, and the answer to that objection. V. 180. a. b. 181. a. b. 182. a. His judgment of Balzac. 345. b. 346. a. b.
- Rondelet* trusts Joubertus, his favourite disciple, with his manuscripts, and desires him to publish them. III. 582.
- Ronfard*, his sonnet on the privileges which Physicians have with the fair sex. I. 400. a. His Trouvel Croqueried. III. 868. a. b. On what occasion he wrote a poem against the Atheists. IV. 845. b.
- Roque* (the Abbot de la) ascribes to Father le Tellier a thing which he does not say of Quintus Curtius. IV. 809. a. b. n. (6). Censured. 242. a. b. Quoted. V. 122. b. Et alibi.
- Roque-laure*, what he said upon hearing a satire against Henry IV read. IV. 482. b.
- Rorence*, his books against the Vaudois. III. 162. a.
- Rose* (the romance of the), who is the author of it. I. 28. b. Was written an hundred years after Abelard. III. 381. b.
- Rosfo* (Mambrin) makes an imperfect translation of Guevara's Dial of Princes into Italian. III. 270. b.
- Rosier*, whence they sprung. IV. 45. a. b.
- Rosier* (du), a Minister, changes his religion during the massacre of Paris. IV. 76. b. And contributes a great deal to the abjuration of several persons of the first quality. 77. a.
- Rosni* does all he can to disengage Henry IV from Mademoiselle d'Entragues. V. 391. a.
- Rossano* (the Princess of), widow to Prince Borghese. II. 471. a. b.
- Roswilde* ascribes to Drusus a letter of Broughton. II. 150. b. His mistake censured by Sixtinus A-mama. ibid.
- Rotbe* (John), a Fanatic, who was first a proselyte of Labadie's, but afterwards separated from him. III. 689. a. b. 690. a.
- Rovere*, an illustrious family in Piedmont, which possessed a strange prerogative there. V. 162. b. 163. a.
- Rouillard* (Sebastian) confuted, as to what he says of Amyot, and his journey to Trent. I. 257. a. b. His capitulary concerning the validity of a marriage. IV. 804. a. b. 805. a. b. 806. a. b.
- Rouxier des Guerres*, what that book is. II. 838. a. b. A remark concerning it. III. 809. b. 810. a. b.
- Ruarus*, his conjectures about the pretended Mahometism of Alciatus. I. 198. a. b.
- Rubens* (Leonard), what he says of Blandrata's death. II. 20. b.
- Rudolph II*, his weakness in giving credit to the predictions of Tycho Brahe. V. 672.
- Rufinus* (Cornelius) degraded from the dignity of Senator for his luxury. II. 710. a. b. III. 2.
- Ruy* (the Monks of) their possessions seized on by a British Lord, on account of their vicious lives. I. 31. a.
- Rule of equity* which those ought to follow, who impute certain things to an author. I. 652. a. A rule to know whether it is out of weakness or contempt, that a person does not answer an adversary. II. 90. b. 91. a. The application of rules is more difficult than the art of discoursing well of them. 38. a.

Rumours:

- Rumours*: the secret springs which excite certain rumours. II. 721. a. b.
- Rufbach* and Rufberus, two chimerical authors formed from the corrupted name of Rufusbeck. IV. 944. a. b.
- Rutilius*, his generous way of thinking, with regard to his countrymen who had banished him. II. 259. a. b.
- Ruxi* (Dr) would not allow some Ministers to begin a conference with a prayer. IV. 921. a.
- S.
- Sabbati Tubbii*, a false Messiah, a book where we find some very extraordinary particulars touching his impostures. V. 539.
- Sabbatical Affirmations*, a confutation of those who doubt of people's being really carried to them. II. 750. a. b.
- Sabina* (a Roman Empress) poisoned by her husband's orders. V. 266. b. 267. a.
- Sacri* (Mr de) succeeds Mr Rose in the French academy. IV. 917.
- Sacraments*, some people put off that of Penitence to their last hours. I. 701. b. Laymen have a right to administer them in certain cases of necessity. III. 267. a. b. When the custom of using wafers in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was abolished at Geneva. 343. a. n. (16).
- Sacrifices*: the Pagans boasted that fire from heaven fell upon their sacrifices. I. 25. b. A tenet of the Peripatetics concerning sacrifices and prayers. 468. a. See Vitium.
- Sadducees*, whether they wholly denied a providence. V. 9. a. b. 11. a. b. 12. a. b. The Jewish High Priest was sometimes one of their sect. 12. b.
- Sadi*, the Prince of the Persian and Turkish Poets. IV. 872. a.
- Sadolet* (Cardinal) writes a letter to the people of Geneva. II. 264. n. (d).
- Sagacity*: proofs of an extraordinary sagacity. II. 636. a. b. 637. a. If there were any such thing as a certain sagacity, it would be odious to all mankind. 636. b.
- Sage of the Stoics* exists only in idea. II. 310. b.
- Sayings*: remarkable sayings are ascribed sometimes to one person, sometimes to another. II. 770. b. People cannot bring themselves to lose a witty saying. 671. a. People are apt to report a good saying, not as it was spoken at first, but according to the form which they believe to be the best. I. 460. b. Persons that excelled for witty sayings. 308. a. 609. a. 753. a. IV. 754. b. 755. a. Bion's witty sayings. II. 12. a. b. The general fault of most witty sayings. ibid. b. V. 152. b.
- Saints*: a faint created by ignorance and chance. I. 230. b. 231. a. b. There are numberless faints in Turkey, who have each of them a particular office. II. 466. a. b. The invocation of them has been long since the practice of the Jews. 879. b. They are always beautiful according to their pictures. III. 57. a. b. Their credit is very little diminished in the Church of Rome. 87. a. b. The precipitation wherewith miracles upon miracles are crowded in their legend. 95. b. 96. a. IV. 556. a. The compilers of their lives have been the boldest of authors. III. 577. b. Not long since the question was discussed at Rome whether the faints of the Old Testament deserved the worship that is paid to the canonized faints. 573. b. There is less certainty in the ancient than in the modern faints. 740. a. It is not by their miracles, but by their charity that we are to judge of their sanctity. 889. b. An unlucky inconvenience which sometimes attends the worship that is paid to them. 896. b. How the worship of faints has been introduced. IV. 353. b. 354. a. b. 355. a. b. A notion upon the invocation of faints. 376. a. b. There have been faints of all professions, excepting that of an attorney. 487. b. The invocation of them is still excessive. II. 126. a. n. (40).
- Saints-Aldegonde* writes to the States the false news of the Duke of Alençon's marriage with Queen Elizabeth. V. 19. a. See Aldegonde.
- Saint Brigid*: the fort of St Brigid was besieged in form, and the French defended it many days. IV. 211. a.
- Saint-Evermonian*. See Evermond.
- Saint Remond* (Peter de) brings a ridiculous charge against Beza. I. 800. a. b. His errors. ibid.
- Saint Sulpice*, an abbey of the order of Cîteaux at Belley: the disorders which the Bishop of that city found there. I. 737. b. 738. a. b. The pious fraud that was published concerning the foundation of it. ibid. b. 739. a. b.
- Saiu*, a city, where situate. IV. 342. a.
- Saladin*, his gallantry with Eleanor of Guienne spouse to Lewis VII. III. 794. b. 795. a. b.
- Salamina*, a town in Cyprus, why so called, and when the custom of sacrificing men to Jupiter was suppressed there. V. 318. a. b.
- Salamis*, how that island came to be the property of the Athenians. V. 304. b.
- Salernitana*: the Schola Salernitana forbids the eating of beans. IV. 671. b.
- Salus* (Francis de) proposes the elephant for an example of chastity. I. 641. b.
- Salian* (Father) censured for several epitaphs. I. 705. b. Censured by Noldius for what he says of Juba. III. 164. a.
- Salian Priests*, what Quintilian said of them. IV. 161. b.
- Salic Law* condemned to castration slaves taken in adultery and theft. III. 77. a.
- Salis*, what he says of Allatius's taste. I. 232. a. A thought of that Journalist. II. 643. b. His reflexion on that book of the Liberties of the Gallican Church. IV. 100. a.
- Sallust*, the lie given to one of his maxims by the manner in which Sanches King of Castile exercised an usurped authority. II. 378. b. How he was treated at Faust's house. IV. 201. a. Has been censured perhaps too severely for making use of old words. 831. a. It does not become him to declaim against the corruption of his age. V. 420. a. b. Why Accursius called him his countryman. I. 69. a.
- Salmastus* has learnedly corrected an epigram inserted in Plutarch. I. 205. a. Is often misled by trusting too much to his memory. 369. b. Censures Solinus for one blunder, and falls himself into another. 424. b. 425. a. A great mistake which he mentions. 656. b. Did not answer Blondel's treatise concerning Pope Joan, after he had promised to do it. II. 25. a. Was of opinion that Æschylus is more obscure than the Holy Scripture. 827. a. His contradictions with respect to Grotius. III. 246. b. 247. a. To whom he was a scare-crow. 310. b. He chuses rather to reason ill than to lose his discoveries. 319. a. How one of his adventures boasted that he had made him lose his life. IV. 217. a. b. His Latin verses on a thing that has been said of monkeys. 600. a. b. He believed that Brutes were endowed with reason. 912. a. An examination of what he said touching the edition of Anastaſius by the Jesuits of Mayence. 726. b. 727. a. b.
- Salmeron* accused of Plagiarism. III. 44. b.
- Salmasius* (Henricus) censures a very obscene epigram of John Antony Campanus. II. 293. b.
- Salt of Agrigentum*, its qualities, and the use that St Augustin made of them. III. 157. b. 158. a.
- Saltatricula*, that word of Aulus Gellius is very ill rendered Grashopper. III. 491. b.
- Saluces* (the Marquise of) is a part of Piemont. II. 16. a.
- Savian*, his opinion touching the impurities of the stage. V. 40. b.
- Sameil* falls in love with Eve. II. 855. b.
- Sammaritani* suppress in their Gallia Christiana the elogy which they had made on the Abbot of St Cyran. V. 16. b.
- Sammaritani* (Abelius) writes an elogy on the family of Schomberg. V. 83. n. (b).
- Samos*, island, why called Parthenia. III. 635. a.
- Samofatenians* solidly confuted by Lascius. III. 732. a. b.
- Sauar*, Sultan of Egypt, dispossessed by Dorgan. IV. 383.
- Saucerre*, the memorable History of that town by John de Leri. III. 781.
- Sanches* counts it a venial sin to see one's own nudities, and a mortal sin to see those of another person. I. 112. b.

WOL, V.

11 P

Sauvion:

- Sancium*: there were as many abuses under the Pragmatic sanction, as there have been since the Concordate. IV. 766. a. b.
- Sanctuary*, whether it be more exempt from the caprices of fortune, than other things. I. 607. b.
- Sancus*, whose were certain monuments that were to be seen in his temple. V. 288. b. 289. a.
- Sanders*, his calumnies against Anne Bullen. II. 56. a. b. 57. a.
- Sandis* (Edwin) quoted. I. 109. b. n. (35.) 730. b. n. (46).
- Sandoval* is not comparable to Thuanus in the praises which he bestows on Charles V. II. 442.
- Samaritanus*, his Poem intitled Christi Lamentatio is printed with notes by Daniel d'Auge. I. 562. n. (4).
- Sansverino* (Robert de) invites Augustin Niphus to Salerno. IV. 378. a.
- Sansjon* (Nicolas) his mistake touching the capital of Ponthieu. I. 10. a. Attacked by Father Labbe. ibid. b. n. 11. a. b. Censured on a point of Chronology, in relation to Pytheas. IV. 677. a. b. Answers Father Labbe. ibid. b.
- Santeuil* writes verses which bring him into a quarrel with the Jesuits and Janfenists. I. 497. a. b. 498. a.
- Saccondarius*, how his chief city was called. II. 628. a.
- Saporis*, King of Persia, his son dies in the arms of Manes. IV. 91. a.
- Saraceni*, how vast their dominion was. I. 14. a. A prodigious victory which they obtained over the Christians. 15. a. They honour a stone, which they call Brachtan. 124. a. Are defeated before Thouloufe. II. 850. Destroy the city of Aix. ibid. b. Spilt left blood in all their persecutions of the Christians, than was spilt in the massacres alone on St Bartholomew's day. IV. 39. a.
- Sarah*, her diffimulation commended by the Fathers of the Church. I. 38. a. b. It is pretended that she was a convert. 45. a. Compared with the wife of Deiotarus. II. 630. a. b.
- Saranita* (Andrew) an impious fanatic. III. 281. b.
- Sarrafsn*, his famous sonnet. II. 857. a. Quoted. III. 366. a. n. 38. The preface to his works by Peliffon is a master-piece. IV. 538.
- Saryavius* suppresses a circumstance that was not favourable to the Count de Coligni. III. 304. a. Concludes, after a careful examination of the manuscript Anastasius in the King's library, that the story of the She-Pope had been tacked to it. IV. 726. a.
- Satires* want commentaries from the time that they are composed. I. 35. b. n. f. It is a favour done to the writers of them, when they are believed upon their oath, confirmed by witnesses. 343. a. The fatal effects which they produce. 426. a. III. 464. a. b. 465. a. b. Satire may easily be metamorphosed into History. II. 160. b. 161. a. Is one of the plagues of History. IV. 142. b. Who were the first authors of satire. III. 905. b. They publish a thousand things in them, which it was impossible should have come to the writers knowledge. V. 755. A general answer to those persons who complain of the satires that are published in Holland. ibid. and 756. As to the profit which may arise from the art of being formidable by satire, it is a disputable point. 225. b.
- Satirical*: it is a satirical stroke to mention the particulars of some peoples estates. II. 543. b.
- Satirists* are too sparing in the article of spy-money. I. 682. b. Necessary qualifications for a good satirist. 727. a. They often vent slanders which may very easily be confuted. II. 56. a. b. 57. a. Their impudence in lying. 136. a. Their method. 148. a. They should not be let go unpunished. 528. a. b. Ought to be no less subject to the laws of reasoning than others. IV. 136. a. Do not pretend to any exactness. ibid. b. Are not to be depended upon. ibid. It often happens that magistrates who neglect to punish them, are punished for their unconcernedness. 251. a. They put criminal interpretations upon the most pious actions. V. 459. b. See Calumny. A true picture of these writers. 756. All legislators concur in punishing them severely. 758. They would attempt upon the lives of their adversaries, if they had the same opportunities which they have to attempt upon their honour. 765.
- Saturn* was dealt with according to the Lex Talionis, in being dethroned. III. 646. a. His leudness. IV. 617. a. b. He escapes to the mountain Niphates, and kills there the shepherd Caucasus, from whom that mountain afterwards took its name. II. 88. b.
- Saul*, King of Israel it was thought strange that he did not know David, when he was going out against Goliath. II. 606. a.
- Savoy*, one of its Dukes spent an hundred thousand crowns to find incantations. II. 243. b. There is a dispute concerning the precedence between the Duke of Savoy and the Republic of Venice. III. 216.
- Savoy* (Charles Emanuel Duke of) a medal which he caused to be struck. III. 406. b. 407. a.
- Savoyard* (the) a famous finger of the Pontneuf. II. 600. a. b. V. 540. b.
- Sawrin* (Elias) quoted. I. 107. a. n. (12). 501. b. n. (9). (10). 502. a. n. (11). (12). Censured. V. 155. a. b. His dispute about the principle of faith. I. 706. a. b. n. (12). (13). (14). 707. a. n. (18). (19). (21). 708. b. n. (28). What he says of invincible ignorance. IV. 875. b. n. (10). (12). (13). The particulars of his dispute with Jurieu. V. 642. a. b. to 648. a. b. Declared orthodox by the Synodal assembly of Brill, notwithstanding Jurieu's accusations. 800.
- Saxen* (John) Rector of the university of Wittenberg, publishes in a Programma, lies unworthy the Gazette. III. 93. a.
- Saxons*: Lotharius grants leave to those Saxons who were called Stellingi, to make profession of the Pagan religion. V. 233. and a. b. 234. a. b.
- Scaliger* (Julius Cæsar) does not speak in a very complaisant manner of the Neapolitans. I. 237. b. 238. a. The judgment which he passed on Cardan. II. 317. b. 318. a. He is censured for writing only to gratify a spirit of contradiction. 321. b. 322. a. And for several other considerable faults. ibid. The original of his hatred to Dolet. 683. a. A book which he boasted to have read. 765. a. b. His extreme warmth in defending the Ciceroians. 804. b. 805. a. b. 806. a. b. He valued himself upon having been in the wars. 805. b. The History of his orations against Erasmus. ibid. 806. a. He did not well understand Horace's meaning, with respect to Laberius's Mimes. III. 695. b. His invective against the government of Athens. IV. 582. b. In the letters of his naturalization he bears only the character of a Physician born at Verona. V. 463. n. (c). and a. b. Confounds himself in speaking of those who surround the world eastward and westward. 781. Confutes Cardan's book de Subtilitate. II. 322. b.
- Scaliger* (Joseph) has collected a great deal of curious learning touching Jacob's Stone. I. 124. b. Every thing that he says is not to be depended upon. 139. b. His temerity in judging of the thoughts of the heart. 731. b. His prediction proves false. 794. a. b. His inattention when he computed the weight of the Colossus of Rhodes. II. 590. a. He commits gross faults in speaking of Helen. III. 371. b. 372. a. Is called the top-critic. 837. b. His judgment was not always to be relied upon. ibid. Being ready to give up the ghost he declares the abhorrence he had for an affected style. 846. b. A thought of his examined. IV. 331. b. He is mistaken when he says that after the passage of the Rubicon Cæsar went no more into Gaul. II. 394. b. Tells a ridiculous story. 707. b. He relates things of his father, which are confuted by public and original pieces. 805. b. 806. a. b. Is to be commended for suppressing certain of his father's letters against Erasmus. ibid. a. Has writ about the squaring of the circle. III. 50. a. Censured by Father Morin and Mr de Maulac, for what he says of Raymond Martini. IV. 168. b. He writes with his own hand several gross abuses in Junius's books. III. 627. b. What Scioppius reproached him with. V. 99. b. Intrapped by Muret. 394. a. b. 395. a. b. 396. a. b.
- Scaligeranus*, there is little exactness in that book. II. 617. a. b. Several things are miserably confounded in it. IV. 727. b.
- Scandalize*: people are not scandalized enough at the writings which authors publish against one another. I. 244. b.

Scanderberg

- Scanderbeg* lays siege to Belgrade. IV. 313. a.
Scarron quoted on ludicrous subjects. I. 315. a. b. III. 644. b. 645. a.
Scaxson, a kind of verse, who was the inventor of them. III. 464. a.
Sceptici, Scepticism. See Pyrrhonists Pyrrhonism.
Scerax, the Baron Gregory Horwath, sets up a new college there. III. 218. a.
Scervola (Mutius) his jest. I. 185. a. b.
Schedia, a town, where situated. IV. 342. a.
Schegkius, his disputes with Simon Simonius. V. 151. b.
Schenk surprized by the Count of Embden. III. 820. b.
Schlusfilburg (Conrad) calls the change from a Lutheran to a Calvinist, apostacy. III. 841. a. Quoted. I. 790. a. n. (27). III. 600. b. V. 258. a. n. (26).
Scholars, masters who desire to have a great many, should not set up for authors. I. 337. a. A scholar who has wit, and loves disputing, gives a great deal of trouble to his master. II. 622. a. Formerly a scholar, that learned Philosophy before he was twenty, was thought very forward. III. 26. a. A good lesson to encourage their studying hard. IV. 103. b.
Scholastic: who among the Greeks began to handle a subject according to the Scholastic method. II. 587. b. 588. a.
Σχολαστικός in Aristotle's time, was not used to signify a Scholar, a Disciple, or a Student. I. 465. b.
Schomburg, his memorial. III. 411. a. b.
Schwinberg (the Marhal de) a story that is told of him. IV. 676. b.
Schoockius (Martin) prosecuted by Des Cartes for gross scandal. I. 327. a. Centured for a mistake. 618. b. Quoted on the subject of dancing. V. 23. a. n. (63), (65), (67), (68). 24. b. n. (81), (82), (25). a. b. n. (83), (84), (86).
School-masters, who did not become Pedants. II. 183. b. The servitude of their condition. V. 738. b. 739. a. A School-master, who does a courageous action. II. 645. a.
School-men: what Democritus and Epicurus call σῖσκαλα, the School-men call intentional species. II. 388. a. Religion does not stand in need of their jargon, for the defence of its fundamental doctrines. III. 196. a. Their chimerical qualities banished. 790. a. They debate very needless questions and things that never happen. V. 41. a. Retort against the Cartesians, the arguments about substantial forms. 116. b. They only studied the art of raising objections and answering them. 339. a. Their wrangles neglected by OEcolumpius. IV. 400. Their subtleties on Transubstantiation, the Trinity, &c. V. 819. Have more confounded than explained the mysteries of religion. ibid. The strange perplexity to which the Abbot Faydit has reduced them. 620. n. (30). Their answers only serve to render difficulties more obscure. 821.
Schools, those who teach and dispute most in them, are not the most strongly convinced of the truths of Christianity. I. 51. a. b. In order to raise a great school, a man must apply himself entirely to his profession. 337. a.
Scotch: a Scotchman beaten for Passive Obedience. II. 286. a. b.
Scotland delivered from the Danish yoke, by the valour of a countryman. III. 332. How many Kings have reigned there, and what treatment they met with. 669. a. The Catholics of that country form a design. II. 577.
Scottus (Andrew) ridicules the Frenchmen for esteeming Guevara's works. III. 270. b.
Sebucker cuts off his brother's head. I. 286. a.
Sebuldingius (Cornelius) publishes a letter of Broughton to Theodore Beza, and several other things. II. 151. a. b.
Schurman, the modesty of that lady. IV. 148. and a. b.
Science or Learning: better a little of it than no health. III. 342. a.
Sciences: Lactantius pretends to have demonstrated, that there is no science in men. I. 411. a. An attempt to run down all science, is the boldest that ever was formed. 412. a. The trial of wits proper for the sciences, a book of John Huarte. III. 528. and a. b. See Knowledge and Learning.
Scientia Media does not mend the matter against the objections of the Manichæes. IV. 518. a. b. A reflexion upon that head. 519. a. How it was looked upon by Pope Clement VIII. 824.
Scioppius acts the part of a Divine unseasonably, with respect to a witty saying that is ascribed to Charles V. II. 438. a. Rallies Strada for saying that the whip of Charles V, is yet stained with his blood. 439. b. Insults the two Scaligers. V. 99. b. Was very satirical. II. 817. b. 818. a. b. 819. a. b. His tricks and plagiarisms with respect to Gifanias. III. 161. a. b. His exaggerations. 169. b. His blasphemy against the Holy Scripture. 500. a. His jest upon a part of Peter Deza's sermon. 896. a. He writes a most abusive satire against King James I. IV. 795. b. Is translated by Ogier. V. 91. a. b.
Scipio, Abderame is compared to him in point of continence. I. 14. b.
Scythians, what they told Alexander. IV. 572. b. A stupid people, needed only to despise pleasures, or not to know them. V. 814.
Sytianus, an Arabian, his impieties. IV. 90. a. b. 91. a.
Slavonian: the Bible translated into the Slavonian tongue by George Dalmatin, and Adam Bohoritch. II. 585. Truberus was the first who taught the art of writing in it. V. 405. A book which he translated into that language. ibid.
Scitist, their opinion concerning the nature of Universals, is only a disguised Spinozism. I. 26. a. II. 412. b. 413. a. b.
Scorus, his subtilties despised by OEcolumpius. IV. 400.
Scourge: who was called the Scourge of Princes, and for what reason. I. 435. and a. b.
Scribere, what is to be understood by that word. I. 351. a. b.
Scripture (Holy): a doctrine, which attacks the authority of it. I. 106. a. b. 107. a. Alabaster's method of explaining it. 174. a. b. 175. a. Whether the materials and principles of all arts and sciences may be fetched from it. 234. and a. b. Whether in the intention of the Church of Rome, the Laity were excluded from reading it. 495. a. The simplicity of its style, disgusts St Augustin. 563. Whether the Laity are obliged to understand it in the originals. 599. a. b. According to certain Controversists, the interpretation of it should be accommodated to the time. 616. b. 617. a. b. Whether the Divinity of it can be proved. 706. a. b. 707. a. Bedell sets on foot a translation of it into the Irish language. 718. a. Salmasius declares that the Holy Scripture is less obscure than Æchylus. II. 827. a. Unworthily treated by some Roman Catholic Doctors. III. 500. a. b. A thought of the Historian Peter Matthieu, concerning the manner of teaching it. 536. a. How a visionary would have had it read to the people. 672. a. b. 673. a. It is not always to be explained according to the rules of Grammar. IV. 857. a. Has been handled by the Christians, much after the same manner as Justinian's Code. ibid. There are certain things and expressions in it, which will confound the deepest Metaphysicians. 876. a. b. What free-thinkers say of the spirit that dictated the Holy Scripture. V. 35. a. Is not afraid of shocking modesty, by expressing things naturally, and without circumlocution. 133. a. See Bible. A singular example, to prove that the letter of it killeth. IV. 723. a. b. The Socinians should be attacked by it, since they acknowledge its authority. V. 820. Should be the principle of the disputes among Christians. 830. The variations and corruptions which the Heretics have introduced into the manuscripts of the Holy Scripture. III. 733.
Scriuerius, what he cites from Scaliger. V. 395. a. b. &c.
Scuderi, his complaints that his pension was ill paid. III. 176. a. b.
Scuderi (Madam de) writ all her works out of her own head. II. 778. b. Delivered romance from an economy injurious to her sex, and to decorum in general. III. 867. a. What she says of authors who love to dedicate their books. IV. 843. b. Is called the Sappho of our days. V. 44. b.
Scullion: the story of a Scullion's conversation with Lewis XI, King of France. III. 803. a.

Sculptors

- Suspens*: who were never pleased with their own works. V. 134. a. b.
- Scallatus* was extremely desirous to see the Lutherans and Reformed re-united. IV. 681. b.
- Sea*, whether it ought to be subject, as well as the earth, to the dominion of some States. III. 217. a.
- Sea of Histories*. See Mare Historiarum.
- Sebasta* changes its name into that of Eleusa. I. 421. b. A conjecture concerning that alteration. ibid.
- Seckendorf*, a particular which he found concerning Aleander. I. 215. b.
- Secret*: a secret discovered, which was pleasing to many. I. 36. b. It is a great misfortune to know secrets that are disagreeable to one's sovereign. IV. 443. a. b. c. The best course a man can take is to behave, as if he had entirely forgot them. 444. b.
- Self*: a new sect think themselves happy at first, if they can obtain liberty of conscience, but they soon want to be upon an equal footing with others, and last of all to be masters. I. 13. b. 14. a. b. II. 121. a. b. Nothing is more common than to see persons, who have fled for their religion, ringing the alarm against the sects. III. 758.
- Selfish*, when they quarrel, hate one another more than they hate those from whom they have separated themselves. I. 198. b.
- Self*, a prejudice which prevails in all sects. I. 51. and a. b. A sect may very soon become unlike its founder. III. b. The means employed to hinder their growing powerful, are pretty much alike every where. 288. a. b. 289. a. b. 290. a. Why tolerated by the States-General. 288. b. 289. a. The desire of revenge may induce a man to embrace a sect. III. 29. b. Sects that are tolerated, have generally this injustice done to them, that they are suspected of ill designs. 42. b. It is natural for a sect that is ill used, to rejoice at the troubles in which the State is involved. 396. b. 397. a. There is no sect which entirely triumphs over the others. IV. 908. b. They change their spirit and maxims, in proportion as they change their state and condition. V. 454. a. b. 473. a. The divisions that reigned among those which are separated from Popery. 450. b. Several sects are formed among the Protestants at Lyons. 483. and b. Viret employs the authority of the Papists to curb them. ibid. and n. (25).
- Secular Games*, when the fifth were celebrated. II. 397. a. Vossius affirms without any foundation, that they were celebrated in the beginning of the VIIIth century of Rome. 396. b. 397. a.
- Seditious*: a sedition quelled by the silence of a Pythagorean. I. 379. a. b. 380. a. What they are in Republics. V. 62. n. (f).
- Seditious*: how criminal seditious persons are in the sight of God. IV. 488. a. b. The Catholics and Protestants mutually accuse one another of a seditious spirit. V. 89. a. b.
- Seed*, whether that of all living creatures be animated. V. 114. a. b. 115. a.
- Seem*: persons who rather chose to be virtuous, than to seem virtuous. I. 278. b. 279. a. b. II. 420. b. 421. a. III. 697. a. b. 729. and a. b.
- Segrais* quoted. V. 488. a. n. (39). 490. n. (d).
- Seguin* (Peter) a famous Physician in the faculty of Paris. I. 172.
- Segur-Pardailan* deputed to the Protestant Princes. II. 142. b. 143. a. b. c. He revered Brocard as a second St Paul. 144. b.
- Sejanus*, a fatality which was said to attend a horse of that name. II. 348. b.
- Sejanus* kept up a criminal correspondence with the wife of Drusus. II. 718. a. b. His artifices. 719. a. b. 720. a. Is praised immoderately. IV. 494. b. 495. a.
- Sene*, the god of that river curses the Marshal d'Ancre. II. 543. a.
- Self-murder*. III. 911. a. b. 912. a. b. 913. a. b. A furious doctrine concerning it, and the murder of our neighbours. V. 14. a. b. Authorized by the laws of a country. 627. a. b. 628. a. b.
- Selim*, Emperor of the Turks, was a Painter. IV. 307. b. 308. a.
- Seller*, we ought not to take advantage of his ignorance, when he does not know the just price of his merchandise. III. 440. a. b. A law to punish those sellers who conceal what they ought to acquaint the buyers with. I. 13.
- Selvaggi* (Ricciarda de') we are obliged to her for the preservation of Cinus's Canzoniere. II. 508. n. (d).
- Semiramis* was prodigiously lascivious. I. 523. a. Whether the built Babylon. 596.
- Senate* (Roman) divests two consuls of their office, for the disrespect which they had shewn to a letter from them. II. 291. a. Makes Cæsar proud by the honours which they confer upon him, and then hate him for being proud. 422. a. Was subject to all the laws made by the people. III. 490. a. b.
- Senators* censured for appearing in an unbecoming dress. II. 384. b. 385. a. b. Deprived of all their tribunals of justice. 711. b. Restored to the possession of them. 712. b.
- Senef*: particulars of the battle of Senef. V. 190. b. 191. a.
- Seneca* makes use of a thought of Agathon. I. 126. b. How he defines probity. 185. An excellent rule which he prescribed. 278. b. 279. a. A thought of that Philosopher. 453. a. Is censured for having ascribed to Aristides what he should have applied to Phocion. 460. b. Recommended poverty in the midst of opulency. 751. b. A judicious criticism of his. II. 483. a. b. 484. a. He looked upon what the antients have said of Jupiter's thunderbolt as a pious fraud. 573. b. His anachronism, with respect to Alexander, and his conversation with Diogenes. 667. a. What he says of Ephorus, and in general of all Historians. 771. b. 772. a. Quoted. 847. b. 848. a. n. (31). How he could lay it down for matter of fact, that no Roman had applied himself to write fables. 833. b. His rules concerning the chastity of women. III. 601. b. 602. a. In what case he thinks a man commits adultery in lying with his own wife. IV. 540. a. He has refuted himself in his writings, as to what he says of the souls of beasts. 549. b. According to him, none can be a good man without the assistance of God. 573. a. b. He laughs at the great number of books which had been writ on the Sophism called the Liar. 617. a. b. Displays all the degrees of Scepticism. V. 607. b. 608. a. Some fine maxims which he lays down. II. 259. a. b. His works translated into French by Matthew de Chabert. 430. and a. The judgment that was made of that translation. ibid. a.
- Seneca* (Christian): a good piece of Joseph Hall under that title. III. 345.
- Sensaray*, Prevost de l'Hotel; his behaviour to President de la Place. IV. 682. b. 683. a.
- Sensation*: why custom blunts the edge of our sensations. IV. 514. a. b. If it be a modification of body, then all bodies are sensible substances. II. 658. a. b. 660. b. 661. a. b. It cannot be the effect of the sole disposition of the organs. ibid. b. Is distinct from all the modifications of body that are come to our knowledge. ibid. and 779. b. Whether it depends upon our free will. V. 764. 765.
- Sense* (common) there are persons who lose it with regard to some things, and who nevertheless shew their judgment through all the rest of their conduct. V. 405. b.
- Sense* (Mythic) persecution makes a man wonderfully clear-sighted in discovering it. III. 772. b.
- Senses*: whether the pleasures of the senses are not spiritual. II. 781. a. b. Whether the evidence of the senses is proved by these words of JESUS CHRIST, Handle me, and see. V. 614. b. 615. a.
- Sentences* strongly affect the mind. I. 461. a. Should be incorporated with the thread of the discourse in an imperceptible manner. V. 327. and b.
- Sepher Jexirab*, a book of great weight with the Cabalists. I. 173. a.
- Sequer*, a strange accident occasioned by the pronunciation of that word in a tragedy. I. 175.
- Serarius* (Nicolas), a Jesuit; Broughton communicated to him copies of very harsh letters which he writ to Beza, with full liberty to publish them. II. 150. b. 151. a. b.
- Serarius* (Petrus) deposed from the ministry for his errors. IV. 123. a.
- Serius*, discourses supposed to have passed in evening conversations; a book writ by William Bouchet. II. 103.

- II. 103. There is a good deal of learning in it, mixed with many jokes, puns, and gross obscenities. ibid.
- Sereia* (Stilicon's wife) marries her two daughters to the Emperor, who both die maids. III. 482. a. b. 483. a. b.
- Sermons*, what Peter Aretin said of them. I. 436. a. What kind of sermons are most approved by the Protestants. II. 520. b. Bloody sermons. III. 874. a. b. Sermons preached upon the letter O. IV. 828. b. The great success of Savonarola's sermons. V. 57. a. b.
- Serpents*: divers reflexions on the serpent which tempted our first parents. II. 851. a. b. 852. a. b. A faculty that is ascribed to them. IV. 182. a. Serpents that grew tame and familiar with women and children. 403. b. Several have passed for the fathers of several great men. 407. b. 408. a. b. A singular story about a piece of money that was changed into a serpent. III. 487. a. b.
- Serranus* (Joannes), a false name taken by Francis Lambert. III. 709. a. b.
- Serris* (John de) adds a particular to the story of Pope Joan. IV. 731. b.
- Serris* (Lewis de) translates into French John de Renou's tracts. IV. 864. and a. b. Was of Dauphiné. ibid. b.
- Servant-Maids*: persons that have married their own servant-maids. I. 446. a. b. II. 139. b. 140. a. 618. b. V. 403. b. Are more liable to be debauched than other women, and are likewise in great danger of being punished. IV. 503. a. One that lies with her master, is not punished, but rewarded. II. 508. a.
- Servetus*, in what year he was burnt at Geneva for his Heresies. IV. 388. a. Strange consequences are drawn from an axiom of his concerning the presence of God. III. 100.
- Servetus*, that cannot be rewarded, produce ingratitude. II. 737. a. b.
- Servien* (Mr) loses his temper in an assembly of the States-General. II. 153. a.
- Servin* (Lewis) Advocate-General of the Parliament of Paris, treated in a brutal manner. II. 459. a. Censured for displaying too much reading and learning in his pleadings. 106. a. b.
- Sesterce*, its value reduced to the French Coin. II. 837. a. b.
- Sethians*, Heretics, vented an Apocalypse of Abraham. I. 46. a.
- Severus* (the Emperor) complains to the Senate of the honours paid to Clodius Albinus. I. 395. a. What enquiries he chiefly made, when he resolved to marry again. III. 603. a. Why he so patiently bore with his wife's lewdness. 604. b.
- Severus* (Sulpicius) highly disapproves the punishment of Heretics. III. 758. a. b.
- Severity*: the strange severity of a father to his own son. II. 343. b. 344. a. Different accounts of that matter. ibid.
- Seville*, when the admiralty was established there. I. 362.
- Sexus*, a Monk that had both sexes. V. 4. b. 5. a.
- Sforza* (Lewis) his wickedness and cruelty. I. 403. b. 404. a. He falls into the hands of the French. III. 811. a. n. (17). 814. a. Would have no soldier that set up for a wit in his service. IV. 460. a.
- Sforza* (Bona), Queen-Dowager of Poland, dies in poverty and infamy. I. 405. b. Rewards a dedication with a pension of 300 crowns. II. 462.
- Sforza* (Galeazzo) assassinated, by whom, and for what. III. 715. and a. b. 716. and a. b.
- Sforza* (Blanche) is killed by a fall from her horse while she was a hunting. III. 530. a.
- Shame* is no less subject than other things to the caprice of the fashion. III. 453. a. b. 454. a. b.
- She-Pope*, if ever the Church of Rome should make one, she will find her apology ready drawn up in Father Mainferme's works. III. 63. a.
- Ship*: what the ancients said of the tree that served to build the first ship. IV. 363. a.
- Shipwreck*: it is pleasant to see a shipwreck, which we are not in fear of. IV. 34. b.
- Shock*: men know not whom they shock when they reprehend the ignorance of those, who would pass for artists in the presence of greater masters. I. 377.
- Shumamite*: how we are to understand the History of the Shumamite, according to St Jerome. III. 281. a. b. 860. a.
- Siam* (the King of) is pulled down from the throne for having too much favoured the Christian missionaries. I. 13. a. and n. (6).
- Siam's* acknowledge no Deity, though they believe the apparition of spirits. IV. 939. a. By what motives they may be prevailed upon to embrace virtue and fly from vice. V. 180. a. b. 181. a. b. 182. a. They believe that Jesus Christ and Thevathat are the same. 183. b.
- Sibil of Cumes* tempted by Apollo. II. 339. a.
- Sicbarbas* marries his niece Dido, and is killed by his brother-in-law Pygmalion. IV. 642. and a.
- Sick People*, the tricks which are put upon them sometimes. III. 614. b. Whether we ought to pray to God for their recovery, when sickness makes them better men. IV. 487. b.
- Sickness*: there are people who put off believing in God till sickness presses them. II. 12. b. 13. a. 647. b. 648. a. b. 649. a.
- Siege*: a custom which has been observed for a long time with respect to Kings, who assist at a siege. III. 718. a. b.
- Sigebert*, what he says of the She-Pope. IV. 728. b. 729. a. b. It is not to be found in some manuscripts. 728. b. Spanheim owns that it is a parenthesis, which may be taken away without injuring the thread of the discourse. 729. a. b.
- Sigeb* besieged and taken by Sultan Solymas, in the sight of the Emperor. III. 780. a.
- Sigismund* (Augustus) gives over his project of a reformation in Poland. III. 848. 849. Whether he banished all the Antitrinitarians out of Poland. 901.
- Sigismund* (John) embraces the doctrine of the Socinians. II. 17. a.
- Silence* quells a sedition. I. 379. a. b. 380. a. Justified by shameful nonsense. 758. a. Whether we ought to keep silence, when we have to do with people of an impetuous temper. II. 195. b. It is the most difficult thing in the world to an author that is attacked. IV. 839. a.
- Silens*, what he thought of life. V. 414. a. b.
- Silk-worms*, who invented the art of spinning their production. V. 627. a.
- Sylla* sends Apellicon's library to Rome. I. 335. a. His library-keeper permits the Bookellers to get Aristotle's works transcribed. ibid. b. What he said of Caesar. II. 417. a. Though he was very far from Atheism, he paid no regard to things sacred, when his interest was concerned. 419. a. He knew nothing of the gallantries of his wife, when they were the town-talk of Athens. III. 382. a. Treats the city of Athens very harshly, and for what reason. IV. 200. Boldly transgresses the Sumptuary laws which he himself had enacted. 202. Thought fit to assume the surname of Fortunatus. V. 366. b. 367. a.
- Syllogism*, what is the foundation of it. II. 327. b. Carneades strongly opposed it. ibid. Chrysippus undermined the foundation of it. 494. b. 495. a.
- Sylva Nuptialis*, the History of that book. IV. 358. and a. b. 359. and a. b.
- Sylvanus* (Plantius) being accused of the murder of his wife, puts himself to death, in order to escape condemnation. V. 516. His wife being accused of having occasioned his distraction by witchcraft, is declared innocent. IV. 385. and a. b.
- Sylvester II*, Pope, his genealogy. II. 240. b. 241. a.
- Sylvester of Florence*, a Jacobin Friar, hanged with Savonarola, and for what reason. V. 64. 65.
- Sylvester de Laval*, a Capuchin, reproaches the Protestants with their obstinacy in the article of Pope Joan. IV. 739. b. 740. a. b.
- Sylvius*, a Chymist, condemned for his crimes. IV. 262. b. Cardinal Richelieu makes use of his writings. ibid.
- Sylvius* (Æneas) who was afterwards Pope under the name of Pius II, is the first who called the story of the She Pope in question, and that too very faintly. IV. 731. and b. 732. a. 710. b.
- Similaris*, his epitaph. II. 430. b.
- Simon* (Richard) quoted concerning the Dutch translation of the bible. I. 246. a. His judgment of St Augustin. 565. a. b. 566. a. And of le Fevre's commentaries

- commentaries on the Bible. III. 48. a. b. And of a book of Father Petavius. IV. 601. a. b. What he says of the Benedictines. III. 126. a. b. 127. a. b. And of a pretended disciple of Port-Royal. V. 178. b. 179. a. Quoted. IV. 77. b. n. (20), (22). 78. b. n. (26). 79. a. n. (32), (34). 391. a. n. (56). Et passim alibi. Praised and afterwards abused by Jurieu. V. 802.
- Simone* advises the Pope not to send a new Legate to Trent, and why. III. 499. a. b.
- Simonides*, one of his sayings. II. 726. b. IV. 654. a. n. (9).
- Simonis Religio*; a conjecture concerning that book. V. 151. a.
- Sympathy*: an instance of a surprizing sympathy. III. 305. b. 306. a.
- Simplicity* without elegance is much better than a fine Latin style which corrupts the sense of the original. V. 60. a.
- Simplicius*, the difficulty about the origin of evil was thought by him to be of great importance. IV. 527. b. His reasonings against two principles. V. 826.
- Sin*, a whole nation punished for that of a particular person. I. 158. a. b. 159. a. What was Eve's first sin. II. 856. a. b. 857. a. How the sin of uncleanness is successfully resisted. III. 64. b. Whether it be an accident of the soul. 558. a. b. The unnatural sin. 612. b. The origin of sin explained by a new hypothesis. 904. a. The difficulty of finding the origin of it. IV. 513. a. b. 514. a. b. 515. a. b. 516. a. b. 517. a. What use is to be made of the dispute on that subject. 519. a. There is no sect which does not abhor the doctrine that makes God the author of sin. 522. b. 523. a. b. The question about the sin of ignorance is surrounded with precipices on all sides. 874. a. b. 875. a. b. People rather chuse to commit it, than to disoblige a Prince who can make or ruin their fortune. V. 811. See Ignorance.
- Sin* (Original) an explication not agreeable to that doctrine. II. 605. a. b. 606. a. A tenet which differs from the doctrine of Original Sin, in its circumstances only. V. 412. a. b. Et c.
- Sin* (Philosophical) a maxim that would carry it to the utmost point. III. 705. a.
- Sin against nature*, who is said to have been the first inventor of it. V. 325. a.
- Sin*: whether a man that sins mortally, ceases to believe the truths of the Gospel. II. 176. a.
- Synagogue*, a specimen of its ceremonies. I. 96. a. b. What are the synagogues which the laws suffer the Jews to possess. III. 220. a. b.
- Synagogue of Amsterdam* is supposed to have writ a letter to Mr Jurieu. II. 175. b.
- Synodus*, his institution of a Christian Prince translated by Daniel d'Auge. I. 562. a.
- Singers*: a famous singer of the Pontneuf at Paris. II. 600. b. 601. a. How they lived in former times. III. 224. a.
- Synod of Dort*, its decision. IV. 64. b. 65. a. Its correspondence with the court. V. 513. b. 514. a. b. The Arminians except against it. II. 793.
- Synod* (Walloon) complains to the Synod of the isle of France, and for what. II. 583. a. b. No longer looks upon the doctrine of Universal Grace as a dangerous opinion, and why. 584. b.
- Synodicon in Gallia Reformata*, remarks on that book. I. 671. a. b.
- Synods* attempts made to strip them of their authority. IV. 839. b. 840. a.
- Synods* of France; their decree relating to the Oriental tongues. I. 246. b. 247. a. There were four persons in them, who formed what was called the Table. 265. b. The national Synod of Charenton gives a particular charge to its deputies, not to deliver their speech to the King on their knees. 261. a. And after several contests an audience, such as they desired, was granted. ibid. A great difference between the Synod of Rochelle in the year 1581. And that which was held at Mid-elburg in the same year. II. 144. a. Calvin refuses to comply with the regulations of the Synod of Lausanne. 264. b. The Synod of the isle of France makes an act, forbidding all flights of imagination, in expounding the word of God. IV. 274. b.
- Sinope*, a city of Paphlagonia, and a city of Pontus at the same time. IV. 113. b.
- Sinaita* (Gabriel) a Maronite, his quarrel with one of his brethren. II. 733. a. Whether it could be of any service to Mr Claude in his dispute with Mr Arnauld. ibid. b. 734. a. When he was a professor at Paris, he had not three auditors, though his reputation was great in foreign countries. IV. 493. a.
- Syracusa* cautes Sanar to be assassinated, and makes himself master of Egypt. IV. 383.
- Syracuse*, confusions that happened there. III. 452. a. b. 467. b. 468. a.
- Syracusians* put two tyrants to death. V. 365. a.
- Syriscus*; Orichovius remonstrates to Pope Paul III, the injustice of his law touching the celibacy of Priests. IV. 296. a. b. 411. a. b.
- Sirmond* (Father) what he called Blondel. II. 27. a. Whether he repented of having published a certain letter of Geoffroy of Vendôme. III. 66. b. 67. a. unjustly attacked by Mr Tollius, and defended by the Jesuits. 853. a. b.
- Syrnabam* was an interpreter of dreams. I. 87.
- Surname*, what was the use of it among the Romans. I. 357. a. Several families have taken their surname from some defect. 610. a.
- Sirvela* (Martin Vafques) had a fine library at Seville. IV. 615. a. (c).
- Sifenna*, an Orator affected to make use of obsolete expressions. I. 63. a. n. (62).
- System of the Church*, that book fully justifies the Church of Rome. I. 476. a. b.
- Systems*: false systems are incoherent. I. 210. If we depart from the system of a God who freely created the world, we must necessarily admit of a multiplicity of principles. II. 644. a. What it is that makes the system of Atoms less absurd than Spinozism. ibid. The usefulness of the system of occasional causes to solve certain difficulties. 767. b. The inconveniences and motives of the reformation of systems. III. 863. b. They require two things to make them good. IV. 94. a. Their reasonableness consists in including nothing repugnant to evident ideas. V. 825.
- Sisters*, their hatred is more violent than that of brothers. II. 701. a.
- Sixtus* IV, Pope, one of his first cares after his exaltation. II. 97. a. b. His answer to Wesselius, who only asked him a copy of the Bible. V. 545. b. 546. a.
- Sixtus* V, a witty saying which is attributed to him. I. 34. b. His bull against the King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé. II. 71. a. b. His esteem and desire with respect to Queen Elizabeth. 758. a. b. How he stood affected to the King of Spain and the League. ibid. b. 759. a. What he said of Henry III, III. 408. b. He chose rather to countenance Henry IV, and Queen Elizabeth, than to suffer the King of Spain to grow too powerful. 568. b. Introduced the custom of not lending the hat to Cardinals newly elected. I. 604. b. Causes an offer to be made of the Infanta of Spain to James VI, King of Scotland, and upon what conditions. II. 577.
- Sixus* (Francis) translates the Anatomical History of Du Laurens. III. 745. b. Why that translation has no figures. 746. a.
- Slander* does not even spare the greatest actions. I. 14. a. That of Archilochus occasions proverbs. 425. a. b. Every body has reason to be afraid of it, and why. 490. b. It is impossible that persons of different sexes should have frequent conversations together, without being exposed to it. II. 767. a. The mortal effects of it. III. 464. a. b. 465. a. b. It spares certain women. 601. b. 602. a. b. Great men despise it out of policy and a greatness of soul. IV. 569. a. b. It is a very difficult matter to confute slanders that have the air of probability. 692. a. b. Slanders ought not to be slightly credited. V. 334. a. b. See Satires. Princes that have despised them. 759. Et c. They are to be feared when they are accompanied with witty sayings. 759. Reflexions upon those that are published against men who change their religion. 224. b. 225. a. b. 226. a.
- Slanderrers* do not even spare themselves sometimes. I. 426. a. b.

Slaves,

- Slaves*, the practice of the ancient Romans in enfranchising them. II. 100. a. b. Slaves who gave occasion for a proverb. 302. b.
- Sleidan* justified against Father Maimbourg's accusations. I. 721. a. b. His History. V. 255. b. n. (10). 293. a. Censured on the head of Gaucicus's country. II. 499. b. Confuted as to what he says of Gropper's having once inclined to Lutheranism. III. 240. and a. b. Translates ill a passage of Philip de Comines. V. 60. a. Pezelius writes a Commentary intitled, Mellificium Historicum, on his treatise de Quatuor Monarchiis. IV. 606. b.
- Shane* (Sir Hans) a Physician of London; his fine library. II. 477. a. n. (1).
- Sloth* offends Heaven, which does not hear the prayers of the slothful. I. 94. b.
- Smalcalde* (the League of) their army overcome by Charles V, at the battle of Mulberg. III. 878. a.
- Smerdians* shaved by an effect of jealousy. I. 292. a.
- Smetius* (Martin) runs over all Italy, to make a collection of inscriptions. III. 251. a. Is hanged at Brussels by the soldiers. ibid. a. b.
- Smiglecius*, a Jesuit, unjustly ranked among the Sociinians. III. 661. a.
- Smith* (Richard) Bishop of Chalcedon, being sent into England, is obliged to leave it, and for what reason. III. 665. a.
- Smyrna*, a woman of that city poisons her husband, and for what reason. II. 681. a. b. There is a wild cherry-tree there, which the Greeks say was the staff of St Polycarp. III. 431. a.
- Sober*: whether a man may be so, and yet drink a great deal. I. 567. a. b. 568. a. V. 576. a.
- Sobieski*, King of Poland, two or three hundred leagues off, destroys a book which was just ready to be put to the press. III. 680. a.
- Societies*: in all Societies there must be a tribunal, to give sentence without appeal, in the disputes of private persons. IV. 65. a.
- Societies* (Religious) how they are kept pure. III. 903. a. b.
- Sociniansism* begun to take root in Poland and Transylvania. II. 16. a. Why there is no reason to fear that Princes will embrace it. V. 171. b. It is only fit for some persons. 172. a. b. Whence it took its rise in Poland. 229. a. b. Those who are for making use of reason in matters of Divinity, become suspected of it. 817.
- Socinians*, the difficulties into which they involve themselves by denying the creation. II. 789. a. b. Their sect not calculated, to answer the objections of the Manichees, touching the origin of evil. IV. 419. b. By denying the Preſcience of God, they reduce him to a pitiful form of government, without removing the grand difficulty, which makes him the author of sin. 518. a. They have drawn great advantages from a book of Father Petavius. 601. a. b. Their sentiments touching the souls of beasts. 905. a. They commend in the Dutch, a conduct which Socinus had very much blamed. V. 170. b. 171. a. A general objection that is raised against them. 178. They take advantage of their adversaries forbidding the reading of their writings. 506. b. Their sentiments touching the mutability of an eternal nature. 588. b. Kester successfully employed Logic in refuting them. III. 660. a. b. 661. a. b. The difficulty of confuting their Philosophical objections: we must attack them by Scripture, the authority of which they acknowledge. 820. What their God is, according to Jureu. 824.
- Socrates* played with his Children. I. 131. b. The way that he proposes for attaining to virtue. 279. a. He ridicules the Sophists of his time. 294. a. b. Says that the Fanatics resemble Poets. 303. a. His censure on a book of Anaxagoras. 309. b. 310. a. And the answer to that censure. ibid. a. b. 311. a. His way was to dispute pro and con. What he says on occasion of the palace of Archelaus being beautified. 417. b. 418. a. He refuses to go to the Court of Macedon. ibid. a. b. His maxim, quod supra nos nihil ad nos. 462. a. The faults of some of his scholars unjustly imputed to him. II. 569. b. 570. a. Why firnamed the Melian. 653. a. b. What he did to obey the god of dreams, who had ordered him to apply himself to the Muses. 830. a. b. Whether Euripides had an eye to him in his Palamedes. 874. a. b. What he said of Beauty. III. 65. a. What he did, in order to lay in a good stock of patience. 312. b. What he said of a kiss given to a fine face. IV. 796. b. 797. a. Why his marriage with Xantippe did not interrupt his lectures. V. 165. a. The description which he gives of the prerogatives of human nature. 583. b. 584. a.
- Sodomy* committed in temples, as a pious action. III. 773. b. Whether it be true that a petition was presented to Sixtus IV, for leave to exercise it, during certain months of the year. V. 157, 158. and b. 159. a. b. 160. a. b. Sc. Whether John della Casa intended to make an encomium upon it in his detestable Capitolo del Forno. 422. a. b. 423. a. b. Abolition from that crime, what it costs. I. 628. a. b. The Dominicans take a resolution to exclaim loudly against it. 855. a. b.
- Soldier*, one who saves his life by a jeft. I. 709. a. Women prefer soldiers to all other men. V. 664.
- Solyman* cuts in pieces Ferdinand's army, which besieged Buda. III. 532. Puts to death his favourite Ibrahim Basha. 588. b.
- Solipsians*, or Monarchia Solipsorum. III. 563. b. and n. (5 a.) 564. a. b.
- Solitar*, an abbey in the county of Hanaw, how reformed. III. 875.
- Solitude* (the love of), what judgment some people have made of it. I. 583. a.
- Solicitors* in the affair of love, generally pay themselves with their own hands. II. 632. b.
- Solomon*, the Jews and several Mahometans maintain that he understood the language of birds. V. 382. a. His views in causing Adenijah to be put to death. 803.
- Solon*, his answer to Pisistratus. II. 384. b. Unacceptable to Croesus, and why. 831. a. His answer to those who represented to him, that his tears could be of no service. III. 73. b. One of his maxims examined. 777. b. 778. a.
- Son*: a son reproached on his exposing his mother's love-letters. I. 388. a. Sons, to whom their father left no portion of inheritance, and why. II. 32.
- Son of God*: a man burnt for taking that title. IV. 269. b.
- Song of Songs* (the book of) Castilio's judgment upon that piece. II. 361. b.
- Songs* may be useful to States. V. 20. a. b. A song rewarded with an abbey. I. 428. n. (1). Those of which John de Wert was the burthen, have been revived several times, and the original of them. V. 540. a. b.
- Songs* (spiritual) set to the most burlesque ballad-tunes, by whom composed. I. 478. b. Whether we are to condemn such as are set to the same airs with prophane ballads. ibid. a. b.
- Sonnet*, what Boileau says of it. III. 177. b. The Sonnet of Job compared with that of Urania. I. 752. a. b. Sonnets prepared for books that were to come out. II. 620. b. A devout Sonnet. 647. a. b. Sonnet of the Abortive, by whom composed. III. 392. a.
- Soothsayers*. See Diviners.
- Sophisms*, that called the Liar, was only a vain subtilty. II. 846. b. 847. a. IV. 616. b. 617. a. b.
- Sophocles*, the circumstances of his triumph over Æschylus. II. 825. a. b. Why he brought none but good and honest women on the stage. 868. a. He esteemed it a great pleasure, that old age had delivered him out of the hands of the fair sex. IV. 84. a. n. (24), (25). Rattall makes a fine Latin translation of him. 848. a. b. 849. a. b.
- Soracte*, a mountain where the Hirpi walked once every year on fire. III. 466. b. 467. a.
- Sorberiana*, a false thing advanced there concerning Bagni. I. 604. b. 605. a.
- Sorbiere* quoted. II. 87. a. b. n. (13), (14), (17). Complaints occasioned by his account of England. 278. b. He sees nothing at Rome but what edifies him. 475. b. An extract of a letter which he wrote on that subject, ill told by the author of the Preservatif contre le changement de Religion. ibid. 476. a. What he says of the absence of mind, for which Poets are remarkable. V. 402. b. 403. a.

Sorbonne :

- Sorbonne*: the censure which the Sorbonne passed on the works of Mary d'Agreda, betrays a want of resolution. I. 137. a. A little book on that subject. ibid. b. 138. a. Had not the courage to publish the censure without qualifying it. ibid. a. b. Censured by Agrippa, on occasion of Henry the eighth's divorce. 150. b. Taught as an article of faith, the immaculate conception of the Blessed Virgin. IV. 77. b. 78. a. Censures the book intitled, Curiosities inouies, &c. III. 122. b. Its decree against Henry III. 294. b. Strongly censures three sermons, upon the beatification of Loyola. 895. a. b. 896. a. b. Marot's verses against that society. IV. 153. a. b. Who are allowed to propose arguments against the Theſes that are maintained in the Sorbonne. 276. b.
- Sorcerers* are much more numerous than Inchanters. II. 243. b. What is the difference between them and Magicians. V. 385. b. A discourse on their impostures. I. 64. b. See Inchanters, Magic, Magicians, Witchcraft, and Witches.
- Sorcery*, what a Roman citizen, that was accused of it, did. V. 524. a.
- Sorel*, the censure which he passes on the obscene collections of the Poets. I. 65. b. And upon Paulus Æmilius's History of France. II. 763. b. 764. a. He blames those who alter the language of the old French authors. IV. 427. b. 428. a. Quoted. I. 65. b. n. (18), (19). His judgment of d'Audiguier. 548. and a. n. (1). And of John Huarte. III. 528. b. 529. a. b.
- Sorites*, a sophism which puzzled the Philosophers much. II. 492. b. 493. a. b. &c. What that sophism was. 846. b. 847. a.
- Sotades*, an ancient Poet treated with contempt, and why. I. 478. a.
- Sotuel* [or Southwell] (Father) latinizes a name after a wretched manner. I. 108. a. Read but few books of Controversy. ibid. Is inferior to Alegambus. 219. a. b. Confounds two Jesuits, Father Fevrier with Father Ferrier. III. 43. a. b.
- Souches* (de) was a Frenchman indeed, but not General of the French. III. 793. b.
- Sovereigns*, religion enervates their authority. I. 13. a. III. 624. a. Whether a person be obliged to restore to them what he has taken from them. I. 13. b. A good book might be wrote on the religion of sovereigns. 130. b. 460. a. II. 440. a. They commit faults, for which their subjects are punished. I. 158. b. 159. a. In punishing transgressors, are not directed by the sinfulness of the action. 223. a. The taking up arms against them condemned by Amyraut. 264. b. 265. a. b. We ought never to slight those, who have a chance for rising to that dignity. 421. b. 422. a. Authors engage them in their petty quarrels. 670. b. An article of their religion. 721. a. What their religion is. II. 754. b. 755. a. III. 94. a. b. They are often tricked by their Generals. I. 764. a. The necessity of the times dispenses them from the obligation even of an oath, according to the laws of policy. II. 213. a. III. 182. a. IV. 698. a. Their unavoidable dependence on the clergy. II. 149. b. Whether a private person may lawfully bear arms against his sovereign. 106. a. A case wherein it is lawful to depose sovereigns. 254. a. They are often unfortunate in their families. 607. b. 608. a. Whether they ought to depend upon the fidelity of their subjects. ibid. Their gratitude is not subject to the same laws, with the gratitude of private persons towards one another. 755. b. There is a great difference between their passions and those of private men. III. 182. a. IV. 698. a. They sacrifice to their temporal interest that of their religion. III. 234. b. 235. a. 397. b. 403. a. b. V. 457. a. They do not always suit themselves in their rewards, to the extent of their dominions. III. 275. a. Have at all times been curious to know the secrets of families. 320. a. b. The Protestants and Catholics have been observed to change maxims with respect to the right of sovereigns. 670. a. b. See Monarchs. They may be good, if we consider them as sovereigns, and bad, if we consider them as men. 767. b. 768. a. It is a crime to consult the future events of their lives. 955. a. b. They are generally unhappy at home. IV. 691. b. Whether they have children, or no children, their condition is still to be pitied. 758. b. 759. a. What their prerogative is, when their lives are concerned. V. 501. a. It is become customary to flatter them in dedications. II. 312. b.
- Sovereignty*, whether the rights of it belong to the people. I. 236. a. b. 237. a. b. 499. a. b. 500. a.
- Soul* (human) converted into a star by the Pagans. I. 348. b. 349. a. b. Is an aerial being according to Anaxagoras. 311. And according to Diogenes, the Natural Philosopher. II. 672. b. Is part of the substance of God according to Celsapinus. 412. b. The doctrine of the propagation of souls, substituted to the end of the Xth century. I. 345. a. An inquiry into the original of the soul, is a very obscure subject. 555. a. b. The mortality of the soul taught by Averrhoes. 557. b. 558. a. What it is according to the same Averrhoes. II. 316. b. What St Bernard believed concerning the state of the soul, when separated from the body. I. 774. The nature of the proof, drawn from the apparition of a soul, to evince the immortality of it. II. 66. a. b. 67. a. b. All the world does not admit of a necessary connexion between the immortality of the soul, and the providence of God. 450. b. 451. a. b. Notable diversities of the strength of the soul. ibid. b. 152. a. b. The strongest proofs of its immortality, are taken from the word of God. 455. a. Whether the eternity of it can be maintained, in case Aristotle's opinions were to be followed. 567. a. b. An invincible objection against Dicaarchus, who would not allow the soul to be distinct from the body. 658. a. b. Objections to the objection against Dicaarchus. 660. b. 661. a. Is distinct from all the modifications of body, that are come to our knowledge. ibid. b. Where you must find the principles of the greatest souls, without the help of Revelation. 673. b. Whether it be possible for a soul, separated from the body, to feel the same pain that a person feels when burnt. 781. a. b. Impious sentiments touching its mortality. III. 392. b. Mock of the Pagan Philosophers supposed that it was material. 650. b. Was composed of several parts, according to the doctrine of Epicurus. 790. b. 791. a. Other Philosophers are divided on that head. ibid. b. He who denies it to be a substance distinct from matter, reasons childishly, unless he supposes that all the universe is animated. 919. b. What becomes of it, when the man dies, according to Epicurus's system. 929. a. Luther's opinion touching the state of the soul. 949. a. Whether it be subject, as well as the body, to certain distempers. 948. b. Whether it separates locally from the body, at the moment the man expires. IV. 320. b. It has strange inequalities. 322. b. The ancient Philosophers believed that the souls of men, as well as those of beasts, were material. 548. b. 549. a. b. Reflexions concerning the immortality of the soul. 591. b. 592. a. b. Whether God creates a new soul, or reproduces the same. 655. b. Whether its immortality can be proved by good natural reasons. 714. a. b. 715. a. b. 720. a. b. Whether the doctrine of its mortality, would induce men to all manner of crimes. ibid. What idea the Pagans had of it. 787. b. 788. a. Whether the soul, being united with matter, can form to itself an organized habitation. V. 114. a. b. 115. a. Its unity in all men taught by some Philosophers. 214. b. 215. a. Whether a Spinozist ought to believe that it is immortal, and subject to the caprice of some invisible persecutor. 216. b. 217. a. Its capacity, whereby a man may turn his mind sometimes one way and sometimes another. 272. b. Francus pretended, that not only beasts, but the inanimate creation partook of a general soul, that was Divine. III. 100. Too much subjected to corporeal qualities, by John Huarte. 528. b. 529. a.
- Soul of the world*, the doctrine of it is not new. It made the principal part of the system of the Stoics. V. 200. b. 201. a. b.
- Souls of beasts*, Anaxagoras said they were intelligences, and gave them the same name which he gave to the first mover of matter. I. 301. a. Celsapinus affirmed that they were part of the substance of God. II. 412. b. Authors who believed that they are endowed with reason. IV. 911. b. 912. a. b. 913. a.

Space,

- Space*, whether it be nothing else but the immensity of God. V. 616. a. b. Suarez endeavours to explain how God may be present in imaginary space. III. 100. b.
- Spain*, several false Chronicles have been published there, to impose upon the credulity of people. I. 362. b. The women of that country are very glad to be alone with a man, who desires the last favour of them. II. 27. b. A smart repartee which an Ambassador of that Court made to the Pope. 474. b. Its Ambassador solicits succours in England, for the Duke of Rohan. III. 397. b. There is a certain convent in that kingdom, which every year furnishes a Monk that shuts himself up in a hot oven, and comes out in the sight of a multitude of people. 467. b. Its ascendancy over France in the XVth and XVIth centuries. IV. 310. a. b. Who were the first that discovered the darkness of Spain. 723. a.
- Spanheim* (Ezekiel) his learning and considerable employments. V. 194. a. 793. n. (ii).
- Spanheim* (Frederic) his Swifts Mercury. II. 551. a. b. He refutes there the pretended miracles, which were said to have happened during the siege of Constance. ibid. b. 552. a. b. If he had wrote the History of a siege, sustained by a Protestant town, perhaps he would have made observations, not unlike those which he confutes. ibid. a. Inherits the books of Samuel Durant, whose sermons he prints. 727. He does not answer the questions which Father Labbe proposed to Marelius, touching the maimed edition of Anastasius, which the Jesuits were reproached with. IV. 727. a. b.
- Spaniards*, their complaints against France, for concluding alliances with the Protestant powers. II. 338. a. b. And the answer that was made to their complaints. ibid. They are reproached with doing the very same thing, which they had found so much fault with in France. 755. a. The cause of the antipathy between them and the French. III. 809. a. b. The stratagem they made use of, when they re-took Maastricht. IV. 373. a. The Spaniards taken for gods by the Americans. 572. b. Are still more to blame than the French, on account of their esteem for Guevara. III. 270. b. The barbarity with which they treat Christopher Marcellus. IV. 106. An expression which discovered Texera's strong hatred against them. V. 319. They are generally negligent, when they write in Latin: an instance of it. III. 774. a. b.
- Sparrow*, one that gives notice to the other birds, by his singing, that a cartful of millet was broke near Porta Maggiore. III. 232. b. n. (40).
- Sparta*, Spartans. See Lacedaemon, Lacedaemonians.
- Speakers*, a sect of Philosophers, who give five proofs of the Unity of God. V. 828.
- Speech*, one abridged in a very short time. I. 633. a. b. Another struck out from the catalogue of the fair of Francfort. III. 169. b.
- Species* (Intentional) how called by Democritus and Epicurus. II. 388. a. Are the shame of the Peripatetics. 643. a.
- Speacles of Devotion*. See Mysteries (Dramatical).
- Spectres*, how the Pagan Exorcists used to drive them away. II. 775. a. b. That trade was looked upon as mean and mercenary. ibid.
- Sperlingen* (John) defends du Laurens against the extravagant censure of Colladon. III. 746. a. b.
- Speusippus*, his zeal for Plato. I. 467. a.
- Spies* have at all times taken notice of the manner how people talk of news. II. 627. a.
- Spigelius* translates into High-Dutch the Turkish Annals which Jerome Beck of Leopoldsdorf brought from Constantinople. III. 774. b.
- Spinoza*, his conformity with Aristotle. I. 470. II. 412. b. And with the Scotists. ibid. What he says of a man that should be in the condition of Buridan's ass. 227. b. There is no system which can less dispense itself from acknowledging, what is said of good and bad angels, among the people, than his. 251. a. 412. b. There is scarce any age, wherein his doctrine has not been taught. IV. 688. b. 689. a. A list of those persons who had the same opinion with him. V. 199. a. b. 200. a. b. 201. a. b. And of those who have confuted him. 207. a. b. 208. a. b. 213. a. b. His shifts and equivocations. 208. b. 209. a. b. 210. a. b. 211. a. b. 212. a. According to him, God and Extension are the same thing. 208. b. V O L. V.
209. a. b. 250. He deprives us as much as in him lies, of a principle, without which all our reasonings would be insignificant. 223. b. A demonstration against his system, taken from the principles of Xenophanes. 574. b. 575. a. b.
- Spinocism*: a disguised Spinozism. I. 26. a. Hypotheses which differ not at all, or very little, from it. 52. a. b. II. 672. a. b. III. 550. a. b. V. 186. a. b. 574. a. b. 575. a. b. An opinion that is more dangerous than it. 587. b. How it is unanswerably confuted. I. 553. b. 554. a. b. 555. a. b. Is more absurd than the system of atoms. II. 644. a. Was at bottom taught by some Philosophers, and almost in all ages. III. 649. b. 650. a. b. 651. a. IV. 688. b. 689. a. Origen had a tincture of it. 421. b. It is incompatible with the hypothesis of a vacuum. V. 617. a.
- Spinocists*, wherein their fallacy lies. I. 26. a. An absurdity to which their hypothesis reduces them. II. 496. b. A thought of Seneca, which they would easily approve. 573. b. They would be strangely puzzled, if they were forced to admit Mr Newton's demonstrations. III. 793. b. Have no solid consolation against death. 928. b. May take advantage of the doctrine of Transubstantiation, nay perhaps, they will have recourse to the mystery of the Trinity. V. 223. a.
- Spirits*: persons who lodged in rooms that were haunted with spirits. I. 225. II. 522. and a. b. 638. a. Whether it may be said that there are spirits of a more limited nature than man. I. 520. b. In what their motion consists according to the Cartesians. IV. 288. a. b. Hobbes's principles are no ways proper to make one deny the existence and operations of spirits. III. 471. a. b. 919. b. 920. a. Nor yet Spinoza's principles. V. 215. a. b.
- Spirits* (familiar): what was Plato's doctrine concerning such sort of spirits. IV. 689. b. 690. a.
- Spiritual substances*, whether among such as are created, the soul of man only is subject to change. II. 767. The Cartesians maintain that we can form no idea of a spiritual substance. V. 144. a. See Soul, understanding.
- Spiritualia* (Heteroclitia) the title of a book. IV. 833. b.
- Spizelius*, what he tells of an impious person, to give some idea of his impiety. V. 138. b.
- Span* (Dr) was unwilling to have it believed, that he made the study of antiquity, his principal employ. I. 337. a.
- Spondanus* (John) his answer to Calvin, touching the small regard which the Popes and Cardinals had for the Christian religion. II. 275. a.
- Spondanus* (Henry) confuted, as to a premeditated design, which he imputes to Theodore Beza. I. 776. a. Is as much accustomed as any one, to dispose of the particular providence of God. ibid. What he did, when he perceived the artifice of the Spanish Historians, with respect to Charles V. and Carranza. II. 336. a. Appears altogether Ultramontane. 594. a. His mistake touching Illyrius, and his Catalogus Testium Veritatis. III. 559. b. 560. a. He goes beyond the bounds of an Historian, as to what he says of the advice which King James gave to his son. 667. a. His negligence with respect to Ochinus, and his adventures. IV. 388. a. b.
- Sponges*: three holy Sponges sent by the Pope to Eudes Duke of Aquitain, and for what use. I. 16. b.
- Squittinio della Libertà Veneta*, opinions concerning the author of that book. V. 448. b. 449. a. b.
- Staff*, whether the Devil has chosen it for one of his occasional causes. I. 4. b. 7. a. b.
- Stage*: it was necessary to condemn the impurities of the stage, without describing them. V. 49. b. When they began to introduce love-adventures on the stage. I. 313. Who first practised the rule of not staining it with blood. II. 824. b. No piece could be recited on the stage at Rome, without being first approved. V. 295. and a. The French stage is more nice than that of Athens. 304. a. St Augustin is unjustly censured, with respect to the licentiousness of the stage. IV. 568. a. b.
- Stage* (French) some fragments that shew what it was in the time of Francis I. II. 477. a. b. 478. a. b. 479. a. b. 480. a. b. A passage of Boileau on that head. 480. b. n. (18).

- Stancarus*, Calvin and he gave one another the same hard words. V. 230. b. He married a wife being a Priest. 232. b. 233. a. Stanislaus Orichovius disputes against him. IV. 411.
- Stars*, the ancient Poets made them often the subject of their metamorphoses. I. 348. b. 349. a. In what part of the world the science of the stars had its beginning. III. 311. What the longitude and the latitude of the stars are. 461. b. Whether revolutions in religion are to be imputed to them. 948. a. b. The star which led the wife-men to Bethlehem has nothing in common with the burning torch which Timoleon saw in a dream. V. 364. b.
- State of Innocence*, the duration of it. I. 22. a. b.
- State-Catholic*, a book highly esteemed, who is the author of it. III. 41. a. b.
- States*: it is generally speaking the maxim of states to observe no other law but what tends to aggrandize them. I. 130. a. b. Those who govern them find themselves oftentimes obliged to commit acts of injustice. 448. a. b. The great revolutions which happen in them often proceed from a trifle. II. 711. b. A temperature that is often to be observed in the government of states. III. 506. b. 507. a. Their temporal good is generally preferred to religion. IV. 621. a. b.
- States-General of France* limit the royal authority in some respects. III. 409. a. Whether it be for the interest of France that they should meet. IV. 139. a. b.
- States-General*, or the United Provinces of the Low-Countries, make an edict, prohibiting the public exercise of the Romish religion in Boisleduc. III. 548. a. A dispute which that edict occasioned. ibid. and b. Send an Ambassador to Muley Zidan King of Morocco. 170. b. 171. a. What they did in favour of the Grecians. 172. a. How they justify themselves with regard to libels. V. 755.
- Statistics*, Stevin's treatise on that subject is excellent. V. 236. b.
- Statius* congratulates himself on having writ 278 Hexameters in two days. I. 664. b. A commentary on that author, in usum Delphini. 756. Navagiero's aversion against him, which was strange and full of prejudice. IV. 315. a. b. 316. a.
- Statius* (Achilles) may very possibly have made the same trial of the public taste, that Muretus made of Scaliger's. II. 353. a.
- Statues*: A statue which appeared with a quite different countenance to those who came into the temple, than it did to those that went out. II. 203. It was a very rare privilege for great men to have their statues placed in the Forum, during the first ages of the Roman Republic. 290. b. Cities have been ravaged for insulting the statues of a sovereign Prince. 605. b. Statues hung in the air by virtue of the load-stone. IV. 41. b. 42. a. Cato the censor's answer to some who wondered that there was no statue erected to him. 750. a. Pygmalion falls in love with one, and how he behaved to it. 641, 642. Clemens Alexandrinus and Arnobius allege that, to shew the Pagans the vanity of their idols. 641. a.
- Statues*: persons that were of a very small stature. I. 184. a. 326. b.
- Step-Mothers*, there is a certain fate which inspires them with a great deal of ill-humour. III. 189. a.
- Stephens* (Charles) passes an error upon us, which has been bandied from one Dictionary to another. II. 258. b. Dies in the Chatelet, greatly in debt. III. 830. b. His mistake concerning Pyrrhus. IV. 660. a. b. Did not understand a passage of Philokrates. 784. a.
- Stephens* (Robert) his house was always full of people who spoke nothing but Latin. I. 602. a. b. Protected by Castellan against the Sorbonnists, and afterwards given up to them. II. 372. b. Being persecuted by the Sorbonnists, he retires to Geneva. III. 830. b. Accused of having altered a passage in Bucer's commentary on the second Psalm. II. 173. a.
- Stephens* (Henry) how he expresses himself, in speaking of the good tables of the Clergy. II. 815. a. b. His cavillings on the death of Lucretia. III. 911. b. 912. a. b. He makes bad defence for Herodotus, who had ascribed envy and jealousy to God. IV. 575. a.
- Stephens* (Nicole) a learned woman. III. 830. a.
- Stefichorus* loses his sight, and recovers it again, for what, and how. III. 368. a.
- Stetius* besieged in vain by the troops of the Emperor and those of Brandenburg. III. 901. a.
- Stevinus* (Simon) censures Peter Nonius, whom he nevertheless acknowledges to be a great Mathematician. IV. 382. a.
- Stewarts*, Cayet accused of having writ an apology for them. 242. b. 243. a. 246. and a. b.
- Style*: affectations in point of style. I. 63. a. b. There was a time when a barbarism of style was much in vogue. 432. a. b. An author does not much entertain the world, when by changing his style, he gets out of his element. 438. a. b. The pompous style is generally not the style of a man of quality. 722. a. b. Who boasted that his style was of a high strain and glittering. II. 191. b. The deceitfulness of proofs drawn from a likeness of style. 808. a. We ought to avoid a style that is too concise, and for that very reason obscure. III. 248. b. There are several degrees of decency with respect to the style. V. 841. The author declares that he did not pretend to politeness of style, which was likewise neglected by Mezerai and le Laboureur. ibid. and n. (24).
- Stock-fish*: some people at Rome valued that fish, in compliance to the Pope. III. 327. a.
- Stoics*, no Philosophers were farther from the truth than they. II. 63. b. Confuted with respect to religion. 331. a. b. Accused by Plutarch of perverting the common conceptions, more than the Academics. 495. a. Said that Cynism was the shortest way to attain to virtue. 671. b. The pain which they feel from their evils, is the best objection that can be made to them. III. 423. a. They spoke too pompously of the empire of Reason. IV. 441. a. b. Are strongly refuted by Plutarch, with respect to the usefulness of vice. 520. a. b. Were more orthodox than Arnobius, with respect to matter considered as one of the principles of all things. 521. a. Their maxim concerning the use of words. 706. b. Their sage exists only in idea. II. 310. b. They laughed at the distinction of words. V. 847. An objection which they made use of. 858.
- Stones*: a black stone carried away out of the temple of Mecca by the Karmatians. I. 49. The same sent back. ibid. How it was proved to be genuine. ibid. The author's reflections upon that head. ibid. a. b. A stone honoured by the Saracens. 124. a. b. Another worshipped by the Arabians. ibid. b. Falls of stones foretold and revered. 306. a. b. Transparent stones. II. 303. a. b. Miraculous stones which people formerly pretended to have in several places. 745. and a. b. 746. and a. b. The Ligurians are knocked on the head by a shower of stones. III. 434. a. b. 435. a. b.
- Stories*: little stories are very proper to entertain a company pleasantly. I. 666. b. Some men have the power to immortalize any story, whether it be true or false. II. 7. a. However ridiculous the story may be that a person confutes, he ought to be exact. 267. a. Stories that were forged in the times of ignorance, for good ends. IV. 615. a. b. It is not allowed to alter any thing in those that are to be found in the best ancient writers. ibid. b. How a person ought to behave, with regard to such stories as are grounded only upon hear-say. 379. a. b.
- Stopp*, author of a book intituled La Religion des Hollandais. V. 203. a. Was killed at the battle of Steinkerken. ibid.
- Strabo*, what he says of fables. II. 832. a. His judicious reflections on the miraculous statues which cities boast of having. V. 156. a. b.
- Straßburg*, the indulgence of its Magistrates for fornication. I. 222. a. Its school. V. 256. a. b. 257. a. That city neither will, nor can always preserve its neutrality. III. 713. a. b.
- Stratagems of the Devil*, what is said of that book and the author of it. I. 92. a.
- Stratocles* persuades the Athenians to offer a sacrifice to the gods by way of thanks for the defeat of their enemies, the news of which he knew to be false. V. 749. b.
- Stratonice*,

- Stratonice*, Queen of Syria; what reasons induced her to make herself drunk. II. 533. a.
- Stratonice* advises Dejotarus, her husband, to make use of another woman. II. 630. a. b.
- Strutius*, why his book, intitled, the Anti-Ancient, has never been printed. I. 341. a. b.
- Strong*: there is nothing more advantageous than to be always for the strongest faction. V. 250. a.
- Strozza* (Charles) dies, notwithstanding Savonarola's cap and contrary prediction. V. 61. a.
- Stuart* (Mary), Queen of Scotland; the Historical Pyrrhonism that one has reason to chuse, with respect to her adventures. II. 282. a. b. How she eluded the design which her uncle had of keeping her jewels. III. 873. b.
- Study*, the most libertine youths, and those who have no inclination for it, do not fail to succeed therein sometimes. I. 562. a. b. 563. a. Extreme application to study. II. 370. b. 637. b. 638. a. The stratagem that a father made use of to make his son resume his studies. 687. and a. Whether study raises leud thoughts. III. 260. a. b. Happy are they who can study fourteen or fifteen hours a day, without being ever sick. 342. a.
- Studying*: a method of studying. I. 319. b. 320. a.
- Stupid people*, a man of wit is sometimes incapable to deceive them. V. 147. a.
- Stupidity* is not such a great misfortune as people imagine. I. 480. b.
- Sturmus* writes things to the disadvantage of Hotman. III. 523. a. b. Had been several years without receiving the communion. V. 257. b. What he tells us of Cæsius, and some other Saxons. II. 242. a. b.
- Swann* went through his course of Philosophy with so little success, that he thought he never should be able to attain to any competent knowledge in it. II. 802. b. Endeavours to explain how God may be present in imaginary space. III. 100. b.
- Subjects* are not pleased to see their prince bestow his treasures and favours on his friends, in an extravagant manner. I. 571. a. The doctrine of their obedience proposed with too much indifference. 687. a. Whether they ought to take up arms to deliver themselves from tyranny, or wait till their neighbours come and deliver them from it. II. 52. b. Maxims about their obedience. 423. a. b. Loyal subjects are generally neglected. 443. a. b. III. 421. a. It would not be a hard matter to make them approve of conquests and battles, provided they cost them no money. V. 656. A subject cannot make himself formidable to his master, without having committed a thousand acts of injustice. II. 541. a. b.
- Substance*: the idea which the Philosophers form of a substance. V. 221. a. b. &c.
- Subtilties* (sophistical) are only fit to corrupt the mind. V. 241. a. b. 242. a. b. We ought not to affect subtilties in matters of religion. III. 343. b.
- Success*, that of an enterprize is not always answerable to appearances. I. 365. b. 366. a. b. Vanity does not hinder men from allowing God to have been the cause of a good success. II. 298. a. b. 299. a. Several have ascribed the glory of a happy success to God, only for a political end. V. 366. a. b. 367. a. b. People often judge of matters by the success. 369. b. 370. a. b. &c.
- Suessa*, there were two towns of that name. III. 905. a.
- Suetonius* (Tranquillus) his candour and sincerity. V. 263. a. b. 264. a. b.
- Suffridus Petri*, his credulity. I. 36. II. 769. a.
- Suidas*, that author is so mutilated and corrupted that there is no depending upon him. I. 44. b. His gross ignorance, with respect to Dejotarus. II. 628. b. He is ill understood, as to the cause which obliged Æschylus to retire into Sicily. 825. b.
- Sulmo* respected by Alphonso, King of Naples, and why. IV. 433. a.
- Sulpitius* (Servius) exceeded his masters. I. 613. b.
- Sultans*, who was the only one amongst them that durst send a body of regular troops into Italy. IV. 50. a.
- Sum*, what it is, according to Anaxagoras. I. 307. a. b. An example of a very particular sympathy with the sun. II. 402. b. 403. a. The Spanish Historians say, that the sun stopped its course in favour of Charles V. 443. b. 444. a. There are several persons to whom the sun is a sensible god. 449. a.
- Superfation*, an instance of superstition often quoted. I. 283. Who was a famous instance of it. ibid.
- Superintendent of the Finances*; the sincere and ingenious confession of such a superintendent's wife. V. 16. b.
- Superiors*, their bad life is imitated, but not their good. III. 385. a.
- Superstition*; nothing is accounted too costly, when once people are intoxicated with superstition. I. 2. How useful it is to a General, when he employs it either to rouse or moderate the ardour of his soldiers. 542. a. b. Those who are infatuated with it, generally make no scruple to commit the greatest crimes. II. 629. a. b. It is difficult to be extirpated when it is a source of gain to private persons. IV. 178. a. b. It destroys good sense. V. 77. b. It is a misfortune that we do not know all the superstitions of the antient Romans. III. 646. b. There are two ways of ridiculing it, the one good and the other bad. IV. 584. b.
- Supplements*: some readers write, in the margin of an History or Calendar, a great many supplements. IV. 728. a.
- Supralapsarians* and Infralapsarians maintain the same thing at the bottom. IV. 524. a.
- Sura* composes orations for Trajan. III. 317. a.
- Surena*, what conclusion one may draw from his perfidious behaviour to Crassus. V. 273. a.
- Surius* (Laurence) translates all Ruybroeck's works. IV. 942. a.
- Suspicion*: people are very ready to give the reins to suspicion. I. 479. b. Prejudices against those who are apt to entertain suspicions. 745. a. b. Their bad effects. 588. a.
- Sutcliffe* is mistaken, as to the time in which Cicero lived. II. 499. a. b. Falsely ascribes to Agrippa some things which he has not said concerning Sixtus IV. V. 164. b.
- Susa*; it is not true that Catinat was obliged to raise the siege of that place; on the contrary he took it, and kept it till the peace. IV. 210. b.
- Sweating-Sickness* in England, what kind of sickness it was. I. 271. b. A dangerous distemper which has frequently made great havoc in England. V. 42. b. Confounded with the pox by a person who translated Sanders into French. ibid.
- Sweden*, what Maimbourg tells us of a treaty about the reduction of that kingdom to the obedience of the Church of Rome. III. 139. b.
- Swedes* invade Poland. III. 553. Make so many conquests upon the King of Denmark that they force him to give up to them three fine provinces. ibid. Had no good opinion of the Emperor's intentions, when he offered them his mediation. 851. b. Besiege Constance without success. II. 551. and a. b.
- Swerinus* taken for a Calvinist, and confounded with the author of the Abusæ Batavæ. IV. 942. b.
- Swift* in running was antiently an heroic quality. I. 77. a.
- Swine's Flesh*, what reason Plutarch gives for the Jews not eating it. I. 115. a.

T.

T*abellaria*: the design of the Lex Tabellaria. II. 345. a. n. (6).

Table, that of Alcinous passed into a proverb. I. 201. a.

Tableau de l'Amour considéré dans l'état du Mariage, who is the author of that book. III. 581. b. Quoted. IV. 801. b. n. (24).

Tables (Alphabetical) See Indexes.

Tables (Akronomical) called Alfonlines, cost the author of them the empire of Germany. II. 379. a.

Tables (Chronological) censured by Tanaquillus Faber. III. 388. a.

Tabourat (William) Father to Des Accords. I. 66.

Tabule Novæ, what they were among the antient Romans. II. 679. a.

Tachard quoted. V. 182. a. b. n. (12), (13), (14), (16), (17), (18). 183. b. n. (20), (21).

Tacitus, the difference of opinions with respect to a Spanish translation of that Historian. I. 180. a. b. What

- What he says, on the statues of Brutus and Cassius not appearing at a funeral solemnity. 498. b. II. 94. b. n. (11). Swallowed the marvellous. I. 518. b. His style is too concise and obscure. III. 248. b. What, according to him, is the strongest inclination of the Deity with respect to man. IV. 572. b. 573. a. Whether he was much more scrupulous than Suetonius in describing obscene actions. V. 264. b. 265. a. b. 266. a. b. A judgment upon that Historian. 330. a. Alchamers publishes notes upon his Germania. I. 235.
- Tacitus*, Emperor, the speech that he made in the senate. I. 575. b. 576. a.
- Taffin*, Minister of Metz, consults the Ministers of the conference of Poissy, touching the baptism of children baptized by women. I. 704. b.
- Tagueit* (John) enlarges and improves the chirurgery of Guy de Cauliac. II. 399. a. His Latin as pure as that of Cicero. ibid. b.
- Tabureau* (James) greatly ridicules the Astrological books of Peter Turrel. V. 417.
- Talents*: the story of talents multiplied. I. 47. a. b.
- Talents*: there is a certain mixture, which hinders the finest talents from advancing us. I. 698. a. b. It is a very considerable and a very useful talent to be able to receive a languishing conversation. 701. b. 702. a.
- Tallard* (Count) takes Traerbach in the year 1702. V. 396.
- Talmudists*, their opinion concerning Adam's stature before and after he had transgressed. I. 103. b. They are so obscure, that they are not to be understood. IV. 598. a.
- Talon*, Advocate-General, taxes the Janfenists with having zealously adhered to the cause of the Popes. III. 567. a.
- Tamerlane* causes his daughters to learn Magic, in order to facilitate his conquests. IV. 940. b.
- Tammux* in Ezekiel was the same with Adonis, according to St Jerome. I. 125. b. 116. a.
- Tandemus*, the head of a sect. IV. 629.
- Tandler* (Tobias) his harange de Fascino & Incantatione, and his answer to Elich. II. 750. a. b.
- Tapestry*; Garaffe sharply censured for publishing the tale of the Tapestry of Queen Joan d'Albret. III. 134. IV. 332. b.
- Tappri* had a law, by which the husbands gave their wives to others, when they had two or three children by them. III. 495. a.
- Tapper* (Ruard) how he cried out one day, on account of Baius's doctrine. I. 608. a.
- Taranto*: Lewis, son to Philip Prince of Taranto, kills himself by immoderately caressing his wife. IV. 301. b. 302. a.
- Tarantula*, Mambria Rofeo continues his History of the world. IV. 918.
- Tardieu*, Lieutenant-Criminal at Paris, murdered with his wife. III. 40. b. 41. a.
- Tartarini* fall out with the Romans without a cause. IV. 662. b.
- Targum of Jerusalem* relates to us what the dispute was between Cain and Abel. I. 23. b.
- Tarpas* an interpreter of dreams at the King of Egypt's court. I. 87.
- Tarquin*, King of Rome, was a tyrant in two respects. II. 162. b. 163. a. He and his brother were very different in their manners. V. 290. a. He re-establishes the Compital games. II. 163. b. Causes children to be sacrificed in honour of the Dii Penates, &c. ibid.
- Tasso* was subject to fits of madness, which did not hinder his writing excellent verses. III. 918. a. Spoiled his Poem by too much correcting. IV. 897. a. Whether he lived in lodgings. V. 401. a.
- Tassoni* (Alessandro) quoted. III. 700. b. 701. a. n. (35). 773. a. n. (7). IV. 835. a. n. (8).
- Taste*, an instance of its capriciousness. V. 374. a. b.
- Tatian* reasons ill against the Gentiles. II. 653. b.
- Tavares*, Confident to the Duke of Orleans, brother to Henry II, performs a considerable exploit against the garrison of Calais. III. 401. a. IV. 17. and a. b.
- Taulerus* praised immoderately by Luther. V. 301. b.
- Taxation*, that for which Cyrenian had a special commission. IV. 820.
- Taxes of the Romish Chancery*, facts concerning that book. IV. 649. a. b. 650. a. The edition of it that was published by Laurence Banck. I. 627. b. 628. a. b. 629. a. b. Other editions of it, and among the rest, that of Rome, in 1514. 628. b. The difference of those editions. ibid. Put in the Index Librorum Prohibitorum. ibid. The just reproaches of the Protestants, with regard to that book. ibid. 629. a. The Romish Controversialists are much puzzled what to say about it. ibid. b. A Chancellor of Bois-le-duc, who promises to abjure his Catholicism, if any one could shew him those abominations which the Protestants quote, as taken from that book. ibid. a. There are several observations upon it, in a work translated by Laurence Tuppiss. V. 415. a. b.
- Taxites*, a custom that they observed, with respect to their daughters. V. 131. a. n. (39).
- Teachers* are obliged to avoid ambiguous maxims, and to prevent false glosses. I. 463. a.
- Teatb*, William Bigot was born with two. II. 7. b.
- Teians* built Abdera. I. 17. a. b.
- Teiffier* (Antony) censured. I. 747. a. n. (1), (10). IV. 848. and a. n. (3). Should have added corrections to the passages, where Thuanus is mistaken, in the eulogies he bestows on learned men. ibid. b.
- Tekeli*, the correspondence which France carried on with him. I. 171. a. b. His misfortunes. III. 682. b.
- Telamon* never laughed. V. 317. a.
- Telemachus*, an eastern Monk so called, his adventure, his courage, and his martyrdom. I. 230. a. b.
- Telemachus*, the author of his adventures, censured for the character he gives to Pygmalion. IV. 643. a. b. 644. a. b. 645. a. b.
- Telissius*, General of the Samnites, for what reasons he wanted to destroy the city of Rome. III. 686. b.
- Tellier* (Father) takes advantage of some stories, which are spread abroad, without knowing whether they be true or false. I. 727. a. His reflexions on the zeal which the Janfenists shewed to have two decrees of the Court of Rome printed. III. 567. b.
- Temerites* advised by the god Hammon, to beware of cocks. IV. 790. a.
- Temurus*, one of the chiefs of the Heraclidæ in the expedition, in which they retook the Peloponnese. II. 240. b. 241. a.
- Temerity*, whether a lucky rashness deserves that name. V. 370. b.
- Temermans* (Antony Antonine) suffers himself to be strangled, rather than he would reveal the confession of Jaureguy. II. 460. b.
- Temper*: a man's temper has a great influence upon his mind. II. 452. a. b. It is almost always the first and principal spring, even in persons who are God's instruments. III. 81. a.
- Temperance*, a discourse on that virtue converts a famous Debauchee. V. 570. a. b.
- Tempest*, an Atheist's answer to those who reproached him with being the cause of one. II. 655. b.
- Temple of Jerusalem*, Julian the Apostate could not rebuild it. I. 228. Ezekiel's description of it is a difficult matter. 618. a.
- Temple of the Earth*, facts concerning it. II. 344. b. 345. a.
- Temple of Ephesus*, the reflexion which an Historian makes, on Diana's suffering it to be burnt. III. 59. a. b. IV. 405. b. V. 360. a. How the Ephesians eluded the desire which Alexander had, to appropriate the whole inscription of that temple to himself. 553. a.
- Temporal*: the Temporal character generally abhors the Ecclesiastical, when they are joined together. III. 768. a. b.
- Tennis*, the antiquity of that play. IV. 344. a.
- Terab*, some Fathers of the Church, have thought that he neither was a believer in his life, nor at the point of death. I. 45. b.
- Tercera Iles*, a bloody affront which the French received there. V. 254. a. b. No satisfaction was required for it. ibid. b. Which is a shameful passage of Henry the third's reign. ibid.
- Terebintus*, heir to the estate, money, and impieties, of Scythianus, comes to a tragical end. IV. 90. a. b.

Terence

- Tereus* commended for having wrote no Tragedies. I. 59. b. Who is the author of the verses, prefixed to his Comedies. 375. a. How he wrote his Comedies. II. 39. b.
- Terentia* divorced by Cicero. V. 380. b.
- Terminus*, a Heathen god, stands more in fear of Hadrian, than of Jupiter himself. III. 317. a. b.
- St Augustin's railery on that head. ibid.
- Tertullian* makes use of a miracle of Achilles against the Epicureans. I. 85. b. His imaginary triumph over the wife Heathens, considering the fact he goes upon. II. 642. a. What he says of the connexion between gluttony and lust. 822. a. And of the privileges which the Heathens granted to women, who had married but once. III. 192. a. An examination of a proposition which he affirms, viz. That the meanest Christian tradesman, finds God and declares him. V. 141. b. & seq. A thing that he reproaches the Pagans with. 454. a.
- Ter. Fer.* See Vera.
- Testament* (the New) some body said that there is not a jot in it, but what is taken from the Jewish antiquities. IV. 880. a. b.
- Tetragramma*: whether the points of the Tetragramma are proper to that name. I. 244. b. 245. a. Abuse reflexions on that head. ibid.
- Text* (Hebrew) whether the Jews altered it. I. 173. a.
- Texelius* (John) is the person who wrote first against Luther. IV. 772. b.
- Thales*, whether he acknowledged a God, who had formed all things. I. 300. b. V. 321. a. b. 322. a. He taught that water was the principle of all things. III. 650. a. An answer which is ascribed to him, touching the definition of God. V. 141. b. 142. a.
- Thalia*, a Poem, what the matter and form of it are. I. 478. a. b.
- Thames*, in less than nine hours, ebbs and flows three times contrary to custom. V. 42. b.
- Thargelia* gains the affection of the principal Grecians by her wit and beauty. IV. 578. b.
- Thaumafius* (Mount) the wonders that were told of it. IV. 205. b.
- Theagenes*, the hero of a romance, gives his heroine a box on the ear. III. 378. a. b. See Romance.
- Theatins*, their quarrel with the Jesuits. III. 887. a. b.
- Theatrum Urbium*, who is the author of that work. II. 121.
- Thebans* were forbidden to sleep in the temple of Amphiarus. I. 277. a. Paid Divine honours to Alcmena. 208.
- Thebes* called the City of the Sun, by the Egyptians. II. 233.
- Theft* was allowed among the antient Egyptians. I. 464. b.
- Thelin*, his Divine essays. I. 562. a.
- Themistocles*, his answer to an inhabitant of Seriphus. II. 414. b. The envy which people bore him, was one of the causes of Cimon's advancement. 504. b. 505. a.
- Theocritus*, his answer to the question, why he did not write. I. 453. a.
- Theocritus*, the Poet, a passage in him, corrected by Mr de Longe-Pierre. I. 113. b.
- Theocritus* of Chios, his judgment of Anaximenes's speeches pleasantly expressed. I. 330. a.
- Theocritus*, the Sophist, his railery upon hearing of Alexander's death. IV. 404. b.
- Theodidastus*, why that name was given to Ammonius Saccas. I. 269. a.
- Theodorus*, the Atheist, boldly denied there were any gods. II. 652. b. After what manner he answered the objection which a woman made to him at a feast. III. 460. a. b.
- Theodorus Studita*, his testament translated by Father Sirmond, and by Livineius. III. 853. a. b.
- Theodoret* decides a point like a bad Divine. I. 13. b. 14. a. b. He should have built upon the authority of Iocrates, when he reproached the Pagans with the Divine honours which they paid to Helen. III. 368. a. Alleged an author who is against him, with respect to the impurities of Prodicus. IV. 784. a. b. 785. a. What he says against Plato's laws, concerning the two sexes. 802. b.
- Theodoric*, King of the Ostrogoths, his History wrote by Cochlæus. II. 523. a. b.
- Theodosius*, Emperor, was offended, when he found his son sitting at his lesson, while his master stood. I. 507. How St Ambrose treated him. 593. a. An edict of this Emperor. V. 760.
- Theodosius the Younger*, Emperor, his sudden change with respect to Nestorius, gives room to believe what Acacius of Bercea says of it. IV. 348. b.
- Theology*, what Accursius says of it. I. 67. and b. Cannot subsist without Philosophy. II. 202. b. Ramism and Cartesianism involved in its disputes. 696. a. It ought not to be subjected to Philosophy. IV. 419. b. See Divinity.
- Theology* (Pagan) what it made a tyrant expect. II. 557. a. b. 558. a.
- Theon*, the Sophist, a precept of Rhetoric which he gave. II. 341. b. What he tells us concerning Ephorus. 772. b.
- Theophilus*, a French Poet, reproaches Balzac with two or three unpleasant adventures. I. 623. b. It is pretended that he was in love with Des-Barreaux. II. 646. b. Of what kind his impieties and obscenities were. III. 135. b. 136. a.
- Theophrastus*, a leud woman wrote against him, which occasioned a proverb. III. 779. a. b. The reason which Vives gives, why Leontium wrote a book against him. ibid. b.
- Theopompus*, his double dealing, in saying one thing with the tongue and another with the pen. IV. 174. b. His vanity. V. 332. b. 333. a. b. He and Timæus are looked upon as a couple of satirical and fabulous Historians. 358. b.
- Theory*, opposite to Practice. I. 130. b. 131. a. A Theory which engages a Doctor to practice. II. 193. and a. b.
- Thesus*, one of his wives has been multiplied into four. V. 305. a. He is obliged to prove his Divine original. ibid. b. 306. a.
- Thespius* led a good life after his resurrection. I. 282. b.
- Thessaly* was very much cried down for witchcraft. V. 310. a.
- Thetis* pimps for her son. I. 84. a. Is at variance with her husband the Ocean. III. 634. b.
- Thevatbat*, the History of that man. V. 182. a. b. 183. a. b.
- Thout* confused, as to the Magic art, of which he accuses Agrippa. I. 151. a. b. 152. a. His want of judgment in recommending certain books. 165. a. His dishonest proceeding. 736. a. He censures the ingratitude of great men, who overlook the misery of several persons of distinguished learning. III. 50. b.
- Thomas Aquinas*, his authority among those of the Church of Rome. I. 470. a. Censured. IV. 877. b. 878. a. b.
- Thomas à Becket*, his persecutor becomes his votary. III. 797. b.
- Thomasius* (James) his harangue concerning the predictions of the new Prophets. III. 436. b. 437. a.
- Thomasius* (Christian) is about an apology for those who have been unjustly accused of Atheism. III. 671. b. V. 323. a. n. (16).
- Thomasius* (Lewis) one of his sentiments examined. I. 302. a. b. His reflexion touching the original of the Manichees, Nestorians, and Eutychians, that are in Asia. IV. 513. a.
- Thomisti*, their Hypothesis about Transubstantiation. V. 819.
- Thonis*, an Egyptian Courtezan, summoneth a young man before the judges, and for what. III. 714. b.
- Thornax*, a mountain of Laconia, why called Coccyus, or Coccyx. III. 632. a.
- Thorns* (fabulous) whose flowers were of the shape of a crown. I. 37. and b.
- Thought*, the formation of it is a very difficult subject. I. 555. b. If it be a modification of the body, then all bodies are thinking substances. II. 658. a. b. 660. b. 661. a. b. V. 215. a. b. It cannot be the sole effect of the disposition of the organs. II. 661. b. Is distinct from all the modifications of body that are come to our knowledge. ibid. and 779. b. Can only be found in an indivisible Being. III. 790. b. 791. a. b.
- Thoughts*, there is not less wit required in applying them right, than in being the first authors of them. II. 779. a. A thought must be true in order to be fine. 527. a. There are no thoughts so much to be suspected, as those which are put off in an assuming

- suming manner, and with a majestic tone. III. 809. a. There are thoughts, which being essentially good, are relished every where, and at all times. IV. 741. b. 742. a.
- Thoughts of Morinus*, a book which brought its author to the stake. IV. 269. b. 270. a. b.
- Thorns*, those who sit upon it, have more need than others of the assistance of a happy temper, to become saints. II. 767. a.
- Thuanus* (James-Augustus) a fault which must needs have crept into his History, corrected. I. 22. b. He calls the Protestants a very suspicious people. 119. a. b. His son was so sharply reproached by King James, that it threw him into a fit of sickness. II. 183. a. He forgets an essential thing, in speaking of Busbequius. 232. a. An examination of what has been said, as to Camden's having furnished him with memoirs different from what he (Camden) published afterwards in his Annals. 283. b. 284. a. A precaution which he took to hinder his History being suppressed. 283. a. b. He admired the judgment which Julius Cæsar Scaliger passed upon Cardan. 317. b. 318. a. One page of Thuanus, upon Charles V, is to be preferred before a volume of Sandoval. 442. He is mistaken in his judgment of the Brutum Fulmen. III. 521. a. His contradiction with regard to Charlotte, daughter to the Duke of Montpensier. 864. b. 865. a. He would not speak Latin. IV. 409. a. b. Disfigured proper names. III. 722. b. 723. a. He inveighs strongly against the conduct of the Constable de Montmorency, with respect to the Dukes of Valentinois. IV. 699. a. Censured. II. 399. IV. 848. b. Did not sufficiently enquire into what concerned the lives of the learned. ibid.
- Thuanus* (Francis), some particulars relating to his trial. III. 802. a. b. 827. a. b.
- Thucydides*, whether or not his style was imitated by the writers of his time. II. 570. b. 571. a. He has gained immortal honour by doing justice to his greatest enemies. V. 891.
- Thuringia*, the Archbishops of Mentz renounce their right to that country. II. 815.
- Tiana*, the inhabitants of it built a temple to their countryman Apollonius. I. 380. b.
- Tiara* (Pontifical), whether the word Mysterium was writ upon it. II. 708. a. b.
- Tyber* (Pontus de) censured. IV. 609. a. b.
- Tyber*, projects formed to prevent its inundations. V. 499. a. b.
- Tiberius* (the Emperor) conceals a most dangerous snare under the appearance of frankness. I. 422. a. b. Is very ill-used by Artabanus II, King of Parthia. 511. and b. 512. a. Puts an author to death for having praised Brutus and Cassius. II. 355. b. Is flattered in full Senate. 356. a. One of his best-conducted intrigues. 559. b. Was destitute of all natural affection. 719. a. Lays aside his ordinary dissimulation. 720. b. 721. a. Rejects a petition very harshly, and his severity is disliked by the Senate. III. 497. What he did to conceal his being the death of the accused. IV. 21. b. Praised immoderately. 495. and a. b. Grants the honour of a triumph to Blesius, and refuses it to Dolabella. V. 277. a. b. 278. a. His conduct with respect to Sejanus's daughters. 824.
- Tiberius* was a Pagan deity. V. 350. b.
- Tycho Bræhe* settles in Bohemia. III. 657. Withed that the number of Mathematician Preachers was greater. IV. 680. a.
- Tigranes* put to death by Tiberius. III. 164. b. Another Tigranes made King of Armenia by Nero. ibid.
- Tigre* (Le), a fatire which occasioned the death of two persons. III. 290. a. b.
- Tilbury* (Gervase of) quoted. IV. 738. b. 739. a.
- Tilens* conspires with Cameron. II. 285. a. His advertisement to the assembly of Rochelle. IV. 212. a. b.
- Tillet* (Lewis de) engaged Calvin to compose short exhortations, which were read as homilies in some parishes. II. 261. a. Was only Canon and Archdeacon of Angoulême, and not a Bishop or Archbishop. IV. 681. a. n. (1). V. 356. and a. b.
- Tilly*, General of an army, was very chaste. III. 414. b. V. 357. Acquired honour, partly by his own good conduct, and partly by the bad conduct of his enemies. 180. a.
- Timæus*, what he said of Aristotle's shop. I. 465. a. He does not do justice to Agathocles in his History. V. 359. a. b.
- Timanthus*, how he drew the face of Iphigenia's father, in order to represent his grief. IV. 505. b.
- Time*; a Grammarian was of opinion, that disputing on any material questions of Divinity, was so much time ill employed. II. 190. b. It is difficult to avert things which passed in remote times. 386. b. Whether time be divisible in infinitum. V. 609. a.
- Time to come*, God has very wisely covered it in thick darkness. II. 126.
- Time* (unseasonable), all those who are to prevent their works to great men, ought to avoid unseasonable time. III. 281. a. b.
- Timocrates*, the calumnies which he vented against Epicurus. II. 782. b.
- Timoleon*, the eulogies which Timæus bestows upon him. V. 360. a. A dream that he had. 364. b. What answer he made when some persons in Syracuse publicly accused him. 365. a. b.
- Timotheus*, how he answered those who reproached him with his mother's scandalous life. II. 548. b. What Plutarch relates concerning that Athenian General. V. 367. a.
- Tyndarides*, a story that is told of their apparition. V. 140. a.
- Tyndium*; whence it came that the thorns which grew about the temple of Tyndium, were thought to be always in bloom. I. 37. b.
- Typographical errors* in names multiply persons. IV. 193. An error of that kind is the reason that Mr Moreri has given us a chimerical Herefarch. ibid.
- Tyre*, the cruelty which Alexander exercised upon the inhabitants of that city. IV. 7. a.
- Tyranny*; in destroying one, people very often establish a greater. III. 452. a. b. 467. a. b. 468. a. Who invented most of the ways by which it is established and kept up. IV. 562. a. One of the greatest misfortunes that attend it is, that there is no way to renounce it. 563. b. 564. a. b. Tyranny exercised without arms. 566. b. 567. a. b.
- Tyrants*, whether faith is to be kept with them. II. 164. a. There are who hate the tyrant, but not the tyranny. 167. a. b. They would have us fear lest the walls and floors of our chambers should witness against us. 627. a. Can lay no stress upon the fidelity of their subjects. III. 139. a. It is lawful to put them to death. I. 237. b. Authors who maintain that doctrine. II. 458. a. b. 459. a.
- Tiragallus* produced every year a book and a child. III. 662. b. 663. a. V. 380. a. Quoted. 129. b. n. (26), (27), (28). He was one of the most illustrious men of the XVth century. 799. The character of his Commentary on the laws of matrimony. ibid.
- Title* of a book, which alarms the Court of Rome, and which the author reforms. III. 122.
- Titles*; how fond people are of pompous titles. II. 170. a. b. Titles given to Princes, are only according to the usage. I. 800. b. A private person who gives Princes the titles which they usually assume, does not set himself up as a judge of their pretensions. ibid.
- Titus Livius*, what he said of the Republic of Rome. I. 138. a. b. The difference there is betwixt him and Valerius Maximus, with respect to the marble tiles, which had been taken from the temple of Juno Lacinia. III. 640. a. b. 641. a. He contradicts himself in speaking of Alexander. IV. 9. a. An estate sold to purchase him. 467. b. 468. a. Quoted. 749. a. b. n. (18). His maxims incorporated in the body of the discourse. V. 327. b. He and Ovid die in the same year. IV. 447. b.
- Tobacco*, when and by whom made known in Italy. V. 26. and a. A Poem on that subject. ibid. a. b. and 346. a.
- Toledo*, flies do not enter into the shambles there, and why. III. 430. b. The fifth Council of Toledo makes decrees against those who are inquisitive about the succession, in a Prince's life-time. 955. a.
- Toleration in point of religion*, a justification of that which the States-General grant to the Mennonites. I. 288. b. 289. a. A comparison between the toleration of the Mahometans, and that of the Christians. IV. 39. a. b. 349. a. b. Milton's principles on

- on that head. 223. a. b. Whether the Roman Catholics should be excluded from it. ibid. b. 224. a. b. That which the Jews granted to the Sadducees, was an excessive toleration. V. 11. b. 12. a. The Sieur de Beauval's treatise on that subject. I. 672. a. b. Opposed by Viret, who employed the authority of the Papists, to curb the sects of Lyons. V. 483. and b.
- Toleration* (the Advocates for), it is not true that they pretend to take from Princes the power of the sword, which they hold from God. III. 147. b.
- Tollius*, the blundering mistake of that Critic, with respect to Father Sirmond. III. 853. a. b.
- Tomb*; some miraculous adventures have been related concerning Ajax's tomb. I. 161. b. And concerning that of Alcmena. 208. b. The Pagans believed that it was not safe to remove them. ibid. A memorable tomb. 210. b. Lightning falling upon them, is looked upon as a glorious accident. II. 870. a. Three famous Lawyers in the same tomb. 507. a. b.
- Tongue*: a boy who continued to speak, after he had lost his tongue. II. 410. b. It is a fine victory to be able to command it. 438. a. b.
- Too much*: the maxim too much of nothing suffers infinite varieties, when the question is to fix the bounds between too much and enough. I. 766. a.
- Tooth* (golden): it was a meer imposture. III. 486. a. Horatius was grossly deceived about it. ibid.
- Top-knots*, their antiquity. I. 333. a. b. II. 544. a. b. 545. a. b.
- Torigni*, confidant to Margaret de Valois, Queen of Navarre, is removed from that Queen. IV. 335. a. b.
- Torstenjón* besieges Brin, loses 4000 men there, and abandons the siege. V. 192. b.
- Torture*, whether the use of it should be allowed. III. 238. and a. b. 239. a. b.
- Torvaldius*, the fictitious name of Des Accords. I. 66. b.
- Totan* (William) believed to be author of the Fortitium Fidei, of which he published a new edition. V. 197. a.
- Totile*, the History of him wrote by Cochlæus, was never published. II. 523.
- Toulous*, the Inquisition there, punishes certain Heretics, on account of their lewdness. III. 280. b.
- Tour* (Count la) seizes on the suburbs of Vienna, and besieges the city. V. 677.
- Tournament*, it does not suit the majesty of a King, to be one of the Combatants. III. 399. b.
- Tournæur* (le) was the name of the family of Verloris, which is no more than that French word turned into Latin. V. 464. a.
- Tourensi* (Gregorius) cited about a son Ham. V. 632. b. 633. a.
- Tours* was not plundered by Abderame. II. 851. a.
- Touche*. See Bigarrures.
- Tower of wood*, which defended the Pyreum. I. 424. a. b. And which was said to have been proof against fire. ibid. An Architect who could transport an entire stone tower from one place to another. 474. and a. b.
- Towns* (Imperial) of Alsace, whether they can retain their immediate holding of the empire, under a protector or guardian that is King of France. III. 717. b. 718. a. Cannot preserve a neutrality. ibid.
- Traetus de Libertatibus Ecclesiæ Gallicanæ*, who is the author of that book. I. 157. a. b.
- Trade*, what is the science necessary to make one succeed in it. II. 33. a. b.
- Traditionaries*, who was the chief of them among the Jews. I. 173. b.
- Traditions*, we cannot be too distrustful of such as are only grounded upon hearsays. II. 473. b. 474. b. 475. a. b. Whether they ought to be credited, when they concern things that are supposed to have happened a great while ago. 829. b. What weight the Pagans laid upon them, when they were to prove the existence of a Deity. 872. b. Whether we ought to have any regard to fabulous traditions. III. 743. b. 744. a. b. The long duration of the most fabulous. 751. b. An author who carefully followed them in his Dramatical representations of the mysteries. II. 480. b.
- Traditions* (ill grounded) Lausot and some other writers who oppose them, do credit to their Church, and displease many. IV. 739. 740. Baronius and Bellarmine maintain with might and main, several traditions as ill grounded as the story of the She-Pope. 734. a. One does not much examine those that may serve for an ornament to the subject one treats of. 738. b. Sometimes people blame and reject them, at the same time that they admit very childish ones. 864. and b.
- Traditions of Slender* are more to be mistrusted than traditions of praise. IV. 511. a. At the end of three or four generations they ought not to be received. ibid.
- Tragedy*: the last word of a tragedy occasions a terrible accident. I. 175. The alterations which the antients made in tragedy. II. 824. a. b. Several women with child miscarried at seeing the tragedy of the Eumenides acted. ibid. b. What was the finest part of the ancient tragedy. 872. a. It is unreasonable to charge the author of a tragedy with all the sentiments he puts in the mouth of the actors. 873. a. Plato is against any tragedies being acted, wherein the gods are abused. 825. a. We are not to place what we find there among Historical facts. IV. 660. a. How it was defined by Gorgias. V. 147. a. Tragedies upon religious controversies. IV. 299. a. b. Rattall represents in a very noble manner the usefulness of tragedy in the Epistle Dedicatory of his Latin translation of Sophocles. 849. b. Some Poets do wonders in the four first acts of a tragedy, and succeed very ill in the last, for which good Poets reserve their most exquisite strokes. III. 720. b.
- Trejan*, what was the most magnificent of all his buildings. I. 376. An extraordinary action attributed to him by Lampridius. II. 770. b. Though none of the Historians of that Prince speak of it. ibid.
- Transcribers*: hasty transcribers fall into the greatest mistakes. I. 209. b. To how many faults they are liable. 536. a. The author mentions divers things only to serve for a warning to transcribers. II. 232. b. A story that is told of the fault of a transcriber. V. 106. b. 107. a. They introduce alterations. I. 538. b. Confound facts with their own conjectures, &c. IV. 609. a.
- Translations*: one single point, either taken away, or added, or altered, produces quite opposite things in a translation. I. 525. a. They require more capacity than one would think. IV. 873. and a. b. How difficult they are. V. 409. a.
- Translations of the Bible into the Vulgar Tongue*, a surprising instance of the abuse that may be made of them. IV. 723. a. b. Blamed by Mr Ponsot; his advice on that head to Peter de Gondy Bishop of Paris. ibid. a. The book which Ponsot writ on that subject is extremely trifling in Mr Arnauld's opinion. ibid. b. A collection of authors who have disapproved them, and Mr Arnauld's judgment of that collection. ibid.
- Translators* often assume a right which they have not. I. 77. a. Some times sow dissension, when they least think of it. 205. a. A rule which they ought to follow. 510. a. They ought never to paraphrase, nor depart in the least from their original, without being thoroughly acquainted with the matter in question. II. 43. b. Are generally the Panegyrist of the authors whom they translate. 590. Cannot well be trusted. IV. 169. a. b. How liable they are to commit great blunders. V. 384. b. Their mistakes. 820.
- Translations*, how difficult it is to manage them well. IV. 619. b.
- Transubstantiation*, John Poinet admits that word, but so as not to include Oral Manducation. IV. 693. b. Those who maintain it, confound the notion of things, and the signification of words. V. 219. a. b. 220. a. b.
- Trappe* (Abbot de la) his prodigious progress in the study of the Greek Poets. I. 299. a. b.
- Travellers*: what a traveller answered to those who made a jest of his unsettled temper: and the answer that was made to another traveller. I. 540. a. Their relations ordinarily shew us what is their prevailing taste, whether they are Antiquaries, Physicians, Geographers, &c. III. 342. b.
- Travelling*, the bad effects of it complained of. III. 345. b. Condemned by Joseph Hall, Lausius, &c.

Approved

- Approved of by Lipsius, who gives good instructions concerning it. ibid.
- Treacle*, who invented it. I. 334. and a. b. 335.
- Treaties of Peace*, it is their fate to be found fault with. III. 420. b. The ancient Romans made no great scruple to violate them. 583. b. 584. a.
- Trebatius* treacherously put to death at Smyrna II. 680. b.
- Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil*, what the prohibition to eat of it signified. II. 856. a.
- Trees*: an extraordinary tree planted by Abraham. I. 46. a. b. The great age of certain trees. 281. b. The Gentiles had a religious veneration for such as they believed to be very ancient. III. 349. b.
- Trent* (the council of) they were willing to conclude it by acclamations. III. 870. b. 871. a. See Council of Trent.
- Treflon* incensed against the Duke of Alba, and for what reason. IV. 453. and n. (b).
- Treus* (Servilius) a Venetian Lawyer, excelled both in business and learning. II. 314. a. b.
- Trexenians* eat their fruits too green, that oracle explained. III. 965. b.
- Tribes*: one of the tribes of Athens was named Acamantis. I. 53. and b. Another of them bore the name of Ajax. 161. b.
- Tribunals* favourable to fornication. I. 222. a. b. 223. a. b. In all sorts of tribunals men of honour decline sitting as judges, from the moment that they are excepted against. 489. b. The people generally presume in favour of tribunals. 610. b. A tribunal which was called the Rock of the Accused. II. 245. and a.
- Tribunes* of the people, the ordinances made at their request, were not properly called laws but Plébiscita. III. 490. a.
- Tribunship* of the people, an employment peculiar to Plebeian families. I. 356. a. b.
- Tribunitian Power*, a name given by Augustus to the supreme authority. II. 718. a.
- Tribute*, it sometimes has the specious name of a pension. I. 541. a. b.
- Triceffus* (John) a man of learning and quality, clandestinely sows the seeds of the Reformation at Cracow. III. 147.
- Trifles*: a person ought neither to dwell upon them, nor return to them: they should be the amusements of youth. I. 64. a.
- Trifling particulars* do not want their use. II. 309. a. b. Are inseparable from criticism. 773. a.
- Trimouille*, the pretensions of that house to the kingdom of Naples. IV. 313. b. 314. a. b.
- Trinity*, most people are not satisfied with words upon that mystery. I. 29. a. The doctrine of the Trinity compared to the three propositions of a Syllogism. ibid. b. And to the three dimensions of matter. ibid. According to some authors Aristotle was not ignorant of it. 471. a. What was the belief of the Fathers of the three first centuries concerning it. 477. a. b. A collection of passages, which shew that the ancient Jewish Church believed it. IV. 880. a. The Spinozists will perhaps have recourse to that doctrine, in order to save their hypothesis. V. 223. a. b. What it was that opened a door in Poland for the overthrow of this mystery. 228. b. 229. a. b. The subtleties of the schoolmen on this head. 819, 820, 821. Some Protestant Divines could wish that the whole doctrine of it had been expressed in five or six lines. 819. A strong invective of the Abbot Faydit on this subject, against the explications of the schoolmen. 820. and n. (30). There is no subject that has been more perplexed by the Spanish schoolmen. 820. The answer of the lesser Catechism of the Reformed Churches on this subject. 826.
- Tripoli* besieged and taken by the Turks. I. 406.
- Triflan* falls into two gross mistakes in a passage of Lampridius touching the Emperor Hadrian. III. 318. b. His mistake, with respect to Julia, wife of Septimius Severus. 603. a. b. Censured by Perizonius, for what he says of Marcellus's mother. IV. 397. a. b.
- Trihemius* (Abbot) his catalogue. III. 559. b. 560. a. Convicted of a falsehood with respect to Platina and his imprisonment. IV. 685. b.
- Triumph*: who was the first stranger honoured with a triumph at Rome. I. 611. b. A taste different from that of an ancient Father, who wished he had seen a triumph at Rome. III. 646. a.
- Triumph* (Naval) who was the first Roman that had it decreed to him. II. 726.
- Triumvirate* dispossessed of their lands, those who had cultivated them. I. 319. a.
- Triumvirate* mentioned in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, of whom it was made up. III. 269. a. b.
- Triumviri* condemn 1400 Roman Ladies to declare what estates they possessed. III. 489. and a.
- Triunclio* causes a passage to be made through a mountain for the introduction of the French army into Italy. III. 98. a. b.
- Troy*: all the misfortunes of the war of Troy were occasioned by women. II. 481. b.
- Trojans*, how they treated the daughters of the Locrians. II. 340. a. b. 341. a. b.
- Trophy*, religion forbade the violation of it. I. 525. b.
- Truchses* (Gebhard) Elector of Cologne, under what name the Spaniards are employed against him. II. 224. b. His complaints on that head. ibid. Waramund writes in his defence, and Gonzalez Pontius de Leon confutes him. III. 774.
- True*: what appears true to us to day, may not appear so at another time. IV. 188. b.
- Truguis* (the President) obliges Guichenon to insert in his works whatever he pleases. III. 275. b.
- Truth*, is centered in an impenetrable abyss. IV. 653. a. b. 654. a. Evidence cannot be the rule and measure of truth, or what they call its Criterion. ibid. b. V. 586. b. Whether it be not necessary to make outward profession of it in time of persecution. I. 663. a. b. There are truths against which the most prejudiced and the most passionate men will not dispute. 708. b. The depositaries of truth compared to the dogs of the Capitol. 773. b. Those truths, which are called maxims, no less clash with each other, than errors and truths. 784. b. They are two very different things, to love truth in itself, and to love the party which one takes for the true one. II. 24. a. b. It avails little that there should be such a thing, if we have no rule to distinguish it from falsehood. 327. a. b. Whether it ought to be suppressed. 451. b. We lose it by disputing too much. 485. b. It does not need to be supported by ill means. III. 55. a. b. There are some who preserve it as they do a piece of China-ware. 902. b. The soul is more strongly fastened to it by the weight of the passions than by the charms of light. IV. 188. b. Whether we ought to own disadvantageous truths. V. 824. 825.
- Truths* (Evangelical) it is essential to them not to be squared by the rules of Philosophy. V. 815.
- Truths* (Historical) are not less impenetrable than Physical ones, on many occasions. II. 543. b. Who were called the three pillars of truth in Spain. IV. 723. a. The suppression of a truth is a real lie, when it is done with an intention to deceive him who asks a question. V. 51. b. 52. a.
- Tudensis* (Benjamin) makes David the co-temporary of Romulus. IV. 763. b.
- Tudisque*, the signification of that word, according to Menage and Bouhours. V. 540. a. n. (2), (3).
- Tullius* (Servius) what was the preface of his rise to the kingly dignity. V. 288. a.
- Tunic* of JESUS CHRIST, Bajazet boasted that he had it. V. 469. a. b. 470. a. b.
- Turenne* (the Marshal de) is fond of re-uniting both religions. I. 705. b. The gentlemen of Port-Royal are very busy to make him change his religion. II. 518. a. b. He did not pretend to learning. 520. b. The impertinence of a country squire in speaking of that great Captain. 774. a. On what occasion his gallantries were talked of. III. 265. b. 266. a. His meals reckoned too short. V. 35. b. Killed. IV. 211. b. Macaron composes his funeral oration. 172. Beaten at Mariendal. 917. b. Puts Colonel Rosen under guard. ibid.
- Turenne* (Madam de) her character. IV. 331. b.
- Turin*, by whom and when its citadel was built. IV. 453. b.
- Turk*, that word strikes the common people more than the word Ottoman; Jurieu's artifice in the use he makes of these words. V. 803.
- Turks* cannot forbear laughing, when they see the image of St George in the Christian Churches. II. 466.

II. 466. Very much in conceit with their own language. 517. b. Are not so destitute of books as people imagine. III. 171. a. b. Some of them believe the transmigration of souls. 341. b. They introduce the ministry of religion into the design of making conquests. 586. a. Their defeat. 682. b. 683. a. They are defeated at the passage of Raab. 793. b. Have a greater aversion to the Jews, than to any people in the world. IV. 40. a. Several among them pull out their eyes, after having seen Mecca. ibid. b. Have a great veneration for a camel. ibid. Who was the first of their Emperors, to whom the western nations gave the title of Grand-Seignior. 49. a. Who are those called among them the sons of the Holy Ghost. 346. They have no sort of moderation in their passions, with respect to their Princes. 425. a. Sacrifice to the reigning Prince, the life or the liberty of all his brothers. 558. a. When and for what reason they solemnly curse the Christians. V. 390. b. Conceive a jealousy against Falkreddin, and put him to death. III. 3.

Turn: the turn which sometimes popular injustice gives to things. V. 188. b.

Turnebus, in what superior to Bodin. II. 44. b. Makes a speech against an Atheist. IV. 845. b.

Turraus (Peter) Regent at Dijon, tried for a conjurer, but defended by Castellani, and absolved by the Judges. II. 368. a.

Tzarlus, the family name of Tilli. V. 356, 357.

Tutus is too modern an author to deserve to be followed in a matter of fact, which can neither be reconciled with Homer, nor with the ancient authors. I. 79. b.

V.

V*acuum*: a Vacuum, and the Hypothesis of atoms, admitted by some Philosophers in the East. III. 792. a. b. Gets the start of Des Cartes's doctrine by degrees. ibid. b. Those who demonstrate a vacuum, do a pleasure to the Sceptics. 793. a. b. Reasons against the existence of a vacuum. V. 615. b. 616. a. b. 617. a. b.

Vayer (la Mothe le) cited upon the Pagan Oracles. I. 132. b. n. (3). Censured for what he says of Socrates and Alcibiades. 131. b. He commits several faults, in speaking of Stratonice and Comababus. II. 535. a. b. His answer to Garasse's invectives against two Philosophers. 667. b. 668. a. Censured with respect to Augustus's successor. III. 816. a. He translates ill a passage of Quintilian touching the contempt which Alexander had for a man of extraordinary skill. IV. 9. b. 10. a. Blunders in explaining a passage of Homer concerning Ulysses and Penelope. 540. a. b. Is mistaken with respect to Pyrrho. 658. b. His blunders in speaking of Tacitus, and his Anachronism with respect to Thucydides and Demosthenes. V. 282. b. He makes a strange clamour against Alciatus and Ferret, for what they say of Tacitus's Latin. ibid. 283. a. b.

Vair (du) one of the decrees pronounced by that president. IV. 747. a. What he quotes from St Jerome. 799. a. b.

Val (du) the Physician, sent to the galleys, and for what reason. III. 954. b.

Valdagna (Joseph) a Physician in Brescia, is driven from thence, together with his defender Donzellinus. II. 689.

Valenciennes taken by assault the eighth day of the siege, but not by treachery. IV. 211. a.

Valentina of Milan suspected of practising against peoples lives by poison. II. 205. a.

Valentinian, (Emperor) although a very chaste man, composes a most lascivious Poem. I. 583. b. 584. a. b.

Valentinois (the Duke of) orders the hand and the end of the tongue of a man, who had spoken ill of him, to be cut off. IV. 89. b. Causes Lorenzo to be thrown into the Tiber. 90. b. Orders the tongue of Jerome Mancionus to be cut out. ibid.

Valera (Cyprian de) his Spanish translation of Calvin's institution. II. 262. b. n. (39).

VOL. V. No. CXLVIII.

Valery: how the estate of Valery came into the family of the Princes of Condé. III. 832. a.

Valerian, Emperor, durst not put his son under the direction of Aurelian. I. 570. b.

Valerius (Marcus) why surnamed Corvinus. II. 290. b. n. (6).

Valerius Maximus, we find a thought of his in a satire against the French Academy. I. 59. a. He is far from being an exact compiler. II. 343. a. b. Speaks too negligently of the temple of the earth. 344. b. Cannot be excused for what he says of the riches of Democritus's father. 635. a. Has taken Diagoras for Protagoras. 652. b. His mistake concerning Aristophanes. IV. 577. b. What he does to improve a jingle of Antitheses and Parallels for his purpose. V. 569. b. 570. a.

Valfiana quoted. III. 569. a. b. n. (29). 740. b. n. (44). IV. 246. a. n. (4). Et passim alibi.

Valerius (Henricus) censured. I. 100. b. His defence of Herodotus, who had attributed to God a jealous humour. IV. 576. a. b. His character. V. 805.

Valette (the Duke de la) condemned to lose his head, and for what reason. III. 59. b.

Valiere (Madam de la) what family she was of. V. 390. a.

Valla (George) his translation of Nemefius's book de Natura Hominis, treated with the utmost contempt by Nicæus Eliebodius. IV. 345. b. 346. a.

Valla (Laurentius) to be commended for his modesty. II. 432. b. A story that was applied to him. IV. 600. b. An ill-natured jest that was made upon him after his death. V. 434. a. b.

Vallier (St) what family he was of. IV. 694. a. Where and by what means he received his pardon, after being condemned to lose his head. ibid. a. b. His punishment of death changed into a perpetual imprisonment. 700. a. b.

Valois (Prince Charles de) is prevailed upon by the Pope to compose the confusions of Florence. II. 296. a.

Valour: the extraordinary valour of a young gentleman fighting against the Saracens. II. 136. a. b.

Van Dale, his answer to an objection. I. 281. b. He supplies the author with some remarks. IV. 424. b. V. 536. a.

Vasini, what he would have to be done in great cities. II. 627. b. A professed Atheist. V. 813.

Vanity: the foolish vanity of men, with respect to providence. I. 24. a. In what the vanity of human occupations chiefly consists. II. 671. a. b. It does but too much prevail among the most pious persons. IV. 331. b. How many crimes it is the cause of. 684. b. A vanity that bought flattery by a testamentary legacy. V. 566. a.

Vanity of Sciences, a book which gave great offence to many. I. 153. a. b. 154. a.

Vannucci says that the Italian writers should not discover their mother's nakedness. III. 273. b.

Vardes, Governour of la Cappelie, condemned to death for contempt of the court, and afterwards declared innocent. III. 263. a.

Vardes (the Marquis de) disgraced by reason of some intrigues mentioned in a book. III. 263. a.

Variations, the History of the Xth century is quite full of them. IV. 429. b.

Varillas censured for his paraphrase on a passage of Paul Jovius. I. 57. b. Commits several remarkable blunders in speaking of Agricola. 144. a. b. And about the learned men whom he has mentioned in his Anecdotes of Florence. 201. b. What he says there concerning the book de Gloria, is inconsistent with what he has said of it in the life of Lewis XI. 202. b. 203. a. b. He has translated ill a passage of Jovius. ibid. Quoted. 403. a. b. n. (4), (5), (6), (7). 404. a. n. (9). 405. b. n. (18). III. 151. a. b. n. (2), (4), (5). Et passim alibi. His moderation commended, and the liberty taken by the author of the second edition of the Menagiana, censured. I. 586. b. 587. a. He is censured for several mistakes, with respect to Calvin. II. 62. a. b. And to Luther. 75. b. 76. a. In the public confession which he makes of a fault, he commits several others. 137. a. b. Censured for a mistake both in a point of fact and in a point of right. 184. b. 185. a. His errors touching one of Calvin's books. 260. a. b. They are so enormous, that they are enough to make one renounce the study of History. ibid.

11 T

- ibid.* a. He advances things that do not deserve to be confuted. 266. b. Had not the courage to publish his sentiments of a story published against Calvin. 267. b. A passage of his concerning the life of that Reformer, wrote by Papirius Masso, examined. 268. b. 269. a. His manner of reading the books which he consulted, must be unaccountable. ibid. His dispute with Dr Burnet about Camden's History, examined. 283. b. 284. a. He is censured for two faults, which he commits in speaking of Castellan, and the Assembly of Melun. 375. b. 376. a. b. Reflexions on his account of the Calvinism of the Ducheſs of Eſtampes. 843. a. His mistakes touching the motive from which that lady's husband caused a juridical enquiry to be made against her. 844. a. b. He is censured with respect to Calvin's going to see the Ducheſs of Ferrara. III. 28. b. 29. a. b. And with respect to the motives which engaged that Princess to renounce Popery. ibid. b. Commits several faults in speaking of Mademoiselle de Rohan, and the Duke of Nemours. 142. a. b. 143. a. b. He did not know all those who have wrote the conspiracy of the Count of Fiesque. 196. b. Makes a curious observation upon the massacre of Goudimel, whom he improperly calls Claudin. 197. and b. 198. a. Maintains against the Spanish Historians, that Charles V was not ignorant of the Latin tongue. 323. b. Censured with respect to the correspondence which Henry II, while he was Dauphin, kept up with the Constable of Montmorency. 395. a. b. Is liable to censure, with respect to a certain speech which is said to have been pronounced by Pompey Colonna against the Popes. 614. a. b. Whence come all his different Hypotheses. 864. a. He would have no reason to complain that his History of Heresy had been taken for a romance. IV. 192. b. His Romantic flourishes on the story of Musurus. 293. b. 294. a. He takes one Alphonso for another, in the preface to his Anecdotes. 312. b. 313. a. He relates a very singular fact, tho' a little doubtful, touching Macrin. 19. a. b. Tells a great many falsties of Ochinus. 392. a. b. Did not know that a certain satire pointed at Henry IV. 482. b. Censured for what he says of Platina. 687. b. And of the reason why the Calvinists hated the Ducheſs of Valentinois. 696. b. He is fit to spoil a great many authors. 697. a. Does not spare the mother of Charles IX. 803. a. It is not easy to apprehend why he has struck the Count de Laval out of the house of Montmorency, after having once made him descend from it. 887. b. He has put in his History of Heresy a marginal note, which has been a snare to some learned men. 920. b. Is criticized with respect to Charles IX, and the cause of his death. V. 392. b. 393. a. Loves to say what is not to be found in common Histories. 748. Did not publish all that people had seen in his manuscripts, and why. IV. 712. a.
- Varietum*: the editors of books, cum Notis Variorum, should never leave out the Epistles Dedicatory, and the Prefaces. I. 225. b.
- Varro*, what he said of the nuptials of virgins, and of the nuptials of widows. IV. 192. b. Nigidius was reckoned not inferior to him. IV. 368. a. Stories that are attributed to him. 370. a.
- Varus*, the Tragic Poet, recites, for his own performance, a Tragedy composed by another. V. 485. a. n. (13).
- Vass*, to whom the massacre, that was made of the Huguenots there, ought to be imputed. III. 287. b. 288. a.
- Kaffer* (le) what he relates, concerning the Duke of Orleans, Francis the first's second son. III. 96. a. b.
- Vatican*, its thunders highly contemned. II. 378. b. 379. a. Who was the founder of the Vatican Library. V. 545. b.
- Vocatſſeur* (Father) the oversight that author falls into in his treatise of the burlesque stile. I. 350. a. b. He knew authors who would rather have lost the greatest advantages, than have given up the praise which they thought they had merited by their romances. III. 379. b. His reasons against the liberty of inserting obscenities in an epigram. V. 839. n. (15).
- Vauban* (Mr de) employs his whole skill in fortifying Landau. III. 718.
- Vaudis*, the History of their Churches by Peter Gilles. III. 161, 162. Translated by Guichenon. 275. b. Send Yfe into England. 597. Teased by Possievin, and persecuted by Calrocaro. 757. and a. b. 758. and a. b. Persecuted by Marco Aurelio Rorencio. IV. 916. a. b. Calumniated by Samuel de Cassini. ibid. b. And defended by the Sieur Valerius Gros. 917. b. Sums of money raised for them. III. 595. b. 596. a.
- Vangelas*, his excellent advice, with respect to the French language. II. 775. b. Who was the Vangelas of the Latin tongue. III. 319. b.
- Vautier* proposes the erecting a place of Court-Astrologer. IV. 260. b. n. (26).
- Uberti* (Farinata de gli) lodged in the shades by Dante. II. 399. b. Guido Cavalcante married his daughter. ibid.
- Ubiquity*, who were the first authors of that doctrine. IV. 288. a. b. V. 549. b. The troubles which it occasioned in Germany. III. 391. a. b.
- Ugalric*, his letter deserves to be rejected. III. 225. a. b.
- Vedelius* (Nicolas) confutes Elias Schiller, and does it in eleven days. V. 81. and b.
- Venator*, the description he makes of Divines. III. 250. b. 251. a.
- Vendôme* (Geoffrey, Abbot of) whether it be true that he put Robert d'Arbrissel in mind of his faulty conduct, with respect to women. III. 63. a. b. 66. b. 67. a.
- Vendôme* (the Duke of) Henry IV designs him for his successor. III. 184. a.
- Venitians* order their Ambassadors to make very advantageous offers to the Emperor Maximilian. III. 274. a. Several States confederate to humble them. 811. and a. b. &c. They repulse the Emperor Maximilian, who had besieged Padua. IV. 293. a. Being animated to wage war with the Turks, they hinder the peace which the Emperor was desirous of concluding with the Porte. 430. It is not the custom of their nobles to have private mistresses. 775. a. b. Complained of being ill used by Capriata in his History. II. 311. b. How he justified himself in that point. ibid. Digby takes several prizes from them, and beats their fleet near Scanderon. 664.
- Vengeance*, that of men is oftentimes more dreaded than the vengeance of God. I. 435. b. 436. a.
- Venice*: why the Senate of Venice is pleased with the irregularities of the clergy. I. 30. b. That Senate is offended, because Pope Innocent VIII, bestowed the Patriarchate of Aquileia, without consulting them. 634. The laws of that Republic forbid all her ministers at Rome to accept any benefice. ibid. Its Senate inflexible on that head. ibid. The Republic of Venice disputes the precedence with the Duke of Savoy. III. 216. Its Ambassador burns, before Henry IV, all the papers in which he owed himself indebted to that Republic. 317. b. 318. a. Its Ambassadors arrive in Holland, to congratulate King William. IV. 505. a. n. (77).
- Venus* rising out of the sea, painted upon the model of one of Alexander's mistresses. I. 368. b. Augustus remits the inhabitants of Cooe an hundred talents, which they were indebted to him, for the purchase of that picture. 369. a. A doubt concerning the said Venus. ibid. Fault found with the temple of Venus built by Hadrian. 377. a. She had a temple on mount Libanus. II. 4. b. How people were initiated in her mysteries. 507. a. b. What the Fathers said of the Venus that was adored in Cyprus. ibid. The Paphian Venus, when, and for what reason her priesthood began to be in the hands of a Prince of the blood. 507. Her vengeance against Diomedes and Clio. 742. b. A continual miracle performed in one of her temples. 746. b. Incroaches more upon Bacchus in the North, than Bacchus does upon Venus in the South. 823. a. b. Bacchus does upon Venus in the South. 823. a. b. Venus Mignonitis, where, and by whom, a temple was built to her. III. 368. b. 369. a. The original of the pretended Divinity of Venus. 375. b. She obtained the golden apple. 644. a. b. 645. a. There was a Venus surnamed Melanitis. 700. a. b. Venus was the best served of all the Pagan deities. 701. b. The temple of Venus Homicide, what it was. 702. a. Venus Urania, her temple plundered by some Scythians. IV. 790. What is the proper way to mortify her. V. 98. b. 99. a. b. A sacrifice which the Roman ladies offered to her. 130. a. b. An

- An honour which was done to her, that she might put a stop to lewdness. 268. a. b.
- Vercel*, the capitulation of that town faithfully observed. V. 504.
- Vercoid* (Dulcineus of) an impious Fanatic. III. 281. b.
- Vercingetorix* comes to the relief of Alexia with 300000 men. II. 413. a. Defeated by Cæsar. ibid. A fine observation which Plutarch makes on that defeat. ibid.
- Verdier* (Antony du) Sieur de Vau-Privas, censured for his negligence, with respect to the Acts of the Apostles, wrote in French rhyme, and fitted for the stage. II. 478, 479, 480.
- Verdier* (Claudius du) Censor-General, is angry with Lycophron, for what he says of Penelope. IV. 542. b.
- Vere*, a Lordship in Zealand, vulgarly called Ter-Veer. I. 781. a. II. 90. a.
- Verger*: See the article VERGERIUS (Angulus).
- Vergerius* (Peter-Paul) challenges an Apostolic Nuncio, to a public dispute. III. 840. b. The reason why it was declared to him, he could not take his place in the Council of Trent. V. 454. b. His abridgment of the Anatomy of the Mals. 455. b. 456. a. His book against the proclaiming of the Council. ibid. His books quickly lost their credit. 457. a. They very much galled the Court of Rome. 456. b. A book is dedicated to him, to congratulate him for having abandoned the party of Antichrist. II. 749.
- Vernias* (Nicoletus) Professor of Philosophy at Padua, his dangerous opinions. IV. 377. He maintained the opinion of Averrhoës, on the unity of the Intellect. ibid. b.
- Veron*, a Missionary, according to Rivet, was ignorant both in Greek and in Hebrew. II. 40. b.
- Verfus*: amorous verses, and well sung, have a great efficacy in touching the hearts of women. I. 27. b. Verses upon the loss of a battle, which offended the victor as well as the vanquished. 191. To be fond of verses, is not enough to make a man a Poet. 375. b. Amorous verses thrown into the fire. 560. b. Ecclesiastics who have wrote such verses. 630. b. It does not follow that a man who writes such is a Pagan. 584. a. b. A wonderful facility in making verses. 664. b. 665. a. III. 573. a. b. Ephorus writes a verse in the same place, where he condemns the cadence and numbers of discourse. II. 772. b. The recital of some verses inspired conquerors with humanity. 866. b. 867. a. Hexameter verses were not used in Tragedies. IV. 596. b. The same verses wrote by several Poets. 822. a. b. Verses composed at four livres a hundred, and others at forty pence. 873. b. Profane and leud verses, rewarded with church-benefices. 896. a. b. Making verses which we can read to no body, and walking in the dark, is the very same thing. 450, 451. Who first begun to comment on the verses of another composed in the vulgar tongue. II. 398. b.
- Verses for Interludes*, Benéfede was an original in that kind. I. 752. b.
- Verseans*, there are authors who only consult them. I. 205. a.
- Vernus* (Ælius) Emperor, what were the books he read most. III. 260. a.
- Vesalius* (Andrew) Borganutius finds the manuscript of his Great Surgery, and publishes it. II. 83. and b.
- Vespasian*, Orators were pretty well paid in his time. I. 196. a.
- Vessels*: some fine vessels of earthen ware broke, and for what reason. II. 558. b.
- Vestal Virgins* condemned for Incest. II. 345. b. A noble piece of History on that subject, lost. ibid. It was the custom of the High Priests, to appoint certain ladies to take care of the vestal virgins, that were obliged by sickness to leave their convent. III. 5. b. It is surprizing that they should ever have fallen into incontinence. 830. b.
- Ugbelli* (Abbot) takes the chronicle of Martin Polonus from him, and gives it to one Martin, a Monk of the order of Cîteaux. IV. 708. b.
- Vial of Rheims*, Paul Emilius has said nothing of it. II. 763, 764. and a.
- Vic* (Mr de) his turn of mind. II. 817. a.
- Vicinitus*, the meaning of that word. III. 777.
- Vices*, there is a less affinity between them than people commonly imagine. I. 232. b. II. 719. a. The benefits which arise from them do not hinder their being in their own nature evil. I. 159. b. IV. 188. b. Some prevail in all countries, religions, and ages. I. 561. a. There are some which are vices of the climate, and not vices of religion. II. 820. a. b. Whether, without vice, there could not be such a thing as virtue. IV. 519. a. b. 520. a. b. 521. a. b. Whether vice is always punished with adversity in this world. V. 11. a. b.
- Vicissitude of human affairs*, how surprizing it is. III. 547. b.
- Vico* (the Marquis del) causes the Anatomy of the Mals to be translated from Italian into French. V. 461. a. b.
- Vidimus* (human) were acceptable to the gods. III. 651. b. See Sacrifices.
- Victoria*, or Victorina, called in her armies the mother of the camp. III. 531. a.
- Victories*, few of them can by their consequences decide the disputes of Gazetteers. II. 413. a. Many obtain victories, but few know how to make a good use of them. 414. a. b. IV. 3. a.
- Vidal* (Mr du) complains of the oppression which the Protestants suffer in the Palatinate, &c. II. 125. b. n. (34).
- Vienne*: a Bishop of Vienna changes his maxims, on his becoming a Minister of State. IV. 13. b.
- Vignere* (Blaise de) translates and comments on Cæsar's Commentaries. I. 631. Mistakes the meaning of a passage in Martial. 18. b. And of another in Plutarch. 75. b. A curious passage of his concerning an enterprise of the Amazons. 85. b. 86. a.
- Vignol Marville* quoted. III. 145. and a. b. n. (15). Et passim alibi. What he tells us of a certain Philosopher. IV. 913. b. Judges too harshly of La Mothe le Vayer's works. V. 427. b. 428. a. b.
- Vignier* (Nicolas) not to be excused for a fast he relates concerning Francisca. III. 99. b. Confounders Radulphus Flaviacensis with Ralph Higden. IV. 824. a. Censured on that head. ibid. a. b.
- Villars* (Francis de Boyvin Baron de) his maxim, that they break the peace, not who first make war, but who arm privately, and use secret practices in prejudice of treaties and alliances. II. 104. a. b.
- Villars* (Abbot de), see Gabalii.
- Villaviciensis* accused of plagiarism. III. 456. b.
- Villagaignon*, his character. IV. 870. a. He puts three Protestants to death. V. 477. a.
- Villena* (Henry de), a story that goes in Spain relating to that Marquis. V. 480. a. b.
- Villanus* (the Marquis de) pretended to Astrology. IV. 263. a.
- Villeroi* (the Marquis de) obliges the governour of La Motte to capitulate, and the Queen-Mother does not observe the capitulation. IV. 278.
- Villeroi* (the Marshal de) prisoner in the castle of Ambres. II. 97. b.
- Villiers* (Peter de), Chaplain to William I, Prince of Orange, reckoned the author of the apology for that Prince, and of a letter against the book of Concord. III. 392. a. b. Gerard de Renesse reprints the said letter with notes. 391. b.
- Villon* posts up theses against Aristotle's doctrine. IV. 262. a.
- Vincent*, Minister of Rochelle, his reflexion upon a comedy. IV. 324. b. 325. a. n. (13). V. 82. b.
- Vindingius*, a fault of his adopted by the author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres. I. 657. b.
- Vinnius* (Arnold) writes notes on Peckius's Commentary ad tir. d. Nautæ, &c. IV. 528. a. b.
- Violence*: in what case violence should be used towards people. IV. 526. a. b.
- Vires* (Peter), the method he made use of in attacking Popery. V. 482. a. b. He turned his arms likewise against Deism. ibid. b. 483. a.
- Virgil* has taken one of Homer's episodes for a model. I. 80. b. No Poet, before him, ever said what he says concerning the dead body of Hector. 81. a. A precept of his applied to old authors. 120. a. b. He gave orders to burn the Æneid. 375. a. b. Is criticized and defended, with respect to the word illaudatus. II. 234. a. b. Cento's have been made of him. 298. and a. What sect of Philosophers he was of, and who was his master. 390. a. A design

- design to justify him at any rate. III. 127. a. It was pretended that some of his words had the power of driving out devils. 890. b. 891. a. A supplement to his Aeneid. V. 446. b. Malatesta causes his statue to be thrown down. 451. a. b. The honour which the Roman people did him one day. 487. a. Parthenius taught him Greek. IV. 483. a.
- Virgil* (Polydore) his book de Inventoribus Rerum contains several things which the Inquisition disliked. V. 495. a. b.
- Virgin*, the Antients used that word in a more general sense than we do. II. 140. b. The Turks call certain persons, born of a virgin-mother, the sons of the Holy Ghost. IV. 346.
- Virgin* (the blessed) the Monks are not her only indiscreet votaries. I. 36. A book full of visions concerning her. 136. a. Whence it comes that no one has yet said that she governs the world alone. 137. a. b. To what danger they expose themselves, who disapprove the errors that magnify her honours. 138. a. b. Her epithet of Mother of God leads one to troublesome consequences. ibid. and IV. 356. b. One is sometimes more speedily saved by invoking her name, than by invoking that of JESUS CHRIST. I. 198. a. The expressions of her indiscreet votaries condemned by Bellarmine. 728. b. She is put as a fourth person of the Godhead. II. 85. and a. b. Had a penetrative chastity. 108. b. Of what efficacy the prayers are, which are addressed to her, the first of April, at eight in the morning. 316. a. Her immaculate conception received as an article of faith, by the Faculty of Divinity at Paris. IV. 77. b. 78. a. 366. b. 367. a. b. Drawn after the model of women, such as pleased the Painters. II. 729. a. b. III. 57. b. How much people are puzzled to defend her worship. 84. b. Whether she wrote a letter to the inhabitants of Messina. 563. a. And to St Ignatius. ibid. A book wherein Orisons are addressed to all the parts of her body. 569. a. Idle traditions concerning her father and mother. 570. and a. b. 571. and a. b. 572. and a. b. Whence proceed the extravagant honours which so many Christians pay to her. 636. a. A contract made in her favour, by Lewis XI, King of France. 808. a. b. Whether exemption from Original Sin be comprehended in the quality of the Mother of God. 931. a. From what motive the Jesuits teach her immaculate conception. ibid. The Protestants enter themselves into one of her fraternities. IV. 121. a. The abuses that have been committed, with respect to her, were equally to be feared, whether she was called the Mother of JESUS CHRIST, or the Mother of God. 347. a. b. 352. b. 353. a. Conjectures upon the causes of the progress of her worship. 354. a. b. 355. a. b. People are obliged to her for all the benefits they receive, and not to God. 354. b. 355. a. b. What Clemens Alexandrinus says of her. 805. a. She has not been able to escape calumny. V. 84. a. It is not probable, according to Mr Patin, that St Luke drew so many pictures of her as he is said to have done. 156. b. Stiled Generalissima, and by whom. 679. How the Fathers of the Church proved her virginity. 772. b.
- Virginity*, whether the loss of it makes any alteration in the outside. II. 636. a. b. A Bishop that was fain to explore the virginity of certain Nuns by squeezing their dugs. III. 344. b. 345. a.
- Virtue*, a good reputation is not always the consequence of it. I. 279. b. Virtue and vice are sometimes in alliance. 413. b. A distinguished virtue never fails to raise envy. 460. a. The candor of an Athenian in owning this. ibid. It must be acquired by the sweat of our brows. 573. a. Whether it be no more than an empty name: the complaint of Brutus examined. II. 164. a. b. 165. a. V. 9. b. 10. a. b. 11. a. b. One of the greatest victories which it can obtain over nature. II. 269. b. Cannot be without a conflict. III. 620. 889. a. It is sometimes easier to have the reality than the appearance of it. I. 279. a. b. III. 602. b. There is no virtue but what proceeds from a victory disputed with the passions. 889. a. It is discouraging virtue, to rob it of its temporal recompence. 814. a. Its bad consequences on some occasions. IV. 188. b. Who are those who maintain, that virtue ought to be followed by reason of its excellency. V. 204. b.
- Virtuous*; it signifies nothing for a man to be virtuous, if he is not master of a noisy blustering eloquence. I. 459. a. b.
- Vision*: a vision may occasion a mortal distemper. II. 715. b. 716. a.
- Vision ratified*, what is meant by it. II. 113. b.
- Visionaries* (les) a dramatic piece, who is the author of it. IV. 114.
- Visionaries*, the chimerical notions of a visionary. II. 84. b. 85. a. Visionaries and interpreters of prophecies are very often impostors and incendiaries. 143. and a. b. Their true character. 538. a. b. They will always be well received, provided they have cunning enough to accommodate themselves to the passions of the times. 693. Are never at a loss. 692. a. Our age seems to be more terrible to them than the preceding ones. III. 691. a. What lengths they carry their knavery or folly. ibid. b. And their extravagance. 692. b.
- Visits* are an incumbrance to learned men. I. 626. b.
- Vitellius* foresaw the advancement of those whom fortune had a mind to favour. IV. 397. b. 398. a. Gains the battle against Otho. V. 261. and b.
- Vitex*, what name it has at present. V. 334. a.
- Vitruvius*, his sepulchre found near Formium. IV. 311. a. Particulars concerning his book. V. 269. a. b. 270. a. b.
- Vives* (Ludovicus) what he says of the false zeal of the Legendaries. III. 708. b. His Institution of a Christian woman translated into French by Peter de Changy. II. 434. and 435. a. b. Translated also by Lewis Turquet. ibid. b. The reason he gives why Leontium wrote a book against Theophrastus. III. 779. The translation of his work de Famina Christiana is defective. ibid. b.
- Ulysses*, what punishment he inflicted on Penelope's maids. IV. 542. b. 543. a.
- Ulm* surprized and taken by the Elector of Bavaria. III. 719. b. It is said that Spinoza lived there, and there begun his Traictatus Theologico-Politicus. V. 225. and n. (c).
- Ulmus* (Marc-Antony) author of a treatise de Barba humana, quoted. III. 81. b. n. (21).
- Unbelievers* are not always induced to unbelief by the motives of self-love. II. 350. Perhaps there never were so many as in the XVIIth and XVIIIth centuries. III. 267. a. See Libertines.
- Uneartheness*, a passage of St Evremond on that subject. V. 585. b. A criminal remedy that is often made use of to remove it. 584. a.
- Unheard*: no man ought to be condemned unheard. I. 757. b.
- Unitarians* excluded out of the amnesty granted to others that were not Catholics, in Poland. III. 901. The history of their establishment, growth, and destruction in Poland. V. 168. a. b. 169. a. b. & seq. The different attempts which they made to settle in Holland. 173. b. 174. a. b. 175. a. b.
- Unitarians*, in what sense the author takes that word. V. 825. and n. (67). Their system preferable to that of the Dualists. ibid.
- Univcrsalia*, the danger there is in denying the reality of them. V. 542. a.
- University of Paris*, the History of it. II. 106. a. Verloris pleads for the Jesuits, in the trial they had with that university, and gains the cause. V. 464. and b. n. 1.
- University of Leyden* revives the degree of Doctor. I. 239. Pronounces a judgment worthy to be taken notice of. 242. b. A reflexion upon that judgment. ibid. 243. a.
- University of Upsal*, Gustavus Adolphus's liberalities to it. V. 660.
- Universities*, the debauchery which prevailed in some. I. 247. a. b. Their interest should be preferred to that of the churches. 260. A good agreement there among the colleagues is a thing rarely to be met with. 261. A great many brag of a familiarity in the university with such or such an one, who is grown into reputation for his writings. II. 284. b. The greatest part of the quarrels which divide universities, are ridiculous. 697. a. There are very few verities, with which the Jesuits have not had some dispute. 700. b. n. (2). Luther turned the universities and their doctors into ridicule. III. 953. a. b. Complaints against the multitude of them. V. 229. b.
- Universities of England*, an encomium on them. V. 513. b.

Volunt.

INDEX.

139

- Vicius*, his disputes with Marefius. IV. 121. a. b.
 122. a. Quoted. 583. a. n. (3). 584. a. b. n. (7).
 (8). Et passim alibi.
Vogelfang confutes an explication of Wolzogue. IV.
 877. b. 878. a. b.
Vulture, it has been said of him, that he had a simple look, but nevertheless agreeable. II. 617. a. The great ease which appears in his works cost him no small pains. III. 262. a. What he writ to the Duke of Enguieu. 748. a. n. (2). What he would have done, if he himself had published his works.
 939. a. His friends threatened with military execution those who should dare to censure him. V.
 344. b. The liberty he takes in his Poems. 840.
a. (16). Charged with using obscene expressions.
 844. a.
Voices: a fine voice has a great influence upon the fair sex. I. 27. b. One of the finest in the world.
 662, 663. and a. b.
Volaterra, what he relates of Francisca, a Roman lady.
 III. 98. b. 99. a. The table of his book is not good. ibid. He roundly affirms that Savonarola was a cheat, etc. V. 60, 61.
Voluntarius, facts concerning his life. III. 958. a. b.
 959. a. b.
Voluptuous persons, it is a matter indifferent to them what way they obtain pleasure, provided that they do obtain it. IV. 30. b. 31. a. b. How they use their riches. 87. How they endeavour to justify themselves. V. 30. a. They may be brave and laborious. 271. a. b. etc.
Voragius (Jacobus de) whether he and Joannes de Janua are one and the same author. I. 614. and
a. b.
Vorsius (Conrad) gives an account of his faith before an assembly of the Faculty of Theology at Heidelberg. IV. 606. Causes Socinus's treatise de Anti- ritate S. Scripturae to be reprinted, with his notes.
 V. 180. b.
Vossius is very particular in his apology for the Abbe-rites. I. 18. b. 19. a. Censures Pliny. 82. a.
 His inattention. 57. a. 62. a. b. He refutes himself in writing against Corradus. 59. a. b. Commits a fault in censuring that of Sigismund Gele-nius. III. 711. Consults Grotius about an objection against one's changing his religion. IV. 375.
a. Censuring Quintilian, with respect to the questions that were put to Xenophon's wife, he is mistaken in his turn. 580. a. Complains of the great number of overights which he found in ancient and modern authors. 594. a. b. Is censured for a thing which Sandius has taken no notice of. 600. a. b.
 Censured for the liberty he takes in quotations.
 783. a. b. He follows Rhodomannus in what he says of Cointus, and commits the same mistakes.
 817. b. Very judiciously censures the perverse humour of Julius Cæsar Scaliger. II. 321. b. 322. a.
 Advances a conjecture touching Craterus, which is not probable. 563. a. b. For want of attention he falls into a mistake touching a passage of Lactan-tius. III. 55. b. Why he would not justify his father-in-law against the mistakes of Thuanus. 627.
b. 628. a. Quoted with respect to the severity of the Lutherans against the Flemish Church banished from London. V. 550. a. b. n. (24), (25), (26).
 Found fault with. II. 32. a. n. (6). 173. a. n.
 (10). 179. b. n. (72). IV. 713. and b. n. (69).
Vossius (Isaac), Francis Junius dies at his house. III.
 629.
Vows made at sea are too commonly forgot on shore.
 II. 83. a. An Italian proverb on that head.
ibid.
Vows (Monastical) are prejudicial to the state. II.
 174. b.
Ur, that word has given occasion to several fables. I.
 45. a.
Urban VI (Pope) is pleased with the news of Charles of Durazzo's death. IV. 305. a.
Urban VIII (Pope) writes verses in praise of Aldro-vandus. I. 213. b. Causes a Poet to die with grief by reproaching him for his impudence. III. 465.
a. b. Complains to the King of France of his alliance with the Swedes. 819. b.
Urſi (the Marquis d') censured by Astræa for exposing her quite naked to the eyes of Celadon. III. 866.
b. 867. a.
Urſiola (John-Baptist de), an instance of the singularity of his Latin orthography. III. 774. a. b.
 VOL. V.
- Urraca*, the eternal disgrace of Spain. V. 518. b. 519.
a. b. The French Ambassadors would not chuse for their master a Princess of that name. 519.
 520.
Useful: people prefer what is useful to justice and religion. I. 130. b. 131. a. 460. a. IV. 618.
 621. a. b. 622. a.
Usher, his mistake touching Lollia Paulina. II.
 256. b.
Usher, it is seldom seen that those who raise one to the throne, do long enjoy his favours. II. 737. a.
Utrecht, the French carry away a book out of its library. IV. 235. a.
Vulcan, upon what conditions he made a suit of armour for Achilles. I. 80. b. Is thrown headlong from heaven to earth. III. 751. a. b. What the vessel was which he made a present of to Pelops at his marriage. 373. b.
Vulgar: the vulgar suffer themselves to be easily imposed upon. II. 148. b.
Vulgare, its authority is not preferred to that of the originals. I. 246. The author of it commended by Lewis de Dieu. II. 663. b.
- W.
- Wafter*, at what time they left off making use of them in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper at Geneva. III. 343. a. n. (16).
Waggers, what is a good bait to draw them in. I.
 76. a.
Wagnus (Tobias) Chancellor of the University of Tübingen, writes against Hottinger's book about the Re-union. III. 526. b. 527. a.
Way (Milky) how formed. III. 637. b.
Wand, the cause of several fine discoveries. I. 4. b.
 5. a. A reflexion on its usefulness. 6. b. 7. a. Whether that of James Aymar lost its credit. ibid. b. 8.
a. b. 9. a. b.
War, what are its usual fruits. I. 239. a. b. The consequence of a war raised in a communion. 241.
b. Whether in a war justice gives us reason to hope for good success. 280. a. Its laws are very cruel. 518. b. Which makes people detest the causes of it. ibid. An unfair war occasioned by the vengeance of the Duke of Montpensier. 591. One of its calamities. II. 159. b. An advantage possessed by the widows of those who had been slain in the wars. 289. There is nothing like the tongues of orators to cause a war either to begin or to continue.
 547. b. To conduct a war according to the laws of religion, is a Platonic idea. 511. b. Dicae-archus said that it destroyed more men than any other thing. 657. b. Those whose professions ought to lead them to dissuade from war, are often the instigators of it. 811. a. b. The wickedness of some particular persons, and the folly of the people, are the source of almost every war. ibid. a. It is a disgrace to return from a long war with empty hands. III. 396. b. Reflexions upon the wars which Clergymen advise. 871. b. The Cardinal's war, what it was. 873. b. A person that has learnt the art of war only by reading, ought to keep to the theory. IV. 14. b. The sacred war, by whom occasioned. 621, 622. War has maxims which become pernicious, when applied to the affairs of religion. 178. a. b. 179. a.
Waramund (Leonhart) writes in defence of Gebhard Truchses Archbishop of Cologne, and is refuted by González Pontius de Leon. III. 774.
Warriors, there are a great many who know how to conquer, but few who know how to make use of their victory. II. 413. a. b.
Wars (Civil) sometimes produce good effects. I. 577.
a. b. Whether in civil wars the Prince's party gives itself more liberty than the rebels. 711.
b. The scruples which Bogars had about the civil wars of the Protestants. II. 70. and a. b.
 The usual protestations that attend them. 515.
a. b.
Wars (Religious) are horrible. I. 648. a. From whence proceeded the first religious war in France.
 III. 513. a.
Wars (Literary) are sometimes violent and of a long continuance. I. 322. b. The hostilities that are committed

- committed in them. II. 433. a. b. &c. Resemble much those of Princes. 798. b.
- Warsaw*, Gustavus Adolphus makes incursions to the gates of that city. V. 666.
- Watchings*: impurities were committed in the devotional watchings that were observed in the ancient Church. V. 337. a. and n. (35). 472. a.
- Watchmen of the City*, in the Song of Solomon, explained by the Ecclesiastical powers: an explication occasioned by the author's imprisonment. III. 772. a. b.
- Water*, who taught men to mix it with their wine. I. 284. b. A certain water, which had a wonderful property. II. 876. b. It was the principle of all things, according to Thales. III. 650. a. V. 323. a. b. A health drunk and pledged with a large glass of water. 346. a. b. The proof of water in the prosecution of witches held lawful by William Adolphus Scribonius. 100.
- Wavre* is a Priory of Benedictines, and not a monastery of Canons regular. IV. 943. b.
- Weeks of Daniel*, Peter de Beloy's exposition of them. I. 740. b.
- Were-Wolf*: a discourse on the sentence that was passed on a man accused and convicted of being a were-wolf. I. 562. b. A man who transformed himself into one condemned to be burnt by an Arrêt of the Parliament of Dole. ibid.
- Wert*, a village of the province of Guelderland, to which the General, who bore that name, belonged. V. 539.
- Wessalus*, his life is little known. V. 544. b. Albert Hardenberg writes his life. III. 353.
- Whitaker* retracts part of what he had advanced in giving Campian the lye. III. 940. b. 941. a. b.
- Whole*: the word all or whole has both a collective, and a distributive sense. I. 298. b.
- Whores*, whether that word be more shocking than the word courtesan. V. 848.
- Whore* (Royal) what person was so called. II. 381.
- Whoredom*, whether the magistrate may and ought to punish it. I. 222. a. b. 223. a. b. What the abolition of it cost. 628. a. See Fornication.
- Whores* occasion a general war in Greece. IV. 579. a. An author wishes that it were permitted to give that name publicly to all women who are guilty of luxury. II. 400. b.
- Wicked Men*, their prosperity has at all times made people murmur against the providence of God. IV. 932. b. 933. a. b. &c.
- Wickedness*, in what manner God restrains it. II. 736. a.
- Wickliff* expelled from the University of Oxford. V. 556. b.
- Wicquefort*, a thought of his. I. 129. a. n. (16). The judgment which he passes on the greatest part of those who attempt to write the History of the United Provinces without permission. 170. a. b. n. (1). His morality is a great deal purer and more evangelical than that of some Divines. II. 154. a.
- Widows*, how much of their riches must be abated, when they have had no children. I. 393. b. An advantage possessed by those whose husbands had been slain in the wars. II. 289. Such as would never marry again, have always been most admired. III. 191. b.
- Widows of the Kings of France*, what they were obliged to do, till such time as their husbands were buried. III. 874. a. 828. b.
- Wierus*, his testimony concerning a black dog which Agrippa had. I. 151. a. And touching a fourth book attributed to the same Agrippa. 154. a.
- Will*: the will is not distinct from the understanding according to Spinoza, and has no liberty. V. 206. b. 207. a.
- Will*: sick persons put off making their will, as a bad omen. IV. 537. b. n. (24).
- William the Conqueror*, his laws condemned to castration those who forced a woman. III. 77. a.
- William I*, Prince of Orange, consults Baudouin. I. 692. b. His manifesto. III. 674. b.
- William III*, never besieged a place, the governor of which acknowledged him as a King. III. 718. a.
- Willis*, his doctrine concerning the souls of Brutes. IV. 912. a. b.
- Wilmot* (John), See Rocheester.
- Wimpfen*, when the Margrave of Baden was defeated there by Count de Tili. V. 357. b.
- Winchester*, the foundation of its college. V. 554. b. 555. a.
- Wind*: it has been found by observation, that there reigns a constant wind from east to west in the Torrid Zone. V. 782.
- Windet* censures the French and English translations of the Alcoran. IV. 872. b.
- Windsor*, who had the direction of the building of that castle. V. 552.
- Wine*, who taught men to mix water with it. I. 284. b. Made serviceable in the cure of distempers. 526. The faculty of bearing much wine, is, physically speaking, a good quality, but it is most commonly attended with a moral irregularity. II. 598. a. Priest-wine, what it is. 815. b. Effects of wine with relation to impurity. 822. a. The Romans forbid their women the use of it. ibid. a. b. 823. a. b. III. 967. a. IV. 756. a. b. 757. a.
- Wings* that a person made use of to fly with. II. 598. and a. b.
- Winter* of life, when it begins. I. 125. b. IV. 163. a.
- Wirttemberg* (Ulric Duke of) kills the Marshal of his court. III. 539. Seizes the Imperial town of Reutlingen, which occasions his being driven out of his dominions. ibid.
- Wirttemberg* (the Duke of) promises to abandon the Calvinists of France. III. 287. b. 288. a. Kills a gentleman, whose wife he was in love with. 541.
- Wife*: whether none but wife men live free from servitude. II. 427. b. Whether a wife man ought to marry. III. 382. b. What the infensibility of a wife man ought to be. IV. 669. b. The different significations of that word. V. 46. b.
- Wish*, one becoming a Philosopher. I. 560. b.
- Wishgots* had a law which condemned Sodomites to castration. III. 77. a.
- Wit*: a bar should be opposed against all the subtilties of human wit. I. 481. a. Whether let's wit be required to apply than to invent a thought. II. 778. a. b. 779. a. Wit may prevent the effects of ugliness. IV. 869. b. Your greatest wits have a mixture of madness. II. 321. a.
- Witchcraft*, a woman accused of it, and put to the torture. I. 147. b. Little credit is to be given to it. 621. a. b. The most incredulous Philosophers are puzzled on that head. III. 214. b. There are some people who believe nothing that is said about it. IV. 716. a. b. A posture that was taken for a kind of witchcraft. I. 207. b. 208. a. See Magic.
- Witches*: a witch filed a broomstick rider. I. 4. a. They steal children, and consecrate them to the Devil. II. 838. a. A confutation of those who doubt of the truth of what is said of them by Elich. 750. a.
- Witnesses*: what is said of the witnesses of some countries. II. 302. b. 303. a. There is a great difference between a hear-say witness and an eye-witness. 708. b. Their retractions should not be admitted as an evidence, and why. IV. 761. a. A person is not obliged to produce more than one witness, after making use of the phrase, there are who have said, &c. I. 236. b.
- Witnesses of the Truth*: a remark upon the character of authors, to whom the Protestants have given that title. II. 252. b. V. 71. b.
- Wittenberg*, its Divines do not reason at all consequentially upon the divorce of Henry VIII. I. 657. b. 658. a. b. Who first introduced the study of Chymistry into that University. V. 113.
- Wives*, there are some who make use of drugs to cause abortion. II. 314. b. A young and beautiful wife is not at all convenient for a traveller. IV. 282. a. Disloyal wives generally make some amends for the injury they do their husbands, by their flatteries and submission. 760. b. An uncommon instance of a wife's affection for her husband. 379. b.
- Wolfius* (Jerom) causes the Rectorship of the new college of Altorf to be given to John-Thomas Freigius. III. 105.
- Wolzege* advanced this proposition, that God might deceive, if he would. IV. 876. b. &c.
- Woman in Labour*, the story of one who caused the blessed candle to be put out, in order to make it serve her another time. II. 83. a. An author who compares himself to one, after having violated the oath which he had taken never to have any thing to do with the Bookfellers. 82. a. b. The reasons which

- which very justly discharge a woman from any thing she may have sworn on such an occasion. 83. a.
- Womb*: a seal fixed to all the wombs of the house of Abimelech. I. 38. b. What the Scripture means by the opening and closing of the womb. 448. b.
- Women* have in all ages been the occasion of several wars. I. 24. a. b. Are easily gained by verses and music. 27. b. A woman who prostitutes her honour, with her husband's consent, in order to save his life. 90. St Augustin's loose principle of morality on that head. 91. and a. b. A woman put to the torture, purely because she was suspected to be the daughter of a witch. 147. b. Women are sometimes obliged to hear very disagreeable things in certain judicial proceedings. 391. a. b. 392. a. b. 393. a. b. What are the parts of their happiness. 392. b. 393. a. b. What is the most dangerous rock for their honour. 405. A doctrine more extravagant than the community of women. 290. a. b. The story of the woman that was twice carried to be buried. 526. b. 527. a. A reflexion upon the qualities of handsome and rich, or poor and ugly, with respect to marriage. 550. a. b. What punishment the ancient Romans inflicted upon women taken in Adultery. 592. a. b. They seldom fall into Atheism. 639. a. Were not permitted to assist at the Olympic Games. 761. and a. b. Are very fond of fine cloaths and ornaments. II. 98. a. b. 99. a. b. III. 185. b. 569. b. 570. a. Whether it be praising a woman, to say that she rejected an immodest proposal. II. 27. a. b. How a modest woman was revenged upon her seducer. 220. a. b. There are some who are neither young nor handsome, and who nevertheless inspire men with as much or more passion, than those who have these qualities. 256. b. Those of high quality are forced to make the first advances in love to their inferiors. 312. a. b. They occasion a great many misfortunes. 481. b. The courage of those of Lacedæmon. 522. b. 523. a. It is a mortal offence to them, to see the advances which they make to men despised. 535. a. III. 20. b. 21. a. b. A woman that makes use of a strange remedy to kill her concupiscence. II. 556. a. b. 557. a. b. III. 99. a. Another bites her tongue off, and spits it in the tyrant's face. II. 557. a. A kind of nakedness for which some were blamed. 593. a. 645. a. Of a very small stature. 599. a. b. The Romans forbid them the use of wine. 822. a. b. 823. a. b. III. 967. a. IV. 756. a. b. 757. a. And left the punishment of their crimes, to the discretion of their husbands and relations. 756. a. Such of them as are cruel and ambitious, exceed men in those two vices. II. 862. b. One must fly them, in order to avoid temptation. III. 65. a. b. 66. a. The complaint which one made at a time. 75. b. 76. a. One of the surest ways to draw them, is to set up fraternities of an austere reformation. 103. a. b. Men who lay with them, in order to prove their continence. ibid. b. 104. a. In what manner the women of Mentz expressed their grief for the death of an author, who had bestowed great praises on their sex. 105. and a. b. It has been maintained that they are not of the human species. 144. a. b. And that they are not made after the image of God. 145. a. b. A Pope grants a dispensation for a man to have two at the same time. 165. and a. b. What influence they have towards establishing or overthrowing religious opinions. 220. a. There are some very learned women. 249. a. b. Thirty things requisite to make them perfectly handsome. 364. a. b. French women are less scrupulous in their child-births, than those of other countries. 453. b. What is the greatest encomium that can be bestowed upon a woman. 601. b. 602. a. b. They are capable of reigning well. 530. a. A chaste woman frights away calumny. 601. b. When they have a share in the government, they are more honoured and respected, than their husbands themselves. 636. a. Who was the first woman that prophesied among the Greeks. 712. The ancient Greeks would not suffer them to be present at feasts. 966. b. Such as love study, ought not to marry. 855. a. They sell their modesty sometimes at a very dear rate to their husbands. 814. b. Are very ill taken care of by Mahomet's law. IV. 34. a. b. 35. a. b. Books published upon the excellency of their sex. 147. and a. b. 148. a. b. The sovereign power ought not to be lodged in their hands. 308. b. 309. a. 406. a. V. 519. b. A severe law against those that should conceal either their pregnancy, or their lying-in. IV. 499. b. &c. Whether religion has more power over them, than the point of honour, to engage them to Continency. 500. a. b. An admirable Plant which hindered them from committing Adultery. 610. a. b. They are suspected of love-intrigues so soon as they shew their affection to a man. 692. a. A poor woman that a man marries, is very often not the less proud on that account. 753. a. The Romans were obliged to repeal a law which forbid the women to wear any ornaments. 769. b. 770. a. Privileges granted to them. II. 217. a. b. How they suffer themselves to be seduced by leud Heretics. 779. and a. b. 780. a. b. An impudent action of some women. V. 131. and a. b. A woman that swam quite naked over the Seine. 393. a. b. A supposition concerning their souls. 139. a. b. A collection should be made of such as were a scandal to their sex and country. 519. a. See Maid. They would seldom do evil, if they were not enticed to it by the men. 426. b. The confession of their sins is always defective. 533. a. b. A time when they wore looking-glasses over their bellies. II. 400. a. b. An author who wishes that it were permitted to call all those Whores, who give themselves up to luxury. ibid. b. They would rather abandon their luxury for the King than for God. ibid. b. There is such a one, that debauches as many women as he can, that yet would cruelly use his sisters and sisters-in-law, and even his mother, if he caught them in the fact. IV. 609. b. They can so straiten themselves that no man can have to do with them: examples. 800. b. 801. a. A woman that lies with her footman, deserves to be punished. II. 508. a. Drunkenness, a common vice among them. V. 540. a. b. Why a virtuous woman is not offended with veiled expressions, and is angry with a filthy word. 850. 856. It is not for their honour, to enter into such proceedings as the congress is. IV. 799. a. b. 800. a. b. &c. V. 799.
- Wood*, the price of it raised in England, by the great number of Heretics burnt there. I. 272. b. What those Heretics were. ibid. Whether allum can make wood incombustible. 424. a. b.
- Word of God* is to Divines, the foundation and source of their proofs and solutions. V. 818. It ought to satisfy every good Christian, that his faith is founded on the Word of God. 829.
- Words*, people run more eagerly after the new than the old. I. 63. a. Words that were made use of to frighten little children. 63. and b. Their significance may vary from time to time. 568. a. Complaints which have been made against the change that happens to them, and which are very ill grounded. III. 208. a. b. 209. a. b. They will sometimes go as far as the sword. IV. 663. b. The stage is a good forge for new words. 743. a. b. A dialogue wrote to ridicule those who make use of antiquated words. I. 69. b. 70. a. IV. 831. a. They ought to be ranged with great nicety. V. 327. b. Some of them are obscene in certain books, and not obscene in others. 844. What makes them obscene. ibid. and 845. The Stoics laughed at the distinction of words. 847. The nicest fully the imagination, as much as the most obscene. 849.
- Workman*: the Civil-Law requires that a workman who excels in any art, should have his life given him, though he may have deserved to lose it. I. 197. b. 198. a.
- Works*, when an adversary attacks them by way of the secular arm, it only strengthens the good opinion which people had of them before. I. 544. There are some excellent ones which have great imperfections. 752. a. The posthumous works of an author are ever faulty, when enlarged by means of his undigested memoirs. II. 429. b. A work, how ever strong in itself, will hardly appear so in the fragments that an adversary alledges out of it. 488. a. b. A work, the loss whereof ought to be regretted. 562. a. b. They ought not to be compared with one another by bits, but a whole work compared with a whole work. 553. a. b. The first work that a man publishes may be a most accomplished piece. 582. b. We ought to speak with great caution of a work, that we know only by the report of others. 589. a. b. People

People are frequently mistaken about the names of the true authors of them. 808. a. Works by which people are imposed upon. III. 236. b. A man should study the rules well, before he pronounces that a work is good or bad. 337. b. There are works of such a nature, that there is no avoiding mistakes in them. 622. b. Easier to be understood by the abstracts which are given of them, than by themselves. 344. a. b.

Works: of the merit of good works. II. 172. a. b. Bucer's ambiguous expressions and variations, on the merit of works. 178. a. b. 179. a. b. The difficulties to be met with in that matter. 178. People would easily agree on that subject, according to Grotius, if they would but banish Chicanery. ibid. b.

World, the calculation of its duration, according to the Greek Bible, preferred before the calculation of the Hebrew text. I. 165. a. How many great conjunctions there have been since its creation. 164. b. 165. a. The eternity of it taught publicly at Alexandria in the VIth century, by a Pagan Philosopher. 270. b. We cannot demonstrate by particular reasons, that each body in the universe is in the best state it could possibly be in. 310. b. 311. a. An egg had been employed in the production of it, according to the Pagan Theology. 444. a. b. Was too narrow for two brothers. II. 249. b. Hypotheses touching its origin and production. 119. a. b. 672. b. 673. a. 786. b. 787. a. b. 788. a. b. 789. a. One half of the world laughs at the other. 697. a. The world is a true wheel of fortune. 832. a. IV. 435. a. b. Had not two principles collateral, eternal, and independent of one another. III. 447. a. b. A tradition about its end. 780. b. 781. a. b. A mark of its depravation. IV. 83. b. It does not grow worse and worse. 305. a. To reason well upon the production of it, we must acknowledge that God is the author of matter, and the first and sole principle of motion. 436. b. cf. seq. Its end foretold on Jesus Christ's being born under the watery triplicity. III. 780. a. An Astrologer foretells the end of it, after which he affirms that all the powers will fall into the hands of the Turks. V. 246. b. The principles of the Pagan Philosophers, touching the production of the world, were incoherent. 324. a. Ambiguities that are to be met with in the controversy, concerning the eternity of the world. 596. a. b. 597. a. b.

Worms, its council declares the election of Pope Hildebrand to be void. III. 229.

Worship: a religious worship that consisted in weeping. I. 114. a. b. And where the mourning ended in joy. ibid. b. and 116. a. What is the most acceptable to God. II. 315. b. 316. a. How difficult a matter it is to correct the abuses of worship. III. 743. b. 744. a. b.

Worthies: the expedition of the seven Worthies. I. 117.

Wotton (Dr) convicts Thomas Elyot of a fraud. II. 770. a.

Woven disliked several things in the reformation of Luther and Calvin. V. 565. a.

Write: an expedient which the ancient Arabs made use of for writing. IV. 177. b. Persons who could write a whole speech, though the Orator spoke never so fast. 811. b. Persons who excelled in that art. 883. b. The reputation of writing well, is a great burthen upon a man. 707. b.

Writers: ancient writers have been made to say several things, which they never thought of. I. 309. a. b. Several of them make use of the property of other men, without mentioning their benefactor. 396. a. II. 78. b. Give us inconsistent accounts of one and the same person. I. 525. a. b. Some of them please at first for their novelty, and at last for their antiquity. 556. a. They should relate matters so, that there may be no need of having recourse to conjectures, in order to understand them. II. 180. a. One of the faults of a writer. ibid. and a. (2). A writer is very negligent, when he only quotes the title of a book in a general manner. 136. b. Neither the French nor Spanish writers thought much of what was to come, in what they wrote against one another. 338. a. A line of Virgil applied on that head. ibid. Writers too fruitful, and who compose too hastily. III. 69. b. 70. a. When passion governs them, they never think of the future, and thus they furnish arms against their own party. 520. a. There are many of them who quoting an author, make him say whatever they think he should have said. 636. b. They often banish moderation and sincerity from their writings, when they are of a different religion. IV. 54. a. How we ought to explain their complaints against the ingratitude of their own time. 454. b. 460. a. A judgment concerning the most celebrated writers of ancient Rome. 778. b. 779. a. b. Some of them are glad to hear that their works have been put into the Index. 827. b. A specimen of the fidelity of several. V. 569. b. 570. a. Many of them add divers things to the testimonies which they quote. 234. b. How those ought to do, who are not bigotted to their own opinions. 811. See Authors.

Writing (Greek) which was made use of as an original or pattern, by those who engraved the types of that language. V. 461.

Writings: which may be called inlaid work. I. 188. b. How we ought to judge of some sort of writings. II. 279. a. b. We cannot give much credit to posthumous writings, especially when they come from remote countries. IV. 833. b. The good fortune of some writings. V. 779. What sort of writings are necessary to be consulted by the author of such a work as this. II. 8. b.

X.

Xanthippus is the first man to speak ill of his own father. IV. 570. a.

Xenades, what he said, after he had bought Diogenes. II. 669. a.

Xenocrates, his continence occasions his being called a statue. III. 704. b. Rallied by Aristotle. I. 112. b.

Xenocrates (the Carthaginian) did not deny that beasts had the knowledge of God. IV. 904. a. b.

Xenophanes, his principles in their natural connexion. V. 585. b. 586. a. b. 587. a. b. 588. a. b.

His genius unjustly despised by Aristotle. 587. a.

Xenophon makes an end of the sacrifice, notwithstanding the news of his son's death. I. 683. a. Said that God humbles the great and raises the little ones. 575. a. b.

Xerxes, a witty saying of that Prince. I. 522. and b.

Xiphilin should not have suppressed the feigned madness of Archelaus. I. 422. b.

Y.

YEAR, the English do not begin it in their public records till the 25th of March. II. 576. a. b. (3). According to Albatagni and Lucides, every hundred and six years occasions the difference of a day in the Solar and the Julian year. III. 904. b.

Yang: whether it be the part of a wife man, to wish to grow young again. IV. 755. b.

Yang men ought to have many superfluities, which might be pruned. I. 61. a.

Yauts: persons that come to distinguish themselves, are often upbraided with the follies of their youth. IV. 724. b.

Yauts: a new author to be added to the famous youths of Mr Baillet. III. 33. a. A person who has been justly reckoned among illustrious youths. IV. 184. a. b.

Z.

Zabarella (Francis) his book de Schismate. V. 591. a.

Zachary, (Pope) ranks the antipodes among the chimera's prejudicial to religion. V. 493. a. b.

Zalucus, his law against those who proposed any innovation. V. 314. b.

Zamoski (John) the greatest Hero that was in Poland, chooses Simon Simonides for his Secretary, and procures him the honour of Knighthood. V. 149.

Zanchius (Jerom) makes use of a mental reservation, in signing a formulary. V. 599. a. b. 600. a. b. The confession which he drew up. 601. a. A passage quoted by Father Labbe, where Zanchius speaks very ill of the Protestant writers. ibid. b. 602. a. b.

Zaphira

- Zaphira* (John) on the news of the birth of a son, drank to such excess, as occasioned his death. III. 532. and a. Soliman had an inclination to see that child, made him rich presents, and caressed him much. ibid. a. b.
- Zeal*: unseasonable zeal, how fatal to the Church. I. 13. b. 14. a. b. The effects of false zeal. 140. a. b. 545. b. 546. a. 790. a. b. II. 246. b. IV. 517. a. b. 518. a. b. 856. a. b. It sometimes suffers real or pretended impieties to lie dormant a great while. I. 468. a. Religious zeal, to what a furious excess it proceeds sometimes. 545. b. 546. a. Most of those who have a great zeal, become credulous and suspicious. 758. a. What zeal makes people believe to the prejudice of Heretics. II. 796. b. A reflexion upon the effects of false zeal. III. 624. a. Religious zeal, to what excess does it not proceed, when it is false. 947. a. b. What is sufficient to moderate it. IV. 188. b. An instance of a furious zeal. 270. a. b. 271. a. A strange instance of its extravagance. 698. b.
- Zealots*, in point of religion, are dangerous enemies. I. 29. b. 30. a. b. 31. a. False Zealots have recourse to accusations of impiety, in order to support themselves in a most unjust authority. 374. b. The greatest part of them fear nothing more than the Orthodoxy of those, whom they accuse. 491. b. The character of many of them. 716. b. They would have people to be determinate and resolute, when the question is about embracing or anathematizing an opinion. II. 706. a. The passions raised by them is more formidable to Princes, than the arms of the Infidels. III. 624. a. Their usual - artifice. IV. 815. a. b. They condemn in their neighbour what they themselves do. V. 471. b. 472. a. The most honest find accusers. 58.
- Zemzem*, the sacred well of Mecca. IV. 179. a. b.
- Zeno*, chief of the Stoics, maintained opinions directly opposite to those of Arcefilas. I. 409. b. 410. a. One of his tenets was far from being just. 462. b.
- Zeno of Elea*, a difficulty which he proposed against the reality of motion. I. 82. b.
- Zeno*, the Epicurean; it is pretended that the Poet Lucretius was his disciple. III. 924. b. 925. a.
- Ziglerus* got nothing by curtailing Aventine's Annals. I. 549. a.
- Zindikites* (a Mahometan sect) whence so called, and what their sentiments are. V. 199. a.
- Zocotora*, an island, the religion of its inhabitants. II. 677. and a. b. 678. a. b.
- Zones* are all torrid with respect to love. II. 80. a. 823. b.
- Zoroaster* teaches the Persians Philosophy. I. 444. He lays down two first principles, one of good and the other of evil. ibid.
- Zosrianus*, an ancient Heretic. I. 255.
- Zuinglians*, to procure peace between them and the Lutherans, Bucer chose general and ambiguous expressions. II. 177. Bucer thought their doctrine concerning the Eucharist too narrow. ibid. a. b. John Schutze's rancour against them. V. 89. a. b.
- Zurich*, the disputes occasioned by the agreement, which the Lutherans and Calvinists entered into there. V. 548. b. 549. a.
- Zuski* (Basil) Great Duke of Muscovy, is dethroned and confined in a monastery. V. 653.

II X

